The present system is not without its benefits for the foreigners. They do not get lost and things do not happen to them that the Government can prevent. On its side the Government knows what they are doing and writing and saying. Their speeches are usually reported by the metropolitan police, a body which is attached to the Home Department, deriving its name from the fact that its original duty was to protect the royal household in Tokio. Apparently some of its functions are delegated to the municipal police. At the present time a foreigner whose views might be classed as radical, or who has connections with Japanese labor or radical movements, will receive periodic visits from some member of the police force, who endeavors to find out what meetings he is going to hold or attend and sometimes what he is thinking concerning some current happening. This interview quite often becomes a friendly conversation on many subjects far beyond the object of inquiry, so the method should make for the education of the Japanese police force. Indeed the whole system seems to be more for the information of the Government than for the suppression of the foreigner. The only case in which anyone has been prevented from speaking was that of Margaret Sanger, and under Japanese public pressure that was finally modified to allow private meetings, which meant that a gathering of forty or fifty persons was not prohibited.

Either there is no desire to conceal the system or else there is a childlike naivete about its workings. Several men will appear at a women's meeting. When questioned they will say, yes, they came from the police department, and when asked to withdraw will do so without objection. They have been carrying out a routine and do not care to press the point. Letters of people who are being watched are, of course, opened and resealed according to the world-wide system of secret-service organizations, but in Japan you are quite likely to have somebody from the police department drop around and ask you about a meeting whose notices you have sent out by mail before the letters could possibly have reached their destination. You may notice in the midst of your audience a stenographer evidently working with efficiency; so the Home Department gets a first-hand report instead of the garbled accounts that our American ignorant under-cover men pass in to those who are foolish enough to pay them. If the Foreign Office is interested in what you are saying you are quite likely when you meet one of its officials to have him casually remark: "I have just been reading in Japanese the lecture that you delivered yesterday."

There is no such strenuous effort to suppress speech as there is with us, but there is a keen desire to know all that is going on, and this is achieved with great thoroughness. A man may be invited officially to lecture before a bureau of some government department another bureau of which is engaged in reporting all his lectures.

Things go differently where the local police are concerned, especially when they are dealing with educational institutions where they are not supposed to enter. If a college invites a foreign lecturer, a policeman is likely to come around afterward and ask a student what he talked about, only to be told that his question is silly. Plain-clothes men, however, are beginning to come into college halls. On one occasion recently, after a lecture by a well-known Japanese scholar in an institution supported from abroad, a police official called on the authorities to say that if that sort of thing were repeated it would be necessary to have men in uniform present at future occasions. When he was asked what had been said that was objectionable, he replied: "Well, I was asleep, but the other men reported that he said 'the government says my education cost them several thousand yen, but I say its cost was milked from the toilers of Japan.' That sort of thing cannot go on."

The new Japan is evidently baffling law and order quite a bit. It is raising more problems than the system is at present able to meet. Students have always had freedom of speech and considerable liberty of action. They have been accustomed to get their desires in the academic world by means of the strike. Recently the Ministry of Education has proposed a military training system for the colleges, offering our example in the States as one of the reasons for it. It will go through, but the students do not want it and have already begun their parades of protest. Their leaders get arrested, but this leads only to another protest, and the authorities are likely to find that they cannot run an educational system by force.

The tactic in Japan has always been to allow perfect freedom within the universities. There things could be discussed which were forbidden outside. It is the same with books. There has been practically no interference with publications in English, so that the intellectuals can read things which are beyond the reach of the common people because they may not appear in Japanese. This indicates the government estimate of the capacity of the intellectuals as a force for social change, but it may be that the Government has not reckoned with new Japan. In the universities the students are forming social-science clubs which are nationally federated. They exist for the purpose of discussing things which are not in the curriculum and nothing under heaven is too radical for their inquiry. The Government has forbidden them in middle schools and colleges, but dares not touch them in the universities. These groups are forming direct contacts with the growing labor organizations. Their members are serving in labor colleges and helping to organize them. This contact between the students and the world of labor makes a new question for the Government.

Heretofore, the authorities in Japan have used their powers with reserve. But with all their cleverness there is the unavoidable stupidity which is inherent always in the method of espionage and repression. They cannot understand that to suppress books is only to incite people to read them. They did not foresee that forbidding Margaret Sanger to land was merely to invite a horde of journalists to interview her on the ship, spread her point of view throughout Japan, and create an irresistible demand among the intellectuals to meet her face to face.

The test of the restraint of the authorities in their use of suppression is the growing labor movement. It is now passing from the guidance of the intellectuals who have inspired and created it to the control of men from the rank and file. It is consolidating its efforts with the farmers, who also are developing an effective organization. The liberal movement in the intellectual world is the third element in what will prove to be a very strong coalition which has already compelled the Government to put through a universal male suffrage measure. Practically the only concession which the conservatives could secure was to limit the age of voting to twenty-five and that of office-holding to thirty, and this will not hold for long. To offset this, however, and also the Russian trade agreement, the Government offered the conservatives, and put through, a new measure of suppression which is called the Peace Preservation Bill, at the same time repealing some of the powers formerly given to the police.

This new law is like some of our State sedition or criminal syndicalist measures. It is couched in general terms and can be used to prevent meetings, writing, or discussion in behalf of any change in the political or economic system. The Government, however, is going to have some fun when it comes to enforce the law. One phrase prevents the discussion of change in the property system, and in reply to questions the Home Minister has said that the Government only wishes to prevent interference with private property in consumption goods, that it does not desire to prevent discussion of nationalization of the land or other means of production. To this the liberals reply by asking: "What, then, are you going to do with the municipality of Tokio, which has already gone into housing schemes to provide under municipal ownership some decent homes for workingmen at a reasonable rent?"

The Government is rapidly developing the customary technique for dealing with the rising power of labor, with some Japanese refinements. Parades have to be permitted and there is enough red in the Japanese trade-union banners to scare our hundred-percenters into paralysis. But on occasion speaking is prohibited and the singing of "The Red Flag" or the "Internationale." On other occasions certain topics are under the ban of the police and any attempt to mention them or to sing the prohibited songs results in speedy and numerous arrests. The police also have developed the habit of gathering-in the outstanding labor leaders the night before a demonstration is to occur, so now these men stay away from their homes and appear safely at the head of the procession the next morning. During the parade the police walk in long lines on either side of it and then occasionally jostle a marching worker out of line and arrest him for disorder. The last May Day parade was ordered to proceed only at the pace of a funeral march, but the workers said: "We don't mind; it is not our funeral."

The Japanese workingmen have a virility and a temper which makes it dangerous for the Government to press them too far. They have shown sufficient strength to lead the powers that be to treat them a little more carefully than they did a few years ago. It is this independent spirit of the Japanese workers which makes quite unlikely the success of anything like a Fascist movement in Japan. Already one or two organizations of this kind have come into action, but they appear to represent the old regime rather than the new industrialists. They are stressing loyalty to ancient ideals and operate under names which put about them the cloak of the old culture. They have not hesitated to use force and violence. Recently they raided the house of a man who was opposing the military-training bill, but the Government will not let that go far, because the workers will most surely answer in kind.

There is one point at which the control of the Government is absolute and that is over the press. Two copies of all printed matter must be sent to the Home Department. In order to avoid the loss incident upon having a book forbidden, publishers naturally try to get a ruling beforehand in the case of doubtful manuscripts. To all papers, magazines, and periodicals the Home Department constantly sends bulletins naming certain matters which must not be reported or discussed on penalty of five to seven years' imprisonment. The result is complete silence concerning anything which the Government thinks might incite the people to action. For instance, the outcasts, who number something over a million at the bottom of Japanese society, have recently been fighting the other people of certain communities in the endeavor to get some of the rights and privileges which have long been denied them. For a day or two the news of these outbreaks appeared in the papers and then suddenly there was silence. Likewise during the discussion over the suffrage bill there was an attack on the president of the Privy Council because of his opposition, but not a word of this was allowed to appear in print. Of course, there are some things that are too important to be suppressed. Concerning others, as usual, repression is stupid enough to defeat itself, for news spreads rapidly in the Orient by a grapevine system and with all due exaggeration.

The vital question for the immediate future of Japan is whether law and order will have wit enough to help emancipate the workers instead of keeping them down. There is a good deal in old Japan that would lead in that direction, but, of course, the new capitalists of industrialism and their satellites all press in the other direction. But the centralized authority of Japan might conceivably be used in alliance with the rising power of the farmers and workers to nationalize the land and socialize the big industrial means of production. Before the industrialists gather strength enough to resist they might be maneuvered into the position of opposing the divine authority of the Emperor. The question is whether such a tactic could be developed before the prestige of the Throne is entirely lost. But Japan at least has a possibility, which exists in no other nation, of using an ancient and real respect for a genuine and not a fake system of law and order to secure a larger social freedom. Should this happen, it would give the West, both its anarchistic Fascists and its Marxian logicians, something new to think about.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1925 No. 3141

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 291
EDITORIALS:
What China Asks 293
The Evidence of Things Seen 294
He Built Ships 295
King Calvin 296
BORING FROM WITHIN. By George W. Norris 297
THE INQUIRING REPORTER IN SHANGHAI. By Paul Blanshard 299
THE CHEAT. By Ruth Janet Barber 300
WORKERS IN PALESTINE. By Ludwig Lewisohn 301
NOW THAT THESE TWO—. By James Rorty 302
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 303
CORRESPONDENCE 303
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
The Tramp. By Lillian Byrnes 305
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 305
Count Montgelas on the War. By Harry Elmer Barnes 305
The Mayan Calendar. By Frederick S. Dellenbaugh 306
Wages and the Family. By Paul H. Douglas 307
Communism and Christianity. By Shirley Jackson Case 307
The Last of the Yeomen. By Emery Neff 308
A Modern Cassandra. By David Saville Muzzey 309
Books in Brief 309
Drama: "Siegfried." By Joseph Wood Krutch 311
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
A Bulgarian Protest 312
Mexico's Agricultural Slump 314

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

IT IS NOT FOR THE LAYMAN to decide whether the navy's great airship Shenandoah perished, and wiped out fourteen lives, through unavoidable accident or through human fault; but it is equally not his place to permit the Washington bureaucracy to smother the facts with a fictitious inquiry and nationalistic propaganda designed to lead the public to "carry on." The layman must not cease to demand a thorough investigation and should refuse to accept any report that bears evidence of concealment or superficiality. The charges of that stormy petrel of aviation, Colonel William Mitchell, are, so far, merely charges, and it is a pity that he should have mixed with them a plea for his hobby of an air service separate from the Army and Navy departments. Nevertheless, Colonel Mitchell is a sincere and intelligent student of aviation, and it is undeniable that the navy has been historically dilatory and timid in taking up new devices. It is also to be noted that Colonel Mitchell's most specific charge of error in regard to the Shenandoah—too few valves for the helium gas bags—is also made by Captain Anton Heinen, who helped in building the airship. The destruction of the Shenandoah, together with the fiasco of the airplane flight from San Francisco to Hawaii and the loss of one of the machines with its crew, is a severe blow to the prestige of the navy. The Nation is not greatly interested in the politics of the situation—it is opposed to the whole program of war preparations, in the air, on the water, or on the land—but it is vitally concerned that our aviators be not needlessly sacrificed and it wants to see America take a leading place in developing aviation as a means of peaceful world communication.

WHEN THE SHENANDOAH fell thousands of newspaper readers assured themselves: "These airships aren't much good; no matter how strong they are built, some gale will get them." And certainly there were some to add that such unnatural means of locomotion are against nature and contrary to the will of God. The grandparents of these persons said the same thing about the steam railroad, the ship propelled by steam, the horseless carriage, the telephone, the wireless. In spite of them, of course, these inventions were perfected and have become accepted assets of our civilization; in spite of them experiments with lighter-than-air craft will be continued and, although the problems to be confronted are immensely greater with airships than with trains anchored solidly to steel rails or even steamboats held up by the sometimes inconstant ocean, the airship will, in the course of years, doubtless be improved and made moderately safe for ordinary travel—as safe as the modern express train, which also has its catastrophes. Meanwhile, those who perished with the broken Shenandoah have joined the great army of those who have died in the cause of invention; they are still dying and will always die as long as science keeps moving, which is to say as long as the human race endures.

RENÉ VIVIANI, who died in Paris on September 7, was one of the most impassioned and eloquent of orators. In 1917 American audiences, which could not understand a word he said, were none the less carried off their feet by the torrential flow of his language and its apparent sincerity. He was, therefore, well picked to do his share in "selling the war" to a deceived and ignorant American public when he came over in 1917 as joint head, with Marshal Joffre, of the French delegation. For he put every ounce of his personality into his words and he burned truly with a "sacred flame" which came near to genius. But he was merely a vain and shifty politician with one extraordinary gift. It was France's misfortune that he was premier in 1914, but before then France had been so enmeshed by the Franco-Russian intrigues that it is doubtful if any of the prominent political figures of the day could have done much to head off the catastrophe. When the Austrian ultimatum to Serbia saw the light of day both Viviani and Poincaré—France's Machiavellian President—were in Petrograd bent on still further intrigues with the Russians against the peace of Europe. It is also a fact that when the declaration of war reached Paris Viviani, the head of the ministry, could not be located for some hours; history has kindly failed to lift the curtain as to his whereabouts at that fateful moment. For a year he carried on the government, but his forte was never that of an executive. His talent lay in his marvelous voice and that extraordinary passion of utterance which no one will forget who ever heard him at his best.

"MOSUL MEANS OIL," M. Briand cried in the French Chamber five years ago. M. Briand was in 1920 chastising Clemenceau for letting Lloyd George trick him out of the Mosul oil area. In 1925 the British are still trying to keep their control over the Mosul oil-fields. When Turkey and Great Britain came to the verge of war about Mosul, peace was concluded by referring the question to the "impartial" arbitrament of the League of Nations, which sent out a commission of inquiry. Mosul is now in the gentle hands of British officials trained in India. While the League's commission was nosing around Mosul a pro-Turk crowd shouted "Long live Turkey!" Looking behind him Count Teleki, chairman of the commission, saw policemen beating the pro-Turks with sticks, while an English police officer looked on unconcerned. Others who demonstrated for the wrong side were imprisoned. The commission sagely concluded that a plebiscite would be meaningless. Mosul includes many Turks and some Arabs, but it is chiefly populated by Kurds, a wild people who care for neither Turk nor Arab. (British rule in Mosul disguises itself as Arab rule, acting through the puppet kingdom of Irak.) The embarrassed commission finally concluded that if the League would prolong the British mandate over Irak—due, according to treaty, to expire in four years—for twenty-five years, to give time for "stability" to grow up, Mosul had best go to Irak; otherwise it might be carved up and divided between Irak (England) and Turkey. The British have generously consented to extend the mandate for the necessary twenty-five years. The decision is not surprising. Mosul still means oil.

IN 1860 THE DRUSES left the coast of Syria and trekked back into the interior in order to get away from the French, whom they hated. In 1919, in accordance with the war-time bargain secretly made with the British, the French came into possession of inland Syria, including the territory occupied by the Druses. The Druses revolted, but were defeated. They revolted again in 1920, in 1921, in 1922, and in 1924. How the French handle these revolts may be understood by citing one of their own Syrian communiqués of 1921:

> Colonel Rocrou's column left Damascus on June 23. It arrived at Kuneitra on June 26. The towns of Jabanal, El Karbab, Soumatié, Trank, Majhar, and Shihani, which had harbored the criminals [rebels] of Kuneitra, thereby rendering themselves accomplices, were destroyed by order of the High Commissioner. The property of their inhabitants was sequestered, and each town was condemned to pay an indemnity of from 50 to 100 gold pounds.
>
> At Jabanal, El Kashale, Artania, and Trank the column destroyed 17 camels on June 27. On June 28 it went to Niejdel Shams, Jelbat, El Set. On June 30 it returned to Kuneitra and sold all the confiscated goods.

By treaty in 1923 France guaranteed the autonomy of their state, the Jebel. But the French governor, Captain Carbillet, who had served his colonial apprenticeship in Senegal, has repeatedly violated that agreement. This year's revolt began with a request that he be replaced. When that was refused the Druses rose, capturing all but 70 of the force of 200 men garrisoning their capital, Soueida. A week later they defeated a relief column of 3,000 men, wounding 600 and killing or capturing 500. The Druses now demand as a condition of peace that the French rebuild the villages their airplanes have destroyed.

MOTION-PICTURE HOUSES are showing pictures of the American "heroes" who are fighting with the French in Morocco. Doubtless these boys are brave, but it is bravery in a sorry cause. Possibly they think that they are fighting in the cause of "peace" and "civilization"; but what do they think of civilization when it sends them flying forth to drop bombs on native herds and villages? They call their group the Lafayette Escadrille; what relation do they think that this business of bombing Africans into submission bears to the mission of Lafayette, who fought to help free America from the British? Every day the dispatches give new evidence of the dirty character of this warfare. From the New York Times we select, almost at random, this story:

> The submitted tribesmen . . . have returned home to find their houses stripped bare by tribesmen whose loyalty to the French was rewarded with the right to pillage. The Ghiatia tribe living around Taza thus plundered the Tsouls and the Tsouls got revenge by plundering the Branes, who are now awaiting their turn to plunder the rebel tribes north of them. This makes each submitted tribe eager to march against its neighbors.

The dispatch also speaks of the "hostages" exacted by the French from each rebel family. Civilization indeed! The adventurous boys who are helping the French in Africa are serving a civilization which has gone rotten.

IN FRANCE AND IN GERMANY political lines are melting and reforming. Ex-Chancellor Wirth, long the leader of the great Centrist (Catholic) Party in Germany, has resigned from his party. In the chaos of Germany's many political parties the Centrum has had to decide for Left or for Right. Neither the Nationalists and People's Party men of the Right nor the Socialists and Democrats of the Left were strong enough to govern without the Catholics; their support has made possible the conservative policy of recent months. While in foreign affairs Germany has in general continued in the fulfilment policy of Wirth's Cabinet, reaction has had its way in domestic affairs. The recent tax law is hailed by the Nationalists themselves as putting an end to the tax reforms of the revolutionary days of 1918-1919, and the new tariff recalls the Wilhelmine era when the Junkers maintained high prices for their crops by setting high duties on foodstuffs. Wirth cannot belong to a party which makes such a policy possible, but how far his revolt will spread remains to be seen. Meanwhile in France the Socialists have definitely broken with the Painlevé Government. They are still willing to support a liberal bourgeois Government such as Herriot's was, but Painlevé's policy in Morocco and Caillaux's tax policy are too much for them. When the Chamber reassembles they will vote against the Briand-Caillaux-Painlevé combination, and if it remains in office it will have to seek its support still further to the Right. Herriot, who helped put Painlevé in office, is left in a fix.

THE RICHMOND, VIRGINIA, NEWSPAPERS have given generous columns of praise and description to the recent convention of the colored Elks in that city. The convention was enormous—larger than Richmond's total colored population. These thousands were housed, entertained, fed, and the convention itself conducted without a single hitch. The Richmond Times-Dispatch spoke with special approval of the organizing capacity of M. A. Norrell, which "put to shame all previous arrangements for any convention ever held in Richmond by white or colored people." No strain in friendly relations was reported. During the great parade white people with houses on the line of march gave up porches and windows to the relatives and friends of the paraders. The concert, at which the four leading bands competed for honors, was crowded with a mixed audience. There was no race disorder, no friction, no rudeness reported from Richmond during the convention. If the city prided itself a little noisily on its successful adventure in friendly race relations, if a trace of surprise or condescension could be detected in its praise of the Negro Elks and their leaders, no one should seriously object. The more the white South boasts of a genuine goodwill toward the Negro the better for both races.

PUSSYFOOTING HAS BEEN CANONIZED as a national virtue in this country. Bitter newspaper rivals speak politely of one another, and political candidates are supposed to refer to their "honored adversaries" as if they really honored them. It is considered bad form to heckle a public speaker—an incidental result of which sober convention is the utter dulness of American political speeches. A man was arrested in St. Louis last month for calling John Roach Straton a liar. It was otherwise in frontier days. Newspaper leader-writers sometimes comment on the change as a development of good manners; it is also an indication that people care less about political issues than they used to. When men really care, really believe that political issues are important, they say what they think of their opponents and call lies lies. We like it when "Al" Smith asks Mr. Hearst's editor to "notify Mr. Hearst that I say that [Hearst's statement] is a deliberate, wicked, unfounded lie," and continues "Mr. Hearst has the nerve of a Bengal tiger to be loafing in the splendor and grandeur of his palatial estate on the Pacific Coast and attempting to dictate the politics of the greatest city in the world." We like it, and we think that if "Al" Smith carries on he may succeed in making American politics interesting.

AT THE RIGHT, WALL STREET. At the left, a Chinese port, little square-sailed Chinese junks filling the harbor. And marching across the page—from Wall Street to China—American marines. It sounds like one of those "fantasies" for which The Nation is so often condemned when it warns of the danger of American imperialism. It appears in the Nation's Business, the organ of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, issue for September, pages 18 and 19. The inscription beneath reads:

> It's all very well to talk of New York as the center of international finance, but—is our Government going to change its policy and protect American interests abroad? During such convulsions as shake China, for instance?

The pictures illustrate an article by W. L. Clause, chairman of the board of the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company, expressing doubts regarding the wisdom of the bankers in lending so much money to European countries. "The world has grown to take it for granted," Mr. Clause remarks, "that the British fleet is ready to protect an Englishman or his interests, wherever situated. Is our Government ready to take a similar position?" He may sleep quietly o' nights. The American Government is ready. It is on the job. American marines are policing the streets of Shanghai today; within a decade they have landed in at least eight Latin-American republics. The picture of the marines sent by Wall Street to China is more than a manufacturer's dream; it is American history.

THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE of a recent date printed an advertisement for an office assistant. We should like to help fill this position if anyone can be found who will suit. So we print herewith the necessary qualifications; it is specifically requested that no one apply who is not possessed of all of them. The candidate, who may write to H5 Herald Tribune, Harlem, must be

> A lady;
> Twenty-five years old;
> An Episcopalian;
> Of American parentage for two generations;
> A first-class stenographer and typist;
> Without rouge;
> Without sleeveless gowns;
> Without bobbed hair.

We once heard of a young woman who would have fitted this description, but if we remember rightly she married a missionary and was later eaten by cannibals. We have never heard of another; and if such a young woman does exist we doubt if H5's offer would attract her. She could do better in the side-show of a circus. H5 offers $25 a week.

What China Asks

IT has taken the powers almost two months and a half to answer China's note of June 24 following the disturbances in Shanghai and elsewhere. During that time they have carried on negotiations among themselves to arrive at a unanimous position in regard to the Chinese demands and—what is even more important—a unanimous manner and tone of voice. The result is a colorless compromise between the amiability supposed to characterize the United States and the gruff, colonial-imperialist attitude of Great Britain. The note is polite but cautious; it commits the nine powers accepting the agreement of 1922 to nothing more concrete than further investigation and discussion along the lines laid down by the Washington Conference. The powers have learned little from recent events.

What China wants, in general, is freedom—freedom from every sort of foreign interference, suppression, and uninvited advice, not to mention actual foreign control and sovereignty. What she wants more especially and immediately is a modification of foreign customs regulations and the abolition of extraterritoriality. The powers meet these demands with nothing but polite generalities and counter-demands.

They are "prepared to consider the Chinese Government's proposal for the modification of existing treaties in measure as the Chinese authorities demonstrate their willingness and ability to fulfil their obligations and to assure the protection of foreign rights and interests now safeguarded by the exceptional provisions of those treaties." This means in plain terms that the powers have not the slightest intention of doing anything until they are absolutely forced to. They know as well as the Chinese themselves do that domestic tranquillity is forever impossible in the face of continued foreign control. China must have independence before it is able to obtain the prestige, the power, and the financial strength to combat internal disorder and decentralization. Such words are plainly provocative.

The powers admit that foreign tariff control may have become burdensome to China and they declare themselves willing to appoint delegates to the Special Conference on Chinese Tariff Matters provided for in the treaty of February 6, 1922, and to discuss a revision of the treaties. But even this modest proposal to carry out promises more than three years old will be taken up only upon evidence of a mending of China's fiscal ways. As for relinquishing extraterritoriality, the powers are ready to form a commission to proceed to China and determine "what, if any, steps may be taken"—a phrase which is repeated twice over as if to insure its irritating effect.

This note is nothing more than a reiteration of the intentions voiced at the Washington Conference—and forgotten as soon as it was over. Perhaps one should be thankful that it is nothing less. The British press in China and many of the foreign merchants of all nationalities have been howling for intervention, which would mean endless bloodshed and the likelihood of extending foreign control still further.

And now resentment has again flared into open protest which, as before, has ended in death and disorder. Three Chinese were killed by British police in Shanghai on September 7 in the course of a demonstration which began in the Chinese city and proceeded peacefully through the French concession only to be blocked when it entered the International Settlement. According to the fragmentary accounts at hand, the police shoved the crowd back to the edge of the French concession and "it was here that the shooting took place." The police reserves were ordered out and the Shanghai Volunteer Corps got ready for action. Since no impartial inquiry has ever been made into the circumstances of the previous Shanghai shootings, it is not to be expected that this latest affair will be investigated or the guilty persons punished. But native anger will raise new protests, new disorders will occur, and new murders will doubtless be committed. The end will be bloodshed and lasting enmity unless—well, unless the powers meet the situation with something more than the futile gestures of conciliation contained in their recent note.

China can never be terrorized into submission. In the past it has been cajoled and put off with promises, but even that chance has gone. China is self-conscious and determined and angry; even its less politically minded classes have been roused to bitterness. It wants no more discussion regarding "what, if any, steps may be taken." It has decided what steps must be taken, and behind this decision is the incalculable power of China's economic strength. The powers have been stirred to a semblance of action by the killing of a couple of students and the protest of their comrades; by a strike in Shanghai and a few anti-foreign outbreaks in other cities. But China has only begun to protest. Will the powers meet her demands with machine-guns and empty words? Will they let events sweep past them and make every concession too late to have it do any good? If the British dominate future negotiations—as they seem to have dominated the recent ones—there is small hope of a peaceful solution.

The Evidence of Things Seen

A NEW Dr. Stockman, unmindful of the fate of his predecessor, has arisen in Denmark. Demanding that a certain small town shall destroy its chief source of income in the interests of truth, he, too, is finding that the defender of the ideal is more likely than not to seem to the practically minded an enemy of the people. This time, however, it is not polluted baths but suspicious relics about which the controversy centers. The town is Elsinore and the subject the most famous prince ever produced in that region.

For some years, so it seems, tourists have flocked to view the castle of Kronborg, where the ghost of Hamlet's father made night hideous, to gaze with respect upon the pyramid which marks the grave of Hamlet himself, and to drop a tear into the waters of "Ophelia's Well." The burghers have prospered, and so far as is known no tourist has ever complained that he had not got his money's worth in spite of the fact that a little antiquarian research would reveal three facts: first, that the castle was completed in 1585, some centuries after the date assigned to Hamlet by students of Saxo-Grammaticus, the earliest known recorder of his legend; second, that the pyramid was constructed in the eighteenth century; and, third, that the connection of Ophelia with the well in question is decidedly dubious. Now a native has arisen to suggest that the monument over the grave be destroyed and the visitor generally disillusioned. The result, of course, is a raging controversy. Johannes Jensen, known in this country as the author of "The Long Journey," thinks it "unworthy of a cultured nation" to encourage fraud; but hotel-keepers and the like are not so enthusiastic in their devotion to pure truth.

It is no new thing to discover that there is something rotten in the state of Denmark and no new thing, for that matter, to find relics not at all what they should be. Though we are not quite so credulous as once we were, we are still credulous enough, and those who embark upon a pilgrimage do not generally risk their pleasure by demanding too rigid proof of the authenticity of things admired. Doubtless we should be a little more skeptical than were those Crusaders who bought without question great quantities of precious Christian relics from the pagans and flooded Europe with so many fragments of the Holy Tree, bits of the crown of thorns, and similar bric-a-brac that Mark Twain was forced to complain of having been called upon to admire enough different nails from the True Cross to fill a keg. Doubtless, too, we should not value as highly as did Pope Innocent VII the lance, sent him by Bajazet, with which Longinus was said to have pierced the side of Christ, nor quite understand the spirit in which Alexander VI received a tunic worn by Jesus which, so documents state, had been sent him by the same Sultan in part payment for a promise to murder Prince Djem. Yet it is still customary in England to point out the oldest portion of any castle as "Caesar's Tower"; one may learn some strange bits of history from a Parisian guide; and the director of classical studies in the American Academy at Rome once confessed to us his delight in frequenting the Forum for the purpose of seeing the remarkable bits pointed out by Italian guides.

As for America, there is Leif Ericson's Tower on the river Charles, to say nothing of the vast number of beds in which Washington slept and the flock of houses which served as "headquarters" during the Revolution. In certain parts of Illinois there is scarcely a village which does not boast of a roof under which Lincoln, when he was riding the circuit, spent the night. Doubtless it would not be too difficult for an energetic denizen of the Catskills to lure passing strangers to the precise spot where Rip Van Winkle spent 7,305 nights. Worm-eaten bowling-barrels, a musket rusted almost beyond recognition, and a decayed dog-collar might be exhibited not without effect. Who knows where Pocahontas saved John Smith or where Hiawatha did his wooing? Doubtless someone says he does, and is profiting by it.

To enjoy such things one needs only that temporary suspension of disbelief which constitutes poetic faith, and so, on the whole, we are rather on the side of the innkeepers in the present case. Actual facts are important to antiquarians and with their integrity we would not tamper, but anyone who can be made seriously to believe that an eighteenth-century pyramid was built by a contemporary of Hamlet will never be an antiquarian anyway. As the Duke of Wellington said to a man who rushed up to him at a reception with the words "Mr. Muggins, I believe," "A man who will believe that will believe anything." We suggest that the custodian at Elsinore exhibit to his visitors both "the skull of Hamlet when he was a man" and "the skull of Hamlet when he was a little boy." The visitors will believe him.

He Built Ships

FAME, it has often been observed, is a fickle jade. She applauds generals who lead thousands to slaughter or to be slaughtered; she crowns with laurel politicians who fool the people with quack or opportunist statecraft; she illumines with her spotlight railroad manipulators, Wall Street gamblers, prize-fighters, and millionaires who have become such through the sale of patent medicines. But how often does she glorify the true builders of the world, the men who in various ages have been responsible for the distinctive contributions of their eras to civilization?

How many Americans, for example, have ever heard of Donald McKay? Few indeed of those whose heroes have been created for them by our school histories and our daily newspapers. Yet McKay was one of the true and great builders of American civilization. He built ships. He not only built ships but he built the greatest ships of our greatest period of ship-building and ship-sailing. He was the builder preeminent of the clipper-ship era of the middle of the past century, when America held the world's pennant for the mightiest and the speediest vessels afloat.

McKay did his best work about three-quarters of a century ago and has been dead for forty-five years, but he has never been nationally commemorated, and only today is an effort under way to erect a memorial to him in Boston. In Boston it should be because it was there that he built most of his ships and that city's reputation on the seas is predominantly due to his genius and industry. In connection with the effort to raise a memorial, there is an exhibition in the Marine Museum in the Old State House in Boston of models of some of McKay's more famous vessels, so that at last a measure of public recognition may come to a man to whom it is long overdue.

McKay, although contributing so much to American ship-building, was not a native of the United States. He was a "Bluenose," born in Shelburne, Nova Scotia, of Scotch ancestry, but he emigrated to New York City while still in his teens and served a ten-year apprenticeship there in ship-building. Then he established a yard of his own in Newburyport, Massachusetts, removing soon after to Boston, where in 1846 he turned out the New World, whose 1,404 tons made her the largest merchantman of her time. McKay was not the originator of the clipper hull. It is a question to whom that honor should go. The clipper hull, like many other milestones of progress, was an evolution to which a number of persons contributed. The Rainbow, owned by William H. Aspinwall, one of the pioneer tea merchants of New York City, was perhaps the first authentic clipper ship. Her water-line was concave instead of convex both at the bow and the stern, and the great speed which she showed doomed thenceforth the "cod's head and mackerel tail" which had been the technique of ship-builders up to that time. But although McKay did not originate the clipper ship he was the man who made it famous. A couple of years after the launching of the New World gold was discovered in California, and ship-owners were besieged and beseeched to carry prospectors to El Dorado—and carry them fast. Some 160 ships were built in four years. It was a golden era for ship-builders and ship-owners as well as for gold diggers.

McKay's first notable contribution to the Cape Horn-California fleet was the famous Flying Cloud. She raced the Challenge, commanded by the notorious "Bully" Waterman, to San Francisco, and won by nineteen days. In spite of a mutinous crew and of twice carrying away considerable portions of her rigging, she made the passage in eighty-nine days, a record never bettered by a sailing-ship, although the Comet later covered the course in the opposite direction—for which the prevailing winds are more favorable—in six days' less time. In the summer of 1852 McKay gave to the waters the Sovereign of the Seas. She measured 2,421 tons, a new record in size. She was sent out to San Francisco in command of Lauchlin McKay, a brother of the builder. She made some remarkable passages, including one from New York to Liverpool when for five successive days she outran the steamship Canada of the Cunard Line, in all by 325 miles. In 1853 McKay surpassed himself for size; in the Great Republic, of 4,555 tons, he built the hugest of the clipper ships. She was a four-masted bark, spreading more than 15,000 square yards of canvas. But she was so big that no ship-owner wanted to buy her and McKay had to operate the vessel himself.

McKay's greatest triumph in speed was in the celebrated Lightning, which he built for the Australian Black Ball Line of James Baines in 1854. Under "Bully" Forbes, who coined the slogan "Melbourne or Hell in sixty days," the Lightning made phenomenal passages, but never accomplished the boast of her skipper. Previous to this, however, the Lightning had established herself as the world's fastest sailing vessel for all time by a run of 436 miles in twenty-four hours, an average of more than eighteen miles an hour, a speed of which no steamship of that day was capable. The James Baines, which was launched soon after the Lightning, was probably actually as fleet. She never quite equaled the Lightning in a twenty-four-hour run, but her log credited her at one time with a speed of twenty-one miles an hour—a marvelous performance for a craft borne by the wind.

King Calvin

DOES Calvin Coolidge think that he is King of the United States or a Fascist dictator, à la Mussolini? His attempt to dismiss Bert E. Haney, Democratic member of the United States Shipping Board, is a serious matter. It is another chapter in the shocking story which United States Senator George W. Norris tells on another page of this issue of The Nation.

President Coolidge telegraphed on August 27 to Commissioner Haney:

> It having come to my attention that you are proposing to remove Admiral Palmer contrary to the understanding I had with you when I reappointed you, your resignation from the United States Shipping Board is hereby requested.

Mr. Haney, in the first place, denies having made any pre-appointment bargain with Calvin Coolidge; and, in the second place, he gives several cogent reasons which, he thinks, are sufficient basis for seeking to remove Admiral Palmer from his post in the Emergency Fleet Corporation. But these are secondary questions. The shocking thing in this matter is President Coolidge's presumption that he has a royal right to lay down pre-appointment conditions for prospective members of federal commissions and boards, and thus to dictate their course of action. Mr. Haney was perfectly right in replying to the President with this stinging rebuke:

> Obviously, Mr. President, to have given you any such promise as that implied by your telegram would have amounted to a total disregard of my oath of office and my obligation to Congress, whose sole agent I am. Such a promise and disregard of my official oath and the consummation of such an understanding would have obligated me to support the administration of the Merchant Marine Act by the president of the Fleet Corporation, however inefficient, notwithstanding the fact that the law imposed upon me, as a commissioner of the Shipping Board, the duty to support and maintain an efficient administration.
>
> The board, when once appointed by the President in conformity with the statute, is an independent agency of the United States Government and is vested by the statute with large and important discretionary powers which the members thereof are compelled to exercise independently of any other governmental agency so long as the law is in force, and, with the exception of the power of removal for causes specified in the act, the members of the board are responsible only to the legislative body.

For a member of the Shipping Board to disregard his own judgment and accept dictation even from the President of the United States would constitute, as Mr. Haney says, a violation of his oath of office. Yet that is what Calvin Coolidge asked Bert E. Haney to do. The Shipping Board is not a marine secretariat attached to the office of the President; it is an independent agency, and its powers and functions are prescribed by act of Congress, duly signed by the then President. Provision was made to include in it members of the two great political parties and representatives of the different sections of the country. This was done for the purpose of insuring variety of view and independence of argument. It is a dangerous thing when the President of the United States makes secret bargains with men whom he appoints to office. Mr. Haney was named as a Democrat, and the theory of the law requiring the nomination of a Democrat was that the Democrat would frequently disagree with his Republican colleagues. Mr. Coolidge does not want him to disagree. He wants "safe" Democrats, Democrats who cannot be distinguished from Coolidge Republicans. He wants to nullify the purpose of the law.

If this were an isolated instance it might be reasonable to pass it by as a blunder. But Mr. Coolidge has demonstrated by his actions in other cases that it is more than a blunder. It is his policy. He wants to destroy the independence of the federal commissions, and make them do his will—big business's will. Not merely Mr. Coolidge but a dangerously large section of the American public approves this Fascist policy, this nullification of the laws of the country. Senator Norris's article in this issue of The Nation might well be entitled Calvin Coolidge Bores from Within. It recounts other instances in which President Coolidge has misused his power of appointment to pack the federal commissions with men opposed to the policies which they are required by law to carry out.

Senator Norris's is a moderate and restrained article, but it has a curious history. It was not written originally for The Nation; it was composed at the request of the Washington representative of another New York magazine, who read it, praised it, and said that the country needed that kind of plain speaking. When the article reached the editor in New York, however, it was rejected. It then went to another so-called "progressive" magazine, whose editor commented that while "personally" he would like to print it he felt that the tide of public opinion was running too strong in the other direction. Here again is a revelation of the unseen danger which threatens the country. Not only do leaders of public opinion want to see the President nullify the constitutional powers of Congress, but they have so frightened and cowed the public that even so-called progressive editors do not dare to point out the danger. "The tide is running in the other direction," and these editors fear the possible loss of circulation which might come if they buck it. They are precisely like the politicians they condemn, who look for the bandwagon of popular issues and jump aboard, regardless of their own beliefs and records.

Bert Haney has refused to resign, and the President cannot remove him except for malfeasance, neglect, or incompetence, of which he is not accused. The President can and, it may be assumed, will refuse to reappoint him. But Bert Haney's fate is not particularly important except as a symbol. The American people have an issue to face—the issue between the kind of Fascism which big business wants and the democracy provided for in the Constitution and expressed through Congress. Mussolini is Prime Minister, Minister of War, Minister of the Navy, and Minister of Foreign Affairs in Italy. There is not a board or bureau in Italy that would dare dispute or argue with him, and the Italian Parliament is a joke. Do our business men and the editors who lambaste Congress for having opinions of its own want to remake America on the model of Mussolini's Italy? Or will the people insist upon agents with opinions of their own?

Boring from Within

By GEORGE W. NORRIS

LAWS enacted for the protection of life and property and for the regulation of transportation and business are of no value and of no effect if the executive department of government fails or neglects to enforce them. Recent executive appointments, made ostensibly for the purpose of giving effect to legislative acts of Congress, have raised a query in the minds of millions of law-abiding citizens as to whether a studied effort is not under way to put into office executive officials who are not honestly in sympathy with the enforcement of many of our regulatory laws. Appointments recently made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to the Federal Trade Commission, and the action of the Executive with regard to the Tariff Commission, together with the appointment of Mr. Warren to be the head of the Department of Justice, all indicate that it is the intention of the present Administration to place representatives of so-called "big business" in charge of all the activities of the federal government. I do not charge that any of the men appointed to the various positions are dishonest or incompetent, but without exception so far as I know every appointee has been some one who has no sympathy with the various acts of Congress passed for the purpose of regulating different activities but on the other hand believes that there should be practically no restraining hand placed upon trusts and monopolies.

The appointment of Mr. Warren as Attorney General would under ordinary circumstances have shocked the sensibilities of all our citizens. Virtually all his business life had been spent—very profitably spent—in carrying on the activities of the Sugar Trust. It stands uncontradicted that he, more than any other one man, was instrumental in organizing sugar factories in parts of the West in accordance with the wishes and the desires of Mr. Havemeyer, the head of the great Sugar Trust. These activities had ceased only a very short time before his appointment. It is fresh yet in the minds of all people that but a few years ago the Sugar Trust was engaged in a gigantic and stupendous scheme to deprive the government of millions of revenue. Both the producers of sugar beets and the consumers of sugar have been for many years more or less subject to the iniquities and the manipulations of this gigantic trust. The anti-trust law was passed to save the people of the country, both producers and consumers, from the manipulations of such unholy organizations as this. To appoint one of the representatives of this gigantic monopoly as the head of the great Department of Justice, whose duty it is to protect the people from this wrong and to prosecute those who are guilty of violating the anti-trust laws, is, in every practical sense, a nullification of these laws, as effective as a repeal by act of Congress.

The appointment of Mr. Woodlock as a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission was another illustration of this scheme. Although the Senate had twice refused to confirm him, he was given a recess appointment and is now a member of that great commission. It is no secret that he is a railroad man. Everybody understands his viewpoint. His connection with the Wall Street Journal and his official connection with some of the great railroads of the country absolutely disqualify him in every moral sense from holding a position on the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Let us ask ourselves: What is the excuse for the existence of the Interstate Commerce Commission? The original act came as the result of years of agitation, a demand almost unanimous on the part of shippers and consumers all over the Republic, that the railroads should be regulated; in response to that just and fair sentiment Congress passed the law providing for the Interstate Commerce Commission. The only excuse for the existence of the commission is fairly and honestly to regulate the railroads so that they will not be able to take advantage of the millions of our citizens who must contribute to their support whether they desire to do so or not. Every human being in a civilized nation like ours has a direct interest in the regulation of railroads. Regardless of occupation or business, all of us who eat food or wear clothes must pay our proportionate share of the freight; and in addition to these millions there are the other millions of producers who are taxed by transportation charges upon everything they produce and must sell. This charge, it is true, cannot be eliminated. No honest man desires to eliminate it; but every honest citizen, regardless of his occupation or business, is interested and is anxious that the charge shall be just and fair. Assuming then that the establishment of the Interstate Commerce Commission was a wise provision of law, where is the man who would dare to say that after it is established it should be turned over to the very railroads that it is intended to regulate? This is in effect an absolute nullification of the law itself. If the railroads needed regulation—and the establishment of the commission assumes that—then fair, honest administration of the law would under no circumstances turn the management of the commission over to the very corporation that the commission is intended to regulate.

No charge of dishonesty is made against Mr. Woodlock. As far as I know he is able, and I presume he is perfectly conscientious, but his viewpoint disqualifies him for this position. He is put on a tribunal for the purpose of trying his own case, to regulate his own business. It would be like permitting a judge to try a case in which he was a party litigant. It would be the same as permitting the defendant in a law-suit to sit on the jury. The whole thing is contrary to the present-day civilization of justice and equality; and I submit that rather than turn the Interstate Commerce Commission over to railroad representatives, we ought to abolish the commission and permit the railroads to operate without a commission.

The same principle applies and the same course has been taken in the appointment of Mr. Humphrey as a member of the Federal Trade Commission. He is a courageous and able executive officer. He has held public office for many years, and we are not left in doubt as to his attitude on public questions. During all his public service his viewpoint has stood out prominently, he has been a fearless advocate of big business in all lines. His record discloses that he can have no sympathy with the small business man who is protesting against unfair competition of trusts and monopolies. His appointment has changed the viewpoint of the commission. It now stands three to two in favor of the big-business idea.

What is the object of the Federal Trade Commission? The law was passed because it was thought that there was need of affording protection to the small business man against the monopoly and the machinations of trusts and combinations. Monopolistic concerns had, by unfair methods of competition, driven their competitors from the field, and the people of the country paid the expense in increased prices. Since Mr. Humphrey's advent this commission has decided that much of its business shall be transacted in secret. If the unfair business man goes before the commission and makes a secret promise that he will refrain from his illegal acts the entire matter is dismissed, no record is made, and the public gets no idea or knowledge of what actually transpired or happened. This means that a secret tribunal sits in judgment where the interests of all the people are involved and where millions of dollars are at stake.

Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the majority of the commission is perfectly honest and wants to do what is right, yet how long will it be until this secrecy brings fraud and corruption? The history of civilization demonstrates that one of the greatest evils of government is secrecy in governmental matters, and without exception history likewise demonstrates that no government has ever for any great length of time remained pure and just where the rights of men or property were subject to the adjudication of a tribunal whose deliberations took place in secret. Secret treaties have brought on many of the wars of the world. Secrecy in governmental affairs was one of the prime causes of the great World War. Secrecy in government through many years of struggle and hardship finally brought to ruin and degradation the great Russian government. Secrecy in a republic like ours is contrary to the very fundamental principles upon which our liberties rest. If the Federal Trade Commission, established for the purpose of protecting the small business man against the machinations of trusts and monopolies, is to be administered by men who believe that best results can be obtained by giving monopoly full sway, then why have the commission at all? If the men and corporations that are intended to be regulated by it are themselves to manage it and run it, then why not take the logical step—repeal the law and abolish the commission?

Another incident that illustrates the trend of the present Administration is the failure of the President to send the name of David J. Lewis, a member of the Tariff Commission, to the Senate, after he had given him a recess appointment. Again let us ask the question: What is the object of the Tariff Commission? It came after years of legislative struggle. Its object was to give the country as nearly as possible a scientific tariff—something that the country had never had. It was to establish a nonpartisan tribunal, a tribunal as free from prejudice and coercion as the Supreme Court itself, one that would gather the true facts necessary for the enactment of a tariff and lay these facts before the President and Congress. In order for the commission to accomplish any good or for its work to have any honest effect its investigations must be absolutely fair and its reports unshaded and untarnished, either by those opposed to any tariff or by those in favor of an unjustly high tariff. In the early part of the last Presidential campaign the commission was investigating the tariff on sugar. No one can deny the importance of such an investigation. Some wonderful disclosures came from that body. It appeared that there was at least one instance where members of the family of one of the commissioners, if not the commissioner himself, owned a large amount of stock the value of which was directly affected by the tariff. The term of office of Mr. Lewis, a member of the Tariff Commission, expired during this campaign. His ability, his honesty and integrity, and his courage have never been questioned. He was carrying out the spirit of the law in good faith. There were politicians who did not want this report on sugar made during the campaign. It would perhaps have been a political blunder to have refused a reappointment to Mr. Lewis at that particular time. The commission was nearly evenly divided. There were members who prior to their appointment had been known as lobbyists in favor of high-tariff schedules when tariff bills were pending before the committees of Congress. If a majority of the commission were composed of such men, then the work of the commission would be nullified. No one could have confidence in a report made by such a membership.

It seems to be the idea of those in control that the Tariff Commission should be composed of men whose whole lives disclose the fact that they have always advocated an exorbitantly high tariff. The action of the President would indicate that he is in sympathy with that idea. He reappointed Mr. Lewis during the campaign, but the appointment was only temporary; to become effective it required renewal when the Senate convened in December. By that time the campaign was over. The object of the temporary appointment had been accomplished, and the President declined to send the name of Mr. Lewis to the Senate, substituting someone else.

Thus one of the fairest and best men who ever sat on the commission was removed from office as soon as the campaign was over. But still the commission was not completely subject to the machinations of high-tariff barons. Mr. Culbertson and Mr. Costigan, members of that commission, who with Mr. Lewis had constituted a majority of it, were like him honestly and fearlessly carrying out the purpose of the law without fear or favor. Free traders on the one hand and high-tariff barons on the other had no effect upon their action. In order to further weaken the commission and to place it under the control of those who think the tariff ought to reach the sky Mr. Culbertson was given a diplomatic appointment. He was kicked upstairs in order to get him off the commission. I do not know what method can or will be taken to get rid of Mr. Costigan, if any. He still remains on the commission, standing there like a stone wall in the face of terrible opposition, striving to carry out the honest purposes of the act creating the commission. Let me in substance repeat my former question: Why have a tariff commission if we are to place it in control of tariff lobbyists and others interested in and believing in the mountain-high tariff? If the Tariff Commission is to become a one-sided tribunal, controlled by those who would use it only to bolster up a high tariff without regard to the truth, then why not let these people handle it directly instead of through the instrumentality of the commission? Why not after all abolish the commission and let those believing in special interests control the tariff directly? It would be much cheaper to let them have their way by simply enacting their ideas into law instead of going through expensive machinery of compelling the taxpayers to pay for a commission that, after all, has no other object than to carry out the ideas of its masters.

All of these commissions were established for a definite purpose. They came into existence in answer to an honest demand for the work which the law delegates to them. The anti-trust laws are likewise on the statute-books for the purpose of curing admitted evils. Are we now to nullify these laws? Are we to go back to the beginning and permit monopoly to have full sway, without any governmental curb? The effect of these appointments is to set the country back more than twenty-five years. It is an indirect but positive repeal of Congressional enactments, which no Administration, however powerful, would dare to bring about by any direct means. It is the nullification of federal law by a process of boring from within. If trusts, combinations, and big business are to run the government, why not permit them to do it directly rather than through this expensive machinery which was originally honestly established for the protection of the people of the country against monopoly and control?

The Inquiring Reporter in Shanghai

By PAUL BLANSHARD

Drawings by Edith Christenson

PLACE: SHANGHAI, JULY, 1925. A general strike of several hundred thousand Chinese workers and students has been in progress for many weeks.

QUESTION

How do you feel about this strike?

ANSWERS

1. The Leader of the Shanghai Student Union. He is a slender, soft-voiced young man with long, white gown and thick-lensed glasses. Like most of the university leaders of China he speaks excellent English. He comes to me in a motor car hired by the strikers with his own secretary. He is the executive head of the organization which began the general strike after sixteen students and workers were shot down by the British police during a demonstration. He directed the strike speaking on that fatal day.

I would like you to understand first of all that this strike of the Chinese people is not bolshevik, not anti-Christian, and not anti-foreign. It is anti-imperialist. It is a human movement for human rights. It is directed chiefly against Great Britain and Japan because they are the worst offenders.

China has been forced by Western military powers to surrender rights which belong to her. The murder of students and workers by British police in Shanghai is only one incident of a long series. Our struggle will go on until we control our own national life.

We students are fighting with the workers because we believe in the workers' cause. I understand that your college students in America are very different from us. I understand that they are not much interested in labor and that they sometimes break strikes. It is inconceivable that a Chinese student should act as a strike-breaker. We are close to the workers in our thoughts. Some of us have gone out into the mills as manual workers to organize unions. Even now we are struggling against the conservatism of the Chamber of Commerce which is not so much concerned with the labor aims of this strike. We intend to stand by the workers until they get the right to organize and strike.

2. A Refugee Missionary from the Interior. He is a fundamentalist from Tennessee. He does not play checkers on Sunday. He calls me "brother."

What these people need is character. They lie and cheat and steal until the Lord Jesus Christ comes into their hearts. He is the only one who can save them. These students who have started the strike are flighty and irresponsible. Of course, they have many grievances, serious grievances, but they are not going about it in the right way to remedy those grievances. They don't want to study, so they raise Cain. Once in a while they go too far and the police have to stop them. If they will learn how to be honest and responsible the foreign governments will trust them with more power.

Have I any program for social reform in China? I do not mix in politics. I am a minister of Christ. We will have better politics when we have Christian character. Character is the root of the whole thing. Yes, I am going back to America. My mother is not feeling very well.

3. A British Gentleman. He wears a helmet and whites. His money is invested in silk mills. He writes anonymous letters to the London Morning Post signed "Fair Play." The works of Kipling stand next to the Bible in his library.

Of course this whole thing has been stirred up by the Bolsheviks working upon irresponsible young students. There is not a doubt about it. You may take Shanghai University as an example. The place has been a hotbed of soviet propaganda for years. When the police raided it they found some letters direct from Moscow. And what did the young devils do when they were caught red-handed? They lied about it and the Chinese papers repeated their lies. The strike leaders are getting fat off the money that is coming in, and the workers are kept away from the mills by intimidation. The police are taking a firm stand against the trouble-makers and every subject of the King ought to be proud of them. The strikers will come to their senses in a few days.

Then they will come back to us begging for work. Yes, we'll hire them, but we'll sack the agitators.

4. A Coolie Strike-Breaker. He is the song leader of a street gang of coolies who are pounding dirt back into a ditch by dropping a weight upon it suspended by a rope. He sings the main line in a high wail, while the rest join in on the chorus, dropping the weight back into the ditch with rhythmic beats. He is stripped to the waist, dripping sweat in the sun. He says:

Me no strike. Me work. Strike good—maybe yes. Me have children yes. Four children yes. Me get dollar day. Me work.

5. The Secretary of the Electrical Workers' Union. He is an emaciated little man with a face half dreamer, half prophet, young and eager, but very tired.

Labor unions have never been recognized in China, but we believe that before this strike is over they will be. Our membership in trade unions here in Shanghai has increased by over 100,000 since the strike began. It is true that the strike is chiefly a nationalist strike against imperialism, but we in the labor unions are determined that we will not go back to work until our organizations are recognized. Here is a contract which we will submit to the electrical employers tomorrow. It does not call for a raise in wages, but it demands the recognition of the union.

Yes, we take care of the strike-breakers very easily. We just drop around to their houses, take them out to some convenient lot and make them kneel down in a circle of strikers. We don't beat them up at all, but we make them sign a statement something like this: "I am a dirty low-down traitor to my fellow-workers." Then we take their pictures and this statement and hang them up where everybody can see. No, we don't have many strike-breakers.

6. An American Marine. His rifle-butt rests on the sidewalk while he gazes at the passing crowd with the bored paternalism of a traffic cop. He is quartered at Shanghai University by order of the British authorities because it has been discovered that this university is a center of radical student leadership.

Naw, I don't know much about the strike. Awful hot, isn't it? Better pay your ricksha man two double dimes to the station. If he kicks on that, just swat him in the face.

Yeah, we march in fours. Got to be careful. If the chinks catch us alone it's all up. Yeah, the student crowd is mostly reds.

Godamn dull here. Nothin' much to do.

7. A Chinese Business Man. He is a member of the national Chinese Chamber of Commerce which has officially supported the Shanghai strike. He is dignified, suave. He looks like a picture of Li Hung Chang.

The important thing about this strike is that it symbolizes the Chinese movement for economic self-government. We are learning to use economic weapons for China and perhaps we may show the foreigners that our boycott is more effective than their guns. We are not going to buy any more British and Japanese goods. The British and Japanese goods that we have on hand will be sold under supervision of a committee. After that we hope to develop our own industries. China has plenty of natural wealth and in time we can easily produce almost everything that we need. We do not object to foreign capital, but we want the foreign investors to remember that we are the hosts and they are the guests.

8. A Chinese Graduate of Glasgow. His English is faultless. His labor library is the best I have seen in the East. His pictures are hung in international exhibitions.

I am a pacifist, but I shall tell you a story that will show you how I feel about this strike. It will show you how hard it is to be a pacifist in China today.

There is a park here in Shanghai which is paid for chiefly by Chinese taxpayers, but no Chinese person is allowed to enter it. One day I was walking by this park when I saw a Sikh policeman chase away a group of ricksha men from the gate, curse them, and deliberately tip over one of the rickshas. He had lost his temper because one of the men had come too close to the forbidden territory. He took the license of one of the ricksha men away from him while the poor fellow stood here in the road with the tears streaming down his face. I walked over to the Sikh policeman and said:

"If I were hired by the British to police India for them, I would never treat your countrymen as you are treating these ricksha men."

He cooled down very quickly and was about to give the license back to the ricksha man when two Englishmen came up. They said to me:

"What are you doing here interfering with this policeman? Don't argue with us. You have no business here. You're nothing but a damned Chinaman. Get out of here."

They said that to me in China.

The Cheat

By RUTH JANET BARBER

Young thunder-dark Tobias, with his dour
Black eyes, with all his stern contemptuous power
Compelled from men who mutter while they cower,

I dreamed I met, far off in Paradise,
Where in the white light of the wholly wise
His ghost had melted into two sad eyes.

And even in Heaven I felt the importunate will
That made me walk beside him, made him still Fling his wild words athwart the starry hill.

Among the jacinth stars they fell, and rose
In mist-like wraiths of drifting wind-tossed snows,
Figures of men in faint satyric pose;

For words like men have an immortal side.
These flaunted velvet gowns the wind blew wide.
One saw them beggars with a leprous hide.

Workers in Palestine

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

THE building activity of the Jews in Palestine ranks as an achievement next to the reclaiming and cultivation of the soil. It is largely the result of the labor of the last five years and is due to the activities of the cooperative building guild called Solelboneh.

When, at the end of the World War, the gates of Palestine were reopened to immigration, the half-ruined agricultural colonies were totally unable to absorb the immigrants who sought to settle in the land. The first necessity, moreover, for further settlement and for the actual opening of the land was the construction of roads. Since there were no capitalistic companies to hire laborers and bid for government contracts, the laborers, most of them newcomers and unaccustomed to hard manual toil, organized the Solelboneh guild for building and public works and built those magnificent roads that opened up the entire northern part of the country.

Training its men, who had been students and indoor workers, to acquire the skill and endure the hardships of their new occupations, the Solelboneh next proceeded to relieve the scarcity of dwellings in the country. Through Zionist initiative mortgage banks were established; a staff of able engineers and architects guided the work; the incomparable adaptability of the Jewish worker was made clear.

Since those earlier days the Solelboneh has not only built the greater part of Tel-Aviv, but the new residential quarters of Jerusalem, of Haifa, of Tiberias. It has constructed public buildings of all kinds, ranging from the beautiful convalescent home for workers at Mozah to the massive electric station at Tel-Aviv. It has erected dwelling-houses, factories, schools, hospitals; it has continued its road-building and has constructed barns and stables throughout the colonies. It has built houses of silicate-brick, of cement blocks, of stone, of reinforced concrete, and has mastered the necessary technique with faultless efficiency. One of its most extraordinary achievements is the construction of the imperial war cemetery and memorial at Beer-Sheba. Yet this is only one of the many tasks which the guild has performed for the Palestinian Government, for the municipalities and railways, and for the Military Administration.

These dry facts take on human significance as one actually recalls the arches and spacious halls of the Mozah convalescent home and visualizes once more the new pillars and capitals of that building which seem to have grown on that hill-side from which one sees the taller hills on which Jerusalem stands. In the new quarters of Beth Hakerem and Talpioth in Jerusalem, in Bath Ganim and Hakarmel near Haifa, in the Kiryat Shemuel quarter of Tiberias there are houses, both large and small, which answer every need of comfort, of beauty, of adaptability to the climate and the landscape of the country. Finally one recalls the wooden bridge that spans the Jordan near Dagania, the new house of the commune, and the road from Tiberias to Semach. Without initial capital and without government subsidy the Jewish workers in cooperation are building roads and cities, even as they have drained swamps, planted forests, and tilled the ruined earth to produce beauty and fertility.

The Solelboneh is, of course, only one among several associations of Jewish workers in Palestine. Some of these cooperatives are practical, some political in their character. They are all united in the Central Organization of Jewish Workers (Histadruth haklalith shel haovdim haivrim), whose headquarters are in the Workers' House of Tel-Aviv —a white house of two stories in the overwhelming light. Upstairs a small, shaded room—half library, half rude council chamber. As everywhere in Palestine, except in a few private houses, complete austerity, complete carelessness of comfort. There is the burning idea . . . there is the work to be done . . . that is all. A man has come there to talk to me about the workers—a spare man in careless clothes with the hands of a laborer except for the shape of the fingers, which are slim and mobile, with sunken cheeks and very speaking eyes, a good high forehead, a bristling mustache over a slightly protruding, ugly, eloquent mouth. He has to talk to me through an interpreter. He has spoken Hebrew so exclusively for so long that he has lost command of the languages of Galuth. I can watch him all the better for that reason; I can fathom all the more completely the utter earnestness, simplicity, single-mindedness of the man, wanting nothing for himself, everything for the workers, for the land, for the days and the generations to come. . . .

He spoke with the air of one who is not fond of speaking nor born to speak. A rather silent man originally, but forced into speech by the duty of communicating the character of the work he had at heart; speaking well precisely because he did not care for speech.

> Our aim is the regeneration of the working powers of the Jewish people. We want to render Jewish work both economically and culturally productive. In order to attain this end we workers sink all party differences. They exist but they do not divide. And that is so because, beyond theories and party platforms, we are trying to learn what to do from life itself. We really harbor no theory that is antecedent to practice. We workers must be the constructive element in Eretz Israel, and in order to be that we must seek what unites, not what divides. And what is it that unites us here? Everywhere in the world we live and labor as German Jews or English or Polish or American Jews. Here we are Jewish Jews. Here we face for the first time not the question of the right to labor but of the possibilities of labor. Here, for the first time, our labor can be creative.
>
> In all the lands of the Galuth we live at the expense of others. We work within an economic structure, an economic organization built by others. Culturally as well as economically we trade with the fundamental values, the Urwerte, created by others. We become the carriers and continuers of the creative values of others. Thence arises the nations' instinct of opposition to us. Since we realize this it follows that in Eretz Israel we do not combat anti-Semitism. We are quite freed from that external conflict. Our conflict, our struggle here is an inner one: how to become a productive people.
>
> What is given us here is the earth on which we can become a creative folk. It is this thought that unites the workers; an overwhelming majority of the workers desires this end, strains after this aim. And the workers know that this aim can be achieved only by national work, not by class struggle. There are Marxists in the land, undoubtedly. But they, too, join in the great, national, concerted effort toward rendering Israel a productive people.

Our experiments in the land extend over forty years. And we found that as long as work was dependent on private initiative or philanthropic aid, there was no renewal of life. There were employers and employed and many of the employed were not Jews, and so the old conflicts and problems arose that have always arisen in the lands of the Galuth. It was only when we began to work out of a national and cooperative initiative that there arose the Jewish worker, that we began to see the possibilities of a renewal in the economic, the political, and the moral life of the nation. For, observe, private initiative needs profit. Profit means the export of goods. And the export of goods means dependence on the outer world. What we desire, above all, is to be self-sustaining, to export only an excess of commodities. This is the aim of the workers' cooperative experiments in town and country, of the guild, the Kvuzah,[1] the Moshav ovdim.[2] . . .

He stopped and leaned his head a little wearily on his hand. But almost instantly he brightened up again with a fine, though somber flash:

Remember, please: We seek the way! All of our present experiments of social organization may be changed, may be, nay, probably will be transcended. Only—all land and all values and all properties belong to the nation and there must be no hired labor and no exploitation; there must be neither oppressors nor oppressed. Thus the cooperative organizations regulate the conditions of labor and consumers' associations, such as the Hamashbir, regulate prices. These associations are controlled and, if need be, checked by the banks, by the nation itself. But the ordinary safeguards and checks against excessive labor demands are not needed, since the workers are inspired by good sense and good-will and desire not the profit of their class or of any class, but the increasing freedom and productivity of all Israel. This aim of the workers is constantly emphasized and intensified by the cultural work of the Histadruth or Great Organization. The organization employs one hundred people in its cultural work alone. It arranges courses in the Hebrew language and lectures; it operates evening schools; it sends out teachers to special groups for special purposes; it sends out traveling libraries in all languages to the remotest farms and labor-camps; it publishes pamphlets and books; it maintains reading-rooms; it has organized concert associations and choruses and is at work on the beginnings of a people's theater.

I have let this man speak very much as he spoke to me, since, as he himself so frankly admitted, both historic and economic theories are transitory. Spiritual facts and values alone are permanent. I do not know enough to exercise any criticism of his tentative economic theories. I am sure that his interpretation of the position of Israel in Galuth is narrow and romantic and discredited by the very fallacies of the anti-Semite. All honest work is productive work. I am not unaware—how could I be?—of the fact that the Jewish artist and thinker seems often in Galuth, especially under the gaze of hostile eyes, to be working with the fundamental values, the Urwerte, of others. The deeper truth is that he is working, if he counts at all, with the Urwerte of mankind which are his as much as any others, that, like the better of his Gentile compeers, he transcends the national limitations through which he inevitably works and belongs to his own people, to the people among whom he lives and creates, and thus to all peoples.

But theories, as I have said, are transitory and formulations for a day. What I see is that dark, slim, earnest man in the Workers' House in Tel-Aviv. And behind him I see the many men and women, the workers, whom I met and with whom I spoke. It is their spirit and the spirit of their work that counts. They do not care for comfort or dainty food or well-made garments. They live as best they can. They live by the heat and the light of the flame within. Yet they are simple and human and cheerful and unpretentious and not given to sounding words or the gestures of the reformer. They take both their hardships and their ideas as a matter of course. They are building up the land of Israel. But greater than the task is the spirit of the task and the example of it. And that spirit and that example belong even now to the permanent possessions of all men and are becoming "part of our lives' unalterable good. . . ."

It belongs to the humanness of the situation that, outside of the Workers' House once more I met a young man who smiled rather sardonically. "You've been talking to our friend A. in there? Well, did you know that he's the executive secretary of the Hapoel Hazair (Young Workers' Party)? They're a terribly idealistic crowd!"

"They may be," I said. "But they represent a good many people. They had twenty-three delegates in the last Histadruth conference."

"True," he flung back. "But Achduth Haavodah (Palestinian branch of Poale Zion, World Zionist Socialist Party) had sixty-seven delegates."

"And are you people," I asked, taking it for granted that he belonged to the Poale Zion, "so very hard-boiled?"

He reflected for a moment. "I suppose not," he admitted. "Beyond all theoretical differences we do the same work and live the same life."

Now That These Two—

By JAMES RORTY

Now that these two have parted, let a word
Be said for the yellow
Bird that flew, and the billow
That broke on the sand, and the tree in which they heard
The patient wind consent
To all they said, and meant;

These will endure, even after his fashion the bird.
How exquisite is man and how unique,
How strangely strident, how oblique
From nature's habit, who can look unstirred
Upon the earth with veilèd eye,
And walk and talk and inly die!

Now that these two have parted, it may be said,
Perhaps, that they were right;
Something took flight,
And now one sees no raven bringing bread.
The sea has storms, whose shock
Loosens the lichen from the rock.

[1] Strictly cooperative group.
[2] Smallholders' village with cooperative management.

In the Driftway

THE recent controversy over Mr. Babe Ruth is only one of many arguments on the same theme: Are certain privileges to be accorded to genius which are denied the ordinary run of mankind? Mr. Ruth neglects the rules laid down by his manager for the conduct of a ball player working under very great pressure; the rules are doubtless salutary and conducive to more successful baseball. But they are nothing to the Home Run King; and Mr. Miller Huggins has not yet demonstrated that breaking the rules has ruined Mr. Ruth's home-run hitting proclivities. For the moment the matter is settled by having Mrs. Babe Ruth bound over to make her husband keep the peace—surely a thankless and unwanted task. Actually the matter can never be settled, for it is a perpetual question. And the unfortunate thing about it for the Miller Hugginses of the world is that genius is remembered when all their rules lie dusty and forgotten.

* * * * *

THE Drifter is not old enough to remember when the first genius stepped out and on the prejudices of his tribe, but he can readily imagine the scene. The man has shown a skill at trapping that is the despair of his fellows; he seems to have advance information of the movements of the beasts, to make traps more cunning than have ever been devised, to bait them more neatly, to walk more quietly away from the spot and disturb as he moves fewer branches to betray the presence of his contrivance. He never fails to make a catch; he always has meat to eat. He is, in many ways, an admirable fellow. But he will not observe the ancient customs about the kill; he kills at any time of the moon, at any spot, with any shape or color of weapon. A council is held over his delinquency; he is urged and then commanded to mend his ways; but though he promises, sooner or later he transgresses again. There is, obviously, nothing to do but kill him; how else shall the taboos be observed? It is true that after his death there is less to eat, for he had always been generous about dividing the spoils; but better starve than fail to observe the ancient customs; they have been good for others, why not also for him?

* * * * *

THERE is always less to eat after a genius has been disposed of by the herd. And before that happens, the genius is always a trial to his family. For one Miss Jane Austen, who sat quietly at her desk and composed her novels and was always willing to be interrupted by any family duty, there have been hundreds who cursed the sun when it rose because it broke in upon their night, or the darkness because it cut short their day, who sent their wives away in despair and permitted them to return on their knees, who would not make an honest living, who would not keep themselves clean, who would not be kind fathers or loving sons or faithful wives; and in general these tactics have earned only the scorn and dislike of their fellow-men. The Drifter will not attempt to solve the problem, to make a rule about breaking rules, to postulate how to live with a genius and be happy or how to excuse the genius to his less talented associates. His advice, as usual, is purely negative: avoid the genius as you would the plague; keep all rules away from him. He is anathema to common men; let him remain so. If unavoidably he comes in contact with current customs, wise men, freely admitting that the end will justify the means, will continue to let him go his way and foolish men will kill him. It is the herd's way and doubtless will continue to be, and the Drifter is not going to try, at his age, to change matters.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

In Praise of Marat

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I was pleased to read your reviewer Mr. Gottschalk's rebuke of the latest biographical libeler of Jean Paul Marat. The People's Friend is surely the most maligned and foul abused of men. I have been irritated for some time by the many false accounts of him. A fine example of this pseudo-history is the very inaccurate biography of Marat in the Encyclopedia Americana, which is not a biography at all but a denunciation.

Not content with slandering Marat, the Americana eulogizes his assassin in lyrical terms, giving her an inch more space than her victim, and reviving the absurd myth of her lover who was murdered by Marat's hired assassins, which is only one of the many romantic reasons advanced for her action. After all, was not Charlotte Corday merely the mentally unbalanced murderess of a dying man?

The whole world admires the romantic figure of the aristocratic Lafayette, cantering with his police through the streets of Paris, ordering the death of the people whose revolt he had first led, and employing a regiment in a vain attempt to arrest one lone starving journalist, whose only weapons were his facile pen and his blazing sincerity, and whose only crime was to love liberty; while, like Thomas Paine, the heroic, self-sacrificing Marat is hated or forgotten in the very country which he helped to liberate. Such is the gratitude of democracies!

I close with the words of the vindicative Carlyle: "This poor Marat has faults enough; but against Liberty or Equality, what fault?"

Houston, Texas, August 13 WILLIAM F. ELLIS

Trial by Fury

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A few summers ago a young, half-ignorant, and poorly paid Negro teacher attending a summer school in the South raised a money order from $4 to $14. She gave the money order in payment for her board bill of $3.50. The bookkeeper, not noticing the alteration, accepted the money order and simply wrote across it "$10.50 due," as he did not have the change. Later during the day the girl was given her change. The bookkeeper was a graduate from the business department of a well-known Northern college. The fraud, which was detected neither by the local banker nor by the local postmaster, was discovered by the inspector in Atlanta. The girl was arrested and the bookkeeper was called as the chief witness for the State. The Negro girl, through an influential white man, got a white lawyer to defend her. The bookkeeper was called to the stand. He was first examined by the State. Then the lawyer for the girl began his examination.

LAWYER. What is your name?

BOOKKEEPER. John Doe.

LAWYER. Where do you live?

BOOKKEEPER. In X (in a Southern State).

LAWYER (impatiently). Nigger, you know what I mean. Where were you born?

BOOKKEEPER. In Y (a Northern State).

LAWYER. See, gentlemen of the jury, here is one of these yaller Northern niggers. Doe, what do you do at the school?

BOOKKEEPER. I'm the bookkeeper.

LAWYER. Bookkeeper! I didn't know any nigger knew anything about bookkeeping. What do you do?

The bookkeeper explained his work. The lawyer then passed the altered money order to him.

LAWYER. Doe, have you ever seen that money order before?

BOOKKEEPER (after examining it). Why, yes, I recognize my notation of $10.50 for change.

LAWYER (triumphantly). You see, gentlemen of the jury, this yaller nigger, Doe, raised the money order. Look how he is dressed. A dude. A yaller Northern nigger all dressed up. Raises a money order to buy a new pair of pants. Doe, didn't you raise that money order to buy a new pair of pants?

BOOKKEEPER. What advantage could it have been to me? Only the girl or the school could have gained by the counterfeit.

LAWYER. You see, gentlemen of the jury, this is one of those smart yaller Northern niggers. Doe, you yaller nigger, own up that you raised that money order.

BOOKKEEPER. I did not.

LAWYER. Gentlemen of the jury, Doe is a yaller nigger. He is a Northern nigger. Now, gentlemen of the jury, you know how he got yaller. Now, are you going to let him get away. Doe, you yaller nigger you, are you going to confess?

BOOKKEEPER. I have nothing to confess.

LAWYER. Doe, you yaller, Charlie-Chaplin mustache, carpet-bagger nigger, you raised that money order to buy clothes to dress up in like a sport. Gentlemen of the jury, are you going to let this yaller, Charlie-Chaplin mustache, carpet-bagger nigger get away with this?

JUDGE (interrupting). You can call Doe all the kinds of niggers you want, but don't refer to the State he is from.

The prosecuting attorney also interrupted to say that Doe's mustache was as well arranged as the lawyer's. The lawyer, in closing his argument, emphasized again to the jury that the bookkeeper was a "yaller nigger" from the North and cautioned those gentlemen to bear in mind, especially, why he was yellow.

The jury deliberated for nearly two hours; they decided the girl was the guilty one.

Atlanta, Georgia, September 3 E. FRANKLIN FRAZIER

Control Through Cooperation

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The economic despotism through which big business rules the American people is made possible by control of the federal government in all its branches. But suppose La Follette and Wheeler and a Progressive Congress had been elected last fall, what would have resulted in the business world? Without doubt the interests back of Coolidge, who also own or control the nation's forests, mines, electric power, transportation, basic industries, public utilities of all kinds—the raw material and economic machinery of the country—would have shut down business and produced hard times overnight to punish the voters for trying to cut off their special privilege to plunder. The mass of the people may not be informed on matters about which La Follette has preached these many years, but they understand hard times. That hits them in the face.

Now, we [illegible] control [illegible] government in Washington could not compel big business to play ball.

Wealth and great business ability constitute power. When nationally concentrated and organized this power is bound to control the government. If the American people want to be free and no longer subject to legalized robbery at every turn, they must organize to do the nation's business collectively—to handle their own business in their own interest and organize to be this economic power that is bound to control the government. If Europeans can learn to handle big business successfully in the interest of the common people, through the cooperative movement, as they are handling it today, surely Americans can do as well.

The point I am trying to make clear in this communication is that all the time, effort, and money that progressives can put into a fight for political control from now till the crack of doom will fail to accomplish the desired end—fail to stop the wholesale plundering—until the people are organized and equipped to handle the nation's business in the interest of the common people.

Through the cooperative movement the people can take over the nation's business gradually and without a jolt. But this they cannot accomplish without earnest personal interest and effort. If I were editing such a journal as The Nation I would devote a full-page editorial to this subject every issue. Industrial control carries political control with it.

Utica, New York, July 21 FRANK R. ROSSELL

A Plumber's View

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Why all the squawk about Tennessee and evolution? Seems to me the law must be right and should be enforced, since it must be the desire of the majority. Our job is to get busy and change their desires. My regular job is plumbing, but I guess I can find time to work on the other job too.

New York, August 1 FRANK LANGAN

How Free Is Britain's Free Trade?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

Sir: I have but one criticism to make of your article in the sixtieth anniversary number of The Nation. You call Mr. Edwin L. Godkin "an absolute free trader." My impression is that he was a "Manchester" or "English" free trader—a very different thing.

I myself am an "absolute" free trader who would turn the world's custom houses into museums or aquariums. During a recent trip to Europe I had any amount of fun with Britishers who called themselves free traders, telling them they were counterfeits who gave free trade a bad name.

"How comes it," I asked, "that you call yourselves free traders and Britain is called a free-trade country while you collect annually more revenue from customs duties than the United States does? Yet in the United States, whenever any one says a good word for free trade he is at once told: 'Look at England and see what free trade does to a nation!'

"Now, whatever may be the cause of Great Britain's present deplorable condition, it certainly is not free trade, for you have none. Yet your pose as a free trader gives commercial freedom a black eye. Your free trade is a spurious article, not genuine. As German silver contains no silver, 'English free trade' has in it no free trade."

Most of them were flabbergasted when I showed them in figures published by the Economist, the Statist, and their Board of Trade Journal the customs collections of the two countries, and they had no adequate answer to my charge that, while they talk free trade straight enough, they do not practice it; and that they should either put the principle in practice or give up the habit of calling their system free trade when it is not free trade.

I believe international commercial freedom to be the only peace-maker. I believe real free trade, instead of being a handicap to the nation that adopts it, will prove an advantage, and that other nations, if they would not be distanced in the race of economic progress, will have to adopt it also.

Clifton, New Jersey, July 15 STEPHEN BELL

Books and Plays

The Tramp

By LILLIAN BYRNES

I could long for your courage,
But have you convictions
That place the wind's whisper
Against the latch-key?

You make a rude path through the dew
In the morning;
Do you watch the mild sun turn the glitter
To vapor and warmth?

I could pardon your insolent way
If you saw, having vistas before you;
If a goblet of nectar turned not at your touch
To stale beer.

I turn to my desk and my papers,
And dream like a weakling,
Of sunshine, and rainfall, and mountains,
And motionless body.

You rob my dull desk of its virtue;
I despise you, resenting your freedom;
Gods, what a lout to lie amid blossoms
And watch the sun set on Olympus!

First Glance

ONE of the reasons why Arthur Waley may be right in claiming that the Japanese novel whose first nine chapters he has translated as "The Tale of Genji" (Houghton Mifflin: $3) belongs among "the dozen greatest masterpieces of the world" is that while the manner of the story is strange its matter is familiar. If there were only a manner to consider, one might call the book quaint and be done. And it is quaint enough. The decorum is that, presumably, of a medieval Japanese court. The clothing, the houses, the flowers, the morals are as "different" as such things may be. The people, as they talk, fall into beautiful verse, so that the scene becomes at times a veritable field of blossoms suddenly blown:

> Then unlike the lovers in the "Everlasting Wrong" who prayed that they might be as the "twin birds that share a wing" (for they remembered that this story had ended very sadly) they prayed "May our love last till Maitreya comes as a Buddha into the world." But she, still distrustful, answered his poem with the verse: "Such sorrow have I known in this world that I have small hope of worlds to come." Her versification was still a little tentative.

Not thus, surely, are lovers in our longitude heard to speak.

Yet it is easy, as one reads on, to slip into the conviction that this story of Prince Genji and his innumerable mistresses is but accidentally different from stories one has read of other lovers in other courts. There is the nearer world, for instance, recorded so brilliantly and so endlessly by the French memoir-writers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries. Might not most of these events have taken place at Paris, Fontainebleau, or Versailles? Was not Whitehall dimly like this for a time? And if the events are credible when transferred to a familiar background, are not the emotions credible and familiar too? Granted the premise of a society whose sole occupation is with the refinements of love, is there anything essentially strange—by the world's testimony—about "The Tale of Genji"?

It is easier still to forget decorums and courts altogether. The triumph of Lady Murasaki after all is that she has made a man, and that although she made him a thousand years ago he is alive in every nerve today. It was inevitable that someone should have compared "The Tale of Genji" with "Tom Jones," as I understand someone has. The comparison carries with it a greater compliment than is involved in the mere merit thereby implied. For it is a long way from the Emperor to Squire Allworthy, from Omyobu to Mrs. Honour, from the Lady of the West to Molly Segrim, from Genji to Tom. One book is as precious as the other is plain; the material at hand in the two cases would seem to have made comparison impossible. Yet there it is—Genji, like Tom, growing up among human beings who in their various ways teach him a little wisdom and much love. The two authors are alike simply in that they know a great deal about human beings, and know also how to bring their learning to bear upon the career of an impulsive, sensitive, and not too intelligent boy. Lady Murasaki, like Fielding, prefers to say that she is writing "history"; on a greater scale than Fielding's, and with a vastly greater delicacy, she pursues the reality which she was privileged to see. It is profoundly to be hoped that Mr. Waley proceeds with what appears to be a perfect translation.

MARK VAN DOREN

Count Montgelas on the War

The Case for the Central Powers: An Impeachment of the Versailles Verdict. By Count Max Montgelas. Translated from the German by Constance Vesey. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

THERE is one—and a fatal—defect in this excellent work on war origins and war guilt, namely, that it is written by a German. Though by far the most lucid, competent, and clarifying single-volume work on the immediate diplomatic background of the World War, the crises of June-August, 1914, and the particular myths and incidents connected with the latter, the book is likely to have little or no effect in setting even intelligent American opinion right in regard to this vitally significant situation upon an intelligent and accurate understanding of which the hope of any decisive and constructive settlement of the European international situation of necessity depends. Though there are some signs of an abatement of this particular national psychosis, it is still true that there is generally prevalent in this country the view that by definition a German is inevitably a subsidized liar. Added to this initial handicap is the curious, if not designed, handicap imposed by the English publisher who so completely altered the original title: "Leading Threads in the Problem of War Guilt." Montgelas's work is by no means an exercise in special pleading; rather it is a brief and objective analysis of the documents, of which Montgelas possesses an unusually thorough knowledge and competent grasp. If it is the "case for the Central Powers," then it means that the Central Powers are in a position to profit by a disclosure of the truth concerning the outbreak of the war.

The examination of pre-war diplomacy, while generally interpreted in a manner favorable to Germany, is well documented and merits serious and respectful consideration. After all qualifications are made it must be held to contain a complete refutation of the Entente contention of the primary responsibility of Germany for the leading diplomatic clashes in Europe in the decade before the war. In particular, Montgelas establishes beyond possibility of successful contradiction the initial responsibility of Izvolski for the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina; Germany's restraining influence upon the Austrian attitude toward Serbia until the assassination of the Archduke; the inferiority of German military preparations to July, 1914, as compared with those of France, to say nothing of those of Russia; Germany's expressed desire to reach an amicable settlement with France and Great Britain from 1912-14; and the adamant and ubiquitous French refusal to accept any general European agreement looking toward permanent peace unless it involved a restoration of Alsace-Lorraine. The only serious charge which can be made against the author is his failure to emphasize the vicious influence of Holstein in rejecting the earlier British advances toward an adjustment with Germany, and the dubious nature of the naval policy of Von Tirpitz. It might, however, be said in extenuation that this omission is offset by his elucidation of the English rejection of the German advances following 1912, something usually overlooked by Entente historians.

Montgelas's analysis of the events of the diplomatic "crisis" of 1914 is a masterly performance. On the basis of a well-nigh complete control of all the pertinent documents he controverts with high success the Entente indictment of Germany which rallied millions to death or bankruptcy from 1914 onward. He proves the undoubted aspiration and good faith of the German civil government in the effort to avert a general European war. He indicates that there is a vast gulf between the guilt of even the Austrian militarists, who merely desired a well-nigh indispensable punitive war against Serbia, and that of the Russian militarists and French Revanchards whose plans rested wholly and solely upon the precipitation of a world war and whose alleged intervention in behalf of Serbia was but a hypocritical moral subterfuge. The real distinction, not only in degree but in kind, between Franco-Russian guilt and that of Germany, who was not even willing to allow the Austrian plans in regard to Serbia to proceed if they were to plunge Europe into war, should be apparent to any reasonably unprejudiced student. Montgelas shows clearly that Germany would undoubtedly have found some pacific method of adjusting the controversy but for the Russian general mobilization, the responsibility for which rests directly upon Sazonov and indirectly upon the encouragement of Poincaré and the technical blundering of Sir Edward Grey, who was under the control of the Russo-maniac, Nicolson, his Under Secretary. Montgelas indicates that even after the German government had decided that a defensive war against Russia was unavoidable there was every desire to avert war with France. Poincaré's enthusiastic promises on his St. Petersburg visit had, however, made any such aspiration pathetically futile and hopeless. Great Britain was so deeply and comprehensively involved in secret commitments to France and Russia that she could not extract herself in 1914, and the invasion of Belgium was but a happy German blunder which helped Sir Edward Grey out of a grave diplomatic and political crisis. While Montgelas holds that the invasion of Belgium was a diplomatic blunder and a violation of international law in the interests of pure military necessity, he shows that the Anglo-French plan of campaign, as drawn up in 1911, 1912, and 1913, contemplated similar action, and that the King of Belgium stated in May, 1914, that he believed the impending danger from France and England to be the greatest and most imminent. Still Montgelas proves the caliber of his intellect and judgment by refusing to exploit this fact in extenuation of Germany. He agrees that "a breach of international law is not legalized by the fact that another state contemplates a similar act."

Only two matters of considerable importance appear to be lacking in Montgelas's handling of the crisis of 1914. He wrote too early to have available the revelations of Yovanovitch and Nenadovitch as to the complicity of the Serbian civil government in the plot for the assassination of the Archduke. Nor was he able to read in the fourth volume of Hötzendorf's memoirs the telegrams of Von Moltke, in which the German Chief of Staff secretly and in direct opposition to the pacific efforts of the German civil government urged Hötzendorf and his party to remain firm and proceed with the punishment of Serbia. Perhaps a third significant omission might be pointed out, namely, his failure to mention the fact established by Hermann Lutz, that by a blunder due to lack of technical knowledge Sir Edward Grey gave Russia to understand, as early as July 25, 1914, that England was willing to contemplate the implications of a general Russian mobilization against Austria.

One of the most interesting parts of the book is the discussion of particular incidents, real and alleged, in the diplomatic crisis such as the "Potsdam Conference" of July 5, 1914, the Szögyény telegrams, the special edition of the Berliner Lokalanzeiger carrying the news of the fake German mobilization order, and the French ten-kilometer imposture. These myths and the special problems are handled in so convincing a fashion that a heavy blow is dealt at some of the most persistent bulwarks of Allied propaganda. There are several omissions, among them the notorious Wickham Steed myth as to the plot for war and the division of Europe hatched by the Kaiser and the Archduke Franz Ferdinand at Konopischt in May, 1914, and the Italian plan for mediation, generally overlooked but properly stressed by Morhardt in his indictment of Poincaré.

The results of Montgelas's analysis of the problems of war guilt are summarized in some seventeen propositions which seem to the writer perhaps the best brief statement yet made of the vitally relevant and cogent facts on this subject. Though scarcely a partisan statement, they certainly constitute a most forceful brief against the Versailles indictment. It does not seem to the reviewer that they can be seriously controverted, but it will be interesting to examine the attempt which will doubtless appear in the work of Renouvin, who is about to bring out the only French work on this specific subject worthy to rank with that of Montgelas on the scores of scholarship, objectivity, and special competence.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

The Mayan Calendar

The Reduction of Mayan Dates. By Herbert J. Spinden. Peabody Museum Papers, Vol. VI, No. 4. Cambridge, Massachusetts: The Museum.

IT has been next to impossible for the white race to realize, even partially, the fact that the American Indian, or Amerind, to employ a term very useful in any general discussion, was in intellect and morals about the equal of the white man; and in his culture was, perhaps, on the road to achievements of a high order when the waves of our swifter people, with their gunpowder, overwhelmed him.

In this new exposition of the results of his labors in the Central American field of archaeology Mr. Spinden adds to his already high record as a painstaking scholar. His correlation of the Mayan calendar with our own Gregorian calendar apparently marks the beginning of a more intimate knowledge of this far-advanced portion of the American race. He is able to establish from carved monuments and the few remaining documents the dates of Mayan events in our own year-terms. This calendar was invented in the seventh century before Christ—in other words, about 2,500 years ago, and it "solved with conspicuous success the great problem of measuring and defining time which confronts all civilized nations."

These people were living in a pure stone age when they perfected this remarkable calendar, and, as Mr. Spinden further declares, "they developed arithmetic, astronomy, and city planning, and swept in advance of anything the Egyptians could do in the sculptural treatment of the human body. . . . The Mayan dates are written out in a remarkable system of hieroglyphs and numerical notations peculiar in their fullest development to the Mayas of Central American lowlands, but found in a fragmentary and debased form among the Aztecs, Zapotecs, and other tribes of Mexico and Guatemala. No similar system is found anywhere else in the world."

The Maya month was twenty days in length, each day having its own name and sign. There were eighteen months, each having its name and sign also. There were five additional days in each year to round out the 365 necessary to a full year, and there was a still further period or cyclic fractional adjustment. The elucidation of the Mayan calendar and the study of Mayan history as well received a death-blow when, in 1561, the Spanish bishop Landa, wishing to save the souls of the Mayas from perdition, gathered everywhere their books and so successfully annihilated them by fire that the history of this extraordinary branch of the American race "for 2,000 years" was blotted out.

For three and a half centuries scholars have been trying to pick up the thread somewhere, and slowly Stephens, Brinton, Bowditch, Maudsley, Goodman, Maler, Charnay, Seler, Förstemann, and Spinden have been delving here and there for the key. Only the carvings on monuments and a few calendar books have been available for study, together with a supposed alphabet and some other crude data left by Landa. "The important thing resulting from the correlation explained in this paper," says Mr. Spinden, "is that we now have a day-for-day chronology for the key civilization of the New World in some respects more accurate than any classical record in the Old World."

As science has no closed trails—or should have none—every theory or statement must be given a hearing, and it is only reasonable in this connection to refer to the linguistic work of Professor Leo Wiener of Harvard University as applied to the question of American pre-Columbian civilization. Professor Wiener disagrees entirely with Mr. Spinden as to the origin of the Maya and Aztec civilizations. And Mr. Spinden does not accept one iota of Professor Wiener's argument. Nevertheless, the statements of so eminent a linguist as Professor Wiener must be considered.

He maintains that these civilizations were derived at a comparatively late date (about the seventh century A.D.) from the Arabs through the Africans—the Negroes. He has traced a number of absolute linguistic agreements, and these have yet to be explained. Professor Wiener is about to publish a new book on the subject. The classification of American tribes and stocks having come down to a linguistic basis, it remains a question as to how far such classification can be trusted. Perhaps Professor Wiener's work may in a measure determine the answer.

FREDERICK S. DELLENBAUGH

Wages and the Family

The Disinherited Family. By Eleanor F. Rathbone. Longmans, Green and Company. $2.50.

THE ironic anomalies of our present wage system have long puzzled the curious. Bachelors and fathers of large families receive the same wage, although their needs are patently different. Widows with children who work alongside of inefficient single men consistently receive less than the male workers, and if they complain are told that since men are the ones who have dependents they must be given the larger wage. What is even more extraordinary is that the reformers, in pressing the thoroughly sound claims of labor to a living wage, have urged that all male workers, whether bachelors or fathers of large families, should receive enough to maintain a family of five. This supposed divine average would, of course, be far more than the former needed, while it would be less than adequate for those with more than three dependent children. If, indeed, all of the 29,000,000 adult males who were gainfully employed in this country in 1920 had been paid enough to maintain a family of five, maintenance would have been provided for no less than 145,000,000 people. But since the census of that year showed a population of only 106,000,000, this would have meant provision for 39,000,000 phantom wives and children. Since the 6,000,000 adult women workers and the 5,000,000 employed juveniles at least earned their maintenance, the payment of the wage commonly claimed for the adult male workers would have resulted in provision for no fewer than 50,000,000 fictitious dependents.

Miss Rathbone has seen through these fallacies, and in an interesting volume she advocates the payment of allowances to families for their dependent children. Those with large families are thus protected, while it becomes unnecessary to pay single men a minimum wage which is more than sufficient to support themselves. Such allowances, in Miss Rathbone's opinion, may be granted either by the state or by private industry. If by the latter, it will of course be necessary, as in France, for the employers to form equalization funds to assess the cost of the allowance upon the various member firms in such a way as to afford little or no temptation for an employer to discriminate in giving employment against those with dependents. An especially valuable feature of the book is the description given of the striking developments in the field of family allowances in Europe since the war.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS

Communism and Christianity

Foundations of Christianity: A Study in Christian Origins. By Karl Kautsky. International Publishers Company. $4.

THE German original of this work, published seventeen years ago, has been translated without any attempt to bring the discussion of the subject down to date, although it has been a much-discussed subject during these years. And by the alchemy of Marxian theory the author, whose métier is socialism, transforms the early Christian movement into an ideal revolutionary communistic society. To say the least, the result is an unusual book. Emotional persons who "see red" on the slightest provocation may here discover the presence of insidious bolshevist propaganda. But the present volume makes its bid for attention as "an authoritative account of the origins of the Christian church." Let it be judged simply as that.

To readers accustomed to derive their information about the beginnings of Christianity from such widely accepted modern authorities as Harnack in Germany and McGiffert in America, the story told by Kautsky will often seem unintelligible, if not indeed absurd. In order to understand the rise of the new religion it is thought quite unnecessary to know anything about the person and teaching of Jesus. Probably even before his day the movement had existed as a "communistic beneficiary organization of the proletarians of Jerusalem." His role had been merely that of a bold agitator and rebel from Galilee who presently became its most prominent champion and martyr. The revolutionary group now clothed their hero in the garments of Jewish messianism, but in one important respect they differed from other Jewish revolutionists who looked for a messianic deliverer. The Christians aimed not simply at throwing off the Roman yoke but at the destruction of all rulers; "the passion which animated them was not race hatred but class hatred." Hatred of the rich, whether Jew or Gentile, was their one distinguishing characteristic. Thus their redeemer was an "international" figure, but their hoped-for redemption failed of realization. With the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. the messianic congregation lost its rebellious character and accordingly deteriorated. Its communism suffered decline because it was limited to consumption of goods and did not embrace production. But even more disastrous was the growth of organization in the Christian congregations, where wealth and class distinctions now received recognition. In spite of its ideal beginnings the new religion suffered a rapid decline when it abandoned its ambition to conquer the world for the proletariat. A harsh judgment is pronounced upon the Christian church: "In its victorious course the proletarian, communistic, beneficiary organization became transformed into the most tremendous instrument of domination and exploitation in the world."

To the historian of early Christianity whose professional training has involved much scrutiny of the total range of the extant documents, Kautsky's easy-going method of treating the sources will be simply astounding. Data that would be inconvenient for his theory are jauntily ignored. Perhaps even greater offense will be taken at his distortions of the data selected for use. The readiness with which he can read his own interests into his sources might well make him an object of envy on the part of every propagandist, whether theologian or politician, who looks backward for the prototype of his ideals.

To be sure, the free-lance is rarely a welcome visitor in the staid company of professional craftsmen, whether they are historians or members of any other well-established guild. Yet conceivably he may on occasion render a very useful service. His freedom from the conventions, his fresh approach, and his lack of interest in traditional conclusions may more than compensate for certain inevitable defects of professional technique. But he must be truly a free-lance and not merely a partisan masquerading as an angel of freedom in a new arena where his liberty of movement is only apparent because his own conventional machinery of control happens to be unfamiliar to his new audience. Truly scientific method in any field of research requires that one's findings shall be kept free from adulteration by personal likes and dislikes. Zeal for a cause, quite irrespective of the merits of the cause, inhibits genuine historical-mindedness. Our author is a champion, not a historian. His work falls far short of being a scientifically dependable reconstruction of the history of Christian origins.

SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE

The Last of the Yeomen

The Life of William Cobbett. By G. D. H. Cole. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $4.50.

LOST causes find friends among social prophets as well as among elegiac poets, for the wise know how frequently the future "is only the past again, entered through another gate." Those who, like Mr. Cole, are not satisfied with the plutocratic absolutism of the present industrial society will find encouragement in the efforts of William Cobbett to strangle it at birth. For Cobbett, the most popular British journalist of the first quarter of the nineteenth century, made articulate the cry of the dispossessed peasants who were the first factory workers for deliverance from the iron rule of the "lords of the spinning jenny," and for freedom to taste the fresh air of their native fields. Had he been successful in allying the new things in politics with the new things in economic life, England might have attained a century ago the industrial democracy for which Mr. Cole hopes. But he was defeated by the persistent and widespread fear of the French Revolution bugaboo, which drove the old lords of the land into the arms of the new lords of the factory. Nevertheless he made a solid beginning of the organization of British labor, which shows increasing promise of succeeding where Cobbett failed. Such is Mr. Cole's interpretation of the history of William Cobbett, which he considers representative of "the spiritual history of the common people of his day."

Not only is Cobbett's life a fascinating historical document; it is for a large part autobiography of the most racy sort, crowded with picturesque incident in America as well as in England. Cobbett championed the Old England of the independent yeoman; he personified it. He was "a strong, hale, stout man, with a ruddy countenance, a small laughing eye, and the figure of a respectable English farmer," clothed habitually in an obsolete "scarlet broadcloth waistcoat, with the flaps hanging down." A son of a small farmer of Surrey, he went to work in the fields at a tender age, when he was "hardly able to climb the gates and stiles," and "at the close of the day, to reach home was a task of infinite difficulty." At fourteen, his curiosity concerning the strange title, "A Tale of a Tub," displayed in a bookseller's window, brought about his intellectual awakening. His adventurousness led him to a bitter experience of the brutalities and injustices of army life; and he tells how, in despair at the loss of a ha'penny which was to buy a supplement to his pitifully meager ration, "I buried my head under the miserable sheet and rug and cried like a child." But his self-assurance and infinite capacity for hard work awed his incompetent superiors; "Did I not wriggle myself from a private soldier to a sergeant major, and if I had remained, with all my military notions, should I not have wriggled myself up to a general, in spite of all the birth and rank in the kingdom?" Such spirit in a class-conscious peasant was the stuff of which radicals were made in the reign of George III. And a radical Cobbett became; not from belief in the abstract rights of man, but unwillingly and slowly, in good British fashion, through repeated collision with "the system" of corruption in high places of the military, and then of the civil government. This stubborn adherence to the concrete made him, and not the theorizing middle-class Benthamites, the authentic voice of the masses. The British people bought his Political Register to the extent of forty or fifty thousand copies weekly, a circulation many times that of any other journal of the time. Against the handicaps of stamp taxes, imprisonment, and exile, Cobbett carried the agitation for parliamentary reform through the dangerous days of Tory coercion until he gleefully saw it forced on the reluctant Whigs; "They are compelled to adopt it, though they do not like it. They are going to be married to this reform. They are going to be married in a halter." Had the Reformed Parliament heeded Cobbett, and not the Benthamites, on questions of economic policy, there would probably have been no "hungry forties" and no need of a "Past and Present." Indeed Cobbett largely anticipated the economic gospel of his fellow-peasant Carlyle, who praised him as the "pattern John Bull of his century, strong as a rhinoceros, and with singular humanities and genialities shining through his thick skin." His skin had need to be thick in those days of scurrilous and hard-hitting pamphleteering, when he provoked his foes by the "mingled storm of torturing sarcasm, contemptuous jocularity, and slaughtering invective" which has given him rank as one of the greatest of political controversialists. The failings of John Bull he had also in full measure: a boundless egotism, a distrust of foreigners, a love for bull-baiting, single-stick, and other brutal sports, and crotchety prejudices—especially against tea, potatoes, and Shakespeare, whom he professed to abominate because of his "bombast, puns, and smut."

Mr. Cole has criticized the biographical materials with admirable care and judgment, and has illuminated them with historical background. His book is a valuable addition to the rapidly increasing number of studies in the Napoleonic War and post-war period, which attracts the contemporary historian by so many striking analogies to the present period of the World War and its aftermath.

EMERY NEFF

A Modern Cassandra

Secret Societies and Subversive Movements. By Nesta H. Webster. E. P. Dutton and Company. $7.

A FEW years ago Mrs. Webster published a thick volume entitled "The French Revolution; A Study in Democracy," in which she advanced the rather startling thesis that the revolution was due not to the discontent of the proletariat, the ambitions of the bourgeoisie, the insolence of the nobility, the obstinacy of the court, or the bankruptcy of the treasury, but to a deep-laid conspiracy of secret agents of the Prussian king and the Duke of Orleans, inspired by the Bavarian Illuminati and the atheists of the "Encyclopaedia," to overthrow religion, patriotism, order, and decency, to ruin the best and kindest of kings, and to put human reason in the place of God. The immediate protests of critics against this interpretation of the revolution as a plot of free-masons and freethinkers apparently roused Mrs. Webster to replenish her arsenal of authorities in order to prove the imminent menace of secret subversive movements to every cherished institution of Western civilization. At the close of the World War she published a volume on "World Revolution" to show that that cataclysm was to be traced in the last analysis to the conspiracies of "illuminized" free-masonry; and now, as she says in her present preface, she has "felt impelled to devote one more book to the revolution as a whole, by going back this time further into the past and attempting to trace its origins from the first century of the Christian era. For it is only by taking a general survey of the movement that it is possible to understand the causes of any particular phase of its existence."

The sentence last quoted reveals the bold assumption of the author that all the revolutionary manifestations of the past twenty centuries have been part and parcel of the same continuous conspiracy of subversion ("the movement"), nurtured by the secret mysteries of the Jewish Cabbala, the Moslem Druses, the Christian Templars, Masonic lodges, Satanists, Rosicrucians, Stuhlherren, Illuminati, Vehmgerichte, and pacifistic humanitarianism. She has ransacked recondite records and explored obscure historians, and she has fully persuaded herself that we of the present day are living in a fool's paradise of fancied security, that we are "drifting along in an hypnotic sleep." Even so innocent a movement as the propaganda for Esperanto is part of the great conspiracy, for its object is to undermine loyalty to one's country by encouraging a universal vehicle of thought.

Readers of Mrs. Webster's former books are well instructed as to the "treasures" of civilization which she wishes to preserve. She defends the very abuses which have provoked revolutions and wars in the past—blind conservatism, aristocratic privilege, suspicious censorship, coercive orthodoxy. She out-Burkes Burke in the championship of the Old Régime. She abhors democracy, condemns the liberty of the press, and regards any effort to promote international peace as a betrayal of one's country. Mussolini is a hero because he "has restored the crucifix to the schools and religious teaching to the curriculum." "The perfectibility of human nature and universal brotherhood are the twin fallacies on which the whole philosophy of socialism has been built."

Mrs. Webster has devoted an immense amount of labor and marshaled an astounding number of citations to prove the existence of an "inner circle" of world revolutionists, supported by "Illuminati" who wish to undermine patriotism and by Jewish financiers who "hope to establish their empire on the ruins of Christian civilization." We must concede her scholarship, her sincerity, and her forceful presentation. Nevertheless we cannot but feel that all this effort is devoted to a thesis unworthy of its expenditure. We would not say that "much learning hath made her mad," but we think that much curious research to prove her assumption has served to strengthen the suspicions on which that assumption is based. And even if Mrs. Webster's worst fears were justified, the remedy which she suggests would be the very best encouragement of the evil. For she has nothing better to propose than the old device of forceful repression, which has driven reformers to revolution and substituted for orderly progress the cataclysm of armed revolt. She would have us return to the policy of the July Ordinances and the Carlsbad Decrees. Metternich and Senator Lusk are proper guardians of the sacred status quo. "A Department for the Investigation of Subversive Movements," she says, "should have a place in every ordered government." Congress might create a new Department of Delation and Persecution. The sheeted and hooded Wizard of the Ku Klux Klan as secretary of the new department would be a picturesque addition to the giants of Mr. Coolidge's Cabinet.

DAVID SAVILLE MUZZEY

Books in Brief

The Nature of Intelligence. By L. L. Thurstone. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $3.75.

Owing to the incursion first of behaviorism and now of psychoanalysis, there has arisen a conflict of viewpoint as to whether psychology is in esse to concern itself with the source of living, that is, the desires and emotions, or with the mind or consciousness, or purely with the objective behavior which may be recorded by precision instruments. Now it is our good fortune to have Mr. Thurstone, a trained engineer and experimental psychologist, present us with a study of human conduct which recognizes and yet attempts to reconcile these three apparently divergent points of view.

Tibet Past and Present. By Sir Charles Bell. Oxford University Press. $7.

Sir Charles Bell, member of the Indian Civil Service and late British Political Representative in Tibet, Bhutan, and Sikkim, has had a longer and closer contact with things Tibetan than any other European, and he has written a very useful book. In its pages the general reader will find rich stores of facts, rather loosely set forth, without pretense of philosophical generalization. The special student of theology, geology, sociology, and other 'ologies will find but little that is new. One gathers the impression that Sir Charles himself is not much concerned about the history, religion, literature, or general culture of the Tibetans, save as those subjects enter into his one absorbing topic, Tibet as a frontier of India. We see in the naive working of his mind an alchemy that turns into "intrigue" and "double-dealing" all that is done in his chosen field by Russia, China, or Japan, while British diplomacy and war—well, these are straightforward, unimpeachable efforts to guard the great empire against any possible danger. When the British give money to a native ruler it is a subsidy. Other governments give bribes. Sir Charles does, indeed, grant that the Chinese exercise of force against Tibet in 1910-12 was a consequence of the Curzon War of 1904. Did not the irascible Viceroy charge the Chinese Government with laxity in holding Tibet to some absurd treaty arrangement? And did not his successor later receive the Dalai Lama when he fled from the Chinese, as he had, only a few years before, fled from the British machine-gunners? Poor Dalai Lama! If we are to follow the plain inferences of a tortuous story of sordid dealings on all sides, he will find safety only when he shall put himself and his people in the benevolent power of the British lion, which shields so many weaklings from other great beasts. Verily, little wars and big wars are engendering in remote places, scarce known even to the elite public which reads The Nation. They are being prepared by good men like Sir Charles Bell. Curzon saw only Russia in Lhassa. Now Bell sees there the yellow wraith of Japan as well. India will be really safe only when the empire shall have no frontiers.

Charles Lamb. A Play by Alice Brown. The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

In writing this drama Miss Brown has proved her fondness and reverence for Charles Lamb, but it is doubtful whether she will afford satisfaction to Lamb's other admirers. When Miss Brown claims the right to "play hob with time and place" in her handling of the events of Lamb's life, her claim is unanswerable. She is also within her artistic rights in allowing her fancy to exercise itself on such persons as Alice Winterton and Bartram, for history knows them only as the shadowy wraiths of Lamb's dreaming hours. But she is open to question when she focuses the light on the pathetic wanderings from mental sanity of Charles and his sister and does not even spare us from witnessing the ghastly spectacle of Mary's mad fit. Could the wealth of affection and tenderness in Lamb be shown in no other way than by dragging before the footlights what he himself hid so carefully from the knowledge of strangers? Miss Brown treats the situation with solicitous delicacy, but its painfulness cannot be obliterated. She lavishes much loving art upon her hero and succeeds remarkably well in bringing to life his whimsicality and his substantial humanity, but was it necessary in the process to reduce to poor automata the men of genius who moved in his circle? In the case of Coleridge, Hazlitt, and Leigh Hunt a certain observance of historical accuracy is desirable. It is not pleasant always to contemplate Coleridge as a pompous clergyman and it is something of a shock to hear him quote from the "Hebrew Melodies" in 1796! Hazlitt (in the same year) is not permitted to open his mouth without foolishly sputtering the name of Napoleon, and Leigh Hunt, being then in sober fact eleven years of age, is brought in as the publisher of Lamb's lampoon on the Regent, anticipating history by sixteen years. With all due regard for the artist's rights, we maintain that in the composition of a play like this some consideration is owing to the other distinguished figures and that the offense which is here given could easily have been avoided. The initiated reader will also feel annoyed by the discharge in an unbroken profusion of the sallies and witticisms which he knows to have been spread over many a Wednesday evening. It gives the effect of a false professional brilliancy to a humor that should bubble up unexpectedly from the ground of serious conversation.

Frances Wright. By William Randall Waterman. Edited by the Faculty of Political Science of Columbia University. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.50.

Frances Wright, who was born in Scotland in 1795, belongs in spirit and activity to the humanitarians of the early nineteenth century. She was one of the exceptional women of her period, and was so well known both in this country and in Europe that in reading Mr. Waterman's admirable biography one marvels she should have remained in such comparative obscurity. It was doubtless the very catholicity of her interests which prevented any one cause from bringing her forward as its pioneer heroine, lest it be obliged to carry the burden of her advocacy of other unpopular ideas. She was not primarily a feminist but an intrepid, unconventional, pioneering type of woman. Her vigorous, inquiring mind questioned the established attitudes and customs regarding race, religion, property, and sex. She believed in the perfectibility of humankind and her recipes for achieving the ultimate Utopia varied with the periods of her life. She first was for political action; later her faith centered on economic reorganization; and finally the emphasis was placed on freeing thought through educational reforms. These transitions seem to have been in some degree influenced by her successive association with various intellectual men. She was a hero-worshiper, and her social philosophy appears to have taken the color of whichever hero was in the ascendant. There is interesting material in this life for a biography done in the manner of Strachey's study of Florence Nightingale. But Mr. Waterman's biography is not one of psychological interpretation; it is a careful and scholarly piece of research, well documented, and presented in a clear and agreeable style.

Rational Diet. By Otto Carqué. Los Angeles: Times-Mirror Press. $5.

This is "an advanced treatise on the food question." The author declares that he has been a close student of the science of nutrition for the last thirty years and that his writings are well known. Well known to whom? He stresses the value of "organized mineral elements or organic salts." "The wonderful creative work of nature throughout the plant and animal world is largely due to the actions and reactions of the mineral salts and their vibratory forces." His 536 pages are filled with detailed expositions of "vibratory forces," "organic salts," and other jargon that is neither science nor English. Christian, McFadden, and McCann are lumped indiscriminately with McCollom and Funk. We are told that "electronic vibration is the material life of the cell"; and that "the principal role of food is not simply to be digested and oxidized, as present-day physiology assumes, but to supply vital electricity and magnetism" (shades of Abrams!). We are here obviously dealing with a man who digests his food badly, whose knowledge of the science of nutrition is at a minimum, and whose medieval mind attempts to cope with modern science. Result: farce and tragedy mixed.

The Evolution of French Canada. By Jean Charlemagne Bracq. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

The presence of two races in Canada with two cultures and two languages has produced a certain amount of friction. English writers have generally had the better opportunity to present their case because they were writing for readers with sympathetic preconceptions. But in 1918 William Henry Moore, son of a Baptist clergyman of Ontario, published "The Clash!", a brilliant presentation of the case for French Canada. Mr. Bracq's book, the work of a European French Protestant, is a further contribution to the subject. He has not Mr. Moore's brilliance or literary style, and he encumbers his book with too frequent quotations not always selected with critical judgment. But he deals with a subject of such interest and importance, and one which at the same time has been so neglected, that his book should prove a valuable aid to the study of those various ethnic groups that will eventually combine to become a distinct American civilization, neither French nor British. Whether or not that coming civilization shall be a reflection of the present Anglo-Saxon (so called) passion for standardization will depend largely on how long the French wedge can resist the steam-roller of uniformity; history teaches that the resistance will be long.

The Essential American Tradition. Compiled and with an Introduction by Jesse Lee Bennett. George H. Doran Company. $3.

The "essential tradition" which Mr. Bennett expounds in the first hundred pages of this volume appears to be a compound of individualism in politics and social matters, a theory of government fundamentally that of compact, an inclination toward liberalism if not an altogether consistent practice of it, and, of course, such novelty as inheres in the federal system and the forms of State government. Following the introduction are some 250 pages of extracts and notes in which the development of the tradition is illustrated or explained. The book will not be without usefulness for those who have occasion to punctuate or enliven their discourses on public questions with quotations from the great or near great, and Mr. Bennett's own contribution, while given to resounding rhetoric, contains a good deal of shrewd and informing comment on the strong and weak points of the American system, but the work as a whole belongs in the class of books which, if they are to be taken at all, are to be tasted rather than read.

Collected Papers, Vol. III. By Sigmund Freud. Case Histories. Authorized Translation by Alix and James Strachey. London: The Hogarth Press. 30 shillings.

This is perhaps the most interesting of the volumes which are to comprise the complete works of Freud in English.

An Anthology of Medieval Latin. Chosen by Stephen Gaselee. London: Macmillan and Company. 7/6.

A cross-section, as charming as it is learned, of popular Latin considered historically. Mr. Gaselee begins with the spoken dialect of towns as old as Pompeii, and comes down—lingering longest, of course, in the Middle Ages—as far as 1916, to a war letter written by a Swiss Benedictine. The volume is the first in its field and should prove extremely useful.

Drama

"Siegfried"

"SIEGFRIED," the new German movie now playing at the Century Theater, is by no means so eccentrically original in technique as either "The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari" or even "The Last Laugh." Yet for persons interested in those much-talked-of possibilities of the movies—which, by the way, are rapidly becoming as old a story as the youth of America—it should be equally interesting. When the effects which it obtains are superior to those in the usual American film they are so because of the exercise of general artistic intelligence rather than because of ingenious technical devices, and in consequence the methods employed are applicable to the treatment of a great variety of materials instead of being suited, as was the case with the other pictures mentioned, only to stories belonging to a particular genre.

In the first place, the makers of "Siegfried" have striven for that unity of style in their backgrounds which is generally so completely lacking in moving pictures. Whereas the worst writer in the world is compelled, by the limitations of his own temperament, to make his descriptions represent to some slight extent one particular view of the world, the eye of the camera, unfortunately, sees everything and reproduces everything with equal clarity and equal emphasis. The actual historic spot where a thing occurred is usually the worst place on earth to act it out for the simple reason that it is generally so cluttered up with irrelevant details and irrelevant objects as to scatter the attention completely. The photograph of it represents the scene accurately but it does not, as every work of art must, represent it as seen through a temperament; for a lens has no temperament. And when, as is usually the case, this lens is turned, in the course of a single picture, now upon, let us say, the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris, now upon a painted studio set, and now upon a stretch of California sand which is supposed to resemble the Sahara Desert, there is added a confusion similar to that which would be produced in a novel if the descriptive passages were written alternately by Theodore Dreiser, Anatole France, and Ethel M. Dell. This fact alone would be sufficient to explain why there are very few movies which, whatever spectacular or other effect they may contain, can be said to exist at all as works of art, since there can be no art without some unity of style. Realizing this difficulty, the directors of "Siegfried" have used only carefully selected natural scenes and used those very sparingly. For the most part they have constructed what they wanted, and they have seen to it that these constructed sets, usually simple in outline and mass, represent a consistent conception of a setting for their legend. Some of the scenes are very striking, some by no means so good, but they hang together and they have a style.

In the second place, those responsible for "Siegfried" have made some advance in skill in the general conduct of a picturized narrative. Most movies, though they may have exciting scenes of combat or chase, seem to me devoid of any cumulative dramatic power. With all their quick shifting of scene, their cut-backs and their close-ups, they do not achieve much arrangement or emphasis; when the hero opens the door of a taxicab the action seems just as significant as that when he faces the seducer of his wife. In "Siegfried" too there are passages of this meandering, pointless narrative; but there are also many scenes, like the sequence of three or four showing the death of the central character, which have real power.

Finally, full advantage has been taken of the unrivaled opportunity for providing an adequate musical score. The task of adapting Wagner was by no means easy, since the film, following a different version of the legend from that upon which the operas were based, has comparatively few scenes corresponding to any treated by Wagner; but Hugo Riesenfeld has done an exceedingly clever job in fitting passages from the various parts of the "Ring" as well as from "Lohengrin" to the movie, and it is, indeed, difficult to estimate just how much of the effect which the whole produces would be left if the picture were seen in perfect silence.

Four-fifths of all the moving pictures I have seen in the last ten years have bored me profoundly, and this remark applies as well to those playing regular engagements in Broadway houses as to those ordinary pictures described by their producers as no more than mere "extra super-features." "Siegfried," music and picture together, I found highly enjoyable.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

SIEGFRIED

UFA'S Great Music Photo Drama Based on the Norse Saga and Wagner's Ring Operas

Limited Engagement

A Symphonic Orchestra of 60 Musicians from the Metropolitan Opera Co. Render a Special Score Compiled From

Wagner's Immortal Music

JOSIAH ZURO, Conducting

CENTURY, 62nd Street and Central Park West.

ALL SEATS RESERVED

TWICE DAILY, 2:30-8:30 1000 SEATS 50c BEST SEATS $2.20

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE 466 Grand St.

The Grand Street Follies of 1925

Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

BAYES Theatre, 44th Street, West of Broadway

LACKAWANNA 6565

Maurice Schwartz Production of

"KING SAUL"

EVES. 8:30. MAT. SAT. 2:30. SEATS NOW ON SALE

International Relations Section

A Bulgarian Protest

WE print below a protest against the attitude of the Bulgarian Government toward political murders signed by the Parliamentary Group and the Executive Committee of the National Agrarian League of Bulgaria. It was printed in the Agrarian Banner, the only paper which the real left-wing opposition is allowed to publish. The Communists have no paper; they are outlawed as a party and their property has been confiscated. The Socialists have two dailies which have finally begun, within the last few weeks, a serious campaign against the Tsankoff Government. Of the fifteen newspapers published at Sofia, only three unreservedly support the Government and eight unreservedly oppose it:

To the Minister-President and to the President of the National Assembly:

The Parliamentary Group and the Executive Committee of the National Agrarian League of Bulgaria at a union meeting held August 4 and 5 took up the question of the murder of prominent Agrarian leaders, the complete disappearance of others, and the killing of still others because of alleged attempts to escape, and

1. Inasmuch as political murders have not ceased but are rather occurring in ever-increasing numbers and with greater and greater frequency and always in a way which points to personal and partisan vengeance;

2. Inasmuch as the perpetrators of these murders are not discovered;

3. Inasmuch as peace cannot be restored to the nation by such murders, which instead of pacifying the people only implant hatred and party malignity and revenge deeper in their hearts;

4. Inasmuch as these murders undermine the stability of the state, impair the authority of the government, and destroy the confidence of the people in the legal order established by the laws of the land;

5. Inasmuch as these murders, by taking away the most precious possession of human kind, namely, life, disturb the peace, hinder the normal development, and jeopardize the welfare of the Bulgarian people;

6. Inasmuch as these murders, by destroying social solidarity and established order and judicial procedure in the state, blacken and defile the good name of Bulgaria before the civilized world;

And inasmuch as (a) the people connected with the Agrarian League live in the constant nightmare of wholesale persecutions, illegal arrests, imprisonment and murders; since (b) more than thirty National Representatives in the present and former sessions of Parliament, among whom are several former ministers, are no longer among the living, although they have never been brought to trial and no legal sentence has ever been pronounced upon them; and since (c) during the last few days there have been added to the list of the killed the names of two more National Representatives, members of the present Assembly, namely, George Kosovsky and Marin Popoff, although neither we nor the public have been informed as to any guilt of theirs;

In view of all this we declare:

1. That we have not been and are not capable of becoming defenders of criminals, whatever circle they may belong to, but we demand that their punishment, however severe it may be, be imposed by proper judicial authorities according to established and legal methods of procedure;

2. And we proudly and boldly affirm that the members of the National Agrarian League of Bulgaria from the first to the last love our country, prize her independence, hold her liberty dear, and value our own labor and property and are ready to oppose any one who dares to lay hands on her freedom and institutions.

We raise our voice before the Government and responsible factors in our country in protest against the placing of the people connected with the Agrarian League outside the laws.

We demand:

1. That the Government fulfil its duty by stopping and preventing political murders;

2. By finding and punishing all those who are guilty of the political murders which have already occurred;

3. That immunity be guaranteed to the National Representatives and freedom to all politicians so that they be able correctly to express the will of the people.

We appeal to all parliamentary groups and to the executive committees of all the political parties to support this protest so as to establish real peace and constitutional order in the country.

President of the Parliamentary Group: DR. IL. KARADJOFF
Vice-President: L. ILIEFF
Secretary: PETER MINOFF

The Executive Committee of the National Agrarian League of Bulgaria:

Secretary: DELIOU K. GEORGIEFF
Members: K. TOMOFF
G. MARKOFF

Sofia, August 5, 1925

The following obituary notice, printed in the same issue of the Agrarian Banner, describes the circumstances surrounding the death of one of the Agrarian deputies. It is typical of the murders and disappearances which have become a commonplace of Bulgarian public life since the uprising which put the present regime in office.

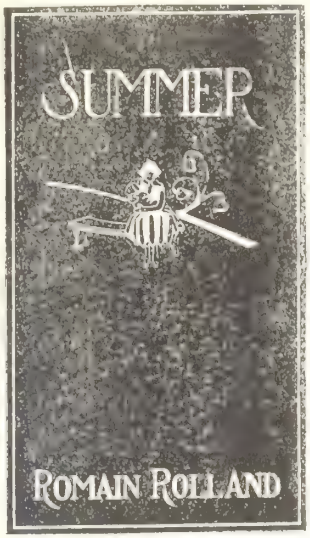
Marin Popoff, a National Representative from Sevlievo, was often threatened with death. His anxiety increased as his intimate companions, who were also leaders in the Agrarian movement, kept disappearing one by one, and especially after he had been told in a roundabout way that he also had been sought. At the opening of Parliament he came to Sofia and as long as the session lasted he was comparatively safe. As the session was drawing to a close we insistently urged him to stay in Sofia and not to return to his home town, where he would be in greater danger. But after the deceased had hung around in the capital for a week with nothing to do, he could no longer bear to think of his unsprayed vineyard and his unharvested wheat, so he went home; and there he was publicly murdered, pierced by nine bullets, on July 27, in the presence of men, women, and children as he was threshing with the cooperative separator the wheat which he had raised with his own hands and which was to feed himself and his family this winter.

He was a well-disciplined leader and displayed great character in his struggles for the Agrarian movement. For that reason his political opponents decided to dispose of him.

Thousands of the fighters, prophets, and apostles of the Agrarian movement have become victims of this tempestuous night which for so long has shrouded Bulgaria in darkness. But the Agrarian movement is not to be extinguished. It shall not die. In the place of the thousands who have fallen, new thousands will spring up to complete the unfinished task.

We extend our sympathies to the parents, wife, and children of our murdered comrade.

THE EXECUTIVE OF THE NATIONAL AGRARIAN LEAGUE OF BULGARIA



SUMMER

Volume II

of

The Soul Enchanted

By ROMAIN ROLLAND

Author of
"Jean Christophe"

Translated by
Van Wyck Brooks

The second volume of Romain Rolland's great study of a woman is self-contained and can be read as a separate novel. It is the story of Annette courageously facing life without fortune, without love and without respectability.

Sound philosophy and penetrating comment on life distinguish the work. Uniform with "Annette and Sylvie."

$2.50 at all booksellers.

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY
19 West 44th Street
New York City

Simon & Schuster
have the honor to announce

TWO DISTINGUISHED VOLUMES OF VERSE

YOU WHO HAVE DREAMS
by MAXWELL ANDERSON
(co-author of
"WHAT PRICE GLORY")

POEMS
by IRWIN EDMAN
(author of "HUMAN TRAITS" and
"THE CIVILIZATION OF RICHARD KANE")

It is the privilege of presenting books of this character that gives publishing its most enduring satisfaction. Here is poetry of genuine beauty.

Both volumes are de luxe limited editions. One thousand numbered copies printed from type by The Pynson Printers, and the type distributed—64 pages, bound in boards.

BOTH BOOKS PUBLISHED SEPTEMBER 15TH

PRICE TWO DOLLARS EACH

Available at your bookstore, or directly from the publishers

SIMON & SCHUSTER
37 West 57th Street, New York

THE PANCHATANTRA

And Other THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS Press Books

IN a city called Maiden's Delight lived a king named Immortal-Power. He had three sons who were supreme blockheads, so he summoned a wise Brahman and said, "Holy Sir, as a favor to me you must make these princes incomparable masters of the art of intelligent living."

So this Brahman, over two thousand years ago, somewhere in the Vale of Kashmir, told the boys a series of tales that are among the great stories of all time.

THE PANCHATANTRA

which means "five books" in Sanskrit, has now for the first time been completely translated into English, by Arthur W. Ryder, in a desire to retell these stories just as they were first told in India. Here is a collection that rivals the "Arabian Nights" of Haroun al Raschid. $4 is a smaller volume than The Panchatantra in which a number of representative tales have been gathered together in a particularly attractive binding. It is a handsome collection of some of the most captivating stories in the world. $2

GOLD'S GLOOM

❖

INTEREST in the Far East today is, however, not confined solely to its folklore. Travelers who know Japan, China, and India are bringing us a realization of what is happening across the globe. What they report is not always what we expect to hear.

ORIENTAL INTERPRETATIONS OF THE FAR-EASTERN PROBLEM
By COUNT MICHIMASA SOYESHIMA and Dr. P. W. KUO

OCCIDENTAL INTERPRETATIONS OF THE FAR-EASTERN PROBLEM
By H. G. W. WOODHEAD and H. K. NORTON
$2.00 each

AND likewise, for our own social scheme of things. How are politics and modern society to work together? Readers of the books described above will want

NEW ASPECTS OF POLITICS
By CHARLES E. MERRIAM
$2.50

❖

THINGS SEEN AND HEARD
By EDGAR J. GOODSPEED

AN excursion of the distinguished translator of the American New Testament into the realm of the personal essay. Mr. Goodspeed writes with charm and distinction of style of such things as "The Life of Adventure," "The Week-Ender," "The Spirits of Our Sires," and "Persons and Things."

AN INTRODUCTION TO SPANISH LITERATURE
By GEORGE T. NORTHUP

FOR the general reader, no less than for the student, Mr. Northup has opened the colorful world of Spanish literature, showing it as a great pageant from the beginning of the epic and drama to the present generation of writers. $3

At all bookstores or, with ten cents per volume for postage, from

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO PRESS

Mexico's Agricultural Slump

AT the opening session of a national congress which met in the city of Mexico on August 18, under government auspices, for the purpose of dealing with the problem created by the acute agricultural depression which prevails generally throughout Mexico, a letter was read from Luis Cabrera, who for several years was Minister of Finance in the Cabinet of President Carranza. Mr. Cabrera, whose ability as a financier and an economist and as a close student of governmental and social conditions in Mexico is widely recognized in the United States and throughout Latin America, has been closely connected with the Mexican revolution since its beginning. He was one of the pioneer agitators for land reform in Mexico and has favored the cutting up of large haciendas and the distribution of arable land among small farmers. Mr. Cabrera placed the blame for the straits in which agricultural development and production in Mexico finds itself upon the manner in which the agrarian policy of the revolution has been carried out. The following extracts from his letter explain his position:

Among the reasons for the deficiency in the production of cereals in Mexico, the principal one, the responsibility for which rests upon the revolucionaries, is the agrarian policy which has been followed for the past five years. By this I do not mean to say that the agrarian policy of the revolution [to provide small landholdings] has been a mistake. I believe that it is necessary to continue to distribute common lands to the communities which lack them, but I affirm that the manner in which the agrarian laws have been applied during the past five years has been disastrous and calculated to produce effects contrary to those aimed at. . . . That is to say, the agrarian program has considerably reduced the cultivated area of the country and has exercised a depressing effect upon the spirit of enterprise of both the large and the small farmers.

In short, the rational solution of the agrarian problem of Mexico consists in placing at the disposition of communities which need them sufficient lands to meet the agricultural necessities of their inhabitants. Concretely, the problem should be solved by taking from the large landowners uncultivated lands and placing them at the disposition of rural communities that are in a position to cultivate them. Instead of this, the present policy is to take from the landowners lands which are under cultivation and give them to rural communities which do not cultivate them. It is unnecessary for me to state in detail the innumerable errors which have occurred in the application of the agrarian laws.

During the past five years the ruling motives which have controlled the administration of the agrarian policy have been the small personal ambitions of the recently created petty headmen of the rural communities, which have been made to serve the political ambitions of municipalities and towns. Under these conditions the demands for community lands have been controlled by the desires of the inhabitants of rural communities, and these desires have been satisfied only at the expense of the small landowners whose properties are situated in the immediate vicinity of the rural communities.

It may be stated as a fact that in a majority of cases the distribution of common lands has affected the small proprietors, who possess no means of defending their interests before either the local authorities or the National Agrarian Commission, while the holdings of the great landowners have been preserved virtually intact.

Another of the gravest errors of the agrarian policy as thus far carried out has consisted in permitting, by preference, distributions of common lands from lands already under cultivation. The effect of this is obvious, for while the large farmer,

Student Worker Prize Contest

This contest is open to university and college students who have spent the summer of 1925 at work in some industrial or agricultural occupation. For the best accounts of such an experience a first prize of $125 is offered, also a second prize of $75, and a third prize of $25. The Judges are:

JEROME DAVIS, of the Yale Divinity School, Yale University

WILLIAM H. JOHNSTON, President of the International Association of Machinists

FLORENCE KELLEY, General Secretary of the National Consumers' League

PIERREPONT B. NOYES, President of the Oneida Community

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor of The Nation.

Conditions:

The contest is open to graduate and undergraduate students, men and women, who were enrolled in some college or university in the spring of 1925, and worked as laborers for at least two months in the summer of 1925.

Contestants must give name, class and college, name and address of employer, and dates of employment; also the name of a member of the faculty of the contestant's school who vouches for his or her eligibility.

Manuscripts must be typewritten and not over 4,000 words in length. The article winning first prize will be published in The Nation. The Nation may accept others for publication, reserving the right to cut the manuscript of any article printed. Winners will be announced and prizes awarded in December, 1925.

The contest closes October 15, 1925

Address Student Worker Contest

The Nation

20 Vesey Street

New York

The Nation for a year $5.00

Student group subscriptions (three or more copies to one address): $3.60

NOW for the price of a few dark rooms in the city

You can own at Sunnyside Gardens a light, airy cooperative apartment. Carrying charges amount to less than rent.

Now a cooperative garden apartment at Sunnyside, with sunshine, light and air, play-space for the children, is well within your reach. There is a small cash payment, and then monthly payments cover all charges, heat and repairs. For example, on a four-room apartment, monthly charges amount to only $62.10.

Sunnyside Gardens are just across the East River—15 minutes from Grand Central by Interboro Subway. The fare is only 5c to all parts of Manhattan.

Sunnyside is being built by the City Housing Corporation, a company, organized on social principles, which has limited its own dividends in order to make possible better housing and community planning at the least possible cost. The apartments are organized on Rochdale co-operative principles, and are being sought by professional people, teachers and writers.

Thinking of moving this Fall? Then don't fail to look at Sunnyside Gardens. Write for full information, or call Stillwell 8475 and arrange for an appointment.

Take Corona Line to Bliss Street, B. M. T., I. R. T. or Second Avenue Elevated, or Fifth Avenue Bus No. 15

Sunnyside Gardens

Bliss Street Subway Station, Long Island City

CITY HOUSING CORPORATION

A limited dividend company—Organized to build better homes and communities

OFFICE: Queens Boulevard and Carolin Street

HOFFMANN SCHOOL for Individual Development

Libby Castle
Fort Washington Ave
at 193d Street
New York City

DAY AND BOARDING SCHOOL

Children 4-12 Years

School Bus

New Home of Hoffmann School

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store

5 Tablets 15c
10 Tablets 25c

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

The New School
for Social Research

Purpose: To seek an unbiased understanding of the existing order, its genesis, growth and present working, as well as of those exigent circumstances which are working for its revision.

Registration begins September 28
School Year begins October 5

MORRIS R. COHEN—Problems of Contemporary Philosophy. Tuesdays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

HORACE M. KALLEN—Dominant Ideals of Western Civilization. Tuesdays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

EVERETT DEAN MARTIN — Psychological Problems of Social Reconstruction. Mondays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

FRANKWOOD E. WILLIAMS—Mental Hygiene. Mondays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

BERNARD GLUECK—Conduct and Its Disorders. Mondays 5.20—6.50 P. M.

ARTHUR F. PAYNE—Technique of Vocational Guidance. Fridays, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

WILLIAM I. THOMAS — Psychological Foundations of Behavior. Thursdays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

A. A. GOLDENWEISER—Neo-Evolutionism: A Theory of Social Change. Wednesdays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

ALFRED J. LOTKA—The Statistical Study of Social Phenomena. Fridays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

FREDERICK R. MACAULAY—The Forecasting of Business and Investment Conditions. Thursdays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

BENJAMIN M. ANDERSON, JR.—Money and Banking. Mondays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

LEO WOLMAN—The Labor Movement in the National Life. Mondays, 8.20—9.50 P. M.

LEONORA O'REILLY—Problems and Progress of Labor.

H. W. L. DANA—Contemporary Literature, 1924-1925.

STARK YOUNG—The Theatrical Season, 1925-26.

LEWIS MUMFORD—Architecture in American Civilization. Fridays, 5.20—6.50 P. M.

JOSEPH W. KRUTCH AND OTHERS—American Writers.

GEORGE A. DORSEY—The Evolution of Man.

Eighteen lectures in each course.
Tuition for each course, $20; special rate of $12 for social workers, teachers and librarians.

Write for catalogue.

465 West Twenty-third Street, - New York City

be he good or bad, possesses sufficient working capital, oxen, and implements for the cultivation of his property and some possibility of obtaining financial assistance if he requires it, the newly endowed proprietors of community lands lack any and all of these advantages. The result is that every allotment of community lands signifies a decrease in the area of land under cultivation, so much so that when the National Agrarian Commission, or the Secretary of Agriculture, by way of boasting of the results of their work, publishes the statistics showing the amount of land which has been distributed for commons, one who examines these figures sees and realizes that just so many thousands of hectares of cultivated lands have been withdrawn from national production.

Recently the demand for commons, or the political necessities on the part of the Government for providing them, has been considerably extended, even to the degree of bestowing the character of legally organized towns or hamlets upon small groups of peoples who before had not even thought of participating in the distribution of commons. I mention this principally for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that, in order to create a situation under which commons might be distributed, the practice has grown up of designating as towns all small communities, even when they have no right to participate in such distribution, as legally organized congregaciones, that is, towns of communal origin.

The result has been that the greater part of the little groups of farmhouses in the country, tenanted by field workers employed by the landowners, with the approval of the local politicians and authorization many times given blindly by the state legislatures have sought to obtain commons taken from the same land upon which these fictitious communities have been organized, in direct violation of the law. These so-called congregaciones are such only because they have been so designated by the local officials or because in rare cases a special charter has been extended to them by the state legislatures, "in order that they may enjoy the benefits of the agrarian laws."

I might point out many other errors or aberrations in the manner in which the agrarian laws have been applied, but I desire to limit myself solely to those which have produced the greatest lack of confidence among the agriculturists and which restrain them from commencing productive work, which many times ties up their capital for two or three years before it is possible for them to realize their profits, if, indeed, there are any in prospect.

The complete lack of confidence at present which exists toward all agricultural activities, which also includes the investment of Mexican capital in agricultural enterprises, is a fact which cannot be denied. The natural effect of this absence of confidence is displayed in the failure of the landowners to place or retain their lands under cultivation and in the consequent shortage in the production of cereals. I refrain from commenting upon the disinclination of foreigners, especially Americans, to acquire agricultural lands in Mexico under existing conditions, for this phase of the situation is without the scope of the problem which the present Congress proposes to study.

In next week's issue of

The International Relations Section

China's Note of June 24 to the powers, charging the foreign police in Shanghai with responsibility for the killing of Chinese students.

Contributors to This Issue

GEORGE W. NORRIS is chairman of the United States Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. He exposed the deal by which valuable government property at Muscle Shoals would have been given to private interests.

PAUL BLANSHARD, field secretary of the League for Industrial Democracy, is in China investigating the student movement.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN, author of "Up Stream" and contributing editor of The Nation, has been in Palestine writing a book which is about to be published by Boni and Liveright.

JAMES RORTY was one of the winners of The Nation's poetry contest in 1921.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is professor of historical sociology at Smith College.

FREDERICK S. DELLENBAUGH is an explorer and author. He wrote "The North Americans of Yesterday," "Frémont and '49," etc.

PAUL H. DOUGLAS teaches economics at the University of Chicago. He is the author of "Wages and the Family."

SHIRLEY JACKSON CASE is chairman of the department of church history at Bates College.

EMERY NEFF is the author of "Carlyle and Mill."

Employers

Your advertisement in the classified section of The Nation under "Help Wanted" will put you in touch with an unusually intelligent type of man and woman.

For rates address Dept. H. W., The Nation.

FOUR NEW TITLES for AUTUMN

MODERN LIBRARY

Jungle Peace—by William Beebe, with Theodore Roosevelt's foreword. Ready September 25.

Camille—by Alexandre Dumas. Ready October 25.

Pinafore and other Plays, including Patience, Yeomen of the Guard, Ruddigore—by W. S. Gilbert, with an introduction by Gilbert Gabriel. Ready November 25.

The Philosophy of William James, drawn from his own works, with an introduction by Horace M. Kallen. Ready December 15.

All handsomely mounted and bound, with gold stamped limp covers, in true Modern Library fashion. $.95 per volume, by mail, $1.00. At every bookstore

Note: On the 25th day of every month, henceforth, a new Modern Library title will be published. A catalogue of the 110 other titles of the Modern Library will be mailed upon request.

MODERN LIBRARY
INCORPORATED
71 WEST 45TH STREET · · NEW YORK CITY

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1925 No. 3142

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 329
EDITORIALS:
Thomas Hardy, Poet 329
Fair Play to China 330
National Forests or St. Regis Peaks? 330
Poincaré in His Own Defense 331
BOLSHEVISM IN CHINA: AN INTERVIEW WITH KARAKHAN. By Paul Blanshard 332
HERBERT HOOVER—SUPER-BUSINESS MAN. By George T. Odell 334
ARMS FOR THE RIFF. By M. M. Knight 335
CREVECOEUR THE LOYALIST. THE GROTTO: AN UNPUBLISHED LETTER FROM THE AMERICAN FARMER. [illegible] 336
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 339
CORRESPONDENCE 340
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
From the Contact Ends. By Padraic Colum 341
Ben Jonson. By Samuel C. Chew 342
Professor Chamberlin Continues. By William MacDonald 343
Human Warfare. By Harold L. Ickes 344
Second Best. By Joseph Wood Krutch 345
Miguel de Unamuno. By Eleazar Vivas 346
Books in Brief 347
Drama: Liberty's Genesis. By Joseph Wood Krutch 348
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Two Chinese Documents 349
Two Missionary Statements 350

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
[illegible]

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, [illegible]

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York City. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscription and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE CHINESE DELEGATES to the Assembly of the League of Nations have introduced a resolution approving the customs conference which is to meet in China at the end of October to discuss a revision or abolition of the tariff forced upon China by the powers. This will do no harm nor will it do any good. Fortunately there is one man in political life in Washington who is ready to speak up and tell the truth about the Chinese situation. He is Senator Borah, and this is what he has to say about the move in the League:

> This is the same pious pretense upon which China has been fed for eighty-three years. At least five of the nations which will vote for this resolution have, and have had for decades, treaties pledging themselves to guard the territorial integrity of China. In the meantime, and in the face of all these treaties and pledges and resolutions, China is deprived of sufficient revenues to maintain a government, thus leading to demoralization and governmental breakdown; forty-odd of her ports have been seized and held by force; the opium traffic has been imposed upon her at the point of the bayonet; her children have been exploited in foreign mills, and when the Chinese people record their protest in the way of public meetings and by public speech they are either shot down or taken into foreign courts and tried and condemned under foreign law. If there is any sense of justice or any humanitarian sentiment anywhere around, we will cease passing resolutions and act—action is now overdue.

SPEAKING OF LAWLESSNESS in China, we should like to direct attention to what is being done to the Chinese in Philadelphia by that noble soul, the Marine Corps director of police, General Smedley Butler. His men have been raiding in Chinatown without warrants in the expectation of catching some Chinese who are illegally in this country. A delegation from the Chinese Benevolent Association, headed by a responsible American attorney, waited upon the general to complain that these raids, besides being lawless, caused unrest, disturbed business, and were calculated to fan into flames the tong warfare. With that exquisite courtesy and gentlemanliness for which the General is famed he replied to the delegation in these words:

> We will not stop the raids. We must find out who's who and that's the only way to do it. We will not disturb any lawful business. As to your complaint that the police are rough, they are no rougher than your countrymen or their forefathers were in the Boxer uprising. I've got two Chinese bullets in me now from treatment I received in your country in 1900. We do not gouge out your eyes as they did [illegible] will be no crucifixions here, but we do mean business in cleaning out those who don't belong in Chinatown.

[illegible] superior we Americans are in kindliness, good-will, respect for law, and all the other attributes of a Christian civilization.

PRESIDENT COOLIDGE has done well to appoint a commission of nine members comprising such distinguished men as General Harbord, Rear Admiral Fletcher, Senator Bingham, Howard E. Coffin, and Dwight W. Morrow to investigate the aviation situation. This commission should insure a thoroughgoing inquiry not only of Colonel Mitchell's charges but of the whole question of the relation of services and whether they should be combined into one separate department. The necessity of some such nonpartisan inquiry is proved once more by the attack just made upon Colonel Mitchell by Rear Admiral Moffett, head of naval aviation—as violent in its abuse as Colonel Mitchell's own utterances. The Colonel, by the way, has plainly maneuvered himself into a position where he will be court martialed and dismissed from the service without being given a chance to prove his case. For that we do not pity him; anybody who can leave the army ought to. But however people may deplore, as does the New York World, his offenses against discipline, they cannot but remember that it is precisely through such lack of discipline that reforms are often brought about in our blindfolded military establishments. Colonel Roosevelt's insubordination at Santiago and Admiral Sims's attack upon the navy in connection with its marksmanship are cases in point. There are many times when it is well to treat the army or navy rough. Meanwhile, we are more than ever of the opinion that if Colonel gets a chance he will prove the bulk of his assertions. The saving of Commander Rodgers and his crew of the [illegible] fortunately deprives the Colonel of the right to lay the loss of those lives at the Government's door.

THE METROPOLITAN NEWSPAPERS, while devoting pages to individual income-tax returns and boasting of their efficiency in collecting and arranging them, have worked themselves up into a fine frenzy of indignation at the principle of publicity. We cannot share their passion. Taxes have always seemed to some an invasion of the freedom of the individual, and every forward step in taxation has been bitterly resented and resisted. The struggle to write the federal income tax firmly into the statute-books of this nation required a generation; there was a time, not half a century ago, when even those who then edited The Nation regarded it as a wicked invasion of the state into the affairs of the individual. A broader social conception has prevailed. No one objects today because the records of personal taxes are open for examination at the tax offices; and probably the time will come—though it may come after a long fight—when the principle of publicity for income-tax returns will be as generally accepted. The unanimous opposition of Secretary Mellon's subordinates—who know the passionate views of their millionaire chief—means nothing. It would be better if the officials of the Treasury Department, all the way up to Mr. Mellon, stopped shouting, accepted the law as it is, and did their best to help the government to reap every possible benefit from it.

LOWER TAXES FOR THE RICH are advocated by Representative Longworth, who will be the Speaker of the next House. Mr. Longworth told newspaper correspondents recently that he favored lowering the surtaxes to less than 20 per cent. "I know that reduced surtaxes would benefit the man who is not paying taxes," he said, "in more employment and cheaper living costs." Mr. Longworth might have expanded his argument by reference to "L'île des Pingouins," Anatole France's beautiful satire on civilized society. When the Penguins adopted the ways of men they held a convocation on taxes, where it was first proposed to tax everybody according to his means. But the better plan of equal taxation for all was hit upon after one of the richest of the penguins rose and said:

> I am willing to deprive myself of everything which I possess in the interest of my brother Penguins. If necessary, I will give willingly even to my shirt. . . . It is only necessary to consider what the public interest demands. . . . The poor live upon the wealth of the rich; therefore such wealth is sacred. Do not touch it; this would be gratuitous evil. To take from the rich would not bring in much money, for they are not numerous; while, on the contrary, you would deprive yourself of all resources and plunge the country into poverty. On the other hand, if you demand a little aid of each inhabitant without regard to his wealth, you will get enough for the public needs and you will not have to inquire how much citizens possess, a kind of investigation which is regarded as an odious vexation. In assessing everybody equally and lightly you will spare the poor, since you will leave them the wealth of the rich.

What could be fairer than that?

GREAT BRITAIN and the United States are twin stars, the former growing dimmer as the latter becomes more brilliant; the United States must expand in the world market, but it can do so only at the expense of other exporting nations, especially England; England is headed for revolution because she has entered the stage of capitalist disintegration. So writes Leon Trotzky in a special preface to the American edition of his "Whither England?" brought out by the International Publishers. He says further:

> By exerting pressure on its debtors or giving them an extension, by granting or refusing credit to European countries, the United States is placing them in a gradually tightening economic dependence, in the last analysis an ineluctable situation, which is the necessary condition for inevitable social and revolutionary disturbances. The Communist International, viewed in the light of this knowledge, may be considered an almost conservative institution as compared with Wall Street. Morgan, Dawes, Julius Barnes—these are among the artificers of the approaching European revolution.
>
> In its work in Europe, and elsewhere, the United States is generally acting in cooperation with England, through the agency of England. But this collaboration means for England an increasing loss of independence. England is leading the United States to hegemony, as it were. Relinquishing their world rule, the diplomats and magnates of England are recommending their former clients to deal with the new master of the world. The common action of the United States and England is the cloak for a profound world-wide antagonism between these two powers, by which the threatening conflicts of the perhaps not remote future are being prepared.

Trotzky goes on to say: "Driving the European countries farther and farther down their blind alley, American capitalism is laying the foundation for wars and revolutionary upheavals, which in their frightful rebound will not fail to strike the economic system of the United States also."

BETTER READING than anything Raymond Poincaré has ever said or written is to be found in some admirable words of Premier Painlevé of France (buried well inside our great metropolitan dailies). Speaking at Strasbourg, September 10, he declared that a reconciliation between France and Germany was the "keystone of universal peace." Continuing he said: "No stable peace, no quietude, is possible in Europe while this feeling exists that on some pretext the two great peoples separated by the Rhine are ready to rush at each other." The Premier, after dwelling on France's sincerity in seeking a Rhine security compact, said:

> I am convinced that the real Germany thinks the same. I am convinced that war is not the ideal which the real Germany willingly cherishes. If the forces of peace are given their true scope, they will overcome the forces of war, which are still tormenting old Europe.

This is the only spirit which will bring peace to Europe and we have no doubt that, despite the remnants of the militarist party and those who seek revenge in Germany, the German people will respond promptly to this holding out of the true hope of peace and reconciliation, if they are convinced of the sincerity of the offer and are given assurance that the attitude M. Painlevé thus voices will not be changed by the next overturn of the ministry.

JUDGES ARE NOT ALWAYS JUDICIAL, even in the United States Supreme Court, said Professor Arnold Bennett Hall of the University of Wisconsin to the National Conference on the Science of Politics, recently assembled in New York City. Professor Hall explained that a study of the divided decisions of the Supreme Court in labor cases over a considerable period of years revealed that one justice had voted every time on the side of labor, one had voted on that side every time except once, and one had voted against labor every time. An analysis of the opinions of these justices showed that they had not followed consistent legal principles, continued Professor Hall. The next day Professor L. L. Thurstone of the University of Chicago suggested that, before appointment, would-be judges should be subjected to psychological tests to determine their judicial-mindedness. We wish we had enough confidence in applied psychology to indorse this suggestion, but we fear it would be as futile as impracticable. The moral we read is that the public should cease to regard judges as demi-gods or allow them to set themselves up as such; that court decisions are not necessarily any more judicial or scientific than the majority votes of legislators; and that it is ridiculous for the United States to continue as the one country in all the world in which a handful of jurists are allowed consistently and flagrantly to overthrow the will of the people as expressed by their elected law-makers.

STONE WALLS do not a prison make—nor, for that matter, a college. There has come to our office a pamphlet called "A Great National Service," giving details for the further enlargement of the George Peabody College for teachers, which includes the spending of an additional three and a half million for the erection of new dormitory, classroom, and laboratory buildings. The college is located at Nashville, Tennessee, yet we have looked in vain for that ringing utterance upon fundamentalism and the liberty of teaching which we have a right to expect from any institution in that State which asks for the respect of the nation at large. Nobody doubts that Tennessee's educational institutions can raise money—they have done it before and will do it again. What we would like to have them prove to us is that they can spend it to good purpose when they get it. As for dormitories, they do not need any more, for their teachers have been asleep too long as it is; while as to laboratories and classrooms, of what use are the former if it is necessary to deny in the latter the facts which any well-used laboratory will surely reveal? Doubtless Tennessee feels proud of the increasing enrolments in those institutions called "of learning"; doubtless she takes a childish delight in seeing brick piled on brick. Yet one fact is clear: she does not really believe in education.

BUFFALO, BUFFALO! Who wants a buffalo free of charge? Anybody who does may apply to the Director of the National Park Service in Washington and he can have a real American bison shipped to him in a well-built crate, f. o. b., Gardiner, Montana. Last year eighty-six were thus given away. This year a hundred are ready for adoption—the surplus product of the wild Yellowstone herd of more than 1,200 animals. So if anybody wishes a little bison in his backyard he need only move quickly. But—it is a big but—the difficulty is that, whether one draws a buffalo from the tame or the wild Yellowstone herd, the animal cannot be easily domesticated. Even though born in captivity and raised on the bottle, the buffalo is not trustworthy after a certain age. Hence there is no possibility of every farmer's adding a buffalo or two to his stock. That untamable buffalo disposition is surely a regrettable fact in nature, but it is a fact. So those who apply for the buffalo must needs be owners of great animal parks or zoological gardens. The most interesting thing about this offer of the government is its proof that the buffalo is saved. Twenty-five years ago it looked as if this characteristically American animal were doomed. Today the species is preserved by the Yellowstone herd, to say nothing of numerous others. Here is a case where the government moved in time and wisely.

Thomas Hardy, Poet

THE greatest living English poet is about to publish, at the age of eighty-five, another volume of verse. Thomas Hardy's suggestion, in the preface to "Late Lyrics and Earlier" three years ago, that he was perhaps done with the muses may now be taken as meaning merely that he was uncertain how much time remained for him on earth. Time, as it happens, has dealt gently with Mr. Hardy, and he has returned the compliment by making much of his moments. The title of the new book—who would call it his last one?—is highly characteristic: "Human Shows, Far Phantasies, Songs, and Trifles." Its quality remains, of course, to be seen; but the chances are very slight that it will be without distinction of a genuine sort.

The fact that Mr. Hardy continues at eighty-five to publish poetry, and good poetry, is picturesque enough and may set a record—Tennyson's last volume appeared when he was eighty-three. The most interesting aspect of the matter, however, has to do with the way in which his career as a poet has built itself up—culminating, it may be, in the book now soon to appear. Mr. Hardy is most widely known as a novelist, and doubtless there are many readers of "Tess" and "The Mayor of Casterbridge" who do not know that their author is prouder today of his verse than he is of his prose. It was verse that he started with more than sixty-five years ago, and it is verse with which he has been exclusively occupied throughout that part of the twentieth century which has accepted him, somewhat too complacently, as a "survivor."

When his poetry did not seem to be succeeding he turned, in the late sixties, to fiction; and until 1895 he was faithful to the field which with George Meredith he dominated. But after "Jude the Obscure," being sick of censorship and tired of unintelligent criticism, he reverted to his first and favorite medium. Then came his poetic drama, "The Dynasts," and the five volumes of shorter pieces upon which his great fame as a poet now rests. These pieces dated from all of the decades in which he had been writing; apparently he had always found satisfaction in verse, and the preface to "Late Lyrics and Earlier" hinted of whole piles of manuscript which were still unpicked and unsorted.

There are critics, indeed, who insist that Mr. Hardy was never, even while he was working at prose fiction, anything more (or less) than a lyric poet. The faults of his novels, they point out, may be attributable to the fact that his vision of the world came to him in fitful gleams rather than in the long, steady rays which presumably play upon the born novelist. At any rate, in one medium or another, he has established his right to stand among the first of English lyric poets; and nothing could give his admirers more pleasure than the news that he has had the strength during the past three years to go on harvesting the remains of a crop all but unexampled in its total riches.

Fair Play to China

IT is profoundly encouraging that as this issue of The Nation appears there is assembled at Johns Hopkins University a conference of American liberals interested in the relations of the United States to China and determined to do their best to reorganize the present American policy toward China on the basis of justice, honesty, and fair play. The membership is limited to 275, but the list of sponsors shows that it is not [illegible] of American life but also that it includes many of the people best fitted by their knowledge of China, or their general interest in foreign affairs, to contribute to the discussions. There are representatives of labor, of various churches, of the colleges, of the liberal press, of the foreign missionary movement, of the China Society, etc.—for once the colored people of this country are also recognized in the discussion of a foreign problem in which they have a profound interest.

A conference which includes in its membership men like Bishop Roots of Hankow, Charles R. Crane, Professor Charles A. Beard, Bishop Francis McConnell, John R. Mott, Nathaniel Peffer, Professor E. A. Ross, and Owen D. Young would be distinguished in itself, but this is only a small portion of the roll of especially competent men and women. Already as proof of its [illegible] the matter of our world policy this gathering is more than worth while; anything that helps to take the direction of our international policies out of the hands of the bureaucrats and the professional diplomats helps to revive one's belief that it is possible to formulate and to regulate our relations with other nations on a basis of decency and morality.

How much good the conference will accomplish depends, of course, upon whether it takes its courage in both hands and speaks out with absolute frankness. If a majority should be influenced in the direction of conservatism and soft-speaking because of the policy of the Government, or any belief that this is the time to go slow, watch developments, and trust the Government, the opportunity will in some degree be thrown away. If, for instance, the conference should fall in with the sentiments of the joint note of the powers to China, which declares that they will assist in the reform of conditions in China when the Chinese Government has given "concrete evidence of its ability and willingness to influence respect for the safety of foreign lives and property and to suppress disorder and anti-foreign agitation," little will be achieved beyond frank speaking by those who understand the real significance of what is happening and realize that the policy of force toward China is played out. The simple truth, as we pointed out last week, is that the powers have not the slightest intention of doing anything worth while until they are compelled to. They know perfectly well that as long as their present policies continue the masses in China will continue to be inflamed. The latest outbreaks in Hongkong and Shanghai show clearly that the powers have not helped in any way to ameliorate conditions since the original troubles began. Their weakness and delay are such that the situation is bound to go from bad to worse unless enlightened public opinion in this and other countries compels a change of front. Moreover, no proof whatever is offered by the several powers that they have ceased their policy of purchasing outright the Chinese generals who are responsible for so much of the disturbance and disorder. As long as the powers seek to rule China imperially by dividing the Chinese by force or corruption, just so long will there be turmoil within the Celestial Empire.

In short, the powers by their assertion that they will do nothing until order and stability are restored in China—they to be the sole judges of what shall constitute order and stability—are seeking to place China in the position in which they have held Germany since the Treaty of Versailles. As the powers trumped up charges that Germany was not adequately disarmed in order to place a cloak of legality about their own retention of the Cologne area, so they can postpone any reforms in China for a century if they take the position that they will not budge until the last bit of brigandage disappears. As a matter of fact, some of these unholy and un-Christian nations would not hesitate one moment to subvention brigands if it were to their interest to do so. What the conference at Baltimore should do, therefore, is to go on record at once as believing that every extraterritorial right of any of the powers should be at once abolished, precisely as the Russians voluntarily yielded up theirs, together with a clear-cut statement of the responsibility of the powers for the disorder which they make their excuse for refusing to do justice. We ourselves are clear that it is no concern of [illegible] what disorder there is in China, or if there is any. We are not the policemen of China any more than we have the right to be the policemen of Mexico and the Caribbean.

The stupidity of the policy of the powers is the more apparent since, as every well-informed diplomat knows, they are now beaten to a standstill by the Chinese technique of non-resistance. The powers may occupy Canton and Hankow; they may once more send their troops into Peking. It would do them no good whatever, but would simply arouse the Chinese people to a degree which would make the present demonstrations seem like child's play. Force is the one thing that can accomplish nothing save infinite injury to the powers themselves. From their own selfish standpoint they ought to yield and yield gracefully, without any talk about the conditions in China today, without any further display of shameless hypocrisy.

To the Baltimore conference we look with faith for a statement of the rights and wrongs of the situation fit to arouse the conscience of the American people. There are plenty of men and women who know where the truth lies. Bishop Roots, for one, has spoken out with frankness and honesty, and so has Provost C. K. Edmunds of Johns Hopkins University, who for so many years resided in China. We have been proud of the attitude taken by most American missionaries, for their recognition of the fact that the day of narrow sectarian proselyting has passed in China precisely as has the day of brazen imperialistic land-grabbing by France, Germany, Japan, Russia, and England. But their test is now. Will these men and women who know what the hour calls for supply the leadership so sadly lacking in the State Department and the White House? Those departments of the government are actually going on building gunboats with which to overawe a few of the inhabitants of the Yangtze River, believing that that sort of thing will [illegible] the situation. They are too blind to see that this [illegible] policy of dividing, spells disaster.

National Forests or Stockmen's Profits?

AFTER twenty years of strenuous effort the preservation of our forests had seemed, until lately, to be assured. With large tracts set aside in the West under national guardianship, and a growing tendency to establish similar reserves in the East through the action of individual States, the fight for timber conservation appeared to have been won. But no policy in the interest of the public good is ever secure for long against the attack of private greed, and today the Forest Service, and more or less the entire policy of national conservation, is the object of an organized and dangerous offensive on the part of the live-stock owners of the West.

The issue in brief is this: The national forests contain 90,000,000 acres of grazing land. Such land is open to the pasturage of live stock by obtaining a permit and paying a fee prescribed by the Forest Service. Previous to 1905, at which time the national forests were transferred from the Interior to the Agricultural Department, there was no fee; since then the charges have been gradually increased from nominal payments until now the Forest Service is proposing to ask the full commercial value of the forage. Owners of cattle and sheep are countering with a demand that instead the fees be reduced to a point sufficient merely to cover the cost of administering these lands, that stockmen be given more permanent rights to the forage, and that the power of the Forest Service be curbed through a board of appeals with superior authority.

The stockmen began their drive last winter by the Phipps bill, which would reduce grazing fees in the national forests by about 65 per cent and would establish a "Board of Grazing Appeals," consisting of two representatives from the Department of Agriculture, two from the l[illegible] industry, and a fifth chosen by the four. The decisions of the board would be final, overruling those of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Phipps bill was reported favorably to the Senate by the Committee on Public Lands, without a single hearing, and was passed on January 31. In the House, fortunately, the measure got no further t[illegible] Committee on Agriculture. But the bill is far from dead and will be revived in some form at the next session of Congress. Meanwhile the stockmen's organizations have loosed a flood of propaganda which has been generously printed by the compliant Western press, and the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate has been holding hearings at various points in the Southwest and Northwest which have given further publicity to the stockmen's side of the controversy. With one exception, the Senate's Committee on Public Lands is made up of men from west of the Mississippi, and the chairman, Robert N. Stanfield of Oregon, has not concealed his hostility to the Forest Service.

The controversy between the stockmen and the Forest Service had its beginnings in 1920 when the latter undertook a comparison of rentals on private range lands with those in the national forests. The study took four years, and as told by Ovid M. Butler in American Forests and Forest Life for September:

> This appraisal of national forest forage, according to the Forest Service, fully substantiated an average increase in the present grazing fees of approximately 75 per cent. Prior to his death, Secretary Wallace, of the Department of Agriculture, served notice on the stockmen that upon the showing of the Rachford report an increase in grazing fees would go into effect January 1, 1926. He did not put the increase into effect immediately in consideration of the fact that the stock business in the West at that time was in a state of "hard times." With the announcement of the proposed increase, the stockmen figuratively got in their saddle and rode to Washington with fire in their eyes. Secretary Wallace stood firm, but after his death Secretary Gore granted the stockmen an extension of one year in the date on which the increased fees would become effective, or to January 1, 1927, in order that his successor might have ample time to review the whole case and finally fix the new fees to be put into effect. The Rachford report, with its proposed increase in grazing fees, is, therefore, in the hands of the present Secretary, William M. Jardine, for his approval or rejection.

The argument of the stockmen is that even under present conditions the industry is not profitable, that flocks and herds are decreasing, and that if grazing fees are increased the public will have to pay for them in higher prices for meat. At the hearing of the Senate's Committee on Public Lands in Yakima, Washington, on September 3, for instance, it was said that the number of cattlemen who were permittees in the Umatilla forest had decreased by more than a third in three years, and the size of the herds likewise; the men remaining were operating at a loss.

On the other hand the Chief Forester recently said:

> We must recognize the fact that, whatever we may say about it, the forage on the national forests is a commercial commodity. It is exactly like any other forage. Forage is one of the great commercial commodities of the Western States, and its character in that respect is not changed by property lines. Range is bought and sold and rented every day. It has its markets and its prices. It is just as much a commercial commodity of the West as are the live-stock products derived from it or the standing timber on the national forests.

The Forest Service [illegible] the [illegible] of the argument. The lumbermen are charged the commercial value of the timber which they cut in the national forests, and there is no justification for making the stock-raisers favo[illegible] of the government. To give them something for nothing—for this is what it [illegible]—is the same favoritism and injustice as is involved in a protective tariff or a ship subsidy, with the further folly that it is designed to foster not an infant or growing industry but a decrepit and waning one. Raisers of sheep already have the benefit of a high tariff on wool, and yet it is admitted that their industry has long been losing ground. Raising cattle for beef—certainly under present conditions—is likely also to be crowded more and more to the wall in the United States. The production of wool and meat is primarily an industry for undeveloped countries with cheap land. The United States is becoming too much settled, land is growing too dear, for us to expect to hold our old position in this regard. Furthermore, it is childish and unbusinesslike to make a gift to any individual in the mere hope that he will pass it on to his fellows. The protective tariff has had no such results. Neither has the past history of stockmen enjoying cheap forage in the national forests given any indication that the benefits were passed on to the consumer of meat. To quote again from American Forests and Forest Life:

> In the past the stockmen using the national forests have received the difference between the full value of the range and the fees actually paid. In marketing their live stock they have not made any reduction in the price corresponding to the cheap range obtained from the government. Also they have sought to capitalize as their own the value of their privilege of using public property. In selling their live stock and ranches with a waiver of their grazing privileges on the national forests they have priced their stock several dollars a head above the market to include the capital value of the government privilege, or this capital value has been added to the price asked for the accompanying ranch property.

In addition to the threat of higher meat prices the stockmen are raising a cry of autocracy and incompetence in the Forest Service. So far as we have seen, they have not produced any convincing evidence. Undoubtedly the Forest Service is a great power in the West, as was pointed out by Harvey Fergusson in The Nation of July 22, last, in an article entitled Out Where Bureaucracy Begins. But if abuses have crept in, they can be eliminated without attacking the service as such. As the proverb has it, it is unwise to throw the baby out the window even if the house is afire.

Some may assume that no matter what happens to the grazing lands in the national forests the trees will not be endangered. Not by any means. If a policy of special favors for stock-raisers is officially adopted, the lumbermen will shortly—and legitimately—demand similar concessions. The only safety for forest preservation is to maintain and extend the policy that has developed through twenty years of earnest effort.

Poincaré in His Own Defense

THERE is an old French adage which runs "Qui s'excuse s'accuse." M. Poincaré has come to his own defense in an article in Foreign Affairs. He had much better have heeded the adage and remained silent, for if he has not accused himself he has made so poor a showing that his discriminating friends, if he has such, must mourn for him. Rhetoric there is and appeals to the old war shibboleths, to the familiar prejudices as well as the customary harping on Alsace-Lorraine and the war of 1870. But of documents, new facts, or new light there is none; nor is there any controverting of the startling testimony of the Russian revelations as to M. Poincaré's intrigues with Russia just before the war came.

Those deadly Bolshevik revelations M. Poincaré simply brushes aside. "What weight," he asks, "can be attached to the Soviet revelations and the commentaries resulting from them" in the face of the assertions he makes and his own restatement of European politics up to 1914? Well, with the average inexpert reader who is not familiar with the documents this may be effective throwing of dust in the public's eyes, but the truth is that the Soviets published no documents of their own. They gave to the world those of the Czar's Foreign Office which they found—contemporary records, like the disgraceful secret treaties which the Allies sought to conceal from the Americans, the authenticity of which has never been successfully challenged. M. Poincaré does not meet them because he cannot. He merely invokes the old Bolshevik prejudice as a smoke-screen.

So, too, he brands every student who dares to challenge the war-guilt mythology as the victim of Russian or German malevolence: "It is unfortunately true that in friendly countries, and especially in the United States, the combined propaganda of Germany and the Soviets has sown confusion in the minds even of well-meaning men of high standing." This, of course, disposes completely of Frederick Bausman, Professors Fay, Barnes, Seymour, Wright, and Schmitt, Senator Robert L. Owen, Frank Simonds, Albert J. Nock, and the Canadian, John S. Ewart. These men are either duped or bought. As for Germans like Hermann Lutz and Count Montgelas, why, they are Huns and so not to be noticed. But curiously enough three Germans do figure gallantly: Lichnowsky, Richard Grelling, and Maximilian Harden, who suddenly become "honest Germans" because they acknowledge "the wrongs committed" by their country and are on M. Poincaré's side. As for the Frenchmen who have lately gone so far as to acquit Germany of most of the blame—for these traitors M. Poincaré has not a word. He ignores Alfred Fabre-Luce's "La Victoire" and Mathias Morhardt's "Les Preuves," both absolutely damning to Poincaré. Are these Frenchmen bought by the Germans and Bolsheviks? M. George Louis's evidence as ex-Ambassador to St. Petersburg M. Poincaré also brushes aside merely by declaring that on his return to Paris he became the associate of defeatists and adventurers.

Let M. Poincaré speak for himself. This is his rhetorical and damning conclusion—damning to himself:

> Imperial Germany is guilty because she did not try to prevent Austria from attacking Serbia. She is guilty because on the contrary she maneuvered so that Europe should leave Serbia alone face to face with its powerful neighbor. She is guilty because having for a time, through belated fear of Great Britain, gone back on her first counsels of violence and made feeble attempts at moderation, she returned, as the Scriptures say, to her vomit. She is guilty because without being forced by anything except strategic considerations she set a torch to the powder houses of France. Against these unalterable truths the gates of hell themselves shall not prevail.

To this amazingly brief indictment does M. Poincaré come! Gone is all the stuff about Germany's long-laid plans to dominate the world, her deep schemes to split Europe in half, her long, long planning of "Der Tag," and all the rest of the fustian and stuff with which the world was regaled through French and British propaganda. Well, badly as we thought of M. Poincaré, we think worse of him now. Yet, even so, The Nation does not go nearly as far as Mr. Bausman or Professor Barnes and others. It cannot yet acquit Germany of all blame. It is simply aware that the documents discovered since 1917 compel any honest man to throw away his preconceptions, to study the case anew upon the sole basis of probed fact and unquestioned documents, and that much Russian, French, and English guilt is now established as well as Austrian, German, and Serbian. They were all guilty, guilty, as M. Poincaré would say, as hell itself, and gradually the truth about it all is coming out, here and there, bit by bit, from the confessions of this or that man, or the discovery of additional documents. Whether it will ever be possible to overthrow all the war lies and get the truth before the masses is a problem of the future.

Bolshevism in China

An Interview with Karakhan

By PAUL BLANSHARD

Peking, July 19

THERE is no more fascinating figure in world diplomacy than Leon Karakhan, Soviet ambassador to China. In our current red mythology he has assumed almost epic proportions. It is said that the Specter of World Revolution, having been maltreated by the Daughertys, Birkenheads, and Poincarés of Western politics, has finally come to roost with him in Peking. He is variously pictured as a devil, an apostle of murder, an unscrupulous trickster, a savior of China, a protector of the weak, a diplomatic genius. In appearance Karakhan is like none of his myths, except perhaps the devil—a very handsome devil, only thirty-six years old. Black bearded, olive skinned, lithe and tall, he moves and talks with easy grace. He is an internationalist by training, an Armenian aristocrat giving his life to Russian communism, a graduate of St. Petersburg University, who has been since Brest-Litovsk a leading figure in Russian diplomacy.

The Soviet Ambassador at Peking

Karakhan talks. That is the delightful part about him. There are few diplomatic reticences about him. He talks for an hour and a half like a realist. Our conversation centers about the Great Fear, the conquest of the Orient by bolshevism. Gradually there emerge the outlines of the three major questions that the Western world is asking: How far has bolshevism actually progressed toward the conquest of China? What prospects are there of an alliance between China, Japan, and Russia for control of the East? What opportunity does internal dissension in China give for Bolshevik control in the future?

As to the actual progress of bolshevism in China, Karakhan says in substance:

> Of course, it should not be necessary to disillusion you concerning the newspaper portrait of bolshevism in the Orient. In the newspapers we are picturesque villains taken directly from Italian comic opera. We sneak stealthily upon the stage with a bag of gold in one hand and a knife in the other. We create all discontent, all strikes, all rebellions.
>
> Now, there is one important objection to that picture. The imperialists who continue to live in a comic-opera world may have their necks broken some day before they realize that the struggle of the workers for power is a serious struggle. If bolshevism is growing in the Orient it is because the Eastern people are beginning to want the things which we want. The British do not seem to be quite aware of this fact. They seem to think that they can make slaves of a nation, kill its citizens, seize much of its wealth, buy its generals, and then announce to the world that everything would be all right if there were no Soviet gold in sight.

Mr. Chamberlain has a good deal of the comic-opera outlook upon diplomacy. He finds the convenient villain embodied in Russia. His analysis is dangerously superficial. And there is something of desperation in his attitude. British imperialism has its back against the wall. The imperialist cannot admit his own guilt without losing everything that he has.

Is there a considerable Bolshevik movement in China? No. Of course, we have influence here. We are proud of it. We do not seek to conceal it. I speak at universities and the Y. M. C. A., but the Communist movement in China is very small and there are very few leaders of strikes and agitation who come from Russia. The Canton army has been assisted to some extent in military training by Red officers. We have a situation in China which I may describe as a rear-guard engagement in the workers' struggle. It is not a vanguard engagement. The Chinese people are still fighting for those elementary things which workers even in capitalist nations have gained long ago.

Of course China is moving forward very rapidly at this moment. There are two outstanding things about the present movement of workers and students which make the movement significant as a preparation for a more decisive battle later on. First, the movement is national and not provincial. It includes the workers as the solid basis, with the students as the vigorous ferment. It presents some striking resemblances to the Russian revolution of 1905 which made the later revolution possible. Second, the aims of this Chinese movement are quite clearly defined. The Boxer movement was a vague anti-foreign uprising. The present movement has definite objectives.

As far as north China is concerned all recent events seem to fit in with Karakhan's description. The present crisis in China is the result of a Chinese and not a Bolshevik movement. No disclosures have been made of any important causal connections between bolshevism and the Chinese agitation. This in spite of the fact that the provinces have been combed by British agents in the attempt to find oratorical ammunition for Chamberlain. The two Communists executed at Hankow were put to death by a pro-British local governor. In Shanghai and Peking student and labor leaders indignantly repudiate any suggestion that they are inspired or paid by Moscow. There is not a single Bolshevik plank in their platforms. Their leadership is purely Chinese. All over Peking they have placarded great signs:

THE STUDENT MOVEMENT IS Not Bolshevik
Not anti-Christian
Not anti-foreign
BUT CRY (sic) FOR HUMANITY

Chinese liberalism is friendly to Soviet Russia because Russia is the one nation in the world that has stood unequivocally for Chinese justice. Chinese bolshevism is three-fourths pre-Versailles Wilsonism. Even the Chinese Communist Party has not a single Communist plank in its political proposals. Its program of fourteen points would be rejected by the British Labor Party as hopelessly bourgeois. Its slogan of eight characters by which it appeals to the masses of the Chinese people means two things: Down with the Militarists and Down with the Foreign Imperialists.

While the foreign policy of bolshevism is winning friends in China there appears to be no structural preparation in Chinese society for the practice of communism. Class consciousness is just dawning among the city workers; in the vast rural districts the hundreds of millions of Chinese peasants seem to be as far removed from the program of the Third International as anyone could be. Bolshevism in the economic life of China will doubtless remain for generations what it is today, a yeast in the vast unleavened mass.

As to our second major question: What prospects are there of an alliance between China, Japan, and Russia for control of the East? Karakhan speaks from a wealth of experience. He it was who piloted Russia through those stormy days of the settlement with Japan concerning Sakhalin. He takes down a great map from the wall and shows me how Japan is extending her power in Manchuria. On the map heavy red lines trace out the railways which Japan has built and the railways which Japan has planned to build on Chinese territory.

> There are several points [he says] at which Russian and Japanese policy clash in the East. First of all in regard to the whole attitude of Japan toward the continent. When Japan speaks of an Asiatic alliance, the alliance seems to bear some resemblance to that between a hungry stomach and a piece of bread.
>
> Thus, we have a number of specific points of difference. They center around the Chinese Eastern Railway. Come over to this map and I can show you. See, there is Tsitsihar in northern Manchuria. You see that is near the Chinese Eastern Railway, which runs across Manchuria to Vladivostok. Russia and China control the Chinese Eastern Railway, and naturally it is of the utmost importance to have the railway protected from aggression since it is part of the trans-Siberian system. If the northern section of Manchuria is controlled by Japan, Russia's path to the Pacific is cut off. Now, Japan is planning the construction of several new railway lines in that northern section of Manchuria. The one from Tsitsihar would not only cut across the Chinese Eastern Railway but it would bring Japan to a commanding position in the Khingan Mountains. Other proposed lines would almost encircle the mountains. Then, over in eastern Manchuria Japan is also planning a number of railway lines which would cut the Chinese Eastern at Ninguta and run along the Russian border, making it possible to throw all her forces against Vladivostok on short notice. We have protested unofficially against these plans and Japan has suspended some operations. Nominally, of course, the Japanese Government is not building these railways officially. The construction is being done by the South Manchuria Railway Company, which is dominated by the Japanese Government.
>
> Aside from this strategic conflict in Manchuria, Russia and Japan also are engaged in the economic conflict for railway traffic and development. If Japan is allowed to carry out her plans of economic expansion in Manchuria a large part of the Soviet Government's holdings in railways will become unprofitable.
>
> No, an actual alliance between Russia, Japan, and China for the control of Asia by the Asiatics seems hardly possible so long as Japan maintains so possessive an attitude toward China. The pan-Asiatic movement is largely a newspaper myth. In fact, Russia is opposed to the slogan "Asia for the Asiatics" unless it includes justice as between Asiatic powers. "Asia for Japan" is no better than "Asia for Britain." But if Japan should modify her policy in China, there would be an inevitable drawing together of Russia, China, and Japan in the Orient. It might not take the form of an alliance against Western imperialism: that would depend partly upon the position of the United States. We have reached an agreement with Japan because Japan was willing to go half way with us. If the United States is unwilling to go half way we greatly regret it. Until the present time American power has served chiefly as a cat's-paw for British and Japanese interests in China.

Meanwhile Japan is, for the moment, playing a much more graceful part in Eastern diplomacy than the British. Without yielding any important economic advantage, the Japanese Government has turned away at least one-half of the Chinese wrath by soft answers. Her press is at once cautious and friendly to the Chinese people. As soon as the agitation in Shanghai reached major significance the Japanese Government clamped down a censorship upon its newspapers. It would seem that the shrewd diplomats at Tokio are beating time, knowing that the situation must play into their hands. If England is hard pressed, she must pay heavily for Japanese support, and together the two powers may dominate the Orient. If England fails, then China and Russia must be wooed and won to a new Eastern entente.

[illegible] of the Great Fear, who would accept the contentions of Karakhan in regard to the actual weakness of bolshevism in China and the remoteness of a pan-Asiatic alliance against the West, still believe that the disorganized condition of China gives bolshevism its great opportunity. They look for the Red hand of Russia behind one or another of the Chinese parties. Specifically, they fear General Feng and pin their faith upon Chang Tso-lin. Karakhan's attitude toward that problem is this:

> What do I think about civil war? There is always danger of civil war in such a situation. You ask about the possible alignment of forces in such a war, with Chang Tso-lin, Britain, and Japan on one side and General Feng and Russia on the other side. I see no prospect of such an alignment as far as Russia is concerned. Perhaps the sympathies of the nations will be lined up in that way in the event of a struggle. Japan has been backing Chang Tso-lin consistently, while England has been cool toward him. Now, England must have somebody to pull her chestnuts out of the fire. So Chang emerges as the logical Chinese Kolchak. He is apparently quite willing to play the Kolchak role if England and Japan reward him well.

But the Chinese people must settle this struggle for themselves. Intervention by outside powers in behalf of one party or another will only perpetuate the disorder. History shows that the Chinese people will never get anything from the powers except those things that they are strong enough to take. The powers will respect China when they are compelled to respect China.

The pro-British press in China has spread grotesque rumors to the world in the attempt to prove that Russia is using Chinese militarists for her own ends. Actually, Britain and Japan have used Chinese militarists for their ends for a generation, while Russia has no representative today in China's internal strife. The Kuomintang, the party of Sun Yat-sen, which controls Canton, is a thoroughly Chinese democratic party, taking root in the traditional radical soil of south China. General Feng, the Christian general who is heading the anti-British movement at the time, has just called upon the Chinese people to repudiate bolshevism. His troops are drawn up by the Great Wall outside of Peking ready to make war upon England in behalf of the abolition of unequal treaties.

If Feng is given an opportunity to fight against England, it will be curious to watch the metamorphosis of this Christian gentleman in the British and American press. Until today he has been a wise and statesmanlike Christian executive, a believer in good roads, baths, and unbound feet. Tomorrow he may appear in Anglo-Saxon journalism as the apostle of mutilated missionaries, nationalized women, and the Red fear. There is nothing in the history of British journalism in the Orient to make this transformation incredible. From Shanghai, Hongkong, and other centers the British press has been pouring out anti-Bolshevik, anti-Chinese, and anti-labor propaganda in a style worthy of the Menace, the Dearborn Independent, and the Los Angeles Times.

Russia has no more effective champions in China today than these British colonials who are leading the bitter attack upon young China. They are throwing the Chinese people into the arms of the Bolsheviks. The demand for war against England is daily growing stronger. Student and labor demonstrations are centering upon British injustice. The feeling is so bitter that a declaration of war against England would probably throw into one camp the considerable armies around Canton, the army of General Feng near Peking, disaffected portions of the armies of Chang Tso-lin in north China and Manchuria, and perhaps India and Russia. Chinese Communists are naturally anxious for this opportunity to smash the British Empire. But for the time being Britain has sufficient power over the puppet government at Peking to postpone the day of reckoning.

As we come from the Russian embassy our ricksha man wheels to the right and there, diagonally across from each other on Legation Street, float the Star-spangled Banner and the Red Flag. Their juxtaposition is strangely suggestive and altogether depressing to an American who loves his own flag. To the Chinese people the red flag symbolizes what America once stood for: honesty in international relations, friendship for oppressed peoples. Karakhan is doing for China what Benjamin Franklin might have done. When he is dead we may erect monuments to him. Now we will not speak to him.

Herbert Hoover—Super-Business Man

By GEORGE T. ODELL

HOW does Herbert Hoover stand now? What is he doing for commerce? Is he relieving the burden upon the consumers' pocket-books?

If you ask a captain of industry and he happens to be in a mood for frank disclosure, the chances are that you will hear nothing but praise of Mr. Hoover. Two years ago the ratio of his admirers among leading business men was not very large. Not many of them were able to divine what he was driving at, and for the most part they did not care for his methods. But they have "got him" now, as we say in that delightfully expressive American colloquialism, and they are delighted to find that he is helping them to accomplish the very things they have been wanting to do for years but have been more or less deterred from doing by the anti-trust laws and the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. Hoover believes in business organizations, chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and trade associations. He works with them, and through them he draws individual concerns into his scheme of democratic business control. By democratic business control he means that business shall control itself with a minimum of government interference. Recently the United States Supreme Court handed down a decision in the "maple flooring" case that was essentially in accord with Mr. Hoover's conception of the functions of a trade association. But owing to a number of prosecutions by the Department of Justice and rulings of the Federal Trade Commission, industry in general has been somewhat dubious about gathering statistics on costs and prices and passing these about among themselves although it very much wanted to do so. The Secretary of Commerce has found a way of surmounting this difficulty by creating "voluntary committees" within the various industries that report statistical data to the Division of Simplified Practices of the Department of Commerce, which together with data gathered by the Bureau of the Census and by the statistical division of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce goes back to the trade associations through which it is circulated to the individual industries. So the vital statistics which the industries were afraid to circulate on their own account are now supplied just as promptly by the federal government, and of course the Department of Justice is not going to prosecute members of a trade association for disseminating official government statistics even if they are supplied largely by the members of the industry or the trade association itself.

The consuming public may wake up some fine day and discover that it is in the grip of great price-fixing combinations that control every necessity of life and most of the luxuries as well. Certainly the Hoover plan will make such combinations feasible, and who shall say them nay? The Federal Trade Commission that originally was conceived as the guardian of the consumers' rights as well as the protector of weak industries against the strong has now, thanks to the Coolidge policy, become an innocuous body that may not even survive the coming Congress. The courts cannot act unless the law is invoked by the Department of Justice, and it is almost unthinkable that an Attorney General will institute proceedings against those who are merely following the precepts of the Secretary of Commerce. Moreover, instead of having a free choice in the matter of quality and style we shall be bound to the narrowest possible limits of standardization under the scheme that is now being carried out. Nor can we turn for relief to foreign markets where creative genius has not yet been stifled, for there is the tariff wall to prevent their products from reaching us. The disappearance from the American market of many fine textiles that still abound in Europe is but an earnest of the further restrictions that may be expected when the simplified practice system becomes universal in American industry.

Strangely enough the prophecy of this undertaking was born amidst the greatest waste that mankind has ever known—the World War. The War Industries Board forced manufacturers in many lines to simplify their processes by reducing the forms of their output to conform to a few prescribed standards. As soon as possible after the war these same manufacturers resumed their former practices. Mr. Hoover entered the Department of Commerce with his mind made up to reestablish the essence of the plan inaugurated by the War Industries Board, but he had to find a different method. In time of peace the government is not endowed with such great prescriptive prerogatives, and the mere suggestion of that power contravenes the political doctrines of those who were then and are now in authority. Consequently the Secretary of Commerce had to exercise his ingenuity to find another means to the same end. Propaganda and the United States Chamber of Commerce, the American Engineering Council, and various trade associations were instruments at hand. The touchstone of the campaign was the self-interest of the individual producer and merchant.

In the fall of 1921 Mr. Hoover called a conference on unemployment to provide temporary relief measures and to consider the whole problem of business slumps. With that conference as a fulcrum a new policy was prized into the governmental structure. Since have followed over two hundred conferences of various industries and some others of a more general nature. In brief the plan of these conferences is this:

Through illustrated lectures by Department of Commerce representatives before trade bodies, and the distribution of quantities of literature, some individuals in an industry are stimulated to request the Secretary of Commerce to call a conference of the whole industry. Mr. Hoover then authorizes the secretary of the trade association or some other competent person acting as his representative to make a preliminary survey of the industry. He has set up in the department a Division of Simplified Practices to assist in this work, and there are also some twenty other divisions, each specializing in one or more of the basic industries which are able to render assistance as the plan progresses. Arrangements are made for a conference at which producers, distributors, users, and general interests are invited to consider the survey and make recommendations. These recommendations are circularized among the individuals of the industry together with a form of pledge to abide by them. Sometimes there is a follow-up campaign to sell the plan to reluctant members. The results so far achieved consist of some twenty-five agreements for the reduction of varieties of manufactured articles.

Mr. Hoover's plan must not be construed as an attempt to regulate business or to force commerce and industry to confer benefits upon the people. It is officially described as the policy of "putting government behind business rather than in business." The Hoover method is more suggestive than mandatory. It is his idea that if shown the way business will reform its own practices and that from this reformation, whether it be in processes or ethics, the people will reap their just reward as surely as if government itself were to interfere in their behalf. Mr. Hoover said:

> In the field of business ethics we have seen great advance in the last two decades and chiefly due to the efforts of the better trade associations. This brings up an interesting question as to the use which might be made of trade opinion and determination of what is unfair competition. . . . It would seem worth considering that the voices of the large majority of a given trade might be given weight in the determination of what is unfair. It might lead to a degree of self-government in industry and trade morals which would free us from much regulation.

Recently Mr. Hoover's attention was attracted by the appalling toll of over 22,000 human lives and the more or less serious injury to nearly 700,000 persons in traffic accidents upon the streets and highways annually. This state of affairs appeared to him as a tremendous economic loss. The First National Conference on Street and Highway Safety was held December 15, 1924. Much preliminary work had been done, and the conference reviewed reports from eight committees and adopted a manual on safety and accident prevention that contained a code for the regulation of city traffic and that on highways as well. In it are the principles for legislation and administration, suggestions for cooperation among various organizations, and a program for future activities, for the conference decided to continue its life and to meet periodically. In time it is hoped that a universal traffic code will be adopted throughout the United States, modified only to the extent necessary to meet local conditions.

The agents of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce are instructed always to be on the alert for opportunities to sell American goods abroad, and the cables are used freely in support of that policy. Surveying parties have been sent to India, Ceylon, British Malaya and the Dutch East Indies, and to Central and South America to study the production of raw rubber. Similar investigations have been made of sisal, nitrogen, and tanning materials. Pending the time when these and other raw materials for which American manufacturers are dependent upon imports can be grown under American suzerainty, Mr. Hoover has recommended the enactment of legislation that will allow common purchasing agencies for imported raw materials where it is found that a positive combination exists to control its sale.

Salmon fisheries in the Pacific, sturgeon fisheries in the Great Lakes, shad in the Potomac, and lobsters and crabs in the Atlantic Ocean and tributary waters are threatened with early extinction unless something is done to conserve them. The Bureau of Fisheries is part of the Department of Commerce, and Mr. Hoover has had them make a careful survey of the situation. He went to the United States Fisheries Association and put the problem before them, and he got a law through Congress giving him power to control the pollution of coastal waters by oil-burning and oil-carrying vessels. Other measures were enacted and agreements entered into with Canada which enable the Department of Commerce to create sanctuaries where members of the finny tribe and their crustacean associates may recuperate and multiply.

Mr. Hoover called three conferences of lumber associations and important consuming industries at which new standards for dimensions and such matters have been adopted. Members of the trades that use 90 per cent of the lumber that is sold estimate that a saving of $200,000,000 has been effected. It would require an extended survey, however, to determine who is getting the benefit of this "elimination of waste," since there are few facts published on the subject. At the last conference, a few weeks ago, Mr. Hoover said:

> The consumer is the person who has most to gain from the work of these conferences, for through protection from fraud and preservation of forests he is the ultimate gainer. If the consumer can be brought to place all orders on specifications of "American lumber standards" he is not only protecting himself but promoting the vital interests of the country.

In 1922-1923 Mr. Hoover held a conference with the producers and distributors of coal, railroad officials, and large consumers to determine what can be done to eliminate waste in the bituminous industry. It is admitted, however, by officials of the Department of Commerce that there is still great waste in this industry that can be overcome only by consolidations. Since the coal question has again become acute and since the Bureau of Mines is now under his direction, it is probable that the Secretary of Commerce will renew his activities in this direction before long.

A conference was called on superpower, at which Mr. Hoover broached his ambitious scheme for linking the hydro- and steam-electric plants in eleven Northeastern States, and while it does not yet appear that any actual development of this sort is under way committees are at work studying engineering and legal features of the question.

Are the Hoover policies bringing about a revolution in American industry and commerce? Mr. Hoover believes they are. In a speech delivered a year ago at Cleveland before the United States Chamber of Commerce, he said:

> I believe we are in the presence of a new era in the organization of industry and commerce in which, if properly directed, lie forces pregnant with infinite possibilities of more progress. I believe that we are, almost unnoticed, in the midst of a great revolution or, perhaps a better word, transformation of the whole super-organization of our economic life. We are passing from a period of extremely individualistic action into a period of associated activities. . . . I believe that through these forces we are slowly moving toward some sort of industrial democracy. We are upon its threshold, if these agencies can be directed solely to constructive performances in the public interest.

Arms for the Riff

By M. M. KNIGHT

Gibraltar, August 24

FOUR years ago Spain was just bringing to a victorious end a long and unnecessary war with Raisuli, leader of the Jebala tribes, west of the Riffians and now allied with them. Suddenly the Spanish army in the Riff was overwhelmed and almost totally destroyed. General Silvestre, seeing his life work in ruins and dead Spaniards all about him, killed himself—perhaps adding to the confusion. So many regulation French army rifles were found in Riffian hands that a cry of treachery went up. The charge was all the more serious because this arm is not sold to the trade at all, both gun and cartridges being manufactured only for the French Government. There seemed to be thousands of the rifles and unlimited ammunition. Of the origin of these we shall have more to say later.

The usual estimate of Spanish losses, as given by French officers, is about fifty thousand men. There were already some Spanish Mauser rifles in the Riff, smuggled or captured from outposts. Of course the Riffians did not capture a rifle for every Spaniard lost, but they apparently made up the difference by taking overstocked outposts, with cannon and shells as well as rifles and cartridges. The real problem was cartridges, as there were more captured carbines than men to use them. From 1921 on it is possible to account for all the ammunition the Riffians needed without in any way implicating the Germans, Russians, or French. The Spanish soldier, like many another on the Continent, regards his gun as a handle for his bayonet—at any rate his rifle fire is wasteful and ineffective. He wears a double bandoleer of some two hundred cartridges which he is said habitually to discard as soon as a retreat begins. Thus to save his own skin he abandons to the enemy the means of killing scores of his countrymen.

Another source of Riffian cartridges has been described to me by numerous eye-witnesses. The Arabs have a certain talent for graphic expression, so we may perhaps picture this condition best by quoting a Sheik, sent by the French to make observations at the Spanish front:

> I went up to the crest of the impregnable hill of X——, south of Melilla. Looking down the slope I saw a lot of tents, about a half mile away. "What the devil," I inquired of my Spanish guide, "are those people doing there, right at our gates?" "Oh, that's all right," he responded; "they are the ones who provision us." Sure enough, in a little while they began to come into the post with all sorts of hampers—even driving heavily laden donkeys. You know what the money of the Riff is. The Spaniards paid for those things largely in cartridges!

The Sheik was silent for a minute or more, gazing reflectively into his glass of mint-tea. He finally added:

> You hear people express amazement that the Riffians have been able to make war for four years. The answer is simple: they have not. They have had three and a half years of barter and four months of real fighting!

Most readers of these lines will recall Ibáñez's charge that in withdrawing to a "defensive line" near the coast, Primo de Rivera practically invited the Riffians to overrun and annex the Jebala country. Spain had taken Raisuli, already fatally ill with dropsy, as her ally in the peace of 1922. He had a great treasure of his own in addition to what she gave him, and was well stocked with ammunition. When Krim captured him eight months ago, not only did the gold and munitions go with him but the soldierly tribes of the Jebala added themselves to the Riffian unit. The gold came in handy for the purchase of further munitions, which were smuggled in through the international zone of Tangier and that occupied by the Spaniards, as well as into the ports actually controlled by the Riffians. Rivera's real defense for the withdrawal is one he does not dare make: that soldiers bartering military supplies on a "figurative" front inland may be doing more harm than they would idling in the rear where it is easier to watch them.

The rest is simple. Having immobilized the Spaniards, annexed the Jebala, and stocked himself with ammunition Krim took up the implied challenge of France when she occupied the ground north of the Ouergha in the spring of 1924. Many of these recently and imperfectly "pacified" tribes went over to the Riffians, taking their arms and ammunition as well as their man power with them. Still more military material fell into Krim's hands through the capture of French outposts, and the advancing Riffians were able to fight France largely with her own earlier partisans. Now that the Riffian advance is checked, Krim loses this cumulative power to make war without cost to himself, and must begin to draw upon his resources.

Newspapers have given much space to the problem of Krim's sources of ammunition from abroad. That problem is largely invented by French and Spanish military authorities for public effect. The marksmanship of those Riffian mountaineers is appalling. They do not waste cartridges, and they must still have a great many in reserve. Of course, they do import some, and the inter-allied blockade cannot possibly prevent it. I had it confidentially from a British naval officer on blockade duty that he hadn't fired on anybody, didn't have orders to do so, and that he inferred from his vague instructions that he must be especially careful about not doing the wrong thing. The activities of the Spanish navy since it gave us occasion for naval maneuvers in 1898 have not been impressive, and there are few French units along the Moroccan coast. I was assured by a group of French newspaper men in Tangier that the whole blockade was farcical, though they were not saying so in their dispatches. One had a rather impressive dossier on the international gun-running syndicate headed by a Captain Gardiner.

Thus the only real mystery about Krim's supplies is the original nest-egg of French Government rifles. Were Spanish suspicions justified; were the French helping Krim? Some of these rifles were identified as part of stocks captured by the Germans at Maubeuge and elsewhere during the Great War. Was Germany, then, engaged in arming the Riffian warriors? If so, where were these rifles between 1914 and 1921? They could hardly have been in Germany for more than two years after the setting up of the Allied control. Such speculations are useful in creating international distrust, but, privately, it is known by the authorities that at least some of these mysterious guns were bought by Krim from dealers in the Netherlands. In other words, in spite of Spanish charges against the French and French charges against the Germans, they were apparently sent to Morocco by neutral firms for private profit. A great war creates lethal implements by the million; and when it is over, these make new wars possible.

Crèvecœur the Loyalist

The Grotto: An Unpublished Letter from the American Farmer

Edited by H. L. BOURDIN and S. T. WILLIAMS

[An event of interest to students of American history and American literature was the recent discovery in Paris of new "Letters from an American Farmer." For nearly a century and a half these manuscripts had lain in a trunk where J. Hector St. John de Crèvecœur, the "Farmer," had placed them. One of these letters has already been printed, and the rest are soon to appear in a volume called "Sketches of Eighteenth-Century America." "The Grotto," a description of a Tory refuge against the persecutions of American patriots, with sundry observations on these patriots, is an interesting corrective for the myth about Crèvecœur that he was during the revolution doubtful about his loyalty to the king. For some reason he chose to suppress those manuscripts which told the truth about his attitude. Crèvecœur was basically a loyalist. This record was written about 1778. Some parts which do not relate to the narrative have been omitted. The original orthography and punctuation of the manuscript have been retained.]

THE spirit which animates the breast of our new people is a spirit of rancor which often becomes blind to its own future interest. 'Tis so with most passions given us for the most salutary purposes; they often transport us beyond the bonds intended. An old friend of mine suddenly disappeared at the same time that two of his neighbours were missing; this caused a great alarm among their connections and much greater ones among those who could have wished to have apprehended them, for they had been long suspicious. I made all the inquiries I possibly could but the universal distrust which possesses all minds was so great that nothing could be discovered. Different parties were sent to search the woods, to explore every place; the search proved vain.

This elopement so sudden and so private filled the country with surprise. Some were glad to see innocence escape the hands of tyranny, and the Rulers reproached themselves with their too tardy indulgence. But how cou'd they remain long concealed? They had left wives, children, great property, and these are ponderous chains which fasten men to their blocks. By repeated guesses and hints, by sollicitations, I was at last admitted into the secret: They were safe and at no great distance from their former habitations. It was not only the pleasure of seeing them I coveted as that of viewing the singular scituation of a retreat which had baffled the inimical ingenuity of the Times.

I was at last conducted to the spott, the most romantick I had ever seen. It was gloomy but not frightfull, entirely sequestred from common paths yet accessible, but only to the experienced foot. It might be called a pleasant habitation when compared to putrid gaols and narrower confinement. This was the azilum of security and silence, and who wou'd not have preferred this retreat to the vexations to which they might have been exposed. . . . I was led through the woods for a considerable distance, then ascended a pretty high ledge of rocks, not laid stratum super stratum but lying at various angles, then we descended into a valley which was so filled with fragments that we cou'd hardly pass along. We climbed over old decayed trees whose strong roots had once reached at a considerable distance among the crevices of the surface in quest of early subsistence, now laid prostrate. We passed under others which tho' living yet were so inclined and distorted as to make us afraid least they shou'd crush us in their fall. Quitting at last this valley, we passed by two large perpendicular rocks like a couple of huge pillars. I observed how a late thunderstorm had wasted its fury on a lofty spruce tree whose roots had reached at a great distance, the trunk was split in shivers, it had been stript of all its limbs and branches. Soon after this we suddenly turned to the south towards a spott almost devoid of vegetables but exceeding full of rattle snakes. Hard by was a morass incompassed all around with very craggy grounds which we were obliged to pass. It was a trembling surface, how formed? I cannot tell, supported by water which was not about 2½ feet distance under our feet as we experienced it by thrusting our poles down. On this doubtful surface there grew some bogs and great quantities of aquaticks: water elder, angelica, and some bushes of alder. We at last arrived on the opposite shore. As we were obliged to follow the shores where bushes grew thicker, we often pulled off our hats and stoop'd and scrambled to get through. Just as I was looking down and searching for a sure foothold, we felt a sudden agitation of the air and an uncommon noyse which startled us the more so as we apprehended being discovered or being the cause of the discovery of our friends. But, behold, it was a great heron we had disturbed from its nest. The great impediment he met with in the distention of his wings had caused both the strange noyse and uncommon agitation of air we had felt. Sometime after we agreed to rest a while, being extremely weary. The sun was scarcely an hour high. "How much farther is it?" asked ——"About ¼ of a mile," answered our guide. "What a horrid part of the creation," observed another, "nothing is to be seen but useless morasses, broken rocks, thunder struck trees."—"Had it been created," said another, "for no other purpose than to save these gentlemen from popular fury, it seems to me that it wou'd be sufficient to extort from us some simbols of gratitude."—"We join you in the pleasing offering" said 3 unseen and unknown voices which appeared to be quite contiguous to us. We arose and looked at each other with astonishment, but perceiving our guide to smile, fear vanished from our wonder. We searched and examined every spott around us, but in vain. Just as we were returning to the stone on which we had set down, a moving green surface seem'd to open with difficulty and the 3 well known heads of our friends thrusting out, beckoned us to come in. No sooner had we entered than the door was immediately shutt.—"How can it be," said I, "that we have been a full ½ hour coming to the entrance of this grotto without having perceived it, and not even been able to discover the least traces of any aperture after we were convinced that the voices we had heard were not inimical? I was so near the pretended door that it struck my feet when it was open, yet with all my attention, was not able to trace the least representation of any such thing."—"So much the better," said a third, "if the eyes of friends overlook these mysteries of iniquity, it is to be hoped that the more hurried and less composed sight of enemies will search in vain as well as we."

This is really a most astonishing natural contrivance taken and view'd together. When we entered, a small fire covered with embers at about 30 feet distance was just perceivable. In the middle there hung a large lamp, the still light of which afforded us no other means of conducting ourselves through this gloomy habitation than as a distant landmark. It was a bacon to lead us towards the fire. Contiguous to what might be called a chimney there sat a small table, a book or two, a pair of spectacles, and a candle which was lighted soon after we came in. Its light was greatly dimm'd by a kind of rainbow proceeding I suppose from the dampness of the air. The first appearance of all these objects put me in mind of a sepulchral monument inhabited by some happy spirit permitted to revisit this peacable mansion in order to attone by new prayers for sins not yet expiated. This Grotto was the refuge of 3 worthy men who had preferred it to the more splendid ones of Court Houses and Publick Gaols.

—"Pray how long have you lived here gentlemen?"

—"3 months"

—"Nature seems to have done everything here for you, but sure I am that she did not condescend to make a door to this retreat."

—"No, it was sufficient for her to have built these impenetrable walls and to have laid on this huge roof, so we might well do the rest." I observed with pleasure the chairs they had contrived with crooked bows of trees fasten'd together with withes. A flatt smooth stone properly supported, served them for a table. They had enlarged a natural aperture on the west side so as to make it receive a casement of 4 paines of glass. At the north end, a passage was left, near where the roof stone joined the perpendicular wall; this they had converted into a chimney, thus what little vapor their coal fire exhaled was carried up, and the smoke of any other fewell might have betrayed them. In every other respect this Antre was hermetick and yet had no disagreeable smell, its floor partly of earth, partly sand was levell with the ground on which we rested before we came in, all the rest was composed of flatt slate stones which in some antient percution had accidently left the void in which we now stand. I perceived with surprise a small shelve full of books, one was a Critical Review of State tryals, another, Clarendon's History of his own time; those were used for implements of leisure and improvement. On the opposite side there hanged few fowls and quadrupeds. After I had been there an hour I began to think my self as much devested of a body as I had represented it to myself. . . . Their door was the most ingenious as well as the most awfull of their contrivances; in the interval which had been left by the antient fall of the roof stone, there was accidently left an aperture large enough to enter. To this opening they had fixed a wooden door made of thin boards the outside of which they had lined with a coarse blanket on which they sow'd large moss which being often watered allways appeared fresh and presented to the eyes nothing but the deceiving surface of a smooth mossy rock perfectly similar to the rest. On the left hand side there grew and flourished a large wild vine such as you often see in our forests; its limbs and branches extended a great way and covered great part of the south front as well as the roof. This appeared to have been planted on purpose, they luckily improved the fortunate hint and made a most excellent use of that which nature intended only for the food of birds and foxes. . . .

Warmed by the new kindled fire, animated by a few glasses of good wine, rejoiced at the safe scituation of our friends, we spent the most cheerfull evening at which nothing was wanted. The simplicity of our food and dishes rather enhanced the delicacy of our fare; we had none of those frivolous additions so common at the tables of the great, calculated rather to feed the vanity of the master than to replenish the stomack of the guests. We sat round this new made table, and where seats were wanting an extemporaneous pile of stone immediately supplied the deficiency. If this table was not impregnated with the royal dignity which King Arthur imparted to his own, we dignifyed this with various simbols of friendship and philosophy too insignificant to repeat, we planned various schemes for the future deliverance of our friends. Like true English patriots we drink'd health and success to the commanders who perhaps have no other intention than to amuse our hopes and fill their pockets. Wou'd you believe it, the noble song of Rule Britania, so expressive of the unanimous wishes of the company forced these american echoes to repeat it though much again their will. What a singular efficiency there is in these national songs! They inspire a sort of enthusiasm they fill the heart with a renovation of antient feelings and affections which distance may impair but not destroy, they often urge men to uncommon deeds, they contain an hidden efficacy well known to soldiers and sailors; this filled me with the most vivid sense. Oh Britain, what mass of wishes, what collection of desires has been formed in thy favour! Not one, I am afraid, has reached Heaven or crossed the Atlantick if we may judge by thy conduct. What are thy sons a doing? Where is thy national vigor, foresight, and wisdom? Must these, thy forward children, take thee by the beard and make the world believe thou art in the doting age? I cannot finish to delineate a thought from which I turn with horror. Will our mother country leave us to our destiny, destiny of jealousy, divisions of power, individual misery, hid beneath the gaudy splendor of premature independence?

In the Driftway

AN eminently sensible young man has just come into the possession of a fortune. His name does not matter; it is his actions just after the happy event that make him sensible. He heard that something like half a million dollars was suddenly and happily his own; immediately on discovering the news he gave up his job, that of collector for the Illinois Bell Telephone Company, and took his wife to a ball game. The Drifter, although he does not know him, is his friend and admirer for life. He is tired of the interviews with janitors, bricklayers, railroad engineers, librarians, et al., who announce that in spite of the million dollars they have just fallen heir to they propose to go on with their ordinary mode of living. Few occupations, the Drifter holds, are attractive enough to deserve such fidelity. Only a deplorable lack of imagination can account for it. To be sure, such tactics are always commended by the newspapers and by certain wealthy men who are occasionally questioned on the subject. The new heir, they say, refused to lose his head but decided that the occupation which he had followed for forty years was still good enough for him. How commendable! Nothing of the kind, the Drifter avers. The most becoming thing a man in such circumstances could do would be to lose his head. He may find it again later if he will; but for a while he ought to spend his time rejoicing in some novel and unexpected way.

* * * * *

THE Drifter is not one of those who turn up their noses at the thought of sudden and large wealth. He would risk all the dangers of being plunged into such a state for the fun he knows he could get out of it. He has often wondered what he would do if he had a million dollars, but he knows that instant departure from his present daily task would be the first step. After that he might do a number of things: he might, for example, charter a sailing vessel the like of which is fast disappearing from the seas and start out on a voyage around the Horn or merely sail without objective up and down the seas; he might go to the most expensive restaurant he knows and order whatever he liked without ever once consulting the right side of the menu; he might mount a horse and explore certain sections of New Mexico and Arizona that have always beckoned to him; he might hire a gondola in Venice, not bargaining about the fare beforehand, and listen all day to the songs of his gondolier and to the shouts from the houses as he slipped by them; he might sit quietly at home with a pile of book catalogues before him and order every book that he wanted without a thought for the price.

* * * * *

THESE, he realizes, are the desires of someone who has always been poor. Doubtless more exotic wishes would appeal to one who, being rich, became suddenly richer. But there would always be something. If at the end strange scenes palled on him, if the edges of Spain looked no more alluring than the temples of Siam, if the Ganges beckoned no more strongly than the Orinoco, if he found himself longing for his own tongue, for his own way of living, for something like his own kind of people then—delightful thought—he could always come back to them. He would no more be compelled to exile than tied to home. That is the great advantage of riches; for, of course, the Drifter would not be one of those who took this wealth seriously. Having come by it through no agency of his own, he would lose it without too much regret. And lose it he certainly would, because the intricacies of finance are beyond him and his idea of managing a fortune is to leave it alone. Ultimately he would be poor again, and that would be the proper time for going on with his former occupation.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The La Follette Trail in Wisconsin

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I have just completed accompanying Mr. Robert M. La Follette, Jr., in his race for the Senate. I was on his staff handling publicity. The love and reverence of a people for a dead leader was constantly evident during these weeks of campaigning.

The Progressives with rare good judgment and a homage worthy of the memory of their dead leader laid aside personal ambitions and grouped themselves about Robert M. La Follette, Jr., the elder son who for six years had been secretary and intimate associate to his father. The campaign to fill the seat was by State statute a brief one, hardly more than three weeks being allowed for the primary race, and fourteen days thereafter election. For three weeks "Bobby," as they call him in Wisconsin, drove through the State "bringing the fight to the people." Everywhere he was met by large crowds. Early in the morning, in mid-afternoon, or late at night, regardless of time or place, the neighborhood was there to meet him. At first the opposition press belied the size of the gatherings. When this became too brazen they shouted: "Mere curiosity." Curiosity it was. The curiosity of farmers and workers, men and women who during a quarter of a century had been educated by this youth's father to question and examine candidate and platform, to ponder and deliberate, and to manifest interest and zeal in progressivism by coming out and scrutinizing the quality of the enunciator.

Day after day, at every meeting, the love and homage of a people for a dead leader was unfolded and the depth of his impress revealed. It was primarily the expression, the uncovering of the depth and quality of the liberalism that Robert Marion La Follette grounded in Wisconsin. When Bob Jr. came to the crowds he was watched, apprehensively. And then as the challenges to which they had stridden to the fight under his father rolled out, as the message of his life-long fight against monopoly and reaction was reaffirmed with a vividness that needs but a little while to make it famous in its own right, the joy of these throngs was awe-inspiring.

Appleton, Wisconsin, September 12 ROBERT S. ALLEN

Disarmament and Credit

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The financial columns of the Herald Tribune today have an interesting bearing on the question of disarmament. They mention an offering of $30,000,000 kingdom of Denmark thirty-year 5½ per cent external-loan bonds priced at 99½. Proceeds of the loan are to be used to retire outstanding 8 per cent bonds, and the report indicates an active demand.

The Danish government bill in the Rigsdag for the abolition of the army and navy, the disarmament of all fortifications, and the disbanding of all volunteer corps was mentioned in your issue of December 24, 1924. While the measure has not yet been adopted, it is not unlikely that a few years will see it in force. Presumably the bankers are fully aware of the situation, but do they shake in their shoes at the prospect of little Denmark venturing about unarmed in the jungle of Europe with Germany on one side and Red Russia a near neighbor? Not so you'd notice it. If their money talks, apparently it is saying that they believe Denmark is going to be more secure than it has been in the past.

New York, July 29 PAUL JONES

Believe It or Not

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Sinclair Lewis's observations on the Hun in The Nation for July 1 remind me of a shameful experience I myself had with the self-same dreadful Huns. Away back in 1910, when the world was still safe for democracy and when we still looked upon the Germans as honest, peaceful, intellectual human beings (today no hundred-per-center considers them such)—back in those already ancient days I translated Mitchell's "Last American" into Esperanto. Being no seer, prophet, fortune teller, or son of a native son, I made the supreme blunder of picking a German publisher, and in that most terrible of all German cities, Berlin. No iron-bound contract was drawn up stating in unmistakable terms exactly what my remuneration was to be; a brief letter stated in a matter-of-fact way that a certain sum was to be mine upon the appearance of a second edition. This letter was subsequently lost, leaving me at the mercy of the Hun editors.

Meanwhile hell broke loose in all Christian (?) lands and Germany became the Beelzebub of the nations. In the turmoil I dismissed all thoughts about my little book because none but a fool would ever again expect sane, honest treatment from a bunch of degenerate Huns.

Some months ago I discovered in Esperanto, official organ of the Universal Esperanto Association, that a second edition of my book had just come off the press. My address was not the same as it was in 1910, so I wrote to the publishers to see what they would do in the matter of remuneration. I did it as a joke, of course; I knew beforehand that I would receive an insulting reply.

In due time came a letter from the publishers written in most courteous Esperanto. The politeness was for effect, most likely. I was told that the company had changed hands three times since the first publication of the book, that no contract could be found anywhere, that the then owner was now residing in Italy, and that a letter from him was to the effect that he could recall nothing about the matter.

Well, so much for German honesty! I might have known that I could expect nothing else from such a source. I was ready to tear the letter into shreds and throw them in the fire, but my better judgment told me to read the final paragraph. That paragraph stated that ten copies of the book were being sent to me and then asked if a certain sum in gold marks would be acceptable. This sum, upon investigation, proved to be just one dollar less than the pre-war sum agreed upon, and as soon as my letter of acceptance reached the publishers their check was promptly forwarded.

Minneapolis, July 7 LEHMAN WENDELL

Bishop Brown's Beliefs

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: An interesting article in The Nation of August 19 by Charles W. Wood, entitled Religion Becomes News, ended with this extraordinary sentence: "If the Protestant Episcopal Church decides that a bishop is at liberty to believe whatever he can find out, the conflict between science and religion may soon be resolved."

Neither the Episcopal church nor any other church needs to decide that a bishop is at liberty to believe whatever he can find out. A bishop, like anyone else, is always free to believe whatever he chooses. A bishop is at liberty to believe that the whole Christian faith is false, just as a banker is at liberty to believe that the whole banking system is a fraudulent scheme to extract money from the poor, or an insurance man to believe that life insurance is a useless waste of money, or a ship captain to believe that his ship will never reach port. It is commonly assumed by sensible people that if bankers or insurance men or ship captains believe such things they should resign from their positions. There are still people in the church who think that a bishop who maintains that the whole Christian faith is false should resign from his office. This is the real question at issue in regard to Bishop Brown, which will finally be settled at the coming General Convention in New Orleans.

It is difficult to see how Bishop Brown's belief or lack of belief can have the slightest connection with any alleged conflict between science and religion. Most authoritative men of science today, as well as most accredited representatives of religion, do not believe that there is any conflict between science and religion. Certainly the unrepresentative opinions of Bishop Brown can have little bearing either upon science or upon religion.

New York, August 29 SELDEN P. DELANY, Editor, American Church Monthly

The "Old Feminists"

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It is a mistake to say that "the old feminists were anti-man." Some were; but the great majority were not.

When the woman's rights movement in England was being denounced as a rebellion of embittered spinsters, its three chief divisions were led by three gray-haired widows: Mrs. Millicent Garrett Fawcett, who had been eyes and hands for years to the blind Postmaster General of England; the saintly Mrs. Charlotte Despard; and Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst. Even the redoubtable Mrs. Pankhurst, who was looked upon as the very embodiment of the anti-man spirit, was nothing of the sort. Holding forth to me one day with motherly pride upon the good qualities of her daughter Christabel, she added, with a soft light in her bright eyes: "I gave her the right kind of a father."

In the United States, Lucretia Mott's husband stood by her in every way. Someone said he had never seen such a look of happiness on any human face as on James Mott's when Lucretia was making an eloquent address and he sat holding her Quaker bonnet. Lucy Stone had a faithful and able coadjutor in Henry B. Blackwell. Elizabeth Cady Stanton's five sons were in sympathy with her. Julia Ward Howe was an ardent lover—witness some of her poems. Mary A. Livermore said it was her husband who converted her to woman suffrage and encouraged and urged her to undertake public work when she distrusted her own powers. Dr. Livermore was exceedingly fond and proud of her. He would drop in at the Woman's Journal office and say, with conviction: "There never was such another woman as Mary Livermore—never!" The union of the Rev. Antoinette Brown Blackwell and Samuel C. Blackwell was ideally happy; after forty years of marriage they were still like lovers.

Three prominent suffragists, representing New York, Indiana, and Kansas, were great friends, but had a standing disagreement on one point: each insisted that her own husband was the best husband in existence. At one of the early suffrage fairs in Boston many of the husbands—busy men who seldom got out to meeting—had come with their wives to help open boxes and barrels. As I passed through the different departments of the fair, a whole series of women seized upon me, one after another, each exclaiming: "I want you to meet my husband. He is the best man in the world!"

Those of the old feminists who were unmarried had a band of able and valiant masculine co-workers, to whom they were warmly grateful, from the day when William Lloyd Garrison refused to take his seat in the World's Anti-Slavery Convention because the women delegates were excluded down to the very end. The woman's rights movement was never a conflict of women against men. It was always a struggle between progressive men and women on one side and conservative men and women on the other. Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt (herself twice married and both times happily) put the case in a nutshell when she said: "The enemy is not man but conservatism."

Chilmark, Mass., August 27 Alice Stone Blackwell

A Comment from the South

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Nation makes me sick. You are so hipped on the Negro question that you say "white woman" and then go out of the way to say "a young colored lady." Along with several of my friends I have written a number of letters to The Nation giving the Southerner's viewpoint, but you fail to print them. Instead you tell the people through your columns what we do and think, and generally it's wrong. You say cowards rule in Tennessee. Is zat so? It certainly is not news. Cowards rule in New York—items, Lusk, birth control—and everywhere else for that matter. You infer that everyone opposed to the child-labor amendment is a reactionary, and that is just as foolish as to say that a man opposed to prohibition is a reactionary and that a man is a Bolshevik because he voted for Bob La Follette. The Nation approaches its subjects just like other American magazines—that is, from its own particular angle. The Nation is undoubtedly the best paper of its kind in America because I permit it to pain me fifty-two times out of every year, but that's not saying much. And don't think it's smart just to make people angry. If you go out of your way to do these things in order to vent your own viewpoint on someone else for that purpose only (you frequently boast of making people angry) you accomplish nothing.

San Antonio, Texas, July 15 Maury Maverick

He Wants Facts

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: It takes your paper to get the facts. Facts I am looking for, and this is the reason I so eagerly look forward to its receipt weekly.

Detroit, July 11 S. W. Eigls

The Rising Tide of Youth

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A torchlight parade on the Fourth of July is undoubtedly appropriate; but a torchlight parade of Socialists, requiring forty-five minutes to pass a given point, tying up traffic precisely as if it were a parade of the American Legion, and carrying more red flags in one night than have been carried in the United States since the landing of the Pilgrims, would hardly meet the approval of the New York bomb squad. For, what could be a graver act of lese majeste than to hold a parade of revolutionists (just before I left the United States, hardly a month ago, I heard Socialists referred to as "revolutionists") on the birthday of the American Revolution?

The New York bomb squad missed one of its great opportunities by not spending July 4 in Vienna. It could have arrested almost as many children as it liked. For the parade, with the exception of the musicians, was composed of children.

From a point near the Wiener Bank Verein it moved into the Ring and marched toward the Opera. Massed, and waiting to begin its march, the procession might have been a new army mobilizing against a new Bastille. Thousands of gleaming torches under a radiant blue sky. That was from a distance. When it came nearer, with its crimson banners and its wistful childish faces, it looked like nothing so much as the Sunday-school parades in Brooklyn on Anniversary Day. Or it would have looked that way had it not been that the children were so [illegible]

The Children's Crusade was nothing compared with what is beginning in Central Europe today. I have seen the children marching in Berlin and in Vienna; and their footsteps [illegible]

The power of this sort of thing is almost inconceivable; but I think I can indicate something of the compulsion it exerts. A week ago I was sitting with a friend in front of the Romanische Cafe, in the shadow of the Kaisersgedenkniskirche, in Berlin. She was damning my radicalism in a most satisfyingly thorough manner when, suddenly, we heard voices singing "The Internationale" and a Communist parade entered the square. My friend looked, then looked away, and then began to weep.

"I can't help it," she said. "I think I understand."

Vienna, July 4 Nelson Junius Springer

Books and Plays

From the Continent's End

By ROBINSON JEFFERS

Birds

The fierce musical cries of a couple of sparrow-hawks hunting on the headland,
Hovering and darting, their heads northwestward,
Prick like silver arrows shot through a curtain the noise of the ocean
Trampling its granite; their red backs gleam
Under my window around the stone corners; nothing gracefuller, nothing
Nimbler in the wind. Westward the wave-gleaners,
The old gray sea-going gulls are gathered together, the northwest wind wakening
Their wings to the wild spirals of the wind-dance.
Fresh as the air, salt as the foam, play birds in the bright wind, fly falcons
Forgetting the oak and the pine-wood, come gulls
From the Carmel sands and the sands at the river-mouth, from Lobos and out of the limitless
Power of the mass of the sea, for a poem
Needs multitude, multitudes of thoughts, all fierce, all flesh-eaters, musically clamorous
Bright hawks that hover and dart headlong, and ungainly
Gray hungers fledged with desire of transgression, salt slimed beaks, from the sharp
Rock-shores of the world and the secret waters.

Haunted Country

Here the human past is dim and feeble and alien to us
Our ghosts draw from the crowded future.
Fixed as the past how could it fail to drop weird shadows
And make strange murmurs about twilight?
In the dawn twilight metal falcons flew over the mountain,
Multitudes, and faded in the air; at moonrise
The farmer's girl by the still river is afraid of phantoms,
Hearing the pulse of a huge city
Move on the water-meadow and stream off south; the country's Children for all their innocent minds
Hide dry and bitter lights in the eye, they dream without knowing it
The inhuman years to be accomplished,
The inhuman powers, the servile cunning under pressure,
In a land grown old, heavy and crowded.
There are happy places that fate spares; here is not one of them;
The tides of the brute womb, the excess
And weight of life spilled out like water, the last migration
Gathering against this holier valley-mouth
That knows its fate beforehand, the flow of the womb, banked back
By the older flood of the ocean, to swallow it.

Fog

Invisible gulls with human voices cry in the sea-cloud:
"There is room, wild minds,
Up high in the cloud; the web and the feather remember
Three elements, but here
Is but one, and the webs and the feathers
Subduing but the one
Are the greater, with strength and to spare." You dream, wild criers,
The peace that all life
Dreams gluttonously, the infinite self that has eaten
Environment, and lives
Alone, unencroached on, perfectly gorged, one God.
Caesar and Napoleon
Visibly acting their dream of that solitude, Christ and Gautama,
Being God, devouring
The world with atonement for God's sake . . . ah sacred hungers,
The conqueror's, the prophet's,
The lover's, the hunger of the sea-beaks, slaves of the last peace,
Worshipers of oneness.

Boats in a Fog

Sports and gallantries, the stage, the arts, the antics of dancers,
The exuberant voices of music,
Have charm for children but lack nobility; it is bitter earnestness
That makes beauty; the mind
Knows, grown adult.
A sudden fog-drift muffled the ocean,
A throbbing of engines moved in it,
At length, a stone's throw out, between the rocks and the vapor,
One by one moved shadows
Out of the mystery, shadows, fishing-boats, trailing each other,
Following the cliff for guidance,
Holding a difficult path between the peril of the sea-fog
And the foam on the shore granite.
One by one, trailing their leader, six crept by me,
Out of the vapor and into it,
The throb of their engines subdued by the fog, patient and cautious,
Coasting all round the peninsula
Back to the buoys in Monterey harbor. A flight of pelicans
Is nothing lovelier to look at;
The flight of the planets is nothing nobler; all the arts lose virtue
Against the essential reality
Of creatures going about their business among the equally
Earnest elements of nature.

Ben Jonson

Ben Jonson. Edited by C. H. Herford and Percy Simpson. Volumes I and II: The Man and His Work. Oxford University Press. $11 the set.

FOR more than a century Gifford's edition of Ben Jonson has held the field, authoritative and unrivaled save by sporadic issues of individual plays. Now at length its long day is waning, for the first instalment of the definitive edition upon which Messrs. Herford and Simpson have been at work for many years has appeared. Eight more volumes, to contain Jonson's dramas, masques, entertainments, non-dramatic verse, and prose, together with critical introductions and elaborate commentaries, are promised. These two introductory volumes present the great bulk of the editorial matter: a "Life"; all the extant documents (with two exceptions to be noted presently) from contemporary sources, including a reprint of the Conversations with Drummond and all but one of Jonson's letters; and a series of introductions to the several plays, the masques, the poems, "Discoveries," and "The English Grammar." If much is gained by the compact form in which all the requisite information is here assembled, something is lost by the separation of the introductions from the works with which they deal. Moreover, until the other volumes are before us, it is impossible in fairness to comment upon apparent lacunae which the editors probably plan to fill in in the separate commentaries which are to follow. The treatment of the theory of humours, for example, is less exhaustive than in Mr. Simpson's edition of "Every Man in His Humour" (1919); there is more to be said about the theory and practice of alchemy, about Bartholomew Fair, about the fire which destroyed Jonson's library, about Jonson's relations with John Fletcher, and other matters. We are entitled to expect more detailed information later on; meanwhile the editors are entitled to our confident expectations.

Much of the editorial labor has been expended upon the assembling, ordering, and interpretation of facts previously known but never before so well set forth; but several documents are here printed for the first time, more perhaps than we could have hoped for at so late a date. Mr. W. A. White of New York has with the generosity which characterizes his relations with scholars allowed three hitherto unpublished letters by Jonson, respecting the imprisonment for his part in the "Eastward Ho" affair, to appear. A deed of assignment (1621) in which Jonson assigns a half-year's annuity to one John Hull is also published for the first time. Other practically unknown documents are gathered together from the periodicals in which they were first printed. An invaluable compilation, ranking almost as documentary evidence, is the catalogue of books in Jonson's library which survived, or were purchased after, the fire and which are still extant. The number and variety of these books is surprisingly large. The editors have taken all possible pains in the difficult task of the detection and indication of forged signatures and inscriptions. The amassing of documents would, then, be complete were it not for two astonishing and disgusting facts concerning which it is best to quote the editors' own very moderate words:

> One collector in America, who owns an unprinted letter of Jonson, has refused to answer an inquiry about it; one collector in England has withheld a manuscript note of a contemporary of Jonson giving a new fact about his life. With these two exceptions we have experienced the utmost generosity at the hands of collectors and scholars.

As it is inconceivable that such contemptible and unworthy misers are readers of The Nation, comment is unnecessary.

The editors have worked in a partnership so happy and so successful that any precise indication of their respective shares in the common task is neither possible nor desirable. It may be said, however, that most of the spade-work of research has been done by Mr. Simpson who is also responsible for the documentation, the commentaries, and the introductions to Jonson's prose. The biography, planned by both "twin-brethren," is in its final form from Professor Herford's pen, as are the introductions to the dramas, masques, and poems. The strictly new material alters very little the established outline of Jonson's life. None the less this biography is of exceptional value for the brilliant light which it casts upon the man's character and literary ideals, his friendships and quarrels, and his whole milieu. No other Elizabethan stands so completely before us in his habit as a man. We can visualize Ben Jonson in the round, with that life-like verisimilitude with which the great figures of literature in later centuries come before us. In comparison with him the dramatists who were his fellows are but shadows of names. And this is due to the fact that he was not only a dramatist but a satirist, moralist, and critic; and not only a man of letters in this larger sense but also a man of the world, in touch with large affairs, commanding important and influential friendships and no less significant enmities. He was a great though unequal artist, a tremendous though sometimes blundering satirist, a learned though unsystematic critic. These qualities would have immortalized his writings but they would not have availed to stamp the impression of his personality upon the English mind. All the comparatively abundant evidence shapes itself into a consistent and highly individual figure. The man who slew his enemy in the Low Countries and afterwards another enemy in London; who was imprisoned for his share in "The Isle of Dogs" and again for his part in "Eastward Ho"; who fixed lasting ridicule upon his rivals in the stage quarrel; who turned Roman Catholic when self-interest demanded that he adhere to the established faith, yet was ready to inform Salisbury of "Romish" plots; who walked from London to Edinburgh and talked with Drummond for a month on end; whose early turbulence gradually subsided into a rugged serenity; who was on intimate terms with many courtly persons and the close friend of the greatest scholars of his age; who came to be surrounded by admiring "sons" and reigned without dispute at the literary foregatherings in the London taverns; who outlived his popularity but not his self-esteem—this man was one of the great personalities produced by the English race. His face is familiar to us; in many a recorded conversation we can catch the very tones of his burly voice; his "mountain belly" as he presides at the Apollo or Devil Tavern looms up before us hardly more mistily than does the shabby waistcoat of his even more familiar great namesake of the eighteenth century.

Professor Herford illuminates this already so distinct personality. In considering Ben Jonson it is the personality that counts. And it is the personality that establishes this man among the immortal figures of our literature. This it is which explains the most familiar of all English epitaphs. Jonson's "rarity" did not consist in his own day and certainly does not consist today in his dramas, which were never enormously popular and which are now very infrequently revived; nor does it consist in his truculent powers as a satirist; nor in his learning; nor even in his occasional snatches of exquisite lyric melody. Professor Herford remarks that Jonson's persistent air of contending against the tide is inconsistent with the fact that the tide was in many respects running in his favor. There is this of truth, however, in Jonson's pose of isolation, that so strong, so rugged, so intensely individual a man could not but stand out among, if not against, his fellows. He is "rare" because he is unique.

So much for the man; when his editors produce the later volumes of their truly monumental work we shall follow his own counsel to the reader of Shakespeare and

> . . . looke
> Not on his Picture, but his Booke.

SAMUEL C. CHEW

Professor Channing Continues

A History of the United States. By Edward Channing. Volume VI. The War for Southern Independence. The Macmillan Company. $4.75.

COMMENTING upon the question whether or not Stephen A. Douglas must have realized the effect which the Kansas-Nebraska bill of 1854 would have, Professor Channing remarks: "One of the first things that the historical student learns to distrust is the vitality of the prophetic vision of himself or of anyone else in ages past. Prophesying is the most dangerous of all historical pursuits and also of political pursuits." To the philosophy which these sentences embody Professor Channing adheres, in this volume of his "History" as in the previous ones, with a considerable measure of consistency. To be sure, he has not been able wholly to resist the temptation to speculate regarding what might have happened if things had been different. The belief, for example, that the election of Bell and Everett in 1860 would have averted secession seems to him to have much to support it, although it is hard to see how he can imagine that those two respectabilities could under any circumstances have won a majority of the electoral votes in the then state of public opinion. Such deviations, however, do not impinge much upon the general theory or its application. What is more, Professor Channing is not only averse to prophecy, but he is even more incorrigibly averse to taking anybody's word for what happened until he has himself inquired into the credibility of the narrator and the life history of his story. If we have had no American historian who has subjected the sources to a more thorough personal examination than has Professor Channing, we also have none who is less a respecter of persons and traditional opinions than he.

The result of this detached attitude appears less in the general outline of the fifteen-years story which this volume tells than in the treatment of particular episodes and the judgments which are passed upon leading personages and their acts. Webster is defended for his Seventh of March Speech on the Compromise of 1850, and "no more painful, no more unjustifiable, lines" are to be found in "American poesy" than those in which Whittier branded Webster as Ichabod. Buchanan's course is treated without further blackening his reputation, John Brown's career is sympathetically recounted, and while many will think that less than justice is done to Lee, the work of Jefferson Davis is favorably exhibited. Anyone who imagines, however, from the subtitle of the volume, or from the apparently complete lack of references to rebellion, or the political immorality of secession, or the superior moral purpose of the North as a prime reason for winning the war, that the South and its leaders are receiving a clean bill of health will not be long in discovering his error. The Civil War was indeed a war for Southern independence, and the merits of the controversy and the relative resources of the combatants were not so unevenly matched that praise or blame should attach exclusively to either, but Professor Channing is clear that by the middle of the nineteenth century "two distinct social organizations had developed within the United States," and that they were so far divergent that they "could not continue indefinitely to live side by side within the walls of one government, even within the walls of so loosely constructed a system as that of the United States under the Constitution." Given these conditions, a war of separation was inevitable.

It is this point of view which, in the main, is kept in sight throughout the volume. A brief survey in the first chapter of economic and social conditions North and South illustrates the divergence of system just referred to, as the account of the Compromise of 1850 and Southern interest in the territorial extension of slavery shows its political bearings. Older readers will perhaps be struck by the relatively small place assigned to Abolition as a political or moral force in the period, and the chapter on "bleeding Kansas" is a model of reduction to scale. For Lincoln, "that God-inspired man," Professor Channing has little criticism, but for the Lincoln following in 1860 he has some sharp words. "Undoubtedly a very large part of the support of the Republican Party," he writes, "came from persons who had no scruple of conscience, but had great desire to hold public office," and most of the Lincoln supporters, the small number of out and out Abolitionists aside, "were those who wished for a change in the economic policy of the federal government." Professor Channing's strictures on the military operations of the Civil War, together with his estimate of the comparative importance of campaigns or movements, are too technical a subject to be gone into here, and the military critics will probably continue to take sides notwithstanding his balanced presentation of the evidence, but the more than usual praise of McClellan may at least be mentioned. What brought the war to an end, next to the continued success of the Union armies, was the reelection of Lincoln in 1864. With that event the South lost heart. Professor Channing regards it as "at least open to debate how far the collapse of the Confederacy can be attributed to the lack of essential supplies," and it appears to him that "the Southern people, had they so wished, could have held out for a long time," but "by the summer of 1864, and even more so by December of that year, the will to fight had gone from large sections of the Southern people."

Certain adverse criticisms which have been passed upon the preceding volumes of Professor Channing's work hold true, in the main, of this latest instalment. The work is relatively weak on the economic and social side notwithstanding a considerable use of economic and social data, and on the history of the States, although the latter lack is in part made good by an admirable chapter on the Ohio Valley States. The foreign relations of the United States get only brief examination, and the account of federal administration and the work of Congress during the war leaves a good deal unsaid. It is, in short, political history, and to the political aspect of things the other matters are made to contribute. But within these limits it is a noble work, rich in sound learning, marvelously free from any kind of bias, and aiming straightforwardly at the truth as the author sees it. One may indeed hope that the years will be generous with the scholar as his task now three-fourths done goes forward to its end.

WILLIAM MACDONALD

Humane Warfare

Callinicus: A Defense of Chemical Warfare. By J. B. S. Haldane. Today and Tomorrow Series. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

CHEMICAL warfare has yet to find its General Mitchell. The die-hard opposition to it on the part of older line officers has created a situation analogous to that in which the aeroplane formerly found itself. Opposition persists and has been strongly expressed at the Geneva Conference. It is based on ignorance; it speaks the fear of the unknown, for chemistry must long remain for the general public a vast and pregnant mystery.

Mr. Haldane injects a pungent dose of fact and clever raillery. He speaks down as only a well-informed English scientist can. His scorn is for the sentimental pacifist and for the "military mind"; and his dear reader escapes with a chuckle. He gives a clear discussion of the four chief types of useful chemicals, with striking instances of their uses. They are effective and humane. A typical picture is the capture, quite unwounded, of 2,400 poilus by means of a bombardment of tear gas. Temporarily blinded, they were disarmed and led off by "a German in goggles." "In order to make future wars humane," says Mr. Haldane, "it would only be necessary to introduce the two following rules: (1) No goggles or other eye protection shall be worn; (2) no shells shall be used containing any other substances save ethyl iodo-acetate (or other lachrymatory compound) and a small bursting charge. Certainly it is unlikely that such rules will ever be adopted, but I do contend that to forbid the use of such substances is a piece of sentimentalism as cruel as it is ridiculous." He sketches the enormous possibilities which chemical warfare still holds and advocates its study and extension. In short: "I have no sympathy whatever for Mr. Facing-both-ways when he says that, though he is prepared on occasion to fight, he will not use these nasty new-fangled weapons." He is keen and true.

Nevertheless this special pleading is a descent from the heights of "Daedalus" and "Icarus," two volumes in the same series which now are famous. That startling debate on the value of science, a precious primer for all sophomores, in college or out, by men who know whereof they write and write exceedingly well, is a judgment on science and a warning to a stupid world. Well may the complacent fundamentalist beware the day when biologists attain their stride and advance to the rank of creative scientists. For Daedalus "was the first to demonstrate that the scientific worker is not concerned with gods." And Bertrand Russell in "Icarus" has sounded the warning. If Mr. Haldane's predictions in "Daedalus" come true, if the gifts of science come to a world unprepared and unworthy, the present situation in chemical warfare will be but a prelude to major disasters. The challenge is to the social and moral sciences; if they do not keep pace mankind must perish by its very power over nature and over itself.

GERALD L. WENDT

Second Best

The Professor's House. By Willa Cather. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THERE is nothing which reveals more clearly the most characteristic defect of modern fiction than the fact that the theme—even the chief substance—of most contemporary novels is easily reduced to abstract intellectual terms; and there is nothing that indicates more clearly the nature of Miss Willa Cather's peculiar excellence than the fact that the intention of her works generally defies any such attempt at restatement. It is not merely that one would find it difficult to say what "My Antonia" proves, but that it would be almost equally difficult either to define the author's attitude or to describe the effect produced; and even when, as in "A Lost Lady," there is unmistakably a theme, it remains as in solution, never crystallizing into an entity separate from the story which embodies it. The quality of the emotion aroused is perfectly distinct; toward the lady in question we have an attitude different from that inspired by any other person; but from the author we get no hint how we may analyze the subtle guilt of her heroine or how we may formulate our charge against her.

Miss Cather begins, one is led to suspect, not with an intellectual conviction which is to be translated into characters and incidents but with an emotional reaction which she endeavors to recapture in her works; and she completes the whole creative process without ever having, herself, imperiled the fresh richness of the emotion by subjecting it to analysis. Some incident observed in life or recalled to memory appears in her imagination surrounded by an aura of feeling. It reverberates through her mind, awaking complicated echoes and making many strings vibrate with sympathetic overtones from which a haunting chord of music, soft but intricate and new, is born. As an artist her task is not to resolve this chord into its constituents nor to describe the strings from which it comes, but so to reproduce the various elements of her apperception as to transfer it bodily to the mind of her reader. She is not one of those who, knowing our stops, plays what melody she will upon them, but one whose skill consists in her ability to reconstruct a situation by which she herself has been moved.

Being essentially an intuitive artist she is at some times markedly more successful than at others, and her new novel is not among her best. Its method is characteristically hers, for though the theme is fairly distinct it never degenerates into a thesis; her story of a scholar whose faith in life fails him when he sees how fortuitous wealth destroys the spiritual integrity of his family is never made, as most contemporary writers would have made it, "an indictment of commercialism"; and, being always rather elegiac than argumentative or bitter in tone, its effects are purely artistic ones. Yet in spite of many fine touches it does not live up to the promise of the earlier [illegible]. Fragmentary and inconclusive, it starts off in several different directions but never quite arrives at any of the proposed destinations.

The initial mistake was, I think, the elaboration of the character whose story constitutes the second of the three parts into which the novel is divided. Miss Cather has wished to multiply the incidents which produce in the professor his dominant mood—the result of a conviction that while achievement is good its rewards, whether reaped by those to whom they are due or by others, are invariably evil. For this purpose she invents a young student who turns up at the university and carelessly presents the professor with some priceless Indian pottery which he had discovered in the West. Later he invents a vague but wonderful gas, rushes away to be killed in the war, and leaves it to the professor's bright son-in-law to commercialize the invention. In a fashion this young hero runs away with the story. He is glamorous, he has adventures, and he furnishes the reflection about which the whole book turns: "Fellows like Outland don't carry much luggage, yet one of the things you know them by is their sumptuous generosity—and when they are gone, all you can say of them is that they departed leaving princely gifts." Yet he has no business to dwarf as he does the professor, for he is not made one-tenth so interesting nor is he by any means so richly conceived. The professor's household was, I would be willing to wager, the observed or remembered situation with which the book started. It is the fact which appeared to the author with that aura of feeling of which I have spoken, and Outland is largely an invention. He is merely a hero, almost an abstraction; he has attributes but he has no character; and he is only very superficially convincing. Put beside Outland even the casually indicated Marcellus, the active son-in-law, and the former pales to a shadow.

In "The Professor's House" there is much that is very beautiful—passages which only Miss Cather could have written. Taken as a whole, however, the book is a disappointment to those who know how good her best work can be.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Miguel de Unamuno

Essays and Soliloquies. By Miguel de Unamuno. Translated from the Spanish with an introduction by J. E. Crawford Flitch. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.

EVERY system of philosophy, every attitude toward the universe which has any claim at all to our attention, will be found to imply a code of ethics, just as every code of ethics will be found to rest upon an attitude toward the universe. For a system of philosophy which exerted no influence upon our actions would find itself without justification or significance other than as an intellectual game, while a manual of practice must look further afield than the immediate needs of the individual which it is to serve if it at all seeks to obtain harmony between him and the universe. This truism will not suffer by reiteration here, because it is the only approach to philosophy which has human relevancy at all. A philosophy which does not answer satisfactorily the question "How does it help me to live the life of reason, in a world in which such life appears at best as a [illegible]?"—such a philosophy would hardly deserve the name. And any other question which we may ask of it, while it may perhaps give rise to interesting problems, will hardly touch at all upon the raison d'être of philosophy—its affective [illegible].

Examined from such an angle Unamuno will be found sadly wanting. His attitude toward the universe, negative in its consequences, is incapable of illuminating or guiding action when that action is directed toward the practical business of living. And his code of practice, built upon negative foundations, [illegible] as in "La Vida de Don Quijote y Sancho Panza") is rudimentary, narrow, anti-social, and therefore irrational. It does not flower from a desire to achieve harmony between the individual and a hostile world, but appears rather to have been consciously designed to keep the individual in a state of chaotic strife with himself and with the world. The result of that atrophy in his moral development is spiritual dissolution and practical despair. And, also, a complete separation from the world of reality. Like Don Quixote in the wine cellar, he finds himself striking against enemies as elusive as shadows in the dark, and the ease with which he vanquishes them makes him seriously doubt their existence.

From a slightly different angle, the reason for that estrangement between Unamuno's ideal and his practical life is sufficiently radical to furnish the best criticism of his ideology. And the reason is that the problem which he has set himself to solve—the tragic sentiment of life, as he calls it; the conflict, that is to say, between the heart that desires immortality and reason that denies its possibility—is a fantastic one. To us moderns at least who have accepted with more or less difficulty, but accepted nevertheless, the conclusions of science, his flutter about immortality will appear at first blush ridiculous. Our point of disagreement with him does not lie in the different attitude toward immortality which we may take, but on something more fundamental than that. For beyond the possibility of immortality lies the question of the transcendental nature of the ego. If instead of amusing himself with positing the question and deducing conclusions from it before solving it he had set himself to find out with the aid of science exactly what he meant by that soul of his for which he desires eternal life, the ineluctable character of the conflict would have disappeared. He would have come to see, as the mechanists have, that the soul, that I of Miguel de Unamuno of which he so vehemently speaks, is a vague name for a wanton wedding of elements having no reason, in an absolute moral sense, other than that which we may arbitrarily thrust upon it, and no permanence other than that which we may fortuitously snatch for it from the teeth of fate.

The question we have now to answer is whether, in the throes of that tragic sentiment of which he finds himself the prey, Unamuno has had the courage to yield free scope to his intellectual curiosity. Though we may not accuse him of insincerity we may charge him with intellectual negligence. If he had been moved by a passionate desire for the truth, rather than for an easy pragmatic satisfaction, he would have sought to sink the foundations of his intellectual life on the only firm soil given to us today—the evidence of science. But his romantic loyalty for an outdated ideology has blinded him to the fact that he has built it upon the shifting sands of a faith which can advance no better proof of its validity than the arbitrary whims of his own heart.

However, Unamuno is a disturbing voice to his contemporaries because he gives expression, in an age which finds itself the battleground of two fundamentally exclusive ways of thinking, to the older ways—and in forms so poignantly vivid that one cannot fail to realize their vital significance. But for one who has already made up his mind the intrinsic value of his thought ends here. Any other value he may possess is only symptomatic.

Perhaps the nature of Unamuno's problem will not be evident in these essays, although Spirituality and Intellectuality, My Religion, and Arbitrary Reflexions adumbrate it from various angles. Unamuno, to be completely understood—and refuted—needs be completely read. Nor is the task of refutation an easy one. For while one's mind may abstract itself from the passionate influence of his arguments, one's heart will find it difficult to remain impassive to their subtle caresses. And it is to the heart, and not to the mind, that he addresses himself.

ELISEO VIVAS

Books in Brief

The Earth Speaks to Bryan. By Henry Fairfield Osborn. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.

It is natural that Mr. Osborn should reply, in behalf of the earth, to Mr. Bryan, who represents God. The two have much in common. Both are dogmatic and long-winded, and both quote the Bible abundantly. Mr. Osborn is a paleontologist of distinction; he tells us here a little of the Neanderthal man and the Cro-Magnon man, more of the religious beliefs of the doctors who taught him in his youth, and gives fascinating sidelights on his dinner-table conversations with bishops and archbishops.

The History of Materialism. By Frederick Albert Lange. With an Introduction by Bertrand Russell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $5.

A new edition of a classic, with an introduction explaining materialism as a product of dogmatism. "At the present day the chief protagonists of materialism are certain men of science in America and certain politicians in Russia, because it is in these two countries that traditional theology is still powerful."

A Good Man. By George F. Hummel. Boni and Liveright. $2.

What the novelist himself calls the "level of light banter" is consistently and entertainingly maintained in this novel. Mr. Hummel is a swift, if somewhat superficial, observer; he is a smooth as well as a shrewd narrator. His study of the suburban Don Juan—a business and woman go-getter—is an engaging piece of fiction.

Ethan Quest: His Saga. By Harry Hervey. Cosmopolitan Book Corporation. $2.

Something more than the empty gesture of romance has gone into this novel. Glamor of the expected sort it has, but beyond that is a thoughtful depth, in which the theme of the story is submerged without effort. One looks into it as into a crystal pool; Mr. Hervey is no paddler in the shallows of fiction. "Ethan Quest" is done with feeling and aesthetic restraint; it belongs in the category of civilized fiction.

Little Nineteenth-Century Classics. Edited by John Drinkwater. I. Twenty Poems, by Robert Stephen Hawker. II. Essays, by Hartley Coleridge. III. Twenty Poems in Common English, by William Barnes. Duffield and Company. Seventy-five cents each.

Three featherweight volumes in a series, which it is hoped will grow indefinitely.

George Fox; Some Modern Appreciations. A Tercentenary Collection of Studies. London: The Swarthmore Press. 6 shillings.

Tributes by Rufus M. Jones, J. St. Lee Strachey, Dean Inge, and others to the perennially interesting Quaker.

Italian Landscape in Eighteenth-Century England. By Elizabeth Wheeler Manwaring. Oxford University Press. $3.

An excellent and valuable chapter in the history of culture, tracing the influence of Claude Lorrain and Salvator Rosa (as well as their imitators in European painting) upon literature, art, and landscape gardening in the England of Thomson and Reynolds and Mrs. Radcliffe.

The Cruise of the Nona. By Hilaire Belloc. Houghton Mifflin Company. $4.50.

A miscellany of sea-meditations upon all matters under the sun; Mr. Belloc's admirers will say that he thought while he sailed; the others that he sailed while he thought. The resulting pages are breezy enough; the intellectual ballast, however, was very light.

Drama

Liberty's Glorious Feast

FASHIONS change, and the hobo is coming once more into his own. Not many years ago moralizing realists were telling us that these knights of the road were no knights at all. Their ranks, so we were told, were recruited from the most feebly unfit. Weak-minded victims of dementia praecox constituted, it was said, the most typical of their numbers, and there was nothing even remotely romantic about their cowardly viciousness. Now, however, poet-tramps, scholar-tramps, and super-tramps are popping up all over America and England to defend the picturesqueness if not the virtue of their fellows; and thanks either to their facts or to their imagination they are getting the best of the argument. Though Gipsies seem to belong almost wholly to the past and though the highwayman has come to operate from the taxicab which he drives, the most thoroughly regimentized citizen must have some symbol of the free life outside those laws which he obeys and those conventional decencies which he preserves. The dream of Vagabondage is as eternal as that of the Golden Age —the one a dream of protest as the other is a dream of fulfilment—and the tramp furnishes the best contemporary material for its embodiment.

On the crest of this wave of neo-romanticism comes "Outside Looking In" (Greenwich Village Theater), which Maxwell Anderson has fashioned from Jim Tully's autobiography, "Beggars of Life"; and it is a dramatic sketch of astonishing vigor, moving with speed in spite of the fact that it is largely made of atmosphere and character, and rollicking with both cynical and Rabelaisian laughter. Romantic no doubt it is, but its romanticism is strictly à la mode, the romanticism, that is to say, not of Alfred Noyes or of Robin Hood but the robust romanticism of "What Price Glory"—which has little to do with prettiness and much to do with things not generally considered the material of romance. Reeking with profanity and rich with that characteristic American humor which expresses itself in the exuberant phrase and the fantastic overstatement, its touches of sentiment are slipped unobtrusively into places where they will give the audience a little comfort without calling attention to themselves; and they do not spoil the illusion of riotous and brutal mirth.

There is a whole gallery of highly individualized portraits, ranging from the silently sinister "Arkansas Snake" at one extreme to the genially violent giant, tinged with the principles of the wobbly and known as "Oklahoma Red," on the other; while in between is a whole army of tramps, varying greatly in their experience and in the extent of their philosophy, but united in a common contempt for easy life within the law. The racy talk, touching lightly upon everything from women to government, blasphemes against every respectability and reaches its climax in the scene where a Kangaroo court is convened in a box car to try a prisoner charged "with eating in restaurants and corrupting a girl from a bawdy house into honorable marriage." "If," demands the judge, "all the women were taken out of sporting houses, what would become of us poor single men?" And then, declaring himself like all other judges, he waves the defense counsel aside with the words: "It's no use; I've already made up my mind, and I'm incorruptible." The audience, not too rootedly respectful of the guardians of law and order to object to a little mockery, rocks with laughter at every sally.

It would not be easy to find in literature so riotous a defiance of all the proprieties. "The Beggar's Opera," being frank burlesque, is not half so strong; and one is driven to that glorious cantata, Burns's "The Jolly Beggars," for such a gallery of rogues or so joyous an exhibition of pariah philosophy. Burns did indeed strike exactly the note which Messrs. Tully and Anderson have echoed, and here it is:

A fig for those by law protected!
Liberty's a glorious feast!
Courts for cowards were erected,
Churches built to please the priest.

Life is all a variorum.
We regard not how it goes:
Let them cant about decorum
Who have characters to lose.

With the ready trick and fa[illegible]
Round we wander all the day;
And at night in barn or stable,
Hug our doxies on the hay.

As for the story of "Outside Looking In," it is rather commonplace melodrama and might, if told in outline, put some strain upon credulity; but thanks to the very skilful handling and to acting which, especially in the parts of Charles Bickford and David Leonard, is extremely good, it is made tense and convincing. Those who were worried because "What Price Glory" was effective in spite of demonstrably poor dramatic construction will be still further distressed by Mr. Anderson's latest effort, but no play ever opened at the Greenwich Village which seemed more certainly destined for success.

At the Lyceum Theater Mr. Belasco is presenting Willard Mack in "Canary Dutch." Mr. Mack does a really masterly piece of characterizing, but the piece is a factitious arrangement of pathos and melodrama designed merely to give him the opportunity. At the Booth Theater the irresistibly amusing Ruth Gordon takes complete charge of a poor play called "The Fall of Eve" and makes it very funny in spite of itself.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE
466 GRAND ST.
Evenings (except Monday) 8:30 sharp
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

BAYES Theatre, 44th St., W. of Broadway. LACKAWANNA 6565
EVENINGS, 8:30 MATINEE SATURDAY, 2:30
The Yiddish Art Theatre Players in
Maurice Schwartz Production of
"KING SAUL" A Biblical Drama by Paul Heyse
Complete Synopsis in English with Program

DEBATES LECTURES

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL
will celebrate its entrance into the new Labor Temple at 14th Street and [illegible] Avenue, Sunday, October 11th, 8:15 p. m., with a DEBATE: "Who Are the Ten Greatest Geniuses in History; and What Are Greatness and Genius?"
SPEAKERS: Mrs. Charlotte Perkins Gilman, Prof. H. W. L. Dana, Dr. Joel Blau, and Dr. Will Durant
Tickets, 50c and $1, obtainable at 239 East 14th Street.

"WORDS" A Course in Vocabulary Development
Given by David Goodman, M.A. (Principal of the Language-Power English School and the University Preparatory School)
in THE LECTURE ROOM OF THE SCHOOL, 5th Avenue at 115th Street
Sunday Mornings 11 A. M.-1 P. M. First Lesson Sept. 27
FEE: $10 for 24 LESSONS For particulars apply at the office of the school

International Relations Section

The Chinese Demands

TEN days after the Shanghai shooting of May 30 representatives of the Diplomatic Body in Peking arrived on the scene to investigate the affair and negotiate for settlement. Three days later the Chinese General Chamber of Commerce at Shanghai presented a series of thirteen demands as terms for such a settlement.

These thirteen points drafted by the Chamber of Commerce are the only "demands" officially presented to the powers up to the present time, and supported by the Chinese Government. As such they must be distinguished from those other more far-reaching aspirations which have been expressed from time to time in the diplomatic correspondence of the Chinese Government.

Immediately following the May 30 affair the Chamber of Commerce held a number of meetings to consider the situation. This body, composed of 530 members, represents the largest and most influential commercial and banking interests in Shanghai. In presenting the thirteen demands the Chamber of Commerce was supported (according to the foreign press it was coerced) by the more radical Amalgamated Union of Commerce and Education which managed the general strike. In the latter organization are included the Chinese Students Union (national), the Shanghai Students Union, the Federated Street Unions, representing more than 10,000 small shopkeepers organized by streets, and many smaller trade unions. Although differences of opinion later developed between the more radical and conservative elements, it is safe to say that the great bulk of Chinese organized opinion stands behind these demands.

Complete agreement in regard to the manner in which the thirteen demands were drafted by the Chamber of Commerce is lacking. According to the foreign press and Shanghai municipal officials, the meeting at the Chamber of Commerce was attended by students and various radical labor groups who forced the hands of the "more stable elements" of the chamber itself. Information from Chinese sources states that the chamber formulated its demands without coercion.

On the following facts, however, there is general agreement: Prior to the drafting of the thirteen demands by the Chamber of Commerce the joint committee of the Commercial Labor and Educational Bodies, the executive of the Amalgamated Union, drew up a series of demands for submission to the Municipal Council. These demands, also thirteen in number, were far more radical than those subsequently adopted by the chamber. They included immediate abolition of extraterritoriality; withdrawal of British and Chinese gunboats; return of the Mixed Court to China; appointment of a Chinese commissioner of police for the Shanghai Foreign Settlement; and eligibility of Chinese to sit on the Municipal Council. When the Chamber of Commerce met, with representatives of the students and labor and commerce bodies participating, the more radical demands listed above were dropped and several others materially modified, on the ground that they were inconsistent with existing treaties or impractical at the present time.

The thirteen demands of the Chamber of Commerce were officially presented to the Chinese Commissioner of Foreign Affairs at Shanghai on June 12 and submitted by him to the Diplomatic Delegation from Peking sent to negotiate for a settlement with the Chinese commissioners. At about the same time the demands of the Amalgamated Union were also submitted to the Chinese commissioners.

On June 18, after holding three sessions, the negotiations were broken off. The Diplomatic Delegation, on leaving Shanghai, published a statement declaring agreement impossible due to the fact that the Chinese demands (except those directly relating to the May 30 affair) were beyond the scope of their instructions. The report of the Diplomatic Delegation has not been published to date.

Following the breakdown of the negotiations in Shanghai the Chinese Foreign Office in Peking transmitted to the Diplomatic Body on June 24 a note containing the thirteen demands as drafted by the Chamber of Commerce. No reply to this note had been presented by the powers at the time of this writing. The Chinese Government has insisted on the thirteen demands as the basis for any settlement of the May 30 affair. Since the note of June 24 no further negotiations have taken place between the powers and China.

On June 18 the powers announced their decision to hold a judicial inquiry. The Chinese Government backed by student and labor organizations opposed such inquiry and to date no further action has been taken by the powers.

The Thirteen Demands

The thirteen demands may be grouped for convenience into two sections. The first, covering seven points, deals directly with the shooting of May 30 and calls for apology, compensation, punishment of offenders, release of Chinese arrested, reinstatement of strikers, betterment of labor conditions. The second deals with general questions long a source of friction which, according to the Chinese, were the underlying causes of the Shanghai affair. These demands, six in number, include revision of the Mixed Court, municipal franchise for Chinese rate-payers in the Foreign Settlement, freedom of speech and the press, and withdrawal of several proposed municipal (Shanghai Settlement) statutes. We print herewith a translation of the demands, taken verbatim from the North-China Herald, with an explanation of those points which may be obscure:

1. Cancelation of state of emergency.

2. Release of all Chinese arrested in connection with this affair and restoration to original state of all educational institutions in the International Settlement sealed and occupied by the authorities.

3. Punishment of offenders. To be suspended pending investigation and [illegible] to be seriously dealt with.

4. Compensation for the dead and wounded and the damage sustained by the laborers, merchants, and students in connection with this affair.

5. Apology.

6. Rendition of Mixed Court. Complete restoration of the state consistent to the provisions of the treaties. When any Chinese is prosecuted under the criminal code of the Republic of China or under the municipal by-laws the prosecution shall be in the name of the republic and not that of the Shanghai Municipal Council.

[This demand refers to the action of the powers in 1911, when they took over complete control of the Shanghai Mixed Court. Before 1911 the Chinese magistrates on the Mixed Court were appointed by the local Chinese authority and paid from Chinese sources. During the revolution, when the Imperial Government was overthrown, the treaty powers assumed control of the Mixed Court in order that it might continue to function and appointed the Chinese magistrates through the consular body. This foreign control was not surrendered after the republic was recognized by the powers, despite the fact, as W. W. Willoughby points out, that "there was no legal or other treaty right empowering this action on the part of the treaty powers." The Chinese now demand restoration of the status existing before the revolution.]

7. All the employees of the foreigners, seamen and workers of mills or factories and others who turned out on strike in sympathy, shall be reinstated and their wages during the period of the strike shall not be deducted.

8. Better conditions for the laborers. Any laborer may work or not on his own accord and shall not be punishable for refusal to work.

9. Municipal franchise.

(a) The Chinese may participate in the Municipal Council and rate-payers' meetings. The rate-payers' representation in the council shall be in proportion to the amount of the rate payable and paid to the municipal revenues, and the qualifications for franchise of the Chinese shall be similar to those of the foreigner.

(b) For the purpose of the franchise, distinction shall be made as to the beneficial and trust (or legal) interests of property. With the beneficial interest, the right of franchise shall accompany; and in the case of the trust interest, such right shall be exercised by the beneficial owner thereof.

[Under existing regulations Chinese residents in the Foreign Settlement, despite the fact that they pay more than 80 per cent of the taxes, are without franchise or representation on the Municipal Council or governing body of the Settlement. Furthermore, a large amount of property in the Settlement is registered in the name of foreigners as trust for Chinese owners. The Chinese demand the franchise on the basis of the taxes paid, without distinction as to nationality.]

10. Restraint to construct roads beyond boundaries. The Shanghai Municipal Council shall not construct roads beyond the Settlement boundaries; those roads which are already so constructed shall be unconditionally turned over to the Chinese Government.

[This demand is the result of a controversy between the Chinese and foreigners over the right of the Municipal Council to build roads beyond the Settlement boundaries. Crowded conditions in the Foreign Settlement led to the construction of foreign residences and business houses in Chinese territory, the land being purchased by individual foreigners and real-estate companies. The Municipal Council, in order to establish communications with the new communities, built a number of roads and highways radiating from the Settlement boundaries, the land for such being purchased from the Chinese for that purpose. These roads, being the property of the Settlement, automatically came under the jurisdiction of the Municipal Council, and as such had the same status as land within the Settlement boundaries. The roads are policed by the Settlement force and, legally, Chinese police and Chinese troops are prohibited from crossing them. This condition led to considerable friction and repeated protests on the part of the Chinese, who claimed that the Settlement was illegally extending its boundaries. The Chinese now demand return of all roads constructed by the Municipal Council and restraint to construct new roads.]

11. Withdrawal of the resolutions concerning printed matter, increase of wharfage dues, and licensing of exchanges.

[For some time past resolutions for amendment of the by-laws to permit control and censorship of the press (affecting Chinese papers printed in the Settlement) and to increase wharfage dues (involving Chinese river traffic) have been introduced at the rate-payers' meetings. These measures have been strenuously opposed by the Chinese, who now ask that they be not introduced again.]

12. All Chinese residents of the Settlement shall have liberty of speech, assembly, and publication.

[This demand is a result of the frequent arrest of Chinese students and others by the Settlement police on the charge of distributing incendiary literature and contributing to general unrest.]

13. Dismissal of the Secretary of the Municipal Council, E. S. B. Rowe.

The directors of the Chinese Rate-payers' Association, at a meeting held, unanimously indorsed the demands addressed to the Foreign Commissioner.

Two Missionary Statements

AN interesting statement from Kuling, China, dated July 11, addressed to the Secretary of State, shows the attitude of certain Christian missionaries.

DEAR MR. KELLOGG:

We, a group of Methodist Episcopal missionaries resident in the Lower Yangtze Valley, wish to commend the proposal, presumably official, that our Government call an international conference on extraterritoriality. And, as American citizens, we beg the privilege of offering a statement regarding the present situation in China.

We have found, through intimate intercourse with these people, that they are one of the most reasonable peoples in the family of nations, and that if they are dealt with in the spirit of fairness, equality, and respect, they readily respond with reciprocal attitudes.

It is with a feeling of deep appreciation that we bear in mind our nation's traditional policy of fair dealing with China, and we herein bear witness to the rich returns in good-will that have redounded to America and to her citizens living here.

But, on the other hand, there is at the present time a widespread and almost unanimous feeling of protest against the unfairness in existing treaties, including those with America. This has accelerated the national movement, which is fundamentally not anti-foreign, but which may become a menace to world peace.

With these experiences and reflections in mind, we greet with profound satisfaction and relief the report that our Government contemplates calling a conference of powers to consider the retrocession of extraterritoriality. We approve the conditions suggested in the press reports, the "codification of China's criminal and civil laws," the "establishment of a responsible Chinese judiciary," and the "acceptance by Chinese factions of the responsibility of the Chinese Central Government," because they will provide necessary safeguards and involve no infringement of Chinese sovereignty. We feel that the risks involved will be far outweighed by the resultant advantages in faith and good-will.

We also feel that the control of its own tariff, internal revenue, and territory is essential to the sovereignty of any nation, and since the nations assembled at Washington promised to respect the sovereignty of China, it is imperative that these promises now be kept. We feel that a conciliatory attitude is a sign of strength, and we believe the time has come when the unfair treaties now binding China should be revised.

We therefore hope that the forthcoming conference will deal not only with extraterritoriality but will widen its scope to include the revision of treaties so that all discriminations against the Chinese, as a nation and as a people—extraterritoriality, foreign concessions, and foreign control of the Chinese tariff and internal revenue—shall be abolished as soon as reasonably possible.

[Signed] W. E. SCHUBERT, Chairman; PAUL G. HAYES, Secretary; L. J. BIRNEY, Bishop; and fifty-two others

NOW for the price of a few dark rooms in the city

You can own at Sunnyside Gardens a light, airy cooperative apartment. Carrying charges amount to less than rent.

Now a cooperative garden apartment at Sunnyside, with sunshine, light and air, play-space for the children, is well within your reach. There is a small cash payment, and then monthly payments cover all charges, heat and hot water. For example, on a four-room apartment, monthly charges amount to only $62.10.

Sunnyside Gardens are just across the East River—15 minutes from Grand Central by Interboro Subway. The fare is only 5c to all parts of Manhattan.

Sunnyside is being built by the City Housing Corporation, a company, organized on social principles, which has limited its own dividends in order to make possible better housing and community planning at the least possible cost. The apartments are organized on a cooperative principle, and are being sought by professional people, teachers and writers.

Thinking of moving this Fall? Then don't fail to look at Sunnyside Gardens. Write for full information, or call Stillwell 8475 and arrange for an appointment.

Take Corona Line to Bliss Street, B. M. T., I. R. T. or Second Avenue Elevated, or Fifth Avenue Bus No. 15

Sunnyside Gardens

Bliss Street Subway Station, Long Island City

CITY HOUSING CORPORATION

A limited dividend company—Organized to build better homes and communities

OFFICE: Queens Boulevard and Carolin Street

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS

By Dr. EDGAR STILLMAN KELLEY

Third Year in A Study Course in Music Understanding
(The N. F. M. C. official Course of Study)

Eight fascinating and fully illustrated chapters

Authoritative Readable Compact

A concise description of the various instruments through which music has found its expression and the story of their gradual development from the savage drum and primitive flute to the power and richness of the modern organ and the color and splendor of the symphonic orchestra of today.

Price, $1.50 net

PIANO MUSIC

Its Composers and Characteristics

By CLARENCE G. HAMILTON, A. M.

Prof. of Music, Wellesley College

Price, $2.00 net

In this book Prof. Hamilton surveys the history of piano music, describing the early claviers and the evolution of the piano therefrom; the gradual progress of piano music from the time of Queen Elizabeth to the present day, and the contributions towards its growth, full illustrated by portraits, music excerpts, etc.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY
178-179 TREMONT STREET BOSTON, MASS.
CHAS. H. DITSON & CO., 8-10-12 East 34th Street, New York, N. Y.

Order of your local dealer

KU KLUX KLAN?

To Readers of THE NATION

You must read the "MAELSTROM," the Visible of the Invisible Empire. The real truth about the Ku Klux Klan. Just off the press, a historical exposé, with original documents, photographs, letters, telegrams, from 1913 to the present.

By one who formerly sat close to the throne of the Imperial Wizard. 200 pages, cloth, $1.65 postpaid

"MAELSTROM" PUBLISHING CO., Inc.
Suite 415
U. S. National Bank Bldg., Denver, Colo.

Count Hermann Keyserling's

THE TRAVEL DIARY of a Philosopher

3rd printing 2 vols. $10.00

Sinclair Lewis's

ARROWSMITH

7th printing $2.00

M. R. Werner's

BRIGHAM YOUNG

3rd printing Illustrated, $5.00

Harcourt, Brace & Co. 383 Madison Ave. New York

MOTHER JONES'

AUTOBIOGRAPHY is the most important book on the American Labor movement that has appeared for many a day. "A unique, ful and picturesque figure," Clarence Darrow calls her in his Introduction to the book. Cloth, illustrated, $1.50 postpaid.

Charles H. Kerr & Company, 317 East Ohio Street, Chicago

Your Winter Problems

If you want to rent a house or an apartment or if you have one to rent—or sell, advertise in the classified section of The Nation, read by desirable landlords and tenants. Rates on application. Special three-time rate. Dept. Y. W. P., The Nation.

DUTTON'S NEW NOVELS

THE ISLES OF WISDOM

By ALEXANDER MOSZKOWSKI

A voyage among undiscovered isles where the theories of wise men of all ages are found to be true. The pointing comments of the moderns who visit them are brilliant bits of satire. $2.50

THE OUTCAST

By LUIGI PIRANDELLO. Author of "The Late Mattia Pascal," etc. A penetrating analysis of the false moralities of a small Italian town. $2.50

Send for our fall list of books for the discriminating.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Avenue, New York

Please mention The Nation

A different attitude is expressed in the resolutions regarding China adopted by the Conference of Missionary Societies in Great Britain and Ireland, held at Swanwick, England, in June:

1. Feeling the need of special prayer in connection with the present critical situation in China the conference refers to its officers to take such steps as after consideration and inquiry they think best for drawing forth the prayers of Christian people for the lands and peoples concerned.

(1a) The Conference of British Missionary Societies, representing fifty-one missionary societies, having given thoughtful consideration to the serious situation which has arisen in China and to the causes which have produced so unhappy and threatening a position between China and the foreign powers, would place upon record their conviction that an urgent need exists for a prayerful study of the various movements underlying the present reaction. The conference sees in the present condition the operation of political, economic, and educational forces vitally affecting the whole life of the Chinese people, and considers that a true solution can only be found by mutual confidence and conciliation resulting from patient and sympathetic investigation of the difficulties with which China is at present confronted as a nation.

(2) To our brethren and sisters in the Christian churches in China:

At this time of exceptional difficulty in China we wish to take the opportunity of our meeting to express to you our loving sympathy and to assure you of our prayers. To you we know that the present situation must be a matter of acute sorrow, and that it must bring grave perplexities. We are sharers of this sorrow, and we wish to help you in facing these perplexities. We do not for a moment doubt that the answer to China's distress is to be found in our Lord Jesus Christ. We recognize also in ourselves and in our organizations a failure adequately to express the glorious gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ. We know that this essentially universal message is made more difficult of acceptance at the present time because of its association with Western nations. No small part of your difficulty is created by these facts. We wish to do all we can to lessen such difficulties. We are earnestly striving to see how the Spirit of Christ may be expressed more fully in us and in our relations with China. . . .

Contributors to This Issue

PAUL BLANSHARD, of the League for Industrial Democracy, is in China studying the student movement.

GEORGE T. ODELL was for many years the Washington correspondent of the New York Evening Mail and of the Christian Science Monitor.

M. M. KNIGHT, assistant professor of history at Columbia University, has just returned from Morocco.

H. L. BOURDIN is instructor in French, and S. T. WILLIAMS is assistant professor of English at Yale University.

ROBINSON JEFFERS is a California poet, author of "Tamar and Other Poems."

SAMUEL C. CHEW has written several books of criticism. The latest is "Byron in England."

WILLIAM MACDONALD was an associate editor of The Nation in 1919 and 1920.

GERALD L. WENDT is head of the department of chemistry at Pennsylvania State College and discoverer of the ozone form of hydrogen.

ELISEO VIVAS was the author of the anonymous article, The Unknown Critic, in The Nation for December 10, 1924.

Fall Term LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL, 14th St. and 2d Ave.
announces the following courses by
DR. WILL DURANT

Course 11. Poets. A guide to the best poetry of the last 125 years; an interpretation of it in terms of the social and cultural background; a study of poetic genius and poetic form.

Sept. 27: A Defense of Poetry
Oct. 4: Goethe as a Poet
Oct. 11: Novalis and the Romantic School
Oct. 18: Wordsworth and Coleridge
Oct. 25: Shelley: The Cenci
Nov. 1: Keats
Nov. 8: Byron: Manfred
Nov. 15: Lamartine and the French Romantics
Nov. 22: Alfred de Musset
Nov. 29: Victor Hugo
Dec. 6: Heine and the Decay of Romanticism
Dec. 13: Tennyson and the Age of Darwin
Dec. 20: Browning the Possessor
Dec. 27: Matthew Arnold: Poet of Doubt
Jan. 3: Dante Gabriel Rossetti
Jan. 10: Swinburne
Jan. 17: Rudyard Kipling
Jan. 24: Francis Thompson and John Davidson
Jan. 31: Ernest Dowson and A. E. Housman
Feb. 7: William Butler Yeats
Mar. 28: Beaudelaire and the Satanic School
Apr. 4: Verlaine
Apr. 11: Mallarmé and the Symbolists
Apr. 18: Verhaeren and Regnier
Apr. 25: Leonardi
May 2: D'Annunzio
May 9: An Anthology of Russian Verse
May 16: Edgar Allan Poe
May 23: Longfellow, Whittier and Lowell
May 30: Walt Whitman
June 6: Field, Riley and Markham
June 13: Lindsay, Masters and Sandburg
June 20: Robinson, Frost and Untermeyer
June 27: Amy Lowell and the Poetesses

Course 12. A System of Philosophy. An outline of the major problems; a comparison of the views of the greater philosophers; and an attempt to co-ordinate character by clarifying the aims and values of life.

Sept. 29: INTRODUCTION: The Uses of Philosophy
Oct. 6: EPISTEMOLOGY: The Mystery of Knowledge
Oct. 7: LOGIC: What Is Truth?
Oct. 14: Reason vs. Instinct
Oct. 21: METAPHYSICS: What Is Matter?
Oct. 28: What Is Life?
Nov. 4: What Is Mind?
Nov. 11: Is the Will Free?
Nov. 18: ETHICS: What Is Morality?
Nov. 25: Is Pleasure the Aim of Life?
Dec. 2: The Ethics of Love and Marriage
Dec. 9: The Ethics of Industry
Dec. 16: ESTHETICS: The Meaning of Beauty
Dec. 23: The Philosophy of Art
Dec. 30: A PHILOSOPHY OF HISTORY: From Bossuet to Voltaire
Jan. 6: From Montesquieu to Buckle
Jan. 13: Condorcet and the Idea of Progress
Jan. 20: Hegel on History
Jan. 27: The Economic Interpretation of History
Feb. 3: Carlyle and Nietzsche on Genius in History
Feb. 10: The Cycle of Civilization
Mar. 24: A PHILOSOPHY OF THE STATE: The Evolution of the State
Mar. 31: The Ideal of Liberty: Anarchism
Apr. 7: The Ideal of Equality: Socialism
Apr. 14: The Ideal of Order: Aristocracy
Apr. 21: The Myth of Democracy
Apr. 28: The Beautiful City
May 5: The Perfect State
May 12: The Road to Utopia
May 19: A PHILOSOPHY OF RELIGION: The Evolution of Religion
May 26: The Social and Individual Function of Religion
June 2: The Religion of the Greeks
June 9: The Religion of the Jews
June 16: Is Christianity Practicable?
June 23: A Definition of Deity

Course 13 at 7 p. m. Sundays; Course 14 at 8:30 p. m. Wednesdays. Single admission 50c; course tickets, $5.00, obtainable at the Desk (3rd floor).

Please keep this for reference

HOFFMANN SCHOOL for Individual Development

Libby Castle
Fort Washington Ave.
at 193d Street
New York City

DAY AND BOARDING SCHOOL

Children 4-12 Years

School Bus

New Home of Hoffmann School

Exchange—Sell—Buy

Something odd, rare; useful, ornamental. Try the classified section of The Nation. Your advertisement will be read by men and women of divers tastes, means and appreciation. For rates address Dept. E. S. B., The Nation.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1925 No. 3143

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 343
EDITORIALS:
Mr. Coolidge Faces a Test 346
"Protecting" America 347
The China Conference and After 347
"Native" Literature 348
SHALL STATE UNIVERSITIES TAKE "TAINTED MONEY"? By Zona Gale 349
THE PREDICAMENT OF AMERICAN LABOR. By Benjamin Stolberg 350
"MAY DAYS." By Genevieve Taggard 353
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 356
CORRESPONDENCE 357
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Carmichael. By Kenneth Fearing 359
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 359
Since John Stuart Mill. By Harry Elmer Barnes 359
A Timid Moralist. By Oswald Garrison Villard 360
Mrs. Wharton and Mr. Dreiser. By C. Hartley Grattan 361
Lord Raleigh. By Benjamin Harrow 361
A Good Subject. By Ernest Gruening 362
Books in Brief 363
Drama: These Charming People. By Joseph Wood Krutch 363
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
The Fight Against Fascismo. By Giovanni Giglio 365
De Bono and His Accusers 366

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

HAIL TO ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.! His triumphant run in the Wisconsin primary will hearten Progressives the country over and insure the continuance in the Senate of the insurgency of Wisconsin. Indeed, it foretells the displacement of Senator Lenroot next year by Governor Blaine—something devoutly to be wished. A chip of the old block the new Senator-to-be unquestionably is; his mental growth and the revelation of his latent ability delighted his friends throughout the campaign. Why not? He has had an excellent apprenticeship to one of the most high-minded and conscientious Americans who ever filled high office, and this training more than offsets his youth. The youngest federal Senator since Henry Clay he will be, and he will bring immediate strength and encouragement to the progressive wings of both parties. We have only one fault to find with him; that is that he has not a more radical and thoroughgoing political program. He has yet to learn that, as we pointed out in the last Presidential campaign, his father's policies in many respects are not adequate to the needs of the times. We cannot go back to the "trust busting" of the Roosevelt period; if further proof of that were needed, Mr. Coolidge has given it by his practical destruction of every one of the regulating agencies established as a result of the Roosevelt crusades. All of this can be worked out in due time. The present happy fact is that Wisconsin has remained true to the cause of reform and progress, has offered to a young man of admirable character and great promise a most unusual opportunity for distinguished service, and has given the first vigorous political check to Calvin Coolidge since his inauguration.

THE DEMOCRATS of the city of New York have purged themselves of Mayor Hylan and at the same time given what ought to be the coup de grace to the malign political activities of William Randolph Hearst. Despite the hundreds of thousands who read his papers, the character of this yellow journalist has long been thoroughly understood in New York City, and the opportunity to smash both Hylan and Hearst was one not to be resisted. The result foreshadows the easy election of Senator Walker as the next mayor of New York. We do not believe that New York will profit overmuch by the change, for the more we have studied Mr. Walker and his career the more dubious they seem to us. Undoubtedly the outcome makes Governor "Al" Smith more than ever the dictator of the Democratic Party of New York State, and as such the vote has a distinct bearing upon the next Presidential campaign. As for the Republican nominee, Mr. Waterman, his campaign has not impressed him upon the community as anything else than a well-meaning business man of the conventional type. So the imperial city of America, with more than six millions of people to draw upon, will probably be governed by a man who boasts that he has never read more than twelve books in his life, who does not represent labor or any other great group in the community, but is a typical product of Tammany Hall.

THE WASHINGTON ADMINISTRATION plainly has the fidgets in regard to the debts owed us by European governments, especially the money due from France. Several weeks ago, when Americans living in France had been criticizing the Washington attitude rather sharply, a semi-official statement was issued from the White House designed to stop such comment and Mr. Fish, a Representative in Congress from New York, even proposed to punish offenders under an eighteenth-century statute. On September 18 another semi-official announcement emanated from the White House asking the American press to refrain from criticism of the Administration's course during the progress of the negotiations for funding the French debt. The action is as pathetic as it is impudent. It is impudent because the Administration's stand on the debt is a public question which any individual has not only a right but a duty to oppose if he regards it as mistaken. The action is pathetic because it indicates that Washington is so unsure of its ground and so uncertain of public support that it is afraid of any stray dog's bark. Matthew Woll, vice-president of the American Federation of Labor, is "amazed" at President Coolidge's "audacity." We are not. Ever since, six years ago, Mr. Coolidge became a national figure through the dissemination of the falsehood that he saved Boston at the time of the police strike we have ceased to be amazed at anything concerning him. After so convincing a demonstration that the American people love to be humbugged, can he reasonably be expected to put his trust in sincere statesmanship?

IF THE ADMINISTRATION intended its announcement regarding Americans enlisting in foreign armies as a gentle disavowal of official approval of the American aviators serving France in Morocco its action may help. The Moslem world is very much aware of the American volunteers who are bombing native villages in the mountains of North Africa and it is natural that an anti-American movement has been taking form. If, however, the note to the American agent at Tangier, calling attention to a law against American enlistments in countries with which we have extra-territorial treaties, was intended to imply that Americans should not enlist for any cause they think right, then we deplore it. It is a narrow nationalism which thinks that a man should never serve any country but his own. The world has always honored Byron for his service in the cause of Greek independence a century ago; it will always honor young men who risk their lives in the service of any ideal. There are better ways of expressing courage, but if young Americans will follow the old blood-stained paths, they might find truer glory than in upholding the cause of an alien empire in Africa. Are there none of these adventurous young Americans who remember 1776?

THE UNITED STATES should by all means participate in the international conference to provide for control of the private manufacture of arms which will be held next year under the auspices of the League of Nations. At the same time we can only deplore the action of the British Government in blocking the call for an immediate disarmament conference proposed by the Dutch and Hungarian delegates at the Geneva Assembly. Every step taken for disarmament, for control of arms manufacture, even for the prohibition of the carrying of weapons by individuals is a step in the direction of international peace. While war is so profitable to certain classes of the population, while the ordinary citizen finds it comparatively easy to possess a weapon, while nations strive to outdo each other in the creation of new and costly articles of warfare, just so long will permanent peace be an impossibility. The British delegation, in opposing all the modest League moves toward disarmament, have done no service to their country. Sir Cecil Hurst protested that the resolution was unfortunate in providing for the immediate commencement of preliminary work toward the proposed conference. It was better, Sir Cecil argued, to leave the question of time to the discretion of the Council, so that an "auspicious moment" could be chosen. But the most auspicious moment is the present one. The way to disarm is to disarm; and the time to do it is now.

POSSESSION IS NINE POINTS of the law in the League of Nations, as in other frontier communities. The British, through their puppet state of Irak, are in possession of the Mosul oil fields, and accordingly the Council of the League, after ponderously weighing the anti-British findings of its own commission, with all the austere solemnity of a judge, was about to hand Mosul to Great Britain. The Turks made it plain that in their view such a decision went beyond the competence of the Council and was likely to mean war. The Council thereupon continued its profound deliberations, and soon reached a new conclusion, a very masterpiece of international statesmanship. It would refer the question of its own competence in the matter to the World Court at the Hague! The Turks did not agree to accept the conclusion of the World Court, and the British made polite threats of war if they did not, but for the moment trouble was averted. Mosul will cause more turmoil later, but the British, right or wrong, are still in possession; and doubtless in the next few months we shall hear many panegyrics of this sidestepping statesmanship—just as we did when the League bowed to Italy in the Corfu dispute.

WHILE SUGAR RETAILS in New York and Philadelphia at 6.2 a pound, San Francisco consumers must pay 7.1 cents, those in Denver 8, those in Butte 8.8. In the regions producing beet sugar, the chief beneficiaries of the tariff, prices are invariably higher than in the regions dependent on importations of Cuban cane. San Francisco, for instance, gets duty-free Hawaiian and Philippine cane, and beet sugar produced in California, yet must pay nearly a cent a pound more than New York. Salt Lake City, headquarters of the Mormon Church and its immensely profitable Utah-Idaho (beet) Sugar Company, must pay 1.8 cents penalty, although the sugar is manufactured at her very doors. Butte, in the center of a beet-sugar producing and manufacturing district, must pay a penalty even higher. Consumers in such districts bear not only the tariff impost, amounting to about two cents (of which less than half goes into the federal Treasury), but also an arbitrary imaginary freight rate from the Coast; the actual freight per pound of sugar from San Francisco to Salt Lake City, for instance, is .84, while the arbitrary charge is .9 cent. Even to fractions of a penny the tariff beneficiaries gouge the helpless consumer. Extortion in one form breeds another. It was for this kind of greed that President Coolidge expressed "the utmost solicitude" in his statement declining to reduce the tariff on sugar.

THE PEOPLE OF MAINE have just authorized by a decisive popular vote a means of obtaining power that has appealed to the imagination of man for centuries but has never been carried out on a large scale. They propose to put the tides on their coast to work. The idea is almost as old as the tides themselves. The latent power from this source all over the world is tremendous, but the practical difficulties are also immense. To harness the tides requires an installation of great initial expense, the burden of which may easily make the power more expensive than that obtained through the use of coal, especially in a country where the latter is plentiful. Besides, until recently, there have been no means for transmitting power over considerable distances except at prohibitive cost. But the plant which the voters of Maine have authorized Dexter P. Cooper to construct in Passamaquoddy Bay will have the advantages of modern means of transmission and will also make use of the tides at an especially strategic point. Owing to the funnel shape of the Bay of Fundy, the tides of Maine's eastern coast have an unusual rise and fall, and Mr. Cooper will be able to use the force of a drop of from fifteen to twenty feet in the turbines which he proposes to install. He expects to generate from 500,000 to 750,000 horse-power—more than is now developed at Muscle Shoals—and to supply electric power to a large area of the Northeastern United States. The experiment will be watched the world over.

THOSE WHO FIND the traditional two-party system in the United States too restricted may get some consolation from Mexico. By September 11 no fewer than 107 separate and distinct political parties had registered their intention to contend for offices in the municipal elections in the federal district of Mexico. Of these, thirty-four were in the city of Mexico and the others scattered through smaller municipalities in the district. Each of these parties has submitted the necessary number of signatures entitling it to a place on the local ticket. One hundred and seven parties, and each presumably with a program for saving the country from going to the dogs—or to the capitalists or the Bolsheviks or whoever seems to menace the country most! That these parties are all-important to their members may be surmised from the names. Leaving out of the count the parties of national repute, such as the Laborista and Agrarista and Civico Progresista, the list bristles with grandiose titles. Voting on the basis of euphony alone, the choice would be terrifyingly difficult. Partido Liberal Construcionista Radical de Mexico—one is tempted to stop right there and rush to the polls. But the fickle eye wanders and catches sight of other enticing names: Partido Estudiantil Independiente (Party of Independent Students), Partido Unificador Revolucionario, Partido Politico Union Revolucionaria Progresista, Partido Revolucionario Nacionalista, Partido Evolucionista Libertario de Mexico, Partido Radical Socialista, Partido Regional Socialista, and so on and so on. There is consolation in two parties!

THE STATEMENT BY CHAUNCEY DEPEW on his ninety-first birthday that he had never in his long and happy life played baseball, football, tennis, golf, or any other game will not give comfort to those who maintain that modern life is unpalatable without the sauce of exercise. Probably no life ever was, though the Greeks are said to have been wise in spending their best hours in the gymnasium. May not the Greeks, however, have got on so well because they set a high value upon the "moderation" which Mr. Depew adds is the only thing approaching a rule that he has followed? Or is it at all possible to say that one thing and one thing only contributes to the success of living? Athletics can kill as well as cure. Games which are tranquilizing to some persons are tiresome to others; and behind the well-developed chest of a two-mile runner there may be the sorriest rubbish of a heart. The moral would seem to be that games should be saved for those who are made happy by them, and that they should not be forced upon those whom they bore.

A UNIQUE SITUATION in American journalism has been created by the will of the late Victor F. Lawson of the Chicago Daily News. Mr. Lawson did not mention his great newspaper by name in his will, but turned it over with all his other assets to the trusteeship of the Illinois Merchants Trust Company. The president of that institution has declared that the paper will continue under its present able management. Under the will three-quarters of its earnings will go henceforth to benevolent, chiefly religious, purposes. "Here, indeed," says Mr. Mitchell of the trust company, "is a unique example of a newspaper not only serving good causes but continuing to carry on its owner's good work through the distribution of its earnings." It will be interesting indeed to see how this experiment develops. As long as its present management continues the News will be a conventionally conservative newspaper, and therefore it will in no wise come into conflict with the conservatism of the Illinois Merchants Trust Company. What would happen, we wonder, if some future editors should advocate governmental or economic policies, such as the national ownership of railroads, which the trust company deemed inimical to the welfare of this country? If the trust company keeps its hands off entirely, we shall have an interesting example of democratic newspaper management without the guidance of a direct ownership interest. If all of its income should eventually go to charity we should then have the example of a newspaper from which had been eliminated the motive of private individual profit. That experiment we need, for today the Jewish Forward stands almost alone as a paper in which the profit motive has been entirely excluded.

MEN'S RIGHTS begin to assert themselves, and curiously the new masculinists agree with the old feminists. Ten years ago a feminist who, separating from her husband, announced that she wanted no alimony, being as competent as any male to support herself, was regarded as a wild radical striking at the foundations of the old-fashioned home. Now it is Justice Selah B. Strong of the New York State Supreme Court who, refusing alimony to a childless woman, adopts the erstwhile feminist position, to protect men and the family:

> I truly believe [he said] that alimony keeps couples from being reconciled. The woman who is being supported by her husband under order of the court, generally speaking, is not very anxious to effect a reconciliation with him. . . . Imagine the predicament of a man who is compelled to pay temporary alimony for five years to a woman who hates him but will not divorce him. It is nothing short of slavery.

NEW YORK CITY lost two valuable citizens on one day, September 16, because of cruel accidents. Herbert Parsons and Seymour L. Cromwell were both born to large wealth, but recognized from the outset of their careers that money, like nobility, brings obligations, and gave themselves freely to public service. Mr. Parsons entered politics in the spirit of the reformer who seeks to change political conditions from within and met with some success. Serving two terms as Congressman—one of the few Representatives of vision, character, and ability the metropolis has sent to Washington in the last thirty years—he also became the benevolent despot of the Republican machine in New York City for four years. Mr. Parsons's fine quality may be best gauged by the fact that he threw away the chance of further political preferment by bolting his party on the League of Nations issue in 1920, thus putting principle above personal advantage. Moreover, he was that rare person in our American political life, a leader who had tolerance for and interest in the views of those who differed from him. Mr. Cromwell served for ten years as president of the New Jersey State Charities Aid and for years labored to reform the penal conditions in that State. But he was best known for his three years' service as president of the New York Stock Exchange, during which he did his utmost, with courage and ability, to purify and improve not only the Stock Exchange but the whole brokerage business. Men like these are too rare to make their deaths in the fifties easy to record.

Mr. Coolidge Faces a Test

THE President's return to Washington has given rise to varying journalistic interpretations of the political situation which confronts him. To some the prospects are of the best. Everything will be smooth sailing. He has wisely cut his legislative program to a minimum of which the important feature will be the ever-popular reducing of the taxes and, if he achieves nothing else, that will still be the best possible accomplishment for his party. He will, they say, dominate the new Congress as he did not control the old, and, with Congressional and Senatorial elections approaching, the members will be ready to do as the Chief Executive wishes.

That is an easy but superficial interpretation of the situation. Beyond doubt further tax reductions will make an appeal to many people. But that is not the whole of the story. As a matter of fact, the President faces the first searching test of his leadership since he took office. He now stands completely on his own feet. It is a new Congress which meets, and with greater control than he had over the last, he must once and for all show whether he has real capacity as a party leader and as a statesman. Merely to pass a tax-reduction measure will not satisfy the public or his own partisans. There is the question of our adherence to the World Court to confront him, and there are pressing economic issues which will not down if only because their existence in the Northwest threatens the return to Congress of a half dozen Coolidge Senators. The President failed lamentably last winter to show himself equal to the emergency when he attempted to force Congress to approve the nomination of Charles B. Warren as Attorney General. The question now is whether he will reveal sufficient power and aggressiveness to dominate a situation which is so full of pitfalls that a Washington correspondent describes it as a "maze of controversy, friction, and problems as important as have yet confronted him."

Besides the coming battle with Senator Borah over the World Court, the impending effort to settle the question of the payment of the French debt, and the question of railroad mergers, Mr. Coolidge still has an ugly fight on his hands in the Boulder Dam dispute despite the fact that in his first move, the appointment of a non-partisan committee from the upper Colorado basin States, he has demonstrated both skill and sagacity. For one thing, Secretary Wilbur is on record as being opposed to the very procedure which the President has adopted. Indeed, that gentleman has proved to be such a bull in the china shop and a man of such limited mentality (after the failure of the Hawaiian flight he was quoted as saying that that made no difference, as the navy had not expected to prove anything worth while anyhow) that many observers believe the President must sooner or later retire him to private life.

As for Mr. Work, the Secretary of the Interior, Senator Borah has already bearded the cat in regard to him. He has plainly told the President of the widespread dissatisfaction with the delays of the Secretary in the initiation of reclamation projects already authorized by Congress. He is understood to have spoken in behalf of Senators Cameron, Oddie, McNary, and Stanfield and members of the House from the States which contain extensive areas of public lands. In these there is widespread conviction that Secretary Work could tremendously improve the condition of settlers by modifying his regulations in regard to payments for water until the present farming crisis has passed and the farmers are able to meet their obligations. The Senators desire not so much Mr. Work's official scalp as an immediate improvement in administrative measures. So great is the unrest among stock-raisers, wool-growers, cattlemen, and ranchers that the outcome of this and other fights is bound to have a far-reaching effect in the States affected upon the future of the Senators who will come up for reelection in 1926. Among them are Gooding of Idaho, Stanfield of Oregon (arrested last week on what he, with others, declares to be a false charge of public intoxication), and Jones of Washington, with an election coming in North Dakota for a successor to the late Senator Ladd. The loss of even two of these three Senators, coming on top of the victory of the anti-Coolidge forces in Wisconsin, would be a severe blow to the President's prestige.

Even this is not the whole of the story. Mr. Butler, the President's manager, declares that there will be no touching of a single schedule of the tariff. But there is a growing demand in his own State for tariff increases—there is much unemployment in this State of heavily protected textile industries. The wool-growers desire still higher tariffs; on the other hand, particularly in the West, there is a growing movement among farmers and labor men for a tariff revision downward. For the first time the American Federation of Labor seems to be tackling the question of the tariff with genuine vigor. It is quite possible that the President will find himself unable to stem the demand for tariff revision, particularly in view of the fact that he has practically destroyed the effectiveness of the Tariff Commission. Indeed, his emasculation of the three great regulating commissions, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Tariff Commission, and the Federal Trade Commission, will inevitably subject him to a heavy fire during the coming session of Congress from the insurgents headed by Senator Norris and young Mr. La Follette. The renomination of Thomas F. Woodlock as Interstate Commerce Commissioner will bring up the question of the President's right to bargain with his appointees in advance of their nomination. So, too, will the case of Commissioner Haney of the Shipping Board, whose resignation Mr. Coolidge has requested but has not been able to obtain. Undoubtedly the President will drop him when his interim appointment expires. But the matter will not end there. Oregon is on fire over the shipping problem, and what adds to the misery of Senator Stanfield's situation is that Mr. Haney intends to run for the Senate on the Democratic ticket on this shipping issue. Sooner or later the President must face this question.

All of this, together with the coal strike, may spell endless trouble and embarrassment for the President. The fact that we are not to be in for what is called an era of good feeling, that is, a suspension of all political controversy, is, however, a good public omen. We have no sympathy with the desire of some people to adjourn Congress for two or three years and take a rest from politics. It is only by controversy and political conflict that democracy can hope to flourish and to progress.

"Protecting" America

SHAPURJI SAKLATVALA has become a figure of international fame. Millions, probably, who would never have heard his name if our nervous Secretary of State had not barred him from the United States, have become aware that an Indian Communist represents a London working-class district in the British House of Parliament and that he will not be permitted to denounce the British Empire within the loyal limits of the United States. Mr. Saklatvala may travel to Canada or South Africa or Australia and make as fiery speeches as he pleases; but in the United States he may not even land. Secretary Kellogg has barred him because his speeches were too red, and the Department of Labor, ransacking its files of deportation days, has found other excuses to back him up.

Some of us feel indignation at this silly act of petty suppression, reversing the time-honored American tradition of an open door to the oppressed of all nations. Today, apparently, Americans fear British revolutionaries more than the British do. For that some of us feel shame, but the ordinary newspaper reader will respond rather by curiosity than by anger. Who, after all, is Saklatvala, and what did he want to say? Mr. Kellogg has aroused an interest in him that did not exist. The Nation will print next week a brief article outlining Mr. Saklatvala's belief that for the sake of world peace the British Empire must be dissolved. This week we quote from the speech in Parliament which aroused such maudlin fear in the American Secretary of State. It is, indeed, imperative to quote it honestly, for Mr. Kellogg is apparently more than afraid. His citations from Mr. Saklatvala's speech give every appearance of being deliberately misleading. In his official statement Mr. Kellogg said that the question of Mr. Saklatvala's admission had been raised "on account of his inflammatory and revolutionary speeches." As an example he quoted from an address made by Mr. Saklatvala in the British House of Commons on July 9. We give below, in italics, the passages from that speech cited by Mr. Kellogg, and, in ordinary type, some of the fragments of sentences and context which he excised, apparently in order to deceive the American public:

> I plead guilty that I am at the bottom of many of the Communist manifestos and the Communist propaganda in India. I am not ashamed of it, and I say that my work is a hundred times more humanitarian than the work of all your missionaries and merchants taken together. Why are you taking this bigoted, narrow-minded view of life? You talk about agriculture. What do you discuss? "Shall Lancashire have more cotton from India than in the past?" "Shall England have more wheat from India than in the past?" That is said to be studying agriculture. I appeal to you to study agriculturalists and not agricultural profits. It is alleged that whatever is said in this House travels abroad and creates misunderstanding. Why be afraid of the truth being known abroad? I, as a Communist, as a true believer in internationalism, do not speak with the intention of offending, but with the intention of giving a shock to your mentality, so that you can think in terms of humanity instead of in terms of banking accounts and profits. . . .
>
> You are talking to the twentieth century in terms of eighteenth-century lawyers when you refer to [illegible] propaganda, sedition, and revolution. They are the birthrights of modern nations, and they are the birthrights of the modern Indians just as much as they were your birthrights. I, for one, will not yield to terrorism. I am going to carry on subversive propaganda, revolutionary propaganda, Communist propaganda, international propaganda, with the assistance of the Russians and the Chinese and the Germans and the British.

The reader may judge how accurately Mr. Kellogg's quotations represent Mr. Saklatvala's thought. We wish we had space to quote more of his passionate denunciation of British misrule in India. It was an eloquent and powerful speech, buttressed by facts and figures, for Mr. Saklatvala besides being a Communist was a successful and resourceful figure in the management of one of India's greatest steel works.

But, after all, beyond exposing the indecency of Mr. Kellogg's misquotation, the character of the speech is irrelevant. The fundamental question is whether the American people are grown up, or to be treated as children. Is their reading to be selected for them? Is a paternal government to choose for them what speakers they may hear? Are they not to be trusted to make up their own minds? All of which, boiled down, amounts to this: Is America to be a democracy, after all? The founding fathers had one answer to that question. The fidgety gentleman whom the Washington reporters call "Nervous Nellie" Kellogg has another, and Calvin Coolidge agrees with him. It is time to wake up. If there is any law permitting our bureaucrats to censor the opinions of visiting foreigners, it should be repealed; and if not, the bureaucrats should be set to more useful labor.

The China Conference and After

THE Conference on China which met at Baltimore from September 17 to 20 resulted in a most valuable exchange of opinions and in some conclusions which are bound to be genuinely useful in educating public opinion in this country. Contrary to some sensational newspaper accounts, there were no dissensions but merely the differences of opinion that ought to take place in every such gathering if it is to have vitality and vigor. Although there was much doubt as to whether the conference under the terms of its call was entitled to pass resolutions, it finally adopted by an overwhelming vote the report of one of its sub-committees as expressing the general sentiment of the conference. It was declared in this that extraterritoriality should be abolished and tariff autonomy be given to the Chinese at the earliest possible moment—the method and exact time was left, of course, to the conferences to be held on these subjects in Peking in October and December, but the necessity of prompt action was emphasized. More important still was the provision urging the United States Government to take a position of vigorous leadership in both these conferences and to proceed independently if the Powers did not move in the right direction with all promptness.

This is an admirable outcome of the conference, for this is precisely the policy that every true friend of the United States and China ought to advocate. The conference developed, of course, the historic difference of opinion to be found in every reform movement between those who believe that the most expedient policy is to do the right thing at once and those who are sure that the proposed action is right in principle but that one must be practical and not do the right thing just yet lest immediate action offend somebody, be taken as a criticism of some government, or jeopardize a few dollars. The business group at the China conference sincerely and earnestly championed the idea of delay, but when challenged to formulate a constructive policy to take the place of a ringing declaration in favor of immediate withdrawal—"immediate" meaning, of course, the time necessary to make reasonable readjustments—was unable to propose any constructive policy. The sentiment of the conference was fortunately overwhelmingly in favor of withdrawal and of placing China on an absolute basis of equality. The usual imperialist talk of governing a backward race in its own interest failed to convince.

Especially effective were the arguments of Nathaniel Peffer and Charles R. Crane; the latter warned the conference most solemnly that the situation in China is "slipping," that there is no time to be lost in doing the right thing by the Chinese if we are not to see genuine disaster in China. Other grave words as to the imminent danger of allowing things to drift and of continuing the present stupid policy of the Allied Powers carried their warning. Not the least effective of the arguments was that put forth by R. E. Diffendorffer, who spoke for the missionary bodies as the most important business organization in China, and declared for immediate withdrawal from the business point of view. It is not necessary to inquire now as to all the motives that led to this action; with some it was perhaps less a desire for right doing per se than a fear that if the wishes of the Chinese are not granted the foreigners may yet find themselves kicked into the seas and their luggage thrown after them. But the gratifying thing is that the right conclusion was arrived at, and by many out of the sheerest idealism and devotion to justice.

The timeliness of the conference was well illustrated by the speech made by Austen Chamberlain on September 18 in which he once more reiterated that England will not forward reforms until China has established a stable government throughout the length and breadth of its land—the same stupid position as that taken by our own government. From diplomats and Anglo-Saxon hypocrites may the Lord preserve us! That simply means that the question of restoring sovereignty to China would be postponed fifty years. If it is postponed for five months after the December conference tragic things are likely to happen, and meanwhile the British merchant for whom Mr. Chamberlain is so concerned is losing in Shanghai alone one million and a half dollars a day—one business man was frank enough to say that no amount of extraterritoriality was worth a million and a half dollars a day. Of course, the Powers have said nothing new whatever in their latest note; they said the same thing at the Conference for the Limitation of Armaments when nine nations declared that they were "prepared to relinquish extraterritorial rights when satisfied that the state of the Chinese laws, the arrangements for their administration, and other considerations warrant" them in so doing. They cannot continue to hold this position without waking up some morning to find that China has denounced all the extraterritorial provisions and assumed her own sovereignty. Then these so-called Christian nations will have to decide whether they propose to uphold their treaties by bloodshed. To prevent this disaster and the possibility of another World War finding its origins in China decent men and women in every country must now bend their efforts.

"Native" Literature

THERE exists a good deal of misconception upon the subject of "native" literature. Overzealous enthusiasts for nationalism are constantly decrying foreign influence and demanding that American literature shall be 100 per cent pure, even though they happen to be people who would shudder at that phrase and do not mean Ku Klux when they say American. Sometimes it is the fancied effect of the Russians upon Sherwood Anderson which disturbs them, sometimes merely a Gallic turn of thought or phrase in someone else; purely native themes and purely native thoughts are always the remedies prescribed. We are advised to turn our eyes away from Europe and even, sometimes, to seek for a really native past among the Indians.

As for the latter suggestion, nothing could be more highly artificial. Spiritually, we have today little more relation with the Indian than we have with the Hottentot, and whatever might have been possible in the earlier days when our forefathers could have brought themselves into contact with other living culture, only the archaeologist can profitably concern himself today with its fading remnants. Indian legends and Indian customs are hardly closer to us than the Chinese, and though, like the latter, they may serve for an exotic coloring, they are no part of our souls. Nor can the less fanatical advocates of a more vaguely defined native tradition educe from the history of literature much to support their case. Literature has always begun with an influence and a borrowing.

Greece, though her origins are lost in obscurity, undoubtedly borrowed from Egypt, and the literature of the Romans would have been, in all probability, nothing at all had they not been glad to take forms, thoughts, and aims from the Greeks. When Italian literature was born it was born because there were classics to be copied, and from Italy the influence passed through France to England, creating in each case a literature where no literature had been able to create itself. In later years France fructified both Germany and Russia, and in no great nation of Europe is there a national literature which is not also derivative. Chaucer owed his art to a visit to a strange land, Shakespeare certainly showed no exclusive preference for "native themes" and welcomed whatever "foreign influence" could reach him. Shall America alone of all the nations of Western Christendom be utterly self-sufficient, demanding someone more American than Shakespeare was English?

Ballads, legends, and sagas—these, perhaps, may be thoroughly native, but the spirit of self-conscious literature is always an importation. It is a sort of precious yeast carried from land to land and leavening a whole nation. It works in native material and is never a contamination. Whenever it germinates in a spirit really rich the product is genuine art, and when the only result is a flabby imitation without something wholly distinctive one may be sure that there was nothing there to be spoiled. Nor need anyone fear lest American literature should not be really American; wherever its authors borrow their leaven, their souls are bound, if they have any, to be their own. However hard he may have tried, Chaucer could not possibly become an Italian, and no American can cease to be an American, provided that he is, to begin with, anything at all. The only racial birthright which a man can renounce is one that he never really had.

Shall State Universities Take "Tainted Money"?

By ZONA GALE

[The University of Wisconsin recently refused a proffered gift from the General Education Board. Miss Gale, who as one of the regents of the university voted against accepting the money, discusses below the reasons for such action.]

THE propriety of the acceptance of subsidies by State-supported educational institutions has been brought into question once more by the recent action of the regents of the University of Wisconsin, who have passed, nine to six, the following resolution: "That no gifts, donations, or subsidies shall in future be accepted by or on behalf of the University of Wisconsin from any incorporated educational endowments or organizations of like character."

The opposition to this action, both by members of the board and by editorial comment in the press, is generally based on the following grounds:

That the incorporated educational endowments are giving large sums to educational institutions, and that the university or college which does not accept these gifts, and seek them, will find itself in a half century falling far behind those to whom such gifts are made.

That these great fortunes cannot better be used than to be put into the hands of State-governed institutions, which are conceivably less likely to be controlled than the smaller private institution, and by these State institutions employed in research work for human benefit.

That there are no "strings" attached to these gifts; that no stipulation whatever is made as to subject or method of teaching or type of instructor; and that these foundations not only do not seek but do not wish publicity for such donations.

That history shows centralized wealth invariably dispersed and in the mere course of events absorbed by the people; and that the making of these gifts, alike to State-supported and to private institutions, is but a wise and deliberate application of a process that will take place in any case.

Those who approve the passage of the resolution do so primarily for the two following reasons:

That the whole theory of democracy is involved. The acceptance of large sums of money, the world over, subjects the beneficiary to potential control.

That though private institutions are dependent on private endowments, State-supported institutions are dependent on the State. That this should be true of a State university just as it should be true of a State legislature, to which no offer of monopoly money for research, legal or social or otherwise, would for a moment be publicly countenanced; and, if such an offer is informally made and accepted and discovered, it is not named a benefaction. But the independence of the lawmakers of a State is no more vital to society than the independence of the university faculty and students. If ever we have a national university which is more than a national university in name, it will be supported by the government and not by the monopolies.

In considering the four specific grounds already cited, the supporters of the resolution hold:

First, that it is impossible to believe that State-supported education in the United States will fall behind if it continues to look for support to the States which created it; or that State-supported education in the United States will ever owe its progress primarily to monopoly money. But if there should be such a consummation, then it would be worth while to have remained a State university which has kept its self-determination at any price.

Second, that the words "tainted money" have not the chief emphasis, but rather the words "State-supported education." That if it were possible for monopolies to exercise perfection in their methods, State-supported education still should not look to them for bounty. Since these fortunes exist, they cannot be dispersed in a better way than to be used in human service, but none the less monopolies should be excluded from State-supported educational institutions. It is not so much the past of this money as its future influence which is in question, an influence which may be quite unintended on the part of those who have come by such fortunes.

Third, that the fact that there are no "strings" attached to these gifts and that the educational corporations do not wish publicity for their gifts has nothing to do with the real objections, which go far deeper. One of these objections was voiced by Professor Josiah Royce in a paper read at the first meeting of the Association of American University Professors, and was based on a report on Middlebury College, Vermont, by one of the educational foundations. His was the fear of standardization, of the loss of what he called a "wise provincialism in education." The relations between State control and private benefactions he regarded as among "the most various and the most delicate with which academic life has to deal." Any such far-seeing discussion of the academic objections to such benefactions reveals by implication that the crude method of "strings" is not one which can enter this situation as a measuring-rod. But the academic danger of standardization is to many not so important as the social danger pointed out in 1915 in the report of the Federal Industrial Relations Committee appointed by President Wilson, which found that "the domination by the men in whose hands the final control of a large part of American industry rests is rapidly being extended to the control of education and public service in the United States; and one of the means of the exercise of this control is by the endowment of colleges and universities, and by the creation of funds for the pensioning of teachers." Any mere stipulation as to type of professor or of teaching or of method could never approach in importance the tacit influence exercisable by the gift of several hundred thousand dollars to a department—and by the hope of more. The whole matter is far more delicate and difficult to weigh and to balance than might be a situation which merely had to deal with anything so obvious as stipulations or conditions. Really, one's sympathy is with the faculties. It is bad enough to be regulated by boards of regents and an occasional act of legislation, without taking aboard potential monopoly control too.

Fourth, it is true that these fortunes will in time be absorbed by the people, and that all centralized wealth will be dispersed and will sink back into the treasury of the race. In an address this year before the Wisconsin Bar Association, Dr. John R. Commons pointed out the slow transformations and stabilizations in this regard which have already taken place, and that to such adjustment in the future we have certainly to adapt ourselves. This certainty, however, does not imply the desirability of all specific transformations. A certain deliberate selectiveness in transformations is to be conceded, and it is of the essence of our new insight in social control that we can hasten or deter some such transformations, both social and economic. The constructive thought of the world has lately agreed upon the sovereign importance of free schools, free from every obligation save to State or municipality. In our slow and painful process of decentralizing wealth there is no occasion to enlist State-supported educational institutions nor to make them dependents.

And here is observable the application of the democratic principle that no matter how much better administered an institution may be whose wheels run smoothly under outside control, direct or indirect, intentional or accidental, there are to be preferred the jolts and cranks and delays of a government propelled from within. There is to be preferred, too, the popular psychology which arises from self-support.

If anything is American, this is American. To that policy we in this country are committed—or we think that we are—in government. In State-supported education we really are committed to it.

Thus the substance of the position of those supporting the anti-subsidy resolution at Wisconsin University is this: That for State educational institutions to look to the monopoly system for any part of their support is consonant neither with the free public-school idea nor with the democratic ideal.

The Predicament of American Labor

By BENJAMIN STOLBERG

I. The New Unionism

THE new unionism is rapidly passing from a fashion to the major strategy of American labor. Since 1920 thirty-three labor banks have been opened, with an aggregate initial capitalization of $10,250,000, commanding resources ten times as large. The investment companies of the Locomotive Engineers, capitalized at $24,000,000, demand a good deal more administrative attention than their labor policy. The unions are revamping their old mutual benefit and burial associations into modern unemployment, health, life, accident, old age, and group insurance companies. Labor is going into personnel administration, scientific co-management, medical social work, and not merely into cooperative but even into commercial business. Workers' education is busily extending its curriculum in this highly respectable proletcult. There is no end of educators, experts, and technicians who would thus liberate the worker on the technological instalment plan, revolution-proof, into his full industrial citizenship.

Of course, technical competence is even more essential to industrial democracy than it is to our present industrial plutocracy, which feeds primarily on waste. But, by definition, technique is but a means. And like all means it is a double weapon. Just in so far as the new unionism is not being watchfully used as a means to conquer and control an adverse industrial environment, it is broadening into an avenue to escape it. Its technology is in grave danger of becoming merely a body of rationalizations, with a growing "expert" bureaucracy to administer these rationalizations. The new unionism is a road to freedom only to the degree to which it is militantly vigilant of the protective character of the labor movement. Otherwise it is a detour into the anarchy of competitive industry.

This vital commonplace is easily checked up. The Amalgamated Banks are distinctly strengthening the militancy of the men's clothing workers by investing only in enterprises sympathetic to the labor movement and by aiding their own membership on a quasi-Morris Plan in times of stress. The Locomotive Engineers, on the other hand, have gone so indiscriminatingly into the general credit system that, at least in one instance, their financial interest in a large Eastern railroad made them forego their bargaining responsibilities. Though the late Warren S. Stone was, to my mind, right in the particulars of his quarrel with John L. Lewis of the miners, he was egregiously wrong in going into bituminous production in a largely unorganized field, whence he could not possibly compete in the open market without disgraceful labor consequences. The Cloth Hat, Cap and Millinery Workers have wisely forced their employers to be the sole contributors to an unemployment fund, which is entirely administered by the union; for unemployment should be wholly the employer's risk. The larger needle trades, on the other hand, are taking at least some chances of emasculating their militancy in the direction of a cooperative unemployment dole.

The Brookwood Labor College is doing excellent work in so far as it is training reasonably permanent trade unionists in applied trade unionism. But many labor colleges and classes, by duplicating the cultural work of other institutions under the captious illusion that learning goes with class, are merely contributing—paradoxically enough—to the escape of their students from the labor movement. And technical cooperation with the employer is good labor strategy only if the worker's increased efficiency, and fatigue, are registered not merely in the purely sedative stabilization of his personal employment but in a sensitively correlated bonus. In this sense, the guaranteed efficiency of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers is a realistic policy, for they get paid even for experimental operations. The B. and O. Plan in the railroad shops, however, is slowly proving to be largely an opportunist strategy, with most of the opportunities being woven into the network of the carriers. Its claim of stabilizing employment in the long run is based on notoriously illusory economics; it is primarily the scientific management of the market, and not of the job, which equalizes and distributes work.

Along with the official new-union development there are a score of private organizations moved by technical goodwill toward the workers. Of these the Labor Bureau is by far the most effective. It is an economic research corporation of invaluable service to the trade unions. But most of these private bodies—"workers' bureaus" for recreation, health, film service, research societies on What Christ Would Do About It, labor secretaryships in the birth-control and pacifist movements—are apt to be more officious than legitimate.

In brief, the new unionism must not be judged merely as a technology. Any new strategy in a militant movement must be judged first on the score of its infusion of a new morale and only secondarily on the score of its specific contribution.

II. The Real Story

The truth is that American labor has never been, relatively, so weak, so utterly deflated and yet restless spiritually, so vitally endangered economically, so inarticulate and unrepresented politically, so torn and bruised by factional bitterness and worse, since the early nineties, if then. This sad plight is the sole topic among the rank and file and the real worry of the leaders. The United Mine Workers, our largest, most basic, most powerful, and historically most militant union, is fighting for its very life in the soft-coal fields. By present indications it is fighting a losing battle. It is, indeed, under a purely political leadership engaged in a defeatist struggle. Instead of bending every effort upon organizing the unorganized fields, the Lewis administration has been consolidating, since 1920, its political machine in the already organized fields. The Jacksonville Agreement of 1924 is a mere paper agreement, which disables the majority of coal operators in the Central Competitive Field from competing with the scab mines of West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee. Mr. Lewis agrees with Secretary Hoover, rightly, that there are twice too many mines and twice too many miners. But by squeezing the organized field he is merely driving the coal market into open-shop arms openly extended. The open-shop operators in West Virginia, Kentucky, and Tennessee—who are paying only $2.50 as against the day wage of $7.50 in the organized field, who have a better quality of coal and a favorable freight rate—are now forming a half-a-billion-dollar corporation, whose increased efficiency is bound to disrupt the organized market still further. The bituminous miners, of whom a fluctuating 60 per cent are working, work only between twelve to fifteen hours a week, and these few hours are rent by sporadic strikes of unrest. Secretary Mellon has just put his extensive coal properties into the open shop. West Virginia is unorganizable within the measurable future. In the much smaller anthracite industry, one of our few really profiteering industries, the miners may conceivably get the check-off at the compromise of a 10 per cent wage increase. Never, since the foundation of the union in 1890, has there been such a profound and ominous apathy among the rank and file.

But when we look into the unions which are in the vanguard of the new unionism, conditions are not much more hopeful. The Locomotive Engineers are gradually cementing themselves away from the labor movement by a trade-union capitalism, which is unconsciously suppressing its trade-union psychology. In fact, the "aristocratic" train-service brotherhoods, whose "concerted movement" of over a quarter of a century was tending toward some sort of sodality, if not solidarity, of railroad labor, have gone back to the crassest craft separatism. The International Ladies' Garment Workers Union—which has an excellent educational department, two banks, an unemployment-insurance fund, a health center, and even a summer resort—is nevertheless now in a more precarious position than ever before. The Communists, who are irresponsibly disruptive in their attack on its present leadership, are merely taking advantage of the deep unrest which is agitating the members. The market of the industry is seriously disorganized by the influx of parasitic jobbers, the union is torn by bitter strife, the curse of gangsterism is difficult of eradication, contractual relations with the employers are handled unskilfully, and dual unionism is raising its hydra head against an administration of which the chief redeeming feature is that its good intentions equal its inability to face its post-war problems.

Factionalism, recondite jurisdictional quarrels to the bitter end, craft fixation, and jealousy are on the increase throughout our labor movement. Since their disastrous strike in 1922 the railroad shop crafts have lost 175,000 members, the machinists leading with a loss of 101,000. Yet President Johnston of the machinists has still further courted this pernicious anemia by "suspending" Vice-President Anderson from the organization, though Anderson's strength was evidenced by the fact that in the recent election he received 17,076 votes for the presidency as against Johnston's 18,021. Anderson's crime lay in his accusation that he was counted out. That his accusation was not fantastically slanderous was brought out by the report of the two official Grand Lodge tellers, one of whom was a Johnston appointee, who "found . . . that the ballots . . . (were) irregular, illegal, and in some cases fraudulent." In the carpenters', in the Illinois miners', in the railway clerks' unions the recent elections were conducted with equal bitterness, accompanied by "suspensions" of the opposition. Never before in the history of American labor has its leadership acted so overtly on the presupposition that the labor movement is its vested interest.

The American Federation of Labor is also gradually drifting into the new unionism. It is going into labor banking, it has accepted the affiliation of the Workers' Education Bureau, it is working out a plan of life insurance, the American Federationist has changed its make-up into the semblance of an academic journal and it prints four articles on technical industrial problems for each one on labor policy. Yet, since 1920 the A. F. of L. has lost a little over 1,200,000 members, which is almost exactly the number gained by the company union movement during the same period, a shift which is by no means unconnected. But in spite of this shift, President Green refused an auspicious request by President John Gross of the Colorado Federation of Labor to aid in the organization of the Pueblo Steel Works, which operate on a company union basis. His reason was that he could not infringe on the autonomy of the sixteen executive bodies involved in the sixteen crafts in the steel industry. President Green, personally a liberal and decent man, also had to countenance the recent strike-breaking of the United Garment Workers in Chicago against the Amalgamated Clothing Workers, whose control of the men's clothing trades is still officially "outlawed." All his public pronouncements emphasize that labor means no trouble, that it is anxious to cooperate with capital, with state and church and school. Not that labor should not as far as possible work with all these forces. But it certainly is not the burden of the labor movement to sign gentlemen's agreements. Its burden is to protect the worker and to cooperate with other social groups within and not without this protective tariff of his life and labor.

Mr. Green's Fabianism expresses the general depression of labor. Everywhere it is forced to "give away conditions," if not contractually then by an enforced reinterpretation of work rules, which invariably deflate the pay envelope. Here and there wages are being cut even in the organized trades, or they are maintained at the cost of locked-out employment. The mean average real wage of the organized worker has been practically stationary since the armistice. The unorganized workers, on the other hand, whose treatment always reflects the respect in which organized labor is held by the employer, have received terrific wage cuts within the last year. In short, the fatalistic optimism that American labor is "awakening" to its responsibilities is merely the illusion of our hectic day that to do is also to accomplish.

III. Why the Bankruptcy?

In a more illuminating sense, leaders do not lead but express a movement. The present bankruptcy of American labor can not be blamed entirely on its hierarchy. It lies in certain historic maladjustments which labor suffered during the growth of our great industry.

American history is best understood as a succession of rapid and overlapping social frontiers. The conquest of the national domain, begun by the agrarian pioneer, was actually closed by another class, the industrial-capitalist adventurer. And before he could complete the logic of his exploitation to its present culture, he had to meet the resistance of labor on the industrial frontier. Roughly, the Gompers era—from the eighties to the World War—laid the pioneer foundations of American labor. In his own person Gompers supremely expressed the guerrilla chieftain. Pugnacious, bigoted, uncivilized, extraordinarily human, incorruptible, and loyal, he held the lesser autonomous trade-union chiefs by the sheer force of his morale. Day in and day out he fought a catch-as-catch-can battle for better hours, wages, work rules—striking, sniping, picketing, and retreating with a vigilance which bespoke genius. And in his ignorance of social theory he actually confused this simple opportunism with the highest form of "philosophical anarchism."

But the price of these bush-whacking tactics, necessary as they were, proved to be usurious. It meant that all "intellectuals" within the labor movement had to be knocked on the head, for the intellectual* was temperamentally for a more synthetic strategy which might accelerate labor to meet the rapid consolidation of capital. Gompers identified such philosophies with "radicalism." And he spent most of his time in keeping the intellectuals out of the labor movement, half-consciously tolerating enough "old-time" trade-union Socialists to form a weak left wing in the American Federation of Labor, so that he might use their opposition as a permanent counter-reformation against the more reactionary of his fellow-leaders.

Due to this enforced arrested development, the intellectuals actually did remain steeped in that utopian sectarianism which characterizes all early social movements. The by-ways of American labor are strewn with the bones of all kinds of populist Holy Rollers, of half a dozen different Socialist denominations, of two I. W. W. sects, of anarcho-syndicalisms which constantly swayed "back to nature" and forward to the industrial union. The more practical among the intellectuals joined the social-reform movement, under the fond illusion that they could gnaw the hand that fed them into a stump helpless against the working class. The result was that both the radical intellectual and the liberal intellectual were effectively out of the labor movement. Labor had to rely on its own intellectual resources, which, however, were daily fine-combed by an environment in which ability was far more generously appreciated elsewhere. Accordingly, American labor has grown up during the last half century into one of the most naive of all labor movements, trying to function in the most industrial of all countries.

Still, during the decade just before the war, the sheer pressure of experience and the still greater pressure of capitalist consolidation began to educate the laborocracy toward the need of some sort of inner harmony. The labor frontier was beginning to settle in spite of the "cultural lag" of its leaders. The business agent, the walking delegate was still—and for that matter is yet—the omnipotent and omnignorant "Grand Lodge officer" of the union. Even now, the "organizer," whose anti-intellectual tradition has prevented his personal cultivation, performs most of the intellectual functions of the movement. He keeps the books, he draws up contracts, he edits the labor press, he is the "legislative agent." None the less, at the turn of this century suicidal "jurisdictional disputes" were increasingly settled by the simple device of the big union swallowing the little one. Hysterical craft separatism was tending, if not toward industrial unionism, at least toward that nominal craft federalism which is typified in the different industrial "departments" of the A. F. of L. The concerted movement in the Railroad Brotherhoods looked very hopeful. The banker, who was gradually displacing the industrialist, was met at least with "programs" for the nationalization of the basic industries. Labor was gradually beginning to feel its concerted strength.

The war upset all this. During the war the government gave labor a powerful opiate of propaganda, which inspired it with roseate visions of its place in "a world made safe for democracy." The A. F. of L. hitched its machine to the time-machine of the Wilsonian crusade. But when the war was over labor had to face one paramount fact: American capital, in eighteen short months, had swollen into the imperial creditor of the world. And, in proportion, labor's power had been deflated into next to nothing. The series of open-shop drives after the armistice, whose "openness" consisted entirely in its brutal frankness, took away most of labor's wind. And its defensive strikes acted as a boomerang. During the height of the open-shop attack organized labor was losing 90,000 members a month. Between the armistice and the La Follette campaign it was losing a mean average of 200,000 members annually. From these terrific blows in the economic field it staggered into the political arena. Even Gompers "non-partisanly" came out for La Follette. But in the political field it found big business no less intrenched. Yet the very complexity of the post-war period forced upon labor ever greater technical responsibilities. And so it invited the "tired radical" to give up both his fatigue and his radicalism and join the labor movement as an "expert."

* By the term "intellectual" I mean the man or woman of formal education, usually from the middle class, who joined the interests of labor in the belief that it is the only efficient instrument for industrial democracy; and who, therefore, derives his character as a social function of the manual worker.—The Author.

In the meantime the Russian revolution, by refraction, had completely blinded whatever indigenous left wing we had in the labor movement. The I. W. W., who had growled on its rim for a dozen years, shrank from about 50,000 to a measly 12,500. The old Socialist Party, which had been allowed to function as the administration's whipping boy in the A. F. of L., was almost completely knocked out by the Communists. The intelligent minority in the party, of course, would not join the Children's Crusade of the American Bolsheviks. And so they, as well as most of the other radical intellectuals, ran under the protecting wings of the labor oligarchy. They joined the A. F. of L. both economically and politically—from the left. The liberal intellectuals joined it, mostly as experts, from the right. And the labor boss is still supreme.

Indeed, the labor movement is today more boss-ridden than ever before. The general deflation makes organization campaigns and inner concerted movements almost impossible. And so the leader is trying to hold on through politics. The pre-war concerted movement is dead. Craft separatism is once more flagrant. And, to a large degree, the new unionism is but a new song-and-dance to pacify the masses, to fight insurgency, and to counteract the welfare work of the employer.

The new unionism is also a reflection in the world of labor of our new idolatry of the scientific methodist. The social-reform movement is pasteurizing the milk of human kindness in community chests, foundations for mutual investigation, organizations for further organizing—with an abracadabra as technical as the theory of equations. The "social gospel" of religious modernism is equally "scientific" in its apologetics. The educational psychologists are bureaucratizing education through mental tests and new examinations from kindergarten to the doctoral degree. All these officious rigmaroles have, of course, nothing to do with bona fide science. But big business is cleverly exploiting them in terms of welfare work, employees' representation schemes, personnel administration, and the other trimmings in the windows of the open shop. The labor movement will instinctively save the new unionism from being subverted to these ends. But at present the line of demarcation between the new unionism and the new philanthropy is very hazy.

IV. The Hope of the New Union

No one in his senses will quarrel with the fundamental educational and technical aspirations of the new union. In this country industrialism has progressed too intricately to be guided by the example of the Russian revolution. The fundamental instinct of the new union that the American worker must work out his problems on and through and with his job is sound; for his genuine control of the job is ultimately bound to have a straightening effect upon the crazy market of competitive production. But the new union can develop into the receiver of our bankrupt labor movement only if it shifts toward the left. It must, and in the nature of industrial society it likely will, become an instrument to raise labor's standard of living, to organize the unorganized, to abolish "jurisdictional disputes" among the crafts which have to be revamped into modern industrial organizations. It should by all means "collaborate" with the employer, but on terms of a mutual guaranty and not on the theory of the Golden Rule. For through the alchemy of profit even its gold is transmuted into dividends.

"May Days"*

By GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

THE four years' task of choosing three hundred poems for the Masses Liberator Anthology of Verse took me over and over the old bound volumes, and brought me face to face with a continuity—and a severance.

That is, I stepped back abruptly through the looking-glass into a literary and political world that seemed both familiar and strange—a preposterous world, but never for a moment an alien one. What I saw had the same fascination that the face of your father at the age of sixteen has, when you come upon it peering from an album, for the first time after years of preoccupation with your own generation. Of course, only part of father's face is here. To put the whole portrait together I would have to get files of Others, Seven Arts, and the Little Review; find pictures of the first suffrage parades, and the speeches of social reformers reported in the New York Times; follow the editorial risings and sinkings of The Nation and the New Republic; and see, by some act of the imagination, the expression on the faces of the crowds who went to the Armory Show in 1912 to watch the Nude descend the stairs.

A war and a revolution and five or six famines have something to do with the severance I felt. Behind the human extremity of those slow war years we discover the preceding period in parade down Fifth Avenue: white horses, purple banners, and a phalanx of well-shod middle-class women, demanding—and getting—the ballot! Elsewhere, a little off the center, we find Frank Tanenbaum and Arturo Giovannitti stirring liberal opinion with the news that, for a few in the commonwealth at least, this is not quite the best possible world. Behind them, the shadow of Upton Sinclair, who, perhaps all by himself, hatched this germ of middle-class discontent during the muck-raking period just preceding when he jerked double the respectable consumer of Chicago slaughter-house meat; acute stomach-ache hit a hypochondriac nation and an uneasy idea grew: Perhaps even for the middle class this was not the best possible world—

> Factory windows are always broken.
> Something or other is going wrong.
> Something is rotten—I think, in Denmark . . .

* This article was written as an introduction to the Masses Liberator Anthology of Verse to be published this fall by Boni and Liveright.

That was the state of mind. Something was wrong. Probably in Denmark. Where else? Not terribly wrong. Just wrong enough to insure a holiday.

And the holiday had numerous events and several attractive features. There was zealous social work, backed by optimistic social theory; humanitarian crusades abounded, gracious amateur movements made a mushroom growth. This activity was never ruthless or bitter, but earnest, idealistic—always Christian.

Our awakening was like us. There was not much reflection or arduous labor. Austerity and desperate struggle were absent. It was a happy, well-bred, and lively society, although it desired to be much more. The air was clear and exciting and the hour was the hour of seven on a spring morning. May days, indeed. . . . Dignity was not the fashion. Boredom, ennui, were not the fashion. There was so much to be said, done, thought, seen, tried out. The youth of the land was getting out of doors and all winter taboos were being broken:

> [illegible]
> But to be young was very heaven.

It was easy to read the Masses in those days. I say easy after following all the indignant letters protesting against Carl Sandburg's Billy Sunday or Billy Williams's Ballad (G. B. S. was one of the protestants that time) or Floyd Dell's articles on birth control. It was easy in spite of all the shock it gave the college-professor, college-student audience, because its shock was pleasurable for those who could stand it and centered chiefly on breaking down prudery and traditional dogma. It hit few class or economic sore spots—not because it did not aim at them but because class fear in the reader had not been genuinely aroused. If he could skip the fine print of Max Eastman's monthly Knowledge and Revolution he could swallow the rest—usually. At any rate this early reader seldom began to fidget, fearing bloody upheaval, seeing himself, wife, [illegible] a great idea. The magazine was so obviously the voice of a harmless minority. Although its editor pounded away at the distinction between reform and the seizure of economic power by the working class, he failed to keep them separate in the mind of the middle-class intellectual because events themselves had not yet made them separate.

Because this magazine of rebellion was edited, in spite of its title, for the bourgeois liberal, to give him the freedom he had grown needy of, and because, although it did talk in a very specific and realistic tone of voice about the proletariat, it did not talk to the proletariat, scoffers said, rightly enough:

> They draw nude women for the Masses,
> Thick, fat, unsightly lasses—
> How does that help the working [illegible]

When it came to it—really helping the working classes a little later—scoffers, along with the bulk of the other readers, found the magazine exceedingly hard to read. But by that time they were not confined to the Masses any longer. That early note of gleeful scorn for the bourgeois and his lady, his ideas about sex, literature, art, politics, furniture, et cetera, has been the cue for nearly all the best [illegible]. The 500,000 Americans who eat [illegible] "61st Street" in 1920, and "Main Street" in 1921, [illegible] in 1925, [illegible] Masses with chuckles of delight, if they could get them. Lewis, Lardner, and Ferber are not as hard nor as clear as their spasmodic original. Sherwood Anderson, John Dos Passos, Edmund Wilson, John Howard Lawson, and Eugene O'Neill would have written, Masses or no Masses, but they would have had to spend more time under water grubbing along on the floor of the ocean if the dredging had not begun earlier. The little magazine taken over by John Sloan's group for the publication of its drawings and gradually altered into a news letter for the hungry idealist had as curious a range of contributors as of readers. Gelett Burgess, Inez Haynes Gillmore, William English Walling, Lincoln Steffens, Amy Lowell, Jimmie Hopper, Will Levington Comfort, Mary Heaton Vorse, Harry Kemp, Sherwood Anderson, Howard Brubaker, Ernest Poole, Charles Edward Russell, Witter Bynner, Irwin Granich, William Rose Benét, J. E. Spingarn, Margaret Widdemer—if this rabble made up its contributors, you ask, just what was the magazine as a whole trying to say? Nevertheless the family was congenial. Because its foe was so imperious and so vast it found more likenesses than differences within its ranks. The widest implications of even a revolutionary doctrine may throw a grateful shade in a great desert. Reginald Wright Kauffman and Pablo Picasso lay down together between the same editorial sheets.

It takes very few individuals to make a new age or explode an old one. That is, if the individuals themselves have hold on a vital substance. For me, and I think for numbers of others, there were few people writing in America in 1913 with the desire for a realistic grasp of our life as a whole. Creative artists dare not bite off more than they can chew; accordingly the novelists of the day who were in love with America were deliberately seeing the country as a confusion of parts, and choosing for themselves one part of the many. So far as I know there were only three people then who saw what we all see now—the identity of the land. At any rate only three registered themselves indelibly: Max Eastman, Jack Reed, and Floyd Dell. They were more than three people merely when you put them in close contact: They drew to themselves a swarm of excellent artists and social satirists—Max Eastman, realistic philosopher and poet; Floyd Dell, teacher and intimate psychologist; Jack Reed, man of action and human symbol for the time. Seen thus, working together, they are for America the most significant group that ever managed to dominate, for a time, an entire generation. They, and the Masses as their instrument, were of tremendous importance for every young middle- or working-class person just then coming alive within their radius. Their recorded sense of contemporary life has been a storehouse to which the diverse and quarreling publicist world has gone for its energy—the liberal editors of the New York World, Vanity Fair's humorists, Amalgamated organizers and pamphleteers, the New Republic's decorous contributors, The Nation's earnest ones, and the present proletarian intellectuals who conduct the Daily Worker, all have to some extent consciously or unconsciously reflected Masses-Liberator tutelage.

What was it they did? Well, to begin with, all three of them, although they would deny it, gave up being single-minded artists. They had started, all, as poets (which they might also consider unimportant) when something else caught them. They became obsessed by the unity of our life, the dance of it, and when they found themselves, after following the dance with abandon for a time, they were no longer poets—merely. In them was a fatal social-mindedness that made being artists a temptation which they put aside, somewhat reluctantly, for pressing matters in hand.

Floyd Dell expresses the struggle best in his own words. His writing abounds with the phrase "escape from reality"—the "escape" being preoccupation with a fantasy, or, as we put it, the writing of a great poem, a great novel, a great play. That was the temptation he and his companions resisted. They turned their backs on "escape" in the Masses days.

And to what purpose? There was this America—its politics, love life, industry, humor, architecture, education, poetry, dancing, clothing, drama, sport, language. . . . When the Masses group, cartoonists, artists, and editors, touched these subjects it was their combination of sophistication and naivete that made what they said so difficult to resist. These were in just the right proportions; they allowed part of the soul to remain childlike while another part acquired worldly wisdom, and discovered its delicious heritage of homely sound sense. The native shrewdness, the drawling humor that is called American because Mark Twain and Mr. Dooley and Abraham Lincoln had it, was coming up through the outlet afforded by this magazine, under layers of surface solemnity. The Masses set up its little tent between the two most social-minded tendencies then active in the American community—between the group that was liberal but Christian and the group that was rational but dull. It entertained them both with blithe impudence, being to some extent the child of both. The parents looked on as modern parents do, in awe of the little creature. Presently the child found its mission—that of de-bunking the society into which it had been born. A point of view known as Marxian, hitherto expressed in this land chiefly in undomesticated foreign gutterals, became, when simplified and translated into the idiom of Lincoln and Jefferson and Tom Paine, the new Yankee wisdom—shrewd, racy, materialistic.

And the awakening came none too soon. The world moved threateningly beneath everybody's feet. Big strikes, outrages; the Mooney case, the McNamara case; a nest of textile strikes shoved it on. Much grist for the mill, and good honest grinding. The European war stretched across the Atlantic. Holiday time almost over. It wasn't all going to be a battle of ideas, no indeed. A long way to Tipperary, Chicago slaughterhouses, Isadora Duncan dancing, and the bright, eager faces of suffrage parades glittering down the great avenues, Fifth, Michigan, Commonwealth. The Masses had a movement on its hands—people following, going where it led. It had created that following and now it had to take it some place. And a fight coming—America came into the war.

The world, abandoning even liberal Christianity and rationalism, went off its head. The Masses folks saw the spectacle. They knew that something might be done—but what, exactly? They kept their balance—if nothing else—in a world that began to whirl faster than a merry-go-round. Until Wilson's second election their heads were clear and until their trial most of alert young America was going to school in the Masses office.

When the trial came the three men tugged in separate directions and the triangle cracked.

Mr. Glintenkamp had drawn two pictures, and an assistant editor had printed them, while Max Eastman and Floyd Dell were away, busy in the larger turmoil. The Liberty Bell in collapse made a frontispiece; another, entitled Conscription, a few pages over. The magazine for August was refused the mails. In October followed another picture by the same artist, a naked young man with a too beautiful young face, a skeleton measuring him. Hot stuff. But they had all been doing hot stuff for years—Art Young, Boardman Robinson, Clive [illegible], Robert Minor, Margaret Becker, Cornelia Barns, John Sloan, George Bellows. Only suddenly it wasn't simply hot [illegible]. It was treason.

Or so it became apparent—slowly, in spite of a cordial letter from President Wilson, visits with George Creel, and the decision of one judge in their favor. The post office [illegible] time, and then, when the Masses went to court for the lost mailing privileges, turned swiftly and brought about the [illegible].

The next spring, in April, 1918, Max Eastman, Floyd Dell, Art Young, Merrill Rogers, and Josephine Bell were

Two Poems by Max Eastman

The Lonely Bather

Loose-veined and languid as the yellow mist
That swoons along the river in the sun,
Your flash of passion pale and amber-kissed
With years of heat that through your veins have run,

You lie with aching memories of love
Alone and naked by the weeping tree,
And indolent with inward longing move
Your slim and sallow limbs despondently.

If love came warm and burning to your dream,
And filled you all your avid veins require,
You would lie sadly still beside the stream,
Sobbing in torture of that vivid fire;

The same low sky would weave its fading blue,
The river still exhale its misty rain,
The willow trail is waving over you,
Your longing only quickened into pain.

Bed your desire among the pressing grasses;
Lonely lie, and let your thirsting breasts
Lie on you, lonely, till the fever passes,
Till the undulation of your longing rests.

A Modern Messiah

Scarred with sensuality and pain
And weary labor in a mind not hard
Enough to think, a heart too always tender,
Sits the Christ of failure with his lovers.
They are wiser than his parables,
But he more potent, for he has the gift
Of hopelessness, and want of faith, and love.

Reprinted from "Child of Life," by Max Eastman, [illegible] permission of Alfred A. Knopf Inc., [illegible] publishers.

tried on the charge of conspiracy to obstruct recruiting and enlistment; with Morris Hillquit and Dudley Field Malone to defend them.

In the interval between December, 1917, and March, 1918, there had been no magazine. The Masses was fading into the protective coloration of the Liberator.

The first jury disagreed. A new trial was ordered. A second jury disagreed. The editors had won—and lost.

Jack Reed got off the magazine—reorganized under a compromise with the war spirit—died in Russia, lies buried in the Kremlin with Lenin. Not gifted as a facile or complex thinker, he escaped the blind-alley of opportunism, and took the road to death and enduring glory. The lines entitled Fog, his strange epitaph, assure him a no less permanent title as a poet.

Floyd Dell, who had never advocated much more than parliamentary socialism, and who believed, as many Bolsheviks do today, in conscription, was willing to go to jail but reluctant to go for an abstract principle he considered worthless. He stayed with the Liberator, to emerge at last as a popular novelist for the generation he had so long instructed.

Max Eastman determined to be a realist and keep the revolutionary home fires burning. This is his reply to Jack Reed's letter of resignation from the editorial board:

> I haven't a word of protest—only a deep feeling of regret.
>
> In your absence we all weighed the matter and decided it was our duty to the social revolution to keep this instrument we have created alive toward a time of great usefulness. You will help us with your writing and reporting, and that is all we ask.
>
> Personally, I envy you the power to cast loose when not only a good deal of the dramatic beauty but also the glamor of the abstract moral principle is gone out of this venture, and it remains for us merely the most effective and therefore right thing to do.

This is what perhaps nowadays we should call a rationalization. His followers, who agreed with him that a sincere radical does not run about the world courting martyrdom, still felt that a revolutionary leader does not purchase immunity from jail by repudiating his revolutionary opinions.

> PROSECUTING ATTORNEY: Will you tell us if the sentiments therein expressed (concerning the star-spangled banner), which I have just read to you, are your sentiments today?
>
> DEFENDANT: No, they are not, Mr. Barnes. My sentiments have changed a good deal. I think that when the boys begin to go over to Europe, and fight to the strains of that anthem, you feel very differently about it. You noticed that when it was played out there in the street the other day I did stand up. . . . I felt very sad; I felt very solemn, very sorrowful, because I thought of those boys over there dying by the thousands . . . with courage, and even laughter on their lips, because they are dying for liberty. . . .

Whether or not this retreat was a tactical error, Max Eastman did do what he set out to do. He did go on with the Liberator, forcibly modified as it was, and preserved what he could of the badly shattered body of the new philosophy. Significantly, because of his old quality of intellectual courage, Max Eastman was a Bolshevik when several of the present most prominent leaders were still anarchists, Mensheviks, or industrialists.

In its last days when the Liberator could not decide whether it wanted to be a propagandist or an artistic magazine or both it declined rapidly—what had been brilliant turned wastefully violent; what had been masterful was either harassed or sentimental. In November, 1924, the Liberator became incorporated with Soviet Russia Pictorial and the Labor Herald as the official organ of the Workers Party—rechristened the Workers Monthly.

But the Masses-Liberator spirit is gone—not so much dead as dispersed and divided. The magazine, until the war, was like a self-fertilizing tree. Social passion and creative beauty grew from the same branches. Now there has been pruning and grafting; we have in consequence two trees—the air is sultry—there is no cross pollenizing. The artists who were attracted to the Masses for its art have gone one way; the revolutionists another. The two factions regard each other with hostility and suspicion. The buds on the two trees wither for lack of each other. It is the artist's fault because he is afraid of revolution. It is the propagandist's fault for giving the artist a job he cannot perform. And it is nobody's fault, as well, but simply the effect of a world change.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter has been moving. Not merely drifting for his pleasure but helping to move goods and chattels, bag and baggage, Lares and Penates. He regards it as a painful business. Since the earliest caveman picked up his arrow-heads and went in search of another home among the stone caverns the victims of moving have groaned and protested—and moved. Moving is one of the operations alike common and odious to mankind, which for reasons private or civic must be endured anywhere from three to twenty times in an ordinary lifetime. Neighborhoods depreciate from innumerable causes. Fire may necessitate exodus; noisy neighbors or crying babies may make it advisable. Houses are sold and fall into the hands of landlords who turn deaf ears to peeling paint and dilapidated wall-paper. A family may diminish or suddenly expand. There may be no reason at all beyond a primordial nomadic urge.

* * * * *

AND so certain friends of the Drifter have been moving, and he has been drawn into the melee. They have seen large apartments, small ones; bright and attractive and expensive floors overlooking Central Park; dull and grimy prisons in which the compartments which were called rooms followed one on the other with the depressing monotony of the cars of a railroad train. They have looked at tenements and flats, rooms and apartments, suites and floors. Some have had fireplaces and some fire-escapes; some neither. Many have clung to the ancient system of gas lighting, and over the chandeliers of these it were best to draw a veil.

* * * * *

THERE is a tinge of shrinking, even a slight shame, about the exposure of one's household goods to the eye of a curious world. The impulse struggles through one's consciousness to clothe the nudity of the homely objects thus bared to the raw inquisition of bright sunlight and the passing human gaze. One may, with an effort, [illegible] the ignominy of such exposure to the moving-van crew—they who handle articles of dearest intimacy with the impersonal unselfconsciousness of a surgeon setting bones. By them the treasures are carted off, one by one. The battered favorites of a lifetime are toted out in ungraceful heaps, chairs atop tables, couches raising their sparse iron limbs to heaven, bundles of books piled into tipsy columns that tremble and totter as they are hoisted to the shoulders of a sweating colossus. Kitchen vessels, squeezed out of their rightful heritage of a journey by barrel, make a forlorn last-moment heap in a dishpan, while oddments which proclaim themselves to be brooms, mops, shoe cleaners, stove polishers, carpet sweepers, ironing boards, and washing implements rear up like earthworks on a battlefront, only to be carried off and deposited on the sidewalk until a place can be found for them among their betters in the van.

* * * * *

AT last it is over. The bill has been paid, and the crew of movers, tipped heavily, have gathered up their ropes and pulleys and padding, and departed. The Drifter sits with his friends among the upheaval which may some day be a home. He is oppressed by the general disorder, by homesickness—though the home is not his—by the conviction that nothing in it will ever again be quite right. Suddenly someone has a terrible realization—the canary has been forgotten. The Drifter volunteers to recover him. Anxiously he takes his way across the city. It is late when he turns the key in the lock and enters the vast and dusty expanse. Relief comes quickly as he hears a faint peep from the inner gloom—Caruso is safe and undisturbed. The Drifter shoulders the bird and somewhat sentimentally makes a tour of the dismantled apartment. Somehow Caruso's presence gives him courage. He covers the cage carefully with a large square of silk and together they sally forth into the twilight. But on one point the Drifter has made up his mind. He will never have a home, or furnishings, or even a canary. He will be glad always to be

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Those Behind Prohibition

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Cline's article Behind This Prohibition is a vivid presentation of facts we all recognize. It is not as disgusting to a prohibitionist, like myself, as it appears to be, and I believe the reason for it is this: A good many people have assumed that the voters who support prohibition, as, for instance, those who increased the dry majority in Congress at the last election and those who carried the proposal in Massachusetts for a State enforcement act, do so because they are convinced they are supporting an advance in morals. While this is true for the minority representing the temperance forces, who also, by the way, observe the law strictly, the great majority, in my opinion, support the law as a measure of health and safety, and individually reserve to themselves the freedom of action so noticeable in regard to other laws.

For instance, most of us would support a law restricting the speed of motors to a degree we should probably not always observe. At least, not till everyone else did. We support measures for the examination of herds of cows, where the milk is sold, but have our cows examined only in face of very alarming symptoms. We support the anti-trust laws, yet cheerfully submit to the knowledge that they are broken, according to Mr. Huston Thompson, as often as the Volstead Act. I don't pretend to explain these attitudes, but it seems to me they are undeniable.

Staatsburg, New York, August 29 MARGARET NORRIE

Pullman Porters Have Grievances

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Kindly permit me to bring to the attention of your thoughtful readers the fact that the Pullman Company has broken its agreement with the Pullman porters. According to Article 6, Section C, "There shall be no discrimination by the company or by any of its employees on account of membership or non-membership in any fraternal society or union." This agreement, known as the Pullman Company Plan of Employee Representation for District Employees, became effective on October 1, 1920, and is still operative.

Since the movement began to organize the porters through a series of articles in the Messenger, the men have been repeatedly called into the office and questioned as to what interest they have in the movement. When a mass meeting was arranged at the Elks' Auditorium, in New York City, Tuesday evening, August 25, at which Mr. W. J. Orr, special organizer of the Locomotive Engineers, spoke, the men were threatened with discharge if they attended.

The company, of course, wants to intimidate the men, so as to prevent them from forming an organization for, of, and by themselves. This is downright discrimination against Negro employees of the company, for the Pullman car conductors, who are white, are organized, and have been since 1918. Every other group of workers on the railroad is organized except the porters. The men are organizing to demand more wages, shorter hours, and better working conditions. They now receive $67.50 a month, a wage sadly inadequate to insure a decent American standard of living. And they are required to make 11,000 miles as a basis of this monthly wage. This causes a porter's hours to trench hard upon the inhuman work-period burden of nearly 400 hours a month.

They want 240 hours or less in regular assignment as a basis of their monthly pay, with compensation for overtime. They also want pay for "preparatory time," that is, the work they put in making ready the car to receive the passengers before the train leaves the terminal station. Now, though a porter may report to the yard at 3 p. m. and work until 7 p. m. making ready his car to receive passengers so as to leave at 7 p. m., his pay does not begin until 7 p. m.

They also want to abolish the doubling-out evil, or the practice of compelling a man who has been on the road two or three days and nights without the proper sleep, needing food and properly to cleanse himself, to go right back out for perhaps another two or three nights' journey, thereby undermining the porter's health and preventing him from giving efficient service to the public, for which it pays the Pullman Company. And not the least among their demands is that of being treated like men and not like children. As it is, porters with self-respect and pride dread going into the district offices lest they be hailed as "George" by some sixteen-year-old whippersnapper, though the porter insulted may have been in the service some forty years or more and be old enough to have great-grandchildren older than the messenger boy humiliating him.

New York, September 3 A. PHILIP RANDOLPH,
Editor of the Messenger and General Organizer of the Brotherhood of Sleeping Car Porters

[The last annual report of the Pullman Company, made public since the above letter was written, shows the largest gross revenue in the corporation's history, amounting to $83,927,749. After all deductions this was equivalent to earnings of $10.20 on each share of $100 par value.—EDITOR THE NATION.]

A Coal Digger on Coal

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your editorial A Letter to the Miners' Chief in your issue of September 9 reveals a stupendous lack of knowledge when speaking of the Fuel Administration, "The Fuel Administration was established [1917] and for two years ran coal as it ought to be run."

I am afraid that a canvass of every coal digger in the country would fail to reveal one who would agree to that. On the other hand, a canvass of the operators would likely find unanimous agreement. Was not this the period of the 2,000 per cent profits?

Garfield sat on the lid for two years and got off just before the widespread "wild cat" strike and the "authorized" strike of 1919. The humiliations and repression suffered by the coal miners during these two years and in the second and shorter period have made the name Garfield forever detested by them.

Tell us not of Fuel Administrations; we coal diggers were sold that gold brick once.

Belleville, Illinois, September 9 Ein Hauer

Vanderbilt University's Liberalism

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Before me are two articles, one by Allen de Ford on The War Against Evolution to the dismissal of Professor Alexander Winchell from Vanderbilt University in the early eighties because of his views on evolution. In a more recent article by Mr. Krutch on the fall of the cowards in Tennessee the statement is made that in Tennessee "bigotry [illegible] sincere, while intelligence is loaded and hypercritical." Without attempting to refute the first article, I should like to submit that the scholars cited do not in any way represent the point of view of the Vanderbilt University of today; and without refuting the sweeping generalization of the second article I should like to suggest that there are some men in Tennessee who ought not to be included in the indictment. In all conscience the situation is bad enough, but not so bad as would appear from these two articles.

The Winchell incident has, of course, had wide reading because of its prominence in Andrew D. White's "History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom," but that it is not typical of the university is evident from a number of facts. Vanderbilt for a quarter of a century and especially since its [illegible] has been generally regarded in the South as a citadel of modernism, higher criticism, evolution, and other forms of heresy. Professor L. C. Glenn, Dr. Winchell's successor in the department of geology, gave an illustrated lecture on evolution which the anti-evolution mob was unable to disturb, and left no doubt in the mind of anybody as to his position; for a quarter of a century he has been doing the same thing with no call out of the classroom. Professor E. E. Reinke, head of the department of biology, delivered a clear-cut address before the Vanderbilt Club of Nashville and later before the Kiwanis Club, defining his position as to his reputation [illegible] Nashville papers.

The dean of the School of Religion, Dr. W. F. Tillett, secured the signatures of the leading ministers of Nashville to a protest against the passage of the law, and has since written an article in the Southern Methodist Review defining the position of those who are resisting the extreme ideas of the fundamentalists. The dean emeritus of the School of Religion, Dr. W. F. Tillett, has recently published a volume entitled "Paths That Lead to God," in which he takes the same position on the question of evolution in relation to the Bible that is held by [illegible] of liberal opinion in American churches. Chancellor J. H. Kirkland, who two years had lectured on evolution in some of the best Southern institutions, was quick to condemn the passage of the Tennessee law in a statement that has appeared in many newspapers and in another vigorous statement prepared for the Religious Education Association of America. It is safe to say that a large majority of the professors at Vanderbilt agree not only in condemning the law but in maintaining the hypothesis of evolution, though they may differ in the religious or philosophical interpretation thereof. And the same may be said of the student body as a whole and of the large majority of the alumni. The main opponents of the law in the legislature are Vanderbilt graduates.

Nashville, Tennessee, July 30 Edwin Mims,
Professor of English, Vanderbilt University

Indignities to Citizens

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I am a plain American citizen of Irish birth. I believe in the Constitution of the United States and in the Declaration of Independence—"that God created all men free and equal." Believing in this, and armed with an American passport, I decided to return to my country after spending a few months in Europe; I decided to embark at the port of Liverpool; I also decided to travel third class. Let us see how the official American doctor at that port treated an American citizen. First of all he decided that I should get vaccinated. I protested against this, but this man who is paid by the American taxpayers told me bluntly that I could not get aboard [illegible] ship unless he said so.

At the hour of embarkation I was lined up with the emigrants for inspection, the American doctor looking on. This ended his inspection of the "Anglo-Saxons." Then he singled me out from a group of 200 plebeians who were allied in blood with the Mayflower progenitors and forced [illegible] a room where there were a dozen Irish boys who were to be subjected to a severe test.

I tried to get redress from the American [illegible] too, seemingly was inoculated with Anglo-Saxon virus.

The world is not yet safe for democracy, at least, not for American citizens.

Brooklyn, August 9 Timothy O'Brien

Discovered!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Who is the Ku Kluxer on the editorial staff of The Nation? This question is prompted by the editorial in the issue of August 19 in which the statement is made that "the Klan has become safe—and uninteresting."

I have just looked over a lot of data sent me from our representative in the Klan—we have one there to get us the correct information. The information certainly does not indicate that our Protestant fanatics have become safe. As to being uninteresting, I do not know—that is a matter of individual ideas. Whipping parties, a murder now and then don't prove uninteresting to the average person.

Minneapolis, August 26 Emil E. Holmes,
National President, World War Veterans

Secret Thinking

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: A remark made by a well-dressed middle-aged woman at a local newsstand the other day may amuse you: "Let me have a copy of The Nation—and will you please wrap it?" One more good soul giving way to secret thinking!

New York, July 17 S. M. Keeny

Books and Plays

Carmichael

By KENNETH FEARING

"You are sure you love me?
Why do you love me?"
Those were the words of Carmichael,
As slim and beautiful as Carmichael,
The tawny pennon of manhood
Snapping and curling in a gale.

"But your eyes are strange.
Hoofbeats on the nightroad past my bedchamber are not so strange.
I love you."
And Thyra was the youngest of the court dancers.

Then he would show her of love
As keen as it was in him,
And from the palace's highest battlement
Carmichael listened to the falling scream.

Few women find them the lover Carmichael,
Carmichael the sheer.

First Glance

CASUAL acquaintance with Edith Sitwell's reputation as a poet would scarcely lead one to look in any of her volumes for lines like these:

> In the forest of sweet birds the spring begins
> And all the trees have leaves like drops of water
> Or small soft birds that sing of lost delight.
>
> And there were haunted summers in Troy Park
> And all the stillness budded into leaves;
> We listened, like Ophelia drowned in blond
> And fluid hair, beneath stag-antlered trees;
> Then in the ancient park the country-pleasant
> Shadows fell as brown as any pheasant,
> And Colonel Fantock seemed like one of these.

For not only is Miss Sitwell known as a radical poet; she is feared as an unintelligible one and fled as one whose satire, presumably, bites. How is it, then, that in "Troy Park" (Knopf: $1.75) she has been willing or able to deliver herself of lines as transparently lovely as those just quoted?

She has not done so often, to be sure. But she did not need to in order to prove herself a richly and interestingly equipped poet. And she was by no means content, having turned some lovely verses, to call her business done. Her business is with the vision that she has, and like all visionary poets who happen also to have lively brains she is struggling constantly to speak in a new way of what she sees. What she sees never changes, for it is invisible. It is a lost world of pure, unshadowed delight which in common with all mystics she mourns. But Miss Sitwell changes. Now she is giving us her world in the directest possible language—images of birds and trees, metaphors of music, fables of the golden age and of the immaculate child:

> But Dagobert and Peregrine and I
> Were children then; we walked like shy gazelles
> Among the music of the thin flower-bells.
> And life still held some promise,—never ask
> Of what,—but life seemed less a stranger then
> Than ever after in this cold existence.

Now in an ecstasy of invention she departs and dances among conceits as wild as any ever dug up by the "metaphysical poets." Now she turns her back to the beauty by which she lives in order to defend it—and herself—against its most evil enemy, age. Her lost delight was a young delight—this she has said again and again. As a belligerent, then, and as a satirist, she moves against

> The real world terrible and old;

she castigates a race of men who > . . . grew as wrinkled as the darkness

> With bitter wickedness and age;

she makes an example of poor Colonel Fantock, that > Old military ghost with mayfly whiskers; and, taking a phrase of Arthur Rimbaud's, she muses long upon

> The old Bacchantes of the suburbs.

Now she mingles all three methods in a poem of the sort which has made her "difficulty" famous. But always her fine energy comes from the vision which lives exactly in her center. Miss Sitwell promises to redeem a whole generation of Georgian poets who had threatened to grow shallow.

MARK VAN DOREN

Since John Stuart Mill

Contemporary Political Thought in England, by Lewis Rockow. The Macmillan Company. $5.25.

THIS substantial treatise constitutes an admirable sequel to the interesting little volume published some years ago by Ernest Barker on English political thought from Herbert Spencer. Mr. Rockow's work, fortunately, conforms strictly to its title and is devoted to an analysis of the political ideas of those literally contemporary figures whose doctrines were but briefly classified and described in the last chapters of Mr. Barker's work. Graham Wallas, the Webbs, H. J. Laski, G. D. H. Cole, Bertrand Russell, Norman Angell, Shaw, Galsworthy, and other notable and notorious contributors to the destructive and constructive trends in modern thought are here displayed in full knowledge of their writings and their significance alike for fullness of estimate and critical acumen.

Perhaps the most striking fact about the book is its implicit refutation of the contention of some that significant political theory ended with Bluntschli, Austin, Spencer, or Thomas Hill Green. Here we have a volume of nearly 350 pages devoted to but the briefest critical summary of a group of thinkers whose writings fall almost entirely within the present century. It would scarcely be necessary to say that their doctrines possess more validity, urgency, and relevance with respect to current political problems and issues than all the political theory compiled in all the countries of the world prior to 1900. Yet Mr. Rockow does not include more than half of the most important and up-to-date of the present-day contributors to political and social thought in England. Many of those whom he does consider belong in a doctrinal sense to a past generation, and, with the exception of Laski, Cole, the Webbs, the Pauls, Russell, and Norman Angell, the most novel and revolutionary aspects of contemporary English thought and scholarship are left unmentioned. It is coming to be more obvious than ever that the study of political theory before the twentieth century can be justified only on the ground of antiquarian interest or the desire to establish the genetic foundations of certain trends in the thought of today.

The volume opens with a brief sketch of the nineteenth-century background in the writings of Bentham, Austin, Darwin, Spencer, J. S. Mill, and T. H. Green. McDougall and Graham Wallas are selected to illustrate the psychological contributions to political thinking; Sir Henry Jones and John Watson appear as the contemporary expositors of philosophical idealism; Lord Hugh Cecil and W. H. Mallock present the arguments for conservatism, individualism, and aristocracy; the Webbs and Ramsay MacDonald argue the case for collectivism and advanced social democracy; Laski, Russell, and Cole attack the theory of the omnipotent and monistic sovereign state and formulate the position of the pluralists; William and Eden and Cedar Paul represent the English enthusiasm for the older Marxian socialism and Bolshevik communism respectively; L. T. Hobhouse and Lord Bryce state the case for compromise between individualism and collectivism, Hobhouse on a theoretical basis and Bryce from a concrete study of the achievements of democracies in action; H. G. Wells pictures a utopian commonwealth, namely, one designed and ordered according to the dictates of intelligence and the knowledge to be derived from the social sciences; Norman Angell presents the economic and cultural indictment of the insanity of modern wars and armaments, and demonstrates the necessity of squaring politics and diplomacy with the realities of economic internationalism; Shaw, Galsworthy, Arnold Bennett, and H. G. Wells attack through their dramas and novels the injustices and imbecilities of contemporary culture and society, and argue for a more rational and happy world. Mr. Rockow is an accomplished analytical expositor. He shows a full mastery of his sources, presents fairly the arguments and positions of the authors studied, and does not fail to point out the weaknesses or inconsistencies in their writings. And the value and utility of the whole work are greatly enhanced by a lively and lucid style.

The chief defects in Mr. Rockow's book are those which arise from the orientation of his own thought and the lack of inclusiveness of his work. While fair minded, his judgments are colored by his background and outlook, which are obviously those of the philosopher and moralist. He gives little evidence of an adequate acquaintance with the realistic social and political thought grounded upon geography, psychology, biology, anthropology, sociology, and the special social sciences. His statement that "psychology, like biology, is concerned only with facts, and not with values" is most fully and damagingly revealing. The significance and volume of contemporary English social and political thought impresses itself upon one as much through reflection upon what Mr. Rockow has omitted as through perusal of the doctrines which he has analyzed. There is little in his book which would indicate that Laski inhabits a much different scientific, technological, and industrial world from that in which John Stuart Mill moved and labored. The vast implications of these changes for thought, politics, and ethics are left unexploited. Nothing is said about the valuable contributions to political thought made by the anthropogeographers such as Mackinder, Herbertson, Fairgrieve, and others, and of the application of regional geography to the problems of civic reform by Patrick Geddes, Victor Branford, and others. Nor does Mr. Rockow call attention to the importance of biology with respect to political theory in the fields of social Darwinism and its critics; the problems of population control as studied by Carr-Saunders, Wright, and others, and by the birth-control advocates; the emphasis of Galton, Pearson, and their school upon eugenics and the breeding of a more capable race; and the implications of differential biology for the problems of democracy as developed by Pearson, Bateson, and others. The most reliable and relevant psychology is not to be found in the writings of McDougall and Wallas, but rather in those of Tansley, Hart, Rivers, Jones, and others. McDougall and Wallas, while solid critics of the older Benthamite felicific calculus, belong to an archaic age of psychological thought. The achievements of the cultural anthropologists, such as Marett and Rivers, have completely upset the older approach to political origins, but they are not dealt with. Sociology, basic to every type of valid contemporary political theory, is scarcely mentioned, and such sociologists as are included are classified under other rubrics—Wallas as a psychologist and Hobhouse as a philosopher. In this way the most important of all of Professor Hobhouse's books, his "Morals in Evolution," was missed. Finally, perhaps the most vital advance in political science in the last generation has been the introduction of the quantitative or statistical method as developed by Pearson, Yule, Bowley, and others. This is not mentioned, though it is indispensable in any effort to supplant political philosophy by political science.

This catalogue of what should have been included in any comprehensive survey of contemporary political thinking in England is not intended as a disparagement of Mr. Rockow's timely and important service in the present volume. Rather it is intended in part, at least, to encourage him to write a second volume which will embody these developments. In the meantime not only students of political theory but also all interested in contemporary thought and English literature will find this volume indispensable and illuminating.

HARRY ELMER BARNES

A Timid Moralist

The Conscience of the Newspaper. By Leon Nelson Flint. D. Appleton and Company. $3.

MR. FLINT has hit upon the original idea of dealing with the "principles and problems of journalism" by the case system so long applied to the teaching of law. Most of his 461 pages are devoted to the statement of some journalistic act or transgression—upon which there is a comment usually mild, carefully balanced, and more or less obvious. He has, however, not restricted the comments to his own, but has quoted many interesting opinions from journalists, lawyers, and public officials (unfortunately without giving the source of the quotation or the place where it can be found).

Curiously enough, whenever Mr. Flint cites a case of journalistic wrongdoing the name of the newspaper is suppressed; where he can praise he usually does so by name. This raises once more the question what it is that professors of journalism are afraid of. Is it their particular set of regents, the press itself, or what else? We can understand Mr. Flint's desire to produce a book which should be as coldly impartial as a textbook of law, and his wish to avoid being called a "kicker" or faultfinder. But after all the book purports to deal with the conscience of the newspaper, and as to that one must take sides to be effective. It is impossible to avoid the conclusion that in his desire to deal impartially and in detail with many such journalistic practices as, for instance, "faking" photographs and news stories, and the "rewrite" evil of latter days, Mr. Flint has failed adequately to praise or emphasize those public servants in journalism who have nearly approached the ideal. Thus Edwin L. Godkin is dismissed with the barest reference; the second Samuel Bowles receives eighteen lines and the first and third are not mentioned, though no better cases of devotion to civic and professional ideals could possibly be cited.

That Mr. Flint's book, despite its lack of systematic arrangement and its constant repetitions, will be useful in schools of journalism we have no doubt. How far beyond them will its influence go or that of Professor Crawford's excellent "Ethics of Journalism"? Not much, we fancy. The professional journalist knows perfectly well what are good and bad practices, and when he sins against the light and when he doesn't. Hence it is useless to teach ideals to students of journalism if they immediately take service under our Hearsts, our Curtises, even our Chicago Tribunes; for there they must do as they are told. The ethics of journalism are as simple and plain as any others. What the conscience of a newspaper should be is easily set forth to students, but the conscience of each daily is created by its owners. How are we to reach them when they are in business for money pure (or impure) and simple? That is the problem. But Mr. Flint gives few cases that couple the conscience of the daily to the business office. Is it really helpful to dismiss the burning question of the commercialism of the press in these non-committal words?

> The growth of the industry of newspaper publishing until it has become one of the greatest industries in the world has lent prominence to the business side of journalism. . . .
>
> The further fact that newspapers now attract capital seeking profitable investment, and that millions of dollars are required to buy a successful metropolitan paper, leads to the charge that our journalism is "capitalistic."
>
> Both of these criticisms contain truth and must be taken account of by any one looking toward the future of journalism. Business success should be provocative of good journalism because it affords financial independence; but in practice commercialism shows itself in conflict with the professional ideal.

Mr. Flint recognizes the recent rapid growth of public hostility to the press and the increasing distrust of it. Yet he passes briefly over Upton Sinclair's indictment, and he winds up on the hopeful note expected of all writers who deal with institutions that are under fire. He is sanguine enough to believe that the press is improving so rapidly that many of his criticisms will soon be obsolete. We hope he is right. Our observations do not lead us to a similar conclusion.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Mrs. Wharton and Mr. Dreiser

Edith Wharton. By Robert Morss Lovett. Robert M. McBride and Company. $1.

Theodore Dreiser. By Burton Rascoe. Robert M. McBride and Company. $1.

BOTH of these monographs have peculiar merits. Both of them have defects. Mr. Lovett's fault, as I see it, is that he fails adequately to discuss the influence of Henry James on Mrs. Wharton. Mr. Rascoe argues too much with Stuart Sherman. Neither monograph can be ignored by the careful reader or—most certainly—by the student. Perhaps there is no greater praise. Mrs. Wharton is difficult to discuss because her work is so uneven, yet Mr. Lovett never falters and ends on a note that is praise or blame as one happens to feel: "she remains for us among the voices whispering the last enchantments of the Victorian age." Mr. Dreiser, of course, speaks emphatically the voice of modernity.

Mr. Lovett quickly concludes that Mrs. Wharton may be summed up in the words: Culture, Class, Morality. She has an overweening sense of the necessity of imposing upon the sprawl of life a carefully articulated pattern. She is ironic. Her problem is always moral, but the morality of "the indoor variety; and the scene of their skirmishes is the tea table or the dancing floor . . . one wonders too often whether the case could have arisen outside the conventions of a special class." She is, then, a class artist and her class rests upon "a crust of custom over a void of thought" (her own evaluation in "The Fruit of the Tree"). Her class is an American class, the product of very special circumstances, easily dispersed by a shift in American life. When it flourished its rootage was inadequate, and even Mrs. Wharton recognized that it was inevitably to be left high and dry by the currents of American life. Consequently Mrs. Wharton is "profoundly ignorant" of the "vital issues" in American life. When she essays to depict industrialism she is hopelessly inept, as in "The Fruit of the Tree," where industrialism is important to her only as it impinges upon the demands of her narrow world. Only when she hits upon a tragedy contained within the limits of her world is she impressive, as in "The House of Mirth."

In fact, Mrs. Wharton is all that Mr. Dreiser is not. At one point they touch: both have faltered at times. Where Mrs. Wharton exaggerates the necessity of form, Mr. Dreiser is impressed by the sprawl of American life and attempts to render it in his novels. Mrs. Wharton's psychology of personality is incisive, clean-cut, and omniscient. She simplifies and explains without qualifications. Mr. Dreiser is never sure, is full of qualifications, is, again, burdened by a feeling of inexplicable complexity. Mrs. Wharton has chosen to depict a back-wash in the stream of American life. Mr. Dreiser has chosen to get into mid-channel. Mrs. Wharton is a surviving voice of an age that has passed away, the heir of James and Howells. Mr. Dreiser is a prophet of the future.

Appropriately, Mr. Rascoe opens his monograph with a quotation setting forth the fundamentals of modern American society. He shows how Dreiser early felt the overwhelming significance of business. He threw himself into a detailed study of the situation and produced "The Financier" and "The Titan." Being a brooding intelligence, he was intrigued by the muddle of life and gave allegiance to a physico-chemical theory of conduct. He threw over a compartmentalized view of the world which accurately, in theory, labeled things right and wrong. His men are ruled by a will to power, and power includes power over women. He has constantly dealt with sex relations, and because of his amorality has refused to be conventionally catastrophic in his portrayals of reward and punishment. His novels have a great deal of the disorder of the life he sees. In Dreiser there is no imposition of an arbitrary framework—for it seems true that disorder is not arbitrary but actual. Mrs. Wharton runs to epigrams and figures of speech. Mr. Dreiser, though on occasion he writes with impressiveness, has an amazing record for inepitude and cliché. He is more impressive in totality than in detail.

Both of these writers, it seems to me, have reported their worlds accurately. Neither method is of absolute merit. There are no absolutes in art. But Mr. Dreiser's world is destructive of Mrs. Wharton's. Mr. Lovett says of Mrs. Wharton:

> She sees that in America, amidst the vast and impersonal forces of nature and the lives of self-sufficient and self-reliant pioneers, pride and dominancy patterning the animal to the [illegible] guard action.

The italicized words represent Dreiser's world in so far as it is militant industrialism. I believe Mr. Dreiser to be the more powerful and potentially the more enduring because he is the more decidedly, for one thing, in the main stream of American life.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

Lord Raleigh

The Life of Lord Raleigh. By His Son, Lord Raleigh. Longmans, Green and Company. $7.50.

THE Hon. William Strutt, third Baron Raleigh, is best remembered for his discovery of argon, a gas present to the extent of about 1 per cent in the air we breathe. During his life of seventy-seven years, however, he published "A Theory of Sound," which is the most scholarly treatise of its kind in the English language, and more than four hundred original contributions to physics. He was the friend and intimate of Clerk Maxwell, Kelvin, and Helmholtz; and his reputation suffers only by comparison with these three giants. He succeeded Clerk Maxwell as Cavendish Professor of Physics at Cambridge, and was in turn succeeded by J. J. Thomson. Here again Lord Raleigh suffers by comparison: Raleigh was a great physicist, but Clerk Maxwell and J. J. Thomson were still greater ones.

When at twenty-three Raleigh graduated from Cambridge as Senior Wrangler a clerical relative urged on him the claims of "duty," by which was to be understood the normal public duties of a country squire or of a cabinet minister. Raleigh replied that he owed his "duty" to science; whereupon the clerical relative said something to the effect that to neglect the estate and state in order to follow scientific pursuits was a lapse from the straight and narrow path. The clergyman's opinion of science was evidently shared by the authorities at Cambridge, for at that time—1867—the only experimental course offered at the university was one in qualitative analysis—"test-tubing," as it is lovingly called by the undergraduates of today. From 1867 to 1925 is a far cry. The Cavendish laboratory for experimental physics is the most famous of its kind the world over. On any week-day you may find three Nobel prize winners, Thomson, Rutherford, and Aston, at work there. Even so specialized a field as bio-chemistry boasts of a building all its own. At Cambridge the blackboards are still filled with mathematical symbols as they were in Newton's day; but now largely as a preliminary means of developing some hypothesis to be tested out in the laboratory. When Einstein develops a theory dealing with the refraction of light rays as they pass the sun it is the Cambridge astronomer, Eddington, who verifies it experimentally. When Thomson develops his theory of the structure of the atom it is Wilson, a Cambridge physicist, who devises an ingenious experiment to photograph the track of Alpha rays as they shoot out of radium.

Raleigh at twenty-four was elected a Fellow of Trinity College. He was excellently equipped in mathematics, but knew little or nothing of laboratory work. Being a man of means, he set up his own laboratory, hired his own assistant, read Maxwell's papers on the electro-magnetic field, Helmholtz's on color vision, and the published researches of Stokes and Kelvin. These gave him the necessary impetus for experimental work, which he carried on unintermittently and unobtrusively for a quarter of a century.

The turning-point in his career came in 1894. An apparently inconsequential series of determinations dealing with the densities of gases led to a momentous discovery—argon, a hitherto undiscovered gas in the atmosphere; and subsequently to the unmasking of four other elementary gases in the air: helium, neon, xenon, and krypton. In his experiments Raleigh found that the density of nitrogen obtained from the air was slightly but consistently higher than that obtained from artificial sources. Writing to Nature, he said: "I am much puzzled by some results as to the density of nitrogen and shall be obliged if any of your chemical readers can offer suggestions as to the cause. According to two methods of preparation I obtain quite distinct values. The relative difference, amounting to about one one-thousandth part, is small in itself; but it lies entirely outside the error of experiment."

Raleigh's letter to Nature attracted the attention of Ramsay, professor of chemistry at the University of London. The London chemist had found that nitrogen is absorbed fairly readily by magnesium. This suggested to him that by first getting rid of the oxygen in the air and passing the remaining nitrogen over heated magnesium any other gas present in the atmosphere could be saved from absorption. The experiments fully confirmed the hypothesis, and the unabsorbed gas was isolated. In the meantime Raleigh himself arrived at the same result, using different means. He had repeated and extended an almost forgotten experiment of Cavendish, performed one hundred years earlier. Raleigh and Ramsay joined hands; they announced their discovery to the British Association for the Advancement of Science which met in the summer of 1894.

The scientists were skeptical. What! Could it be possible that the atmosphere so exhaustively studied by scientists for centuries contained a gas which had never before been isolated! They shook their heads, smiled the smile of doubters, spoke of faulty manipulation and hasty conclusion, and suggested more caution and less eagerness to rush into print. Ten years later, in 1904, Raleigh received the Nobel prize for physics and Ramsay the prize for chemistry.

I heartily recommend this book to all those wishing to obtain an insight into the achievements of modern science. The chapter dealing with the discovery of argon, naturally the longest in the book, excellently shows how great discoveries are made by geniuses. And the writing is non-technical throughout.

BENJAMIN HARROW

A Good Subject

The History of American Idealism. By Gustavus Myers. Boni and Liveright. $3.

MR. MYERS sets out to prove that "the American people are a nation of idealists." He asserts it is "the fact of facts." Now America's services to mankind, her leadership on various occasions, her permanent contributions to civilization are conspicuous and undeniable. Yet Mr. Myers would be more effective if he were more objective. He selects his facts, omits vast categories of others, and cuts and pastes his history most arbitrarily. Had he done so from a consistent point of view his book would be convincing as a piece of special pleading, a patriotic paean useful in its compilation of related facts. One gains the impression that two conflicting personalities contend for and alternately gain possession of the writer. In his preface he protests that he has written other books "showing the evils imposed on American life by organizations, groups, and particular classes," but that this book deals "with the American people as a whole."

In his earlier chapters Mr. Myers appears to be imbued with the spirit of his "other books," as when for instance he admits that the war with Mexico was "a black chapter in American history." On the whole the first fourteen chapters are interesting and informing, especially those dealing with the overthrow of aristocracy in the post-revolutionary period and the rise of the ideal of general education. Best of all are the chapters dealing with the rise of American art. In his last seven chapters, however, Mr. Myers is often naive. Thus he holds that the habit of "unrestrained imbibing" (for the Eighteenth Amendment is in his view one of the achievements of American idealism) is "the European custom transplanted here in settlement times." The implication therefore is that the American people are not wholly guilty. But while he blames Europe for various of our shortcomings he is indignant at the "misconception" of a Danish newspaper to the effect that "the American nation is an extract of European youth which melted together has produced a race of incomparable health."

In the chapter entitled Curbing Plutocracy we read: "With the slavery issue disposed of, the people of the United States could now begin to concentrate upon the aim to subjugate the powers of wealth and the ensuing corruption and oppressions." Yet later he confesses sadly: "True, no powerful magnate had ever been sent to prison; by the lavish use of money in hiring astute lawyers and finding refuge in a maze of legal technicalities, railroad as well as other masterful capitalists violating laws had contrived to keep clear of prison. But there was always a possibility that they might go there . . ."; and "Instead of being shaken by laws passed by both Congress and the States, the trusts multiplied and their power hugely increased." But he concludes: "If the movement against the trusts was a failure there were associated national movements that achieved complete success." And he enumerates the income-tax, publicity for campaign contributions, and direct election of senators. Thus the American people curbed plutocracy. Polyanna substituted for Clio in this chapter.

Mr. Myers on the Spanish War is wholly original. Thus, in 1896 (two years before the sinking of the Maine), "from every part of the United States, North, South, East and West, from cities and villages and farms, came the thunderous demand that Cuba should be free and that the United States should employ its entire power to expel Spanish rule." Mr. Myers bestows high praise on our liberation of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines—he makes no mention of Nicaragua and Haiti.

Mr. Myers feels that the American people reached "an eminence of moral grandeur" during the World War and quotes President Wilson's earlier war declarations freely. One is permitted to infer that the world was made safe for democracy, that the rights of small nations were guaranteed from then on, and that the ending of all war, while not yet an accomplished fact, has been started on the high road to realization.

The basic error in Mr. Myers's approach to his subject is that his hero, "the American people," is ever a unity, one and indivisible, now and then defeated by its foreign heritage, by its predatory groups, by this, that, and the other thing, yet always idealistic and like Horatio Alger's heroes winning out in the end. That most progress in the United States, as elsewhere, has been initiated by political and social pioneers, lone voices in hostile wildernesses, battling courageously against odds and obstacles until the great mass was swung into line—this Mr. Myers fails totally to recognize. The abolition of slavery, equal suffrage, leadership in the world peace movement, and the like are to him achievements of an all-American phalanx.

Mr. Myers's subject is deserving of a less confused treatment. The book is dedicated to Mr. Otto H. Kahn, who receives in its pages more space than George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Abraham Lincoln, and Wendell Phillips combined.

ERNEST GRUENING

Books in Brief

Studies from Ten Literatures. By Ernest Boyd. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

Mr. Boyd is a mixture of historian, bibliographer, and reporter. The discrimination which he brings to his task saves him from being drowned by his material, but his material is voluminous. As a reporter he reveals a greater erudition in modern foreign literatures than is to be found in anyone else now writing in America. As a critic he has a distinct preference for the solid, realistic, intellectual, and sophisticated; he is the enemy of all cults, of sciolists, and of aesthetes. As a wit he brutally knocks down what as a rule is not deserving of much tenderness.

William Blake in This World. By Harold Bruce. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.75.

This book is a mosaic of quotations cemented together by epigram and metaphor; Mr. Bruce is not content with supplying appropriate passages from authority, but peppers his own sentences with quoted phrases and even single words until our eyes are bewildered. Furthermore, the absence of footnotes deprives us of reference and leads to a valid suspicion that the author, or compiler, sometimes employs excerpts for purposes far from their original intention. The most valuable feature is a chronological chart of Blake's life, works, and acquaintances. A few dates here should be revised. The Marriage of Heaven and Hell should be assigned to 1793; Milton was begun in 1803; Jerusalem should be dated 1804-1827; and it should be noted that the illustrations to the Book of Job were not engraved until 1825. The list of works brings to our attention the fact that Mr. Bruce does not once mention in his text the Four Zoas and has almost nothing to say about several other important works.

America of the Fifties: Letters of Fredrika Bremer. Selected and edited by Adolph B. Benson. The American Scandinavian Foundation. $2.

Fredrika Bremer in her day was a highly regarded Swedish novelist, and a pioneer for women's rights. Today her contributions to the former field are forgotten and those to the latter field are antiquated. These letters of travel are, however, fresh, discerning, and valuable. No one who has delved into the intimate life of the New England authors can fail to appreciate her keen and sometimes caustic criticisms. Of Bronson Alcott she writes: "Alcott drank water, and we drank—fog." She saw the country clearly but with a dash of sentiment and a pinch of humor. The book is a first-rate document.

Drama

These Charming People

"THE GREEN HAT" (Broadhurst Theater) will subject to its severest test the hypnotic spell which Mr. Michael Arlen has cast upon the American public. Doubtless most of those who read the genuinely amusing book from which it was taken were never impelled to any intellectual analysis of its plot because they were sufficiently entertained by the fireworks which accompanied it and because they were carried along by the exuberance of the telling; but in making his play Mr. Arlen has deliberately chosen to discard the fantastic humor which protected him and to set forth in plain terms the pretentious vulgarity of his mind. The novel was a fantasy, sustained with remarkable verve; the play is a straight tragedy, tawdry in its conception and outrageously theatrical in execution.

Mr. Arlen's story of a sentimental nymphomaniac who justifies her wild career on the ground that she was deprived of her boyhood sweetheart and then, by way of atonement, picturesquely commits suicide just off stage is [illegible] as the play tells it, not by implication or by indirection but almost in chronicle form, it fails to carry much conviction. Yet luridness is by no means the worst of its faults; for it is conceived in the spirit of the flabbiest sentimentality and presents the most odious of all combinations—an oily lubricity still further contaminated by all sorts of slimy prattle about "clean eyes" and "purity." Whatever interest the play can arouse is an interest in spectacular depravity; whatever fascination the central character has is the fascination of accomplished harlotry; and yet she is always referring in a choked voice to "the beauty of pure love," while Mr. Arlen seems to be constantly whispering [illegible] "Charming people these, but in their hearts they too are longing for England, Home, and Beauty."

In a way the psychology of Iris March is true enough. Just as no one sets a higher sentimental value upon a "pure woman" than does a slightly aging roué, so too there are doubtless many hundreds of Iris Marches who love to romanticize themselves after the manner of Mr. Arlen's heroine and who would like to whisper, as she does: "I have a body which burned for love and with love I have burned it—but to no one but you have I ever said 'I love you.'" But to take her seriously at her own valuation one must needs be almost an Iris March oneself, for however important purity may be there is surely nothing less important than a rake's idea of it. As for "womanly virtue," the world has always been full of charming ladies who got along very well without it; but they needed the strength of their convictions. To drop to chastity the tribute of a pious tear when one is on the point of changing lovers is not, as the Marches (and the Arlens) would have us believe, either noble or particularly pathetic. It is merely very vulgar.

There is always an audience for sentimental lubricity of the sort which "The Green Hat" purveys, provided only the thing is well enough done. The success of the movies is alone sufficient to prove that there is a considerable body of women who deserve the description which La Rochefoucauld ungallantly applied to the whole sex when he called them "rakes by impulse and prudes from necessity"; and they will flock to any entertainment which enables them to participate imaginatively in the delights of an amorous career while assuring them that the part which physical disability or moral cowardice has forced them to choose is, after all, the better one. But it is doubtful if "The Green Hat" is well enough done to succeed unless the mantle of its author's fame can be called upon to hide its defects. It is, to be sure, well acted, for Katherine Cornell seems to realize perfectly the intention of the character and Margalo Gillmore is, as always, charming, but its staginess exceeds all reasonable bounds. Only an audience thoroughly inured to the movies can regard with composure the spectacle of Iris, "hungry for roses," parading the cloisters of a nursing home clad only in a nightgown and a bouquet; and surely only the magic of Mr. Arlen's name could restrain a smile from the face of his auditors at the climax of the first act when Iris's brother (who, by the way, keeps constantly drunk in order to forget the world's lack of purity) says goodby to his sister. Touched by a sudden tenderness he kisses her neck. Then, flinging her from him, "You harlot! . . . God! but I'm thirsty," he cries, and rushes from the room. It is very strong—and a little beyond.

"Arms and the Man" (Guild Theater) is not, to be sure, one of the very best of Shaw's plays, for, an old prejudice of the theater notwithstanding, the best are those which are most thoroughly Shaw rather than those earlier pieces in which somewhat conventional situations are merely touched off with the Shavian philosophy. Yet for all that "Arms and the Man" is a thoroughly amusing play and the Guild is giving it a joyous revival. Alfred Lunt, in particular, has achieved one of the most perfect portraitures of his career, revealing hidden values in the role and making of Captain Bluntschli a richly human figure moving amidst the fantastic puppets who constitute the remainder of the dramatis personae. Lynn Fontanne also is charming, though she is, perhaps, a little too sophisticated for a Bulgarian maid even in a piece not remarkable for its realistic atmosphere and though she nowhere brings so rich an invention to bear upon the interpretation of her rôle. Henry Travers and Lionel Comery also exhibit great comic force, and Stella Larrimore makes a lively part out of Louka, the maid.

"All Dressed Up" (Eltinge Theater), a new farce comedy by Arthur Richman, deals with the effect of a wonderful drug which, secretly administered in cocktails, causes people to throw off the mask of control and to exhibit their real selves. It is ingeniously developed and funny throughout in spite of the fact that it never, unfortunately, escapes the somewhat mechanical air which its scheme entails. "The Jazz Singer" (Fulton Theater) deals with the son of a Jewish cantor who breaks his father's heart by becoming a black-face comedian. It has undoubted elements of popular appeal and some moments of real feeling, but for all the newness of his theme the author has a fatal penchant for the tried and true scenes of conventional melodrama.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THE NEIGHBORHOOD 466 GRAND ST.

Evenings (except Monday) 8:30 sharp
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp

The Grand Street Follies of 1925

Orchestra $2 Balcony $1.50

BAYES Theatre, 44th St., W. of Broadway. LACKAWANNA 6565
EVENINGS, 8:30 MATINEE SATURDAY, 2:30
The Yiddish Art Theatre Players in
Maurice Schwartz Production of
"KING SAUL" A Biblical Drama by Paul Heyse
Complete Synopsis in English with Program

DEBATES ☐ LECTURES

RAND SCHOOL
7 E. 15th Street

V. F. Calverton
"Social Interpretation of American Literature"
Fridays, 8:30 P. M., Sept. 25 to Oct. 30

Joseph M. Osman
"The Psychology of Personality"
Tuesdays, 7 P. M., Sept. 29 to Dec. 22

Marius Hansome
"A Critical Approach to Sociology"
Tuesdays, 8:30 P. M., Sept. 29 to Dec. 22

"WORDS" A Course in Vocabulary Development
Given by David Goodman, M.A. (Principal of the Language-Power English School and the University Preparatory School)
in THE LECTURE ROOM OF THE SCHOOL, 5th Avenue at 115th Street
Sunday Mornings 11 A. M.-1 P. M. First Lesson Sept. 27
FEE: $30 for 24 LESSONS For particulars apply at the office of the school

FREETHINKERS' SOCIETY OF NEW YORK
226 West 58th Street, near B'way. Sunday, Oct. 4th, 3 P. M.
MR. LEONARD D. ABBOTT formerly connected in an editorial capacity with "The Literary Digest" and "Current Opinion" and well known in the intellectual circles of New York, will deliver an address entitled:
"THIRTY YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT"
ADMISSION FREE QUESTIONS
The Freethinkers' Society invites as members all persons interested in an organization devoted to the American principle of a complete separation of Church and State. Membership dues only $2.00 per year.

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL
14th St. and 2d Ave.

			Tickets 50c and 75c Time	Fee
1. The Jew Yesterday and Today	Dr. Joel Blau	Mon. Oct. 5-Nov. 9		$1.50
2. The Labor Temple Chorus	Wm. J. Fadiman	Mon. Oct. 5-May 3		5.00
3. Contemporary Art	Walter Pach	Tues. Oct. 6-Nov. 3		1.50
4. Architecture in New York	Lewis Mumford	Tues. Nov. 10-Dec. 8		1.50
5. Social Theory	Dr. A. A. H. Stone	Tues. Oct. 6-Nov. 17		1.50
6. The Arts of World Dancing	Doris Humphrey	Thurs. Nov. 12-Dec. 10		1.50
7. Modern Fiction	John Cowper Powys	Fri. Oct. 23-Nov. 6		1.00
8. Scandinavian Literature	Hilda Morrison	Fri. Nov. 13-Dec. 11		1.50
9. The Problems of Women	Doris Stevens	Sat. Oct. 10-Nov. 7		1.50
10. The Problems of Race	Dr. [illegible], Dr. Du Bois, [illegible], and Bagnall	Sat. Nov. 21-Dec. 19		1.75
11. Plato, 1400-1925	Dr. Will Durant	Sun. Sch. 27-June 27		5.00
12. A System of Philosophy	Dr. Will Durant	Wed. Sept. 23-June 23		5.00

All courses at 8:30 p. m. except Course 11 (5 p. m.). Single admissions to Courses 11 and 12, 25c.; to Courses 1-9, 35c.; to other courses, 50c. For [illegible] and detailed announcements apply at 239 East 84th Street. Phone Lexington 4760.

In subscribing, please mention The Nation

International Relations Section

The Fight Against Fascismo

By GIOVANNI GIGLIO

AFTER the verdict which discharged for "insufficient evidence of guilt" Senator De Bono, Mussolini's ex-police chief, from the accusation of connivance in the murder of Giacomo Matteotti and other murderous plots against some leaders of the Opposition, two facts most eloquently characterize now the political situation in Italy, namely, the appointment of De Bono as Governor of Tripolitania—the most important of King Victor's colonies—and the deportation of Signor Donati, the accuser of De Bono.

These two facts, apparently, prove that the "constitutional battle" which the Aventine Opposition has been carrying on against the Fascist Government during the past thirteen months has utterly failed. But this failure does not necessarily mean that the Aventine Opposition is defeated. The distinction is not a sophism, for not only is the Aventine Opposition still the greatest bloc of anti-Fascist forces in Italy, but it is most likely to be strengthened, in the near future, by the adhesion of other political forces which it, by means of its uncompromising action, had caused gradually to break away from the Fascist army.

The fact is that the liberal forces headed by the former prime ministers, Giolitti, Orlando, and Salandra, instead of joining the Fascist chorus in proclaiming the defeat of the "Aventine," and instead of mitigating their anti-Fascist attitude after the verdict which, however incompletely and obscurely, acquitted De Bono, are at this moment strongly inclined to come to an agreement, and even to an alliance, with the constitutional elements of the "Aventine," and join forces with them in the anti-Fascist struggle. In fact, after the verdict acquitting De Bono, the annual conference of the Liberal Party adopted unanimously a powerful resolution against Fascismo and the Fascist Government, in which the latter was charged with diminishing the prestige of Italy abroad and leading her to financial and economic ruin.

An alliance of all constitutional parties, to include the Populars (Don Sturzo's party), the Democrats, and, possibly, the United Socialists (Turati's party) on the one hand, and the Combatants and the newly reconstituted Liberal Party, whose leaders are Giolitti (left wing), Orlando (center), and Salandra (right wing) on the other, is the latest proposal from the liberal quarters to the "Aventine," which is really significant after the failure of the "constitutional battle" of the Aventine Opposition. In fact, the proposal shows that loyal supporters of the Italian monarchy and of constitutional government in Italy are perfectly alive to and view with alarm the danger that the failure of the constitutional method in the struggle against Fascismo will, as many signs clearly suggest, thrust the anti-Fascist forces of the country into the sphere of the anti-constitutional parties, the Communists, Republicans, and Maximalist Socialists. As a matter of fact, the failure of the constitutional method hitherto employed in the anti-Fascist struggle by the Opposition has greatly influenced the mind of the Italian middle class and working class in favor of those parties which, like the Republicans and the Maximalist Socialists, have never ceased proclaiming, although unwilling to discontinue their membership of the Aventine bloc, that the latter's confidence in the constitutional loyalty of the King was misplaced, that the Opposition in the Senate was pure moonshine, that nothing but force can compel Fascismo out of power.

During the past three months the United Socialists have lost considerable ground to the Communists and the Maximalist Socialists in the trade unions, not only because they are less active, but apparently because the Italian workers have grown tired and are getting every day more dissatisfied with the cautious and wavering policy of their United Socialist leaders. It is significant that after the last metallurgical strike in Lombardy, Piedmont, Liguria, and Rome, which was abruptly called off, in spite of the splendid fighting spirit of the masses, by the United Socialist leaders of the Metal Workers' Federation, the latter have lost to the Communists the leadership of the Milan Branch and their influence in the shop-committees of the Turin Fiat Works, the most powerful industrial concern in Italy. And there are signs which suggest that the same spirit of revolt is brewing among the textile workers, whose will to fight out their wage dispute with the owners was recently ignored by their United Socialist leaders notwithstanding that the workers had decided by a two-thirds majority for a general strike.

I think it can be safely forecasted that the next phase of the anti-Fascist struggle in Italy will see a strong revival, among the workers and the middle class of Italy, of radicalism and republicanism, as a result of the failure of the constitutional method in the struggle against Fascismo. This failure, as already said, must not be interpreted to mean that the Opposition is defeated. Mussolini has only destroyed the confidence which the constitutional parties of the Opposition placed in the King, whom they believed a loyal guardian of the constitution. This will make the anti-Fascist struggle in Italy more bitter and more dangerous in the future. Even the most moderate elements of the Opposition frankly and openly admit now that Fascismo cannot be beaten by legal means, and that the struggle must be carried on otherwise. It is, however, improbable that the constitutional parties of the Aventine Opposition will accept the proposal of their Republican and Maximalist Socialist allies to extend the front of the anti-Fascist struggle so as to include the Monarchic positions. What seems most likely, on the contrary, is that instead of the present Aventine Opposition bloc there will be two opposition blocs in the near future—namely, an all-inclusive alliance of the constitutional parties and a united labor and republican front. The former will include the Populars, Democrats, Combatants, Liberals, and perhaps also the United Socialists; the latter will include the Republicans, the Maximalist Socialists, and the Communists. The sphere of action of the former group will be the Senate and the Chamber of Deputies, and the defense of the constitution will be their platform, while the Republicans, Maximalist Socialists, and Communists will intensify and carry on their struggle without Parliament.

But the most decisive factor in this anti-Fascist struggle will certainly be the economic and financial factor. If Mussolini weathers the present financial crisis in Italy the problem of how to beat him will become more difficult for his enemies to solve.

De Bono and His Accusers

ON March 18 we published in the International Relations Section a manifesto issued by the Aventine Opposition, charging that "the group of culprits which was responsible for violence and death in the crimes most talked of today was centered very high up, close to the Government itself, and its leaders were among those who divided the daily bread 'salted with power,' and among the great electors of the parliamentary majority."

On June 27 Senator De Bono, Director General of Public Safety, was cleared by the Senate, acting as High Court of Justice, of many charges, including participation in the attack on Deputy Amendola; favoritism in the attack on Hon. Misuri; favoritism in the crime against Deputy Matteotti; prevention of the arrest of the assailants of Cesare Forni and participation in the seizure of documents relating to the crime; and membership in a criminal association known by the name of "Cheka," to which numerous crimes against persons have been ascribed. After which Senator De Bono was made Governor of Tripoli. His acquittal created a furore throughout Italy, and the Executive Committee of the Aventine Opposition at once drew up a second manifesto setting forth in detail evidence which the court had either thrown out or ignored.

With regard to the attack on Amendola it states (Corriere della Sera, July 16) that > the High Court ignored the written confession of Ludovico Perrone, maniple chief in the militia (who led the attack), arguing that no trace of Perrone could be found and that Amendola himself (who had been attacked from behind) had not recognized Perrone's features in a photograph which had been shown him. And when the elder Vagliasindi had assisted in obtaining the written confession from Perrone, as well as another document confirming it (the Narbona letter), the court declared that Vagliasindi had merely had copies of these documents, and had not been able to say anything concerning the truth of their contents.

>
> Well enough: here is the testimony of Vagliasindi (examined before the presiding judge of the Milan Court of Appeal: Vol. I, Section 147): "The documents mentioned in the request just read to me were confiscated in the search made at my home in Gardone Riviera the night of December 30, 1924. . . .
>
> "I vouch for the authenticity and truth of these documents here as I did before the chief of police at Brescia, and I assume full and absolute responsibility for them. [illegible] waiting to produce them until I am convinced that justice will take its regular course and that the reprisals to which I have so long been subject exclusively for the above reasons will be stopped."
>
> But the examiners never ordered Vagliasindi to produce the original documents, notwithstanding the fact that he [illegible] would seem proper for the High Court to demand all the documents which were seized from me, because it can find other interesting things in them aside from those connected with the present examination." . . .
>
> The main part of the letter (Vagliasindi's confession) is as follows: "About the 20th of the month of December I was asked by Consul Candelori Mario, commander of the 112th Legion of the M. V. S. N. (Fascist militia), to which I also belonged in the capacity of maniple chief, if I would take part in a punitive expedition against a person who by his actions was opposing and interfering with the work of the National Government, blocking its favorable development. When I replied in the affirmative, pledging myself to this task, I was informed that the person in question was Hon. Amendola, who was to be beaten up.
>
> "I was impressed when the name of Hon. Amendola was given, but I was assured that His Excellency Mussolini also wished this to be done. Conversations followed with His Excellency General De Bono, who gave explicit orders that Hon. Amendola should only be beaten, and that even if he defended himself and fired at us, we should in no case fire at him, even at the cost of our lives." . . .

After describing the attempts that failed, the confession continues:

> "Then we decided to act, at the risk of being killed by him or arrested by others, which we did, on the morning of December 26, as reported in the papers, which, except for minor inaccuracies, gave the story exactly as it happened.
>
> "After this the conversations with His Excellency Hon. De Bono were continued, and the police were furnished by Consul Candelori and myself with clues expressly contrived to sidetrack the authorities in such a way as to give the appearance of interest and speed on their part in running down the guilty ones. In this way the thing was kept dark, and the investigation was closed for lack of evidence."
>
> After which (and in spite of the fact that it was confirmed by the testimony of Narbona on April 28, 1925) the High Court passed over altogether the fact that Cesare Rossi, in a tragic interview with De Bono on June 12, 1924, attacked the latter in the manner recounted before the High Court (Vol. II, Section 175 retro). "I confirm the statement made to General De Bono: 'The attack on Hon. Amendola was organized by you at the order of the President.'"
>
> Upon being further questioned, he replied: "The Amendola attack was organized by Hon. De Bono under orders from the President; but I do not know who carried them out. I am under the impression that it was done by Roman Fascist elements or members of the militia." . . .
>
> When Hon. Misuri was savagely beaten for a speech made in the Chamber a few hours before, the assailants were identified at once. The leader, named Bonaccorsi, member of the militia, then confessed. . . . Favoritism toward this man was one of the charges against Senator De Bono. The court acquitted him for lack of evidence, but charged him with having had Bonaccorsi imprisoned in Fort Osoppo June 5, when the court had ordered him to be sent there June 1; and with having permitted Bonaccorsi to leave Fort Oneglia [illegible] revoked.
>
> Some [illegible] are also brought to light in connection with the [illegible] murder by the testimony of Dumini. For instance:
>
> During his isolation Dumini wrote two letters to Finzi, in the first of which he says: "I see that I have been abandoned by everyone, and especially by those for whom I have sacrificed everything. So I shall defend myself, and I shall accuse if the occasion arises. . . . His Excellency De Bono made a statement in court which was not only false but very serious. He declared that I had confessed to him, not as to the Director General of Public Safety but as to a Fascist, that I had participated in the attack on the Socialist Deputy. Now, aside from the vile betrayal that he would have made in using a statement made as Fascist to Fascist, I declare that De Bono's statement is false, because, knowing the antipathy he has for me and Rossi, I should certainly not have made any statement to him concerning my participation in the attack, even if I had taken part in it." . . .

From the examination before the High Court we learn that Dumini, after facing one of the first cross-questionings (in which he denied everything), added spontaneously: "Not only did I not make admissions of any kind regarding my participation in the act, but in the conversation with De Bono I now add that, before leaving me that night, he said these exact words: 'If you know anything, deny, deny. I want to save Fascism.'" . . . .

As for the Forni assault, it will suffice to recall that Cesare Rossi himself was accused of organizing it—and he did not defend himself—and that authorization was requested to proceed against Hon. Giunta (at that time secretary of the Fascist Party). This request was not granted. The official who requested it was punished: perhaps because he had not hesitated to report, with the request for authorization to proceed, that Cesare Rossi—when he was confessing the part he himself had had in organizing the crime—had said that he had become involved in the affair "after a brief talk with His Excellency the President of the Cabinet, who had expressed his wish that the party should prevent the penetration of Forni's dissensionism, especially in Milan." (Parliamentary Records: XXVII Legislature, No. 274.) And Forni was attacked as soon as he reached Milan. . . .

The court acquitted De Bono of the charge of "participation" (in the Cheka), but did not deny the existence of the Cheka. . . .

In the statement signed and sworn to by Senator De Bono in his own defense, we read that . . . "Marinelli declared that when he learned from Rossi of the President's proposal to get rid of Matteotti, he had been deeply impressed, and therefore, on Thursday of the following week, he had gone to His Excellency Mussolini to ask him if he considered it advisable to establish a kind of 'Cheka' to keep an eye on the opponents and hold them in check, with Dumini at the head. The President, according to Marinelli's statement, consented.

"After such a declaration I felt it advisable to keep silent. Later, I telephoned to the President, to whom I merely said: 'They are turning against you.' Hon. Mussolini, indignant, exclaimed, 'The cowards, they are trying to get back at me.'"

Rossi and Marinelli denied the truth of this account. But it was repeated even more exactly by Hon. Finzi in a testimonial examination reported by the examiners to the High Court. . . . "Marinelli, wishing to rouse them (De Bono and Finzi) out of their stupor, explicitly said that [illegible] was right, because ten days or so before they had been severely rebuked by the President of the Cabinet, and concerted them in violent terms, and said that the party had no political sense, and that after emerging victorious from a revolution and being in power, it was absurd that all the Opposition leaders were able to go about unhampered and carry on their work of defamation and abuse of all [illegible] in the party and the Government, and that the [illegible] with which the Opposition leaders had violently begun the battle in the first sessions of the Chamber showed a decadence in the fighting power of the Fascist Party and a renewal of the activities of its opponents which must somehow be broken up.

"Marinelli added that because of these reproofs of the President he proposed to form at once and finance with party funds a small secret body for acts of violence, at the head of which he proposed to put Dumini, and the President accepted." . . .

HOFFMANN SCHOOL for Individual Development

Libby Castle
Fort Washington Ave.
at 193d Street
New York City

DAY AND BOARDING SCHOOL

Children 4-12 Years

School Bus

New Home of Hoffmann School

DUTTON'S NEW NOVELS

THE ISLES OF WISDOM
By ALEXANDER MOSZKOWSKI
A voyage among undiscovered isles where the theories of wise men of all ages are found in action. The running comments of the moderns who visit them are brilliant bits of satire. $3.00

THE OUTCAST
By LUIGI PIRANDELLO, Author of "The Late Mattia Pascal," etc. A penetrating analysis of the false moralities of a small Italian town. $2.50

Send for our Fall List of books for the discriminating.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Avenue, New York

FACTS ARE SACRED
BUT COMMENT FREE

The Manchester Guardian
WEEKLY

[illegible] without suppression or [illegible] broad-minded outlook on all vital matters.

[illegible] The Manchester Guardian Weekly
[illegible]
New York City

[illegible] MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY, to be mailed to me direct from Manchester, England

Name . . .

Address

Many further references to this "Cheka" are given, among them that of Rossi, > who told the examiners of the High Court that before the Matteotti crime "the organization of a squadron of faithful ones had been decided upon by the old Directorate and sanctioned by the Dux of Fascism, who knew also that Dumini was a member of it," although at that time its organization was not fully completed. But Rossi himself explained that he advised going slow "in arresting elements which had been used on various occasions at the suggestion of the Dux," especially since "Dumini had been named by the President and accepted as one of the principal members of that organization, which, as De Bono and Finzi knew, was being formed for the defense of the party." . . .

The document closes with the words: "If, after this accusation, the answer comes once again in an excess of violence, which is merely a subterfuge, the Opposition groups, knowing they have done their task, will from now on rely upon the final judgment of the country."

Contributors to This Issue

ZONA GALE is the author of "Miss Lulu Bett," and other plays and novels. She is a regent of the University of Wisconsin.

BENJAMIN STOLBERG is a writer on labor subjects. He wrote two articles on Third Party Chances for The Nation in April, 1924.

GENEVIEVE TAGGARD, author of "For Eager Lovers" and "From a Hawaiian Hilltop," was one of the contributors of the Masses and the Liberator, from whose verse she has now compiled a volume.

HARRY ELMER BARNES is professor of historical sociology at Smith College.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN is an essayist in American literature, living at Salem, Massachusetts.

BENJAMIN HARROW is a New York physician and professor of biochemistry at Columbia University.

ERNEST GRUENING, formerly managing editor of The Nation, is now in Mexico.

GIOVANNI GIGLIO, correspondent of the London Daily Herald, was expelled from Rome by Mussolini in the spring of 1924, and now writes from Chiasso on the Italo-Swiss border.

The Nation for October 14 will be the Fall Book Number

and will contain an article on James Joyce by Edwin Muir, Ludwig Lewisohn's chapter in the series on whether an artist can function freely in America, and articles, verse, and reviews by Harold J. Laski, Henry W. Nevinson, Genevieve Taggard, Lola Ridge, M. T. McClure, Samuel C. Chew, James Rorty, Anna Louise Strong, H. L. Mencken, and others.

The New School
for Social Research

School Year begins October 5
Registration begins September 28

AMERICAN WRITERS

DR. JOSEPH W. KRUTCH of The Nation has organized for the New School a course of twelve lectures by distinguished American writers. Among those who will give lectures or readings are SHERWOOD ANDERSON, ZONA GALE, CARL VAN DOREN, EDGAR LEE MASTERS, and ELINOR WYLIE.

EVOLUTION OF MAN

DR. GEORGE A. DORSEY, formerly Curator of Anthropology in the Field Museum and Professor of Comparative Anatomy in Northwestern University, offers a course of 18 lectures, dealing with the evolution of man in its physical, intellectual, and cultural aspects. Thursday evenings at 8:20, beginning October 8.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT IN THE NATIONAL LIFE

DR. LEO WOLMAN of the New School. A critical and constructive analysis of the present condition of American organized labor, its problems and policies. Monday evenings at 8:20, beginning October 5.

These are specimen courses in a rich and varied program for the fall term, 1925-26.

Write for catalogue.

465 West 23d Street, New York City

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1925 No. 3144

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 369
EDITORIALS:
The Failure of Prohibition 372
Twin Military Evils 373
'Twixt Wood and Water 373
The Third Poet 374
SEVEN YEARS AFTER: A LETTER AND ITS ANSWER. By Dabney Horton 375
THE ADVENTURERS' WAR IN MOROCCO. By M. M. Knight 376
THE MENACE OF BRITISH EMPIRE. By Shapurji Saklatvala 378
THE MAN WHOM COOLIDGE FEARS. By Rennie Smith 379
POINCARÉ'S GUILT IN THE WAR. By Harry Elmer Barnes 380
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 384
CORRESPONDENCE 385
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Ironies. By Wyman Sidney Smith 387
The Lineage of Printing. By Nelson Antrim Crawford 387
A Great Physician. By Herrmann Blumgart 387
The Long Journey. By Joseph Wood Krutch 388
Talking of Taxes. By Henry Raymond Mussey 389
Circumstance and Character. By Alice Beal Parsons 390
Books in Brief 390
Drama: Second Flight. By Joseph Wood Krutch 390
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
British Labor and the Empire. By L. Haden Guest 392

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

JUST AS THE FRENCH DEBT COMMISSION was reaching Washington Governor Blaine of Wisconsin sent an emphatic telegram to President Coolidge asking that as a prerequisite to any financial settlement the President demand the ending of the wicked war in Morocco. All honor to Governor Blaine! We shall never be able to understand why American sympathy does not flow out to the gallant tribesmen who are holding their own in defense of their homes and their fields against two rapacious European Powers. Their war is as much a war of liberation as was our war of independence. They are manly people who were being deliberately shoved by the French out of their chief granary. They are now facing famine, but despite grandiose reports they have, with 18,000 men against 200,000, kept the French at bay, and they have permitted the Spaniards to move only a short distance from the new joint base at Alhucemas. Meanwhile all the Moslem world is watching the struggle which will have its repercussions from Gibraltar to Shanghai. The participation of American fliers helps to stamp us with the guilt of the French. It will be another indictment of the Western Powers when the inevitable day comes on which the Moslems will throw off the yoke of Europe.

HISTORY MOVES MORE SLOWLY in France than elsewhere. The outstanding figures of French politics fifteen years ago were Briand, Caillaux, and Poincaré. In 1925 they are still Caillaux, Briand, and Poincaré. Meanwhile Poincaré has served a term as Prime Minister, cemented the Franco-Russian alliance, retired to the comparative obscurity of the Presidency to watch his war, returned to the premiership to startle Europe with the invasion of the Ruhr, and retired again to await a new hour for trouble. Briand has steadfastly played his shifting role, slipping into power now with the Left and now with the Right. And Caillaux has played alone. Even when Prime Minister he negotiated with Germany alone, over the head of his Foreign Minister. During the war—after his wife's shooting of Calmette had thrown him into temporary retirement—he thought and worked alone for a "white peace." It was his loneliness which made it possible for Clemenceau, at the height of hate and power, to force an unwilling Senate to condemn Caillaux for indirect communication with the enemy. And today, though Caillaux holds the Ministry of Finance under Painlevé, he still acts alone. His success or failure will reflect credit or blame upon him alone. It is an extraordinary thing that the man called traitor in war time should today be France's chosen spokesman to the New World. Yet it is even more extraordinary that the alternatives to Caillaux are men who were old hands in politics when Baldwin and MacDonald were still unknown names.

THE ASSEMBLY of the League of Nations has met, talked, and adjourned. The ardent Geneva correspondent of the New York Times thus summarizes its session:

> The Sixth Assembly of the League of Nations ended its work today with three important accomplishments to its credit. First, it has brought about an agreement on the conditions under which a disarmament conference can be held and has ordered technical preparation to be made for such a conference. Second, it has agreed that a conference to study the economic maladies of the world which might lead to war should be held, and has ordered the Council to make an essential study for such a conference. Third, it has ordered commencement of the preliminary work essential to a conference for the control of the private manufacture of arms.

Which, translated into plain American, means that the League, first, gave up the idea of doing anything about disarmament now; second, decided for the present to do nothing about M. Loucheur's idea of working out a program for rationing the world in raw materials; and third, postponed action indefinitely toward controlling the international arms traffic. In still other words, it did nothing. This, the correspondent of the Times continues, "marks an important stride toward international understanding and good feeling."

ENGLAND, AS A MATTER OF FACT, was largely responsible for this negative record of the League. The British delegates opposed a conference on the arms traffic, opposed M. Loucheur's world rationing scheme, and were lukewarm about disarmament. The French were still more opposed to a disarmament conference prior to agreement upon a "security pact" including military guaranties; they still believe in wars to end war. The whole performance, however, is and must remain a hollow sham until the League includes Turkey, Germany, and Soviet Russia in its ranks. What is a security pact worth which leaves Russia out of consideration? It would only make of the League an open alliance against Russia—and, to be sure, it has often enough acted as such. Until the passions born of war and revolution are sufficiently stilled to admit the great Powers of Eastern Europe into equal partnership, Geneva must continue to be a pompous stage drop, behind which France and England pull the controlling wires.

TO THE DELEGATES to the Interparliamentary Union, holding its twenty-third meeting in Washington, The Nation extends its welcome. They represent a fruitful endeavor to bring together the lawmakers of the nations—fruitful not because previous meetings have achieved concrete results, but because they have established a tradition of unofficial international friendship. These delegates are not, like those who confer in the League of Nations, appointed by governments to represent an official point of view. Any member of any party is welcome. In that provision for the expression of minority opinion this pre-war organization—nearly forty years old now—represents an advance beyond the Geneva organization. Its tradition of freedom for all shades of opinion represented in any parliament is, of course, broken by the American exclusion of Shapurji Saklatvala because he is a Communist. The discussions of the union have value precisely because they have permitted opposition as well as government spokesmen to meet foreign legislators, and we hope the delegates will find an opportunity to let our Government know what liberal Europe thinks of our so-called freedom.

THE SALVATION OF THE REPUBLIC is at hand and honest Americans may sleep soundly in their beds without fear of the bomb-throwing, job-snatching, whiskery, and unassimilable foreigner. Immigration figures for the past year show a drop of 68 per cent over 1923-24. While in the latter year there was a net gain of 630,107 aliens, the most recent report for the year ending June 30, 1925, reports a net gain of only 201,586. A number of countries did not fill the quotas allotted to them by our immigration laws: Czecho-Slovakia fell 17 per cent short of its allowance; Germany, 11 per cent; Great Britain, where live white Nordics almost as good as our American brand, 12½ per cent; Italy, 10 per cent; and Sweden, 6 per cent. More significant still, 27,151 Italians returned to Italy as against 6,203 who came to America. Other nationalities show similar increases in emigration from America, and in general they are South-European countries from which in former years the tide of immigration to this country has been heavy. What can be the trouble with the land of the free and the refuge of the oppressed? Can it be that our attempts at Americanization are not favorably received? Can it be that our attacks on foreigners are noted by the victims themselves? If next year's figures show a similar falling-off, our immigration will be somewhat less than nothing. What will happen then? Will superior white Nordics have to go to work in the steel mills, will they become intensive farmers in New England, will they take to the pick and shovel and other tasks now thought suitable only for hunkies? Perish the thought. It is all very well to save the country, but not at such a price.

HOW HAPPY THESE DAYS for Big Business! The Government, after spending months of time and much money to investigate the merger of two of the great packing concerns, has suddenly quashed the whole proceeding and announced that the amalgamation is quite legal. At the same time the Administration is openly letting it be known that it wishes the Interstate Commerce Commission to hurry up and approve the Van Sweringen railroad merger so that other roads can hasten the process of coming together. It is going to work for repeal of the income-tax publicity clause and to insist upon reducing the taxes of the very rich, which means many of those particularly allied to the large corporations. It wants to sell several government steamship lines to private corporations, and it has appointed, according to the daily press, one of the counsel for the Steel Trust to our embassy in Tokio, in succession to the late Edgar A. Bancroft. But there is one fly in the ointment. The Federal Trade Commission has dared to charge the Aluminum Company of America, of which the esteemed Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, is chief proprietor and backer, with being a monopoly and a violator of the Clayton Anti-Trust Act. This the company promptly denies. What an unfortunate lapse of taste for the Federal Trade Commission! Doubtless the President will ask for somebody's resignation. The commission is there, Mr. Coolidge has explained, not to hamper big business, but to aid it.

THE GOVERNMENT OF NICARAGUA is showing a new spirit of independence and self-assertion which promises to give it greater respect in this country and more stability at home. This was exhibited at a luncheon given to the Nicaraguan delegates to the conference of the Interparliamentary Union by Toribio Tijerino, Consul General in New York City. The delegates, including members of both major political parties, joined the Consul General in assuring representatives of the press that the long stay of our marines in Nicaragua had been unjustified and undesired by the people and that their departure last summer had been the occasion for general rejoicing—so much so, indeed, that the date of the going of the troops, August 3, had been set aside as a regular national holiday. Mr. Tijerino added that the recent dispatch of United States naval vessels to Nicaragua was unnecessary and had not been requested by his government. With her railways and her national bank once more in her own hands, Nicaragua seems to be on the way to better days. What is most needed now from the standpoint of more satisfactory relations with the United States is an adequate and impartial news service giving us the truth about affairs in Nicaragua. According to Mr. Tijerino, the present correspondents of the Associated Press in Nicaragua are the High Commissioner and the Collector of Customs, both of whom are minions of our Department of State and of the foreign bankers to whom the republic still owes money.

FIFTY YEARS AGO there were incarcerated in British prisons 10,000 persons serving sentences of penal servitude and 20,000 convicted of lesser crimes; at present, there are 1,600 of the former and 8,000 of the latter class, with 1,100 juvenile offenders in addition. This marks an extraordinary decrease in the criminal population during a period in which the population at large was increasing something like 60 per cent. The number of prison institutions has diminished correspondingly from 13 penal-servitude centers in 1875 and 113 local prisons to 4 penal centers and 31 local prisons. The Home Secretary attributes this enviable record to several causes: better and more widespread education, an improved standard of living, the parole system, and a more enlightened treatment of prisoners during their incarceration. We in the United States, who have a very different series of figures to contemplate, have bettered our living standards, have extended our educational system, and have in some cases at least improved vastly our prisons and the treatment of prisoners. And still crime in the United States is on the increase and on January 1, 1923, there were in federal penitentiaries, State prisons, county and city jails and the like 108,939 persons, a percentage of the population three times as high as England's prison class. It is time that we began a scientific investigation of crime in the United States, that we took a look into our prisons themselves and into the conditions outside them which keep them full; the "bandit," the second-story man, the murderer, the "con" man, the get-rich-quick real-estate dealers, the lady adventuress—each can be explained by something in our national life. It is for us to discover what, and to start changing it.

SELDOM HAVE WE SEEN a more black-and-white exhibition of the idiocy and waste of our present industrial organization than the agreement among a majority of the wholesale flower dealers of New York City not to handle any outdoor-grown blossoms, chrysanthemums excepted, after October 1. As a rule field-grown flowers arrive in the city in abundance up to November 1, and the action of the wholesalers is expected to cut off asters, dahlias, and other low-priced outdoor flowers which bring to townspeople some of the gorgeous color of autumn in the country. The action of the wholesalers is frankly admitted to be in the interest of the owners of greenhouses. So that the profits of the latter on their investments may be larger the public is to be compelled either to go without flowers or to buy hot-house products at high rates. Probably the action of the wholesale flower dealers is in violation of both the State and the national anti-monopoly laws, but there is no prospect of any legal action in time to be effective. Meanwhile the agreement stands as a fine instance of the greed, incompetence, and tyranny of modern business.

THE ACTION of the wholesale florists is especially deplorable because already there is perhaps no city in the world where flowers are as scarce and as dear as in New York. Except at Easter time there are almost no flowers sold by sidewalk or pushcart vendors, and the regular shops do not sell wild blossoms at any season of the year. The prices charged make flowers an impossible luxury to the average New Yorker, who has to die in order to be surrounded with that kind of beauty. In many other American and in most European cities flowers are sold so generally and cheaply as to be within the reach of all. The long, gray London winter is brightened by blossoms for every month, while Paris has half a dozen markets given over exclusively to the sale of flowers, whence they find their way into every street. During the war there was a terrible hullabaloo in Paris because the street sellers tried to raise the price of a sprig of lily of the valley—which everybody wears on May Day—from two to four cents. The vendors had to capitulate. Unhappily New York City has no such spirit. "Say it with flowers," urge the dealers, but if anybody tries to it costs him $5 a dozen.

"MR. ZERO" has seldom done the vagrant and the unemployed a better service than he recently did them through the mere process of defining the terms by which they are popularly known. Among themselves they employ dozens of picturesque designations which would be unintelligible to the layman in his living-room. Laymen seem forever to be confined to three words: hobo, tramp, and bum. And these three words, say Mr. Zero and the International Welfare Association over whose meetings he presides, are sadly confused with one another in current speech. The standard dictionaries, even, are helpless before the task of differentiation. The "Century" dismisses a hobo as "a tramp" merely, remarking that the origin of his title is obscure. Mr. Zero insists that the difference between the hobo and the tramp is that while the first is a traveling worker the second is a traveling shirker. This, if not exactly in line with normal usage, is neat—and may go back to the original meaning of "hobo," which all dictionaries agree comes out of Western America. Upon the bum Mr. Zero is if anything too easy, for he lets him go as "a stationary shirker." The layman is nearer the historical truth when he prefixes the inevitable adjective "drunken." The word "bum" is a very old one, and one of its meanings—as a verb—is "to guzzle." The "New English Dictionary" traces it back to the year 1387 but says it is "not in polite use." The "Century" is more eloquent when it defines the bearer of the name as "a drunken loafer; one who leads an idle, dissolute life." At any rate few would quarrel with Mr. Zero's determination to remove the bum to a bad eminence; though it will be difficult for him to establish the existence of a very wide gulf between the hobo and the tramp.

THE DEATH OF ADA LEWIS, one of the best character actresses the American stage has produced, recalls anew the happy days when Harrigan and Hart were presenting their remarkable pictures of New York life—"The Mulligan Guards," "Reilly and the Four Hundred," "The Last of the Hogans," and all the rest of that admirable series of plays which in their artistry, their fidelity to life, and their incidental songs won the unstinted praise of the discerning. With Harrigan and Hart Ada Lewis for years portrayed the tough girl of the East Side with a skill that no one ever surpassed. When the end of that partnership came so prematurely Miss Lewis went to other fields—even to light opera—and always with success, in large part because of her training with the two men who better than any other actors understood and loved the life of a New York which has long since passed. It was the Manhattan of the Irish and the Germans, a handful of Jews, and not many colored people. But it had its songs, and its several quarters had their individual existences. To live in Yorkville or Harlem then meant taking a pride in those sections which few feel today. The Nation has long hoped that some day these notable plays might be revived in the metropolis, but with the passing of years, the loss of nearly all the old company, and the vast change in the metropolis itself, it becomes more and more doubtful whether the public would appreciate or understand these pictures of a past life and whether artists like Harrigan and Hart and Ada Lewis could be found to play in them.

The Failure of Prohibition

PROHIBITION—so far—has failed: it has reduced drinking, but it has increased lawlessness. That is the conclusion, already firmly fixed in the popular mind, which is confirmed by the advocates of prohibition themselves—in a report upon The Prohibition Situation published by the research department of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

With a singularly honest mind the Rev. F. Ernest Johnson has examined the statistics compiled to prove the failure or success of prohibition, and other data, and his conclusions are as convincing as any summary of so enormous a situation can well be. He finds that prohibition has been most effective in the working class; social workers are almost unanimous in seeing an improvement in working-class homes, but they also agree that there is more drinking among young people today than before the law was passed, and a far laxer attitude toward law enforcement. Prohibition reached its peak of effectiveness about 1920, and has been becoming slacker ever since—unless possibly the new attitude of Treasury officials is today effecting a slight turn for the better. Studies of crime, of hospital records, of death-rates from alcoholic diseases agree in revealing this backward trend. Records of savings deposits throw no useful light on the question; nor, on the other hand, does the size of the California grape crop indicate as vast an increase in wine-making as cynical anti-prohibitionists assert. The evil today lies primarily in bootleg whiskey, not in red wine, or home brew, or even in the scandalously increased consumption of "sacramental wine."

Business men are almost unanimous against the law—rather because of personal prejudice, Mr. Johnson believes, than because of reasonable study of the situation. Working-class sentiment is also strongly against it. The young people drink more than they used to—which he thinks part of a general loose tendency in which the automobile plays a larger role than the hip flask. One student in a conservative denominational college earned his way by bootlegging. "Certainly," the sage comment occurs, "the non-observance of the law by parents has a rather tragic effect on boys and girls." The government has been lax in enforcement, but Mr. Johnson—rightly, we believe—finds the major difficulty not in the weakness of officialdom but in the uncertainty of public opinion. Prohibition is a regime, he says, "at variance with the habits of the community, in the violation or evasion of which a very substantial part of the population is directly interested. . . . If infractions of the law incident to the retail traffic in liquor should continue on the present scale nothing but a sweeping change in public opinion can prevent the effectual nullification of the National Prohibition Act." And finally he declares:

> The crisis that has developed in the enforcement of prohibition calls for a frank facing of facts and a new assumption of responsibility. The federal government has announced a right-about-face in its enforcement policy. That is the government's task. It is not its task to change the minds of the people. Religion and education must do that.

There, we believe, Mr. Johnson puts his honest thumb upon the nub of the question. There is a vast improvement possible in law enforcement; but there is even more to be done in convincing people—rich men, poor men, judges, diners-out—that the law is worth enforcing. Prohibition will remain a failure if a great section—even if it be a minority—of the people does not want it. Bullying is not a convincing argument. The fact that the law is on the statute books, even were it better enforced, would not be enough. The anti-prohibitionists are lawbreakers, but they are not a criminal class. They are a substantial body of citizens who believe that an unrighteous law has been "put over," and who see no wrong in the drinking which the act seeks to stop. The task of education which culminated in the enactment of the Prohibition Amendment has never been completed.

The old prohibitionists have talked much of the new generation. "Yes," they have admitted, "the old drinkers still get their booze; but a new, drinkless generation is growing up which has never known the saloon and will not hunt out bootleggers." As this report shows, that is a dangerous and false complacency. The young people are drinking; a new generation is growing up with even less respect for the law than its parents had. And that is a condition which, unless remedied, means the breakdown of government.

Prohibition was not "put over" upon an unwilling people, but it received its large majorities in the hectic fervor of war time, and it is probable that it would receive no such sweeping indorsement today. The Nation is among those who believe that a considerable majority of the American people favored prohibition and still favor it; but it emphatically disagrees with those who regard disagreement with the law as a lesser form of treason. They are within their rights in agitating against it, and the arrogant attitude of the prohibitionists has powerfully aided their opponents. They are within their rights again in demanding a national plebiscite upon the question, and we believe that such a referendum would clear the air. In the long run, however, the question is not to be settled even by repeated counts of noses. A majority may well be wrong; if it is sure of its rights it will welcome discussion of its issue, meet facts with facts and argument with argument, and consider its duty incomplete until it has not only defeated the minority at the polls but convinced a substantial part of it as well.

And there we come back to Mr. Johnson's campaign of education. "The fundamental fact," he says, "is that a large part of our people are unconvinced with reference to the liquor traffic. The trouble is with the people more than with their government." That is why prohibition is failing—because the prohibitionists have concentrated their battle upon law enforcement, assuming that their task with the people had been completed by the Volstead Act. The government should give such support to the law as to prove finally whether prohibition can prohibit; the prohibitionists should return to their old task of proving that prohibition should prohibit. Mr. Johnson's pamphlet (which can be obtained at 105 East 22d Street, New York City, for 25 cents) should end a deal of ranting, obfuscating argument, but a long, long task of public education and discussion lies ahead.

Twin Military Evils

PRECISELY as was to have been expected, the Secretary of the Navy, the Acting Secretary of War, the leading generals and admirals who have testified before the Air Inquiry Board appointed by President Coolidge have expressed complete satisfaction with the present organization of their forces and have declared that nothing whatever was wrong beyond the fact that Congress was not giving them enough money. Thus it is more than ever apparent that if there are to be any changes they can only be brought about by outside pressure. Both the army and navy are plainly going to "pass the buck" to Congress, their favorite occupation, and to insist that if only more millions were given to them everything would be well. Their personnel and equipment are, they say, superb—the Air Board was actually told that America led the world in flying, although every sane student of the problem knows otherwise. And the complacency of Secretary Wilbur hardly seems shattered when now, on top of airplane, dirigible, and submarine disasters, we learn that he falsified the record, that Commander Lansdowne was opposed to the Shenandoah's last trip, and that the acting chief of naval operations, R. H. Jackson, on August 12 last overruled his recommendation in the following remarkable letter:

> Your recommendation to make the flight the second week in September has not been approved. By starting on September 2 the Shenandoah would fly over State fairs as follows: Columbus, Sept. 3; Des Moines, Sept. 4; Minneapolis, Sept. 4; Milwaukee, Sept. 5; Detroit, Sept. 5. This includes all the State fairs except that at Indianapolis.

This proves beyond question the charge of politics made by Mrs. Lansdowne in her first outburst of grief, which she subsequently modified under official pressure. What has naval flying to do with State fairs?

Politics and conservatism—these are twin evils of the military and naval services, and they have been so in Great Britain and the United States from the beginning of military history. Let us take some historic facts about the navy. Was the Monitor actually a government vessel when she steamed to Hampton Roads? She was not. Despite the fact that it was known in Washington that the Confederates were armor-plating ships, the Monitor had to be forced upon the Navy Department and had actually not been definitely accepted when she stopped the victorious career of the Merrimack. Throughout the war the heaviest fighting thereafter was done by the Monitor, but when the war was over the Navy Department discarded this remarkable invention chiefly because of the lack of modern ventilating equipment and the fact that there was little deck space available in a sea way and none on which to parade the marine guard. When the war was over it sold to foreign countries its most modern monitors, forgot all about the Confederate invention of the submarine, did not bother further with torpedoes or mines, and let twenty-five years go by before really beginning to experiment with any of these instruments. Yet in the World War the Allies were compelled to build monitors. We invented the submarine sixty years ago and the modern submarine, too, but this boat was taken up and developed in England and Germany far in advance of any action by us. In 1915 the head of the submarine division of the Navy Department appeared before the House Naval Committee and demanded larger submarines on the ground that the Germans had them. On cross-examination it appeared that the only knowledge of these submarines in the possession of the Navy Department was the testimony of an American boy who had served briefly on one. We invented the airplane, but in its uses we have been far outstripped by the European Powers.

As for the inevitable demand for larger appropriations, that is of course the invariable outcome of every maneuver and every inquiry and every other happening affecting either army or navy. Yet there is hardly a business organization in the world as loosely or as uneconomically managed as is the army. Here are two concrete examples. Since the removal of the troops who were the custodians of the Yellowstone National Park the present admirable civilian management has saved hundreds of thousands of dollars in expenses besides giving far greater efficiency. Take the case of Colonel Mitchell. He gave his final provocative statement to the press and announced that he knew it would lead to his court martial. There was no mystery about it; he openly said that he was going to give the interview and then gave it. The War Department could not be satisfied with that. It could not send him a wire; it could not even ask the general commanding at San Antonio, nor the lieutenant colonel and assistant inspector general on duty there to inquire of Colonel Mitchell whether he was correctly quoted. It had to send a colonel and an assistant inspector general all the way from Washington to San Antonio and return to find out officially what every man knew—at a cost of hundreds of dollars for railway fares and subsistence! There you have the evil at its worst, and that is why the presumption of being in the right is always on the side of men who finally kick over the traces and insist upon "starting something."

'Twixt Wood and Water

TWENTY years ago there was no such thing as fancy diving. There were stunts only. To be sure one tried for a reasonably symmetrical standing front dive, but all other configurations were somersaults which ended in a grand splash, front and back sittings on the board, leapings, jumpings, with arms and legs spread to the four winds; dares and the taking of dares. There were probably not a dozen well-articulated spring-boards in the country. As why should there be? Any old plank that protruded over eight feet of water was good enough for the convulsions of the era.

Then came Annette Kellerman. With her canvas tank on the vaudeville-circuit stage, and her board that was a board, she made the youngsters' eyes pop from their heads and set many a swimming coach—already upset with this strange new stroke, the crawl—to dreaming. As diving goes today, Annette's repertoire was limited and still burdened with vestiges of stunts—as in her "standing, sitting, standing" dive. But who can forget the lithe grace of that superb body as it turned like a leaping salmon in the "half twist"? Stunts, yes, but also, and almost for the first time, beauty—authentic and challenging. Heaven knows how many youths and maidens retired to their chosen swimming holes, and on boards decrepit and stubborn tried for the first time to get some lilt, some form into that second and a fraction between wood and water.

Ever since, the soul of Annette has gone marching on. At pool after pool, the crazy flopping stunts give way to coordination and an aspiration for grace and form. As the body cleaves the air, one watches for entirely different sorts of things than one watched for a generation ago. In 1900 it was: Will he get in without landing flat on his back? Bravo! He did. In 1925 it is: Not enough arch, the toes are not pointed, but the line of the head is good.

Perhaps in competitive diving some of the earlier joyousness has been squeezed out in the grip of a relentless ritual. There is beauty in plenty, but it is all so terribly serious. Judges now score for five distinct parts of every running dive: (1) Attention—the position of the body just before the attack; (2) the run on the board; (3) the "take off," or leap from the board; (4) the flight through the air; (5) the entry into the water—to the disappearance of the toe or the finger. Number four, the flight, is still the matter of major importance, but failure to meet the other standards is a heavy handicap in competitive scoring. Perhaps the board ritual is overelaborate, with its arms just so, and its chest just so—but who shall standardize a human body when it has launched itself into the wild free air? Ah, then must the diver save his own soul, wring his own shrill beauty from a dizzy pit of nothingness! How many stand, hands on hips, fingers down thighs, head up, body like an arrow, three paces from that dread end of oak, only to sag the arch in the air and "kick buckets" as the ankles slide beneath the surface. A shambling figure on the board is surely not to be tolerated, but it is the air, ye leapers, the air, where you must face your God!

In competitive diving, and in the hearts of all who see in the art an outlet for creative beauty, it is no longer the difficulty of the stunt which claims first consideration but rather the flow and coordination of the body. And it follows—as in dancing—that women by and large are better divers than men. Knotted muscles tend to hinder rather than to help. In the "swan" we have a body launched into nothingness, up rather than out, to hang poised and still for an eternal segment of time, six feet above the board, back arched, head up, legs sewn together, arms flung wide and true—then the swift, breathless rush to the water, tilting the body to perpendicular and bringing the arms to the front, the middle finger the first to touch the surface, the curved toe the last to disappear. A beautiful thing to watch, but how to be compared with the flying beauty in the doer's heart? There are "jack-knives," front and back, and there is the regular back dive, so easy in theory, so immensely difficult in practice. Up, not out, you beginners, with hands on hips until the climax of height is reached, and then the arms flung backward and the great curving arch as the body goes from sky to sea.

For elective dives in competition one can take Miss Kellerman's half twist; the heady "half-gainer"; the once and one-half somersault, which ends in an arched front dive; the handstand from the board's edge. Difficult some of these dives are, but no hint of difficulty must appear. The body line must never be broken with striving; each movement must flow into the next like chords in an anthem.

Youth may be wild, skirts top the knee, parsons may roar, but surely degeneration is not the word to apply to youngsters who throughout the length and breadth of the land are diving and learning to dive with a mastery and a beauty which no previous civilization has ever approached.

The Third Poet

IT takes some effort now to remember that the man whom most persons agree upon calling the third English poet had nearly as much difficulty with his public as Walt Whitman had with his. Wordsworth was scorned and ridiculed at the very height of his career; as he descended the long slope of his later, less inspired days he found true followers, and was indeed proclaimed by most competent judges to be great; but it was not until three decades after his death that a bold and influential critic demanded for him the place among British poets which he now securely holds. Matthew Arnold performed no more valuable service as a critic than that which he performed when in 1879 he went to the trouble of selecting from Wordsworth's grotesquely uneven works, abruptly elevated him to a rank far above Byron, Shelley, and Keats, and defined his quality.

If in defining Wordsworth's quality Arnold did not say the last utterable word the fault lay not with him. He went as far as it was possible to go, in a day when the ideas of Wordsworth still cast their spell, toward disengaging his poetry from his philosophy and insisting that the first was all but supreme on its own account. One would go farther today. Arnold still found it necessary to say in recommendation of his hero that he was a true artist because he dealt in truth; that he was great because he operated at the center of existence; that "his superiority arises from his powerful use, in his best pieces, his powerful application to his subject, of ideas 'on man, on nature, and on human life.'" One shies today at the declaration that Wordsworth's subjects and ideas were "true"; true to whom, and of what? One is not so sure now just where the center of existence is, or sure, even, that it is important to know where it is. And one is likely to be distrustful of ideas. No, if one is the "disinterested lover of poetry" whom Arnold preferred above the mere "Wordsworthian" one is likely now to go the whole way and say that Wordsworth belongs in the company of Shakespeare and Milton, and in their company alone, because of the sheer poetic art which he lavished upon his two or three dozen best pieces. It might be comforting to be able to agree with Arnold that poetic art consists, among other things, in applying noble ideas to life. It would be most enlightening if any critic could prove that Wordsworth was a greater poet than Byron because he had a profounder nature. But both these things are as impossible as unnecessary.

To a seasoned reader of English poetry, to one who goes back over the familiar ground again and again and again, Wordsworth will inevitably emerge abreast of Shakespeare and Milton by virtue of the incomparable felicity with which he wields his language. The test is in the rereading. As Shakespeare takes the breath with passages one thought one already knew too well, as Milton moves the blood with harmonies not at all subdued by repetition, so Wordsworth consistently surprises his most intimate acquaintances by the power which leaps from his lines. It is not a quiet power, as is so often said. And it seems to have nothing to do with the thing being stated. Wordsworth undoubtedly thought so, for he would state the thing again—not so well—and assume that he had succeeded again. A lesser philosopher than he knew, he was also a greater artist than he knew. Quite by accident, perhaps, he is one of the most magical of modern poets.

Seven Years After

A Letter and Its Answer

By DABNEY HORTON

New York, August 1

Dear D——:

Come with us over to Morocco this summer to enlist in the French Aviation Corps again to fight against the Riffs. They won't put us in the Foreign Legion as simple soldats at five sous a day this time; we're to be all lieutenants under Mike Sweeny in the Army of the Sultan of Morocco. The Sultan never had an army before, the French wouldn't let him, but he'll have one now.

We sail for Bordeaux in two weeks, and they give us two weeks with pay in Paris. It sure will be great to swell around Maxim's again. I hear Henri's has reopened. Do you remember the day the Old Man gave the dinner for Lena Bogardi and we made anti-aircraft ammunition out of olives and the chandeliers were Gothas?

I suppose you are broke as usual; we all are, but you won't have a cent to pay except your fare to New York, and maybe I can wangle that for you. The steamship companies will be glad to take us over free, though I suppose they are really sticking the French Government for it. Jimmie is going, and so is the Duke, about half a dozen of us in all.

There won't be any particular danger about this proposition. We heard that the Riffs have got hold of a couple of old-school Fokkers from some place and are trying to fly them. If they dare to fly them after we get there we'll simply make clay pigeons of them. You can land a plane almost anywhere in that part of Morocco, except up in the little foothills where these darned little Arabs live in their dug-outs.

It would be great sport to be taken prisoner, though. The Riffs don't dare do a thing to their prisoners because the French have got two or three villages full of their relatives and they know jolly well what would happen to them if they started anything.

So drop whatever you're doing and come along. We've got a place all saved for you. You won't get another chance like this as long as you live. Just think it over; no other fighting planes dropping down on your back, no anti-aircraft, and no more being bullied around by a bunch of dumb French non-com flying instructors! You can pick up your flying again in a day or two. This is going to be just one big picnic, with martial music. Manon, les' go, as you used to say.

Yours in red britches,

G——

Keokuk, Iowa, August 5

Dear G——:

Before I got your letter asking me to go along to Morocco with you and be a little tin hero again I'd already seen an account of the proposed junket in the Sunday newspapers, with photographs of you and the Duke and Jimmie. Pardon my mentioning it, old fellow, but you looked a little bit fat in that photograph, a little too much like the arm-chair strategists in the caricatures and too little like the nervous-eyed kid I went to France with nine years ago to join the Lafayette Flying Corps.

And I see you fellows are using the name Lafayette Flying Corps to identify yourselves by. Well, that's the American of it! Everything must have a good, snappy name or slogan. But why don't you call yourselves the Young Sultans or the Houris' Own, as you're nominally enlisted under the Sultan of Morocco, whoever he is? Don't you get a free pass to the Mohammedan heaven if you get bumped off or poisoned by those funny things they drink south of Sidi Bel Abbes? Wouldn't you look queer up there in Mohammed's Paradise when you can't speak a word of Arab!

I'm surprised that they don't make you any more than lieutenants. Some of the boys that formed the Kosciuszko Squadron to help the Poles against the Bolos in 1919 were made captains; and that Brooklyn kid that went over to run the Esthonian Flying Corps to straighten out some other cafe quarrel was a colonel. You chaps under the Sultan ought to be generals at least. The lower down you get the higher rank they give you. As for the glory—well, I was very much tickled with my own little Croix de Guerre, until I saw in the paper that Foch had decorated a lot of Red Cross dogs with the same medal. But, then, the French like dogs.

Fighting those Arabs with airplanes seems pretty poor sport to me. About as much sport as bombing fish in the Oise after the armistice. But we used to eat the fish. Just what are you going to do? There won't be any fighting planes to meet, nor any anti-aircraft guns to dodge. The Riffians don't build villages big enough to hit or compact enough to scatter. From what I've heard of Arab villages, the only way to get rid of them is to stop up the entrances to the holes and then drop poison down the burrow, as the farmers in Iowa get rid of ground squirrels. You can't do that in the air.

I don't believe that the roaring of your motors is going to frighten those little riding monkeys either. A lot of them fought with us in the Big Affair and that's why they're making trouble now. They've learned how to shoot from the saddle with modern rifles. Personally, I've always had a fondness for those little fellows, riding along so merrily under those inordinately large, handsome turbans. And their bugle music, ending with a wild flourish and upthrow of the elbow, makes my blood tingle yet. There was a regiment of them at Verdun, and I used to slip over and drink coffee with them. They made wonder-

Really, if I didn't have a good job, and a family to look after—I mean to look after me—I'd accept a good offer to go over with you. But we'd separate at Bordeaux and I'd go over and fly with these same little Arabs. That might be a sporting proposition. But otherwise I reckon I'll stay here in Keokuk.

I don't want to hurt your own feelings when I say that I'm not sure that all the youth and good looks of America is with you in this escapade. You say Jimmie is going. I hope they don't have any bombing expeditions. Do you remember the day when he went out with a load of ninety-ones? He dropped them all at once and the machine nearly turned a somersault with the release of 500 pounds weight at one shot. Jimmie nearly turned a somersault, too, when he landed at camp and found that what he took for a little German town was dear old Bar-le-Duc, where the jelly comes from, and where Madame Jeulin used to scrub my back with a brush and hot water whenever I came in on leave.

Isn't Steve going along? I thought he was a real dare-devil. At least he got into the Sunday supplement with a yarn about being a volunteer to test the upper atmosphere by being fired out of a rocket. I believe he later repudiated it after a couple of bromo-seltzers. But it was a good yarn.

It strikes me that this expedition is just another good yarn. But it isn't as good a yarn as the one we went as pals in the first time. I suspect that this will consist of a big banquet in New York, several more after the twelve-mile limit is passed, much swaggering around Paris and Henri's bar, a big reception at the Prefecture in Sidi Bel Abbes. After that, a few weeks of country-club life and occasional gipsy flying with an army background. When you get home again, if home still appeals to you, you will puff out your chest as we did shortly after the armistice and tell the home folks about it. But this time it won't sound the same; it won't ring true.

And so, in the expressive language of Abe Potash: "You'll hafta 'scuse me, for I got it business I should attend to."

Wishing you the best of luck and a joyous hereafter in the Mohammedan heaven,

I am, as ever,

D——

The Adventurers' War in Morocco

By M. M. KNIGHT

MAN-HUNTING has always been the big-game sport par excellence of the world. For example, American ambulance drivers, youngsters ambitious to fly, and even infantrymen for the Foreign Legion sought adventure in France between 1914 and the time when such conduct became compulsory. Many who frankly went in to see the show honestly believed at a later date that their motive had been to save the world for or from this or that.

Yet the American volunteer contingent in France was not strictly a group of adventurers. Most of the men had never made war before. There is a vast difference between the man—every other one you meet—who thinks from a distance that he would like to try war once and the much scarcer type which knows war and still yearns for it. Out of the twenty-five million or so who fought the World War came enough trained and self-discovered adventurers to run the nineteen smaller conflicts which immediately ensued. Death has removed some of these professional warriors, but Europe's economic doldrums have added to their number many who have no great objection to peace, if it would only yield them a living.

But even the Moroccan war enlists some home talent—men who have to fight, which makes it impossible to separate the willing from the unwilling. For example, the Riffians.

Your Riffian is a white man, burned reddish brown by his pitiless sun. To the original Berber stock, which inhabited these mountains before anybody in the world had learned to write, has been added Phoenician, Greek, Roman, Germanic Vandal, Arabic, Jewish, and heaven knows what other blood. The amount of new blood arriving in any one period has not been large enough, however, to change Berber civilization much. Rather have these people been driven back into their Riffian and Atlas mountains and made more conscious of their own ways. While they are proud, often fanatical Mohammedans, other Moslems look upon them as heretics. This is because they cling to an older fabric of laws and customs, far more like those of Europe than is the case with their stricter coreligionists who follow the Koranic law.

None of this is visible to the enemy, any more than is the Riffian's person. He has hunted and shot all his life in these hills or in the higher mountains to the northward. Often clothed only in a brown robe, the jellaba, and his thick-soled slippers, he melts into the landscape and can move for miles without being seen by his quarry—human or otherwise. In the hood of his one garment are parched grain or a loaf of bread, a few dried figs, a bottle of oil, and a hundred or two of cartridges to fit his modern repeating rifle. If you show your head within a quarter of a mile of him he will fire once, and the bullet will usually go through the foolish object aimed at. Fly over him with an airplane, and you will probably come back—if you come back—with a hole or two somewhere in it. He has shot down more than a score of Frenchmen who thought from World War experience that they could fly over riflemen with impunity.

His intermediate officers are largely adventurers. At the top are the two Krims, brothers, and their immediate following of Riffian nationalists. They have wisely availed themselves of European adventurers, skilled in the technique of war, who train the lieutenants and "non-com's." Some of these foreigners are Turks, eastern Arabs, Egyptians, or Hindus, nationalists and Mohammedans with scores to pay as well as adventurers. Some are deserters from the French Foreign Legion, which is mainly German. Undoubtedly there are some Germans who have not been in the French service.

"If you are captured by Riffian regulars," the French officer will tell you, "you will be well treated. But if you should fall into the hands of some of Krim's partisans, there is no telling what may happen to you." No doubt many joined the Riffians because they seemed to be winning, and the chances for pillage would be excellent while this continued. The Jebala tribes themselves, Krim's great allies in the west, are not always so nice to their prisoners, some of whom have been taken apart with barbaric ingenuity. There may be something in the French explanation that prisoners are of no use to them, whereas Krim can afford to handle his like fresh eggs because of their ransom and hostage value.

It is well to have some soldiers so thoroughly hated by the enemy that they will never allow themselves to be captured. These Berber mountaineers have hated the black Senegalese for centuries, since the great Sultans began importing them to keep order at home and to extend the frontiers. France inherited this scheme with her North African possessions. Senegalese are particularly valuable for holding outposts. We need not be censorious about the custom of wearing amulets of ears and noses. As to their preference for knives over bayonets, that is a technical point on which many North Africans, on both sides of the front, agree with them.

We may pass lightly over the French-trained Moroccan and Algerian troops which are bearing the brunt of the struggle from the south side. There is not much adventure in it for them—from the war standpoint, they are almost Europeanized. Their French officers are largely professional warriors, willing to take a dirty job rather than rust out. Decorations and promotions are the chips in this game, and they are more plentiful where there is trouble. Nobody need begrudge a French post-commander, with Senegalese under him, whatever honors and emoluments he gets out of it. At Ain bou Aissa, in the beginning of August, fifteen Senegalese under a native sergeant cut their way out after a shell had exploded the magazine. Of the lieutenant, who had been wounded already, no trace was found by the relief column.

For these officers and the other Europeans—notably the Foreign Legion—the summer climate of this war zone is literally hellish. The Riff range cuts off any Mediterranean breeze, but collects the sirocco or hot desert wind. Oftentimes the thermometer climbs to 115° or 120° in the shade. The desert wind, much hotter still, does not always die down even at night. Where the Riffians have artillery, holes and ditches must be dug outside the post, behind barbed wire. Crawling about these for weeks under a broiling sun, without water to wash or shave, their clothes cut to ribbons and crawling with vermin, even the officers come out looking like savages.

No group is more interesting for one evening than the Foreign Legion. While those at the front are fearfully busy or dog tired, the units resting near some city in the rear can be interviewed at leisure. To avoid the constraint of a visit to their crowded camp, where there is unlikely to be any public room except the packed and noisy sutler's store, it is perhaps simplest merely to go into the tenderloin district in the evening. These quarters of cities in French Morocco are safe and orderly. Two or three journalists can drop in unobtrusively and see what might be called "the Legion at tea."

Legionnaires have little money, but dancing is free. One will be guiding some obvious person with all the grace of a royal ballroom, oblivious of the cracked notes of the phonograph or tin-disk music box. Another will whirl his partner about with almost American abandon. It is easy to collect half a dozen at a table and please the management at the same time by buying a couple of dollars' worth of beer. On the whole, the Legion is quiet and well mannered. One Dresdener of thirty-five speaks almost gaily of life before the big cataclysm of 1914. His voice and manner betray his gentle upbringing. The Berlinese next to him tells quite casually of their awful marches and the number of their dead—more than half. Their language, he says, is German, but it is a binding custom that no man shall understand a word of it if pronounced by an officer. They do not hate the French, nor do they "love France," who, they think, might make their lives a bit less hard.

Oftentimes the women have stories quite as interesting as those of the soldiers. Some will have been with the "B. M. C." (literally, official army camp women) near the front, undergoing dangers and hardships comparable to those of the men they are sent to divert. I remember one village of them near a headquarters camp, on top of a barren hill, where the heat was terrible even at six in the evening and there was only a liter of water a day per person. The natives did not seem to mind it, but the Frenchwomen, like the European soldiers, were often ill simply from the heat. I was told that in this service, as in the Legion, the eyes of law and order are closed to faults committed at home, it being considered sufficient expiation to serve one's country on the far-flung frontiers.

The American Air Squadron (some unkind New Yorker has called it the "Hot-Air Squadron") is another case of men who fight because they want to. All having seen at least one previous war, we might perhaps speak of them as the pure, high type of adventurer, as distinguished from the callow youth with hankerings. Personally, the ones I met were fine fellows, boon companions for an evening. Nevertheless, this thing of advertising them as the "American aviators" has a serious side, as the State Department has found out. It makes us partisans in the war, whether we like it or not. Their excuse, as given in the Associated Press dispatch of September 21, is worse than none at all from our point of view. The very fact that they have taken no oath of allegiance to the Sultan and signed no enlistment papers means that they are fighting as Americans, with a special status as such. Let them fight if they feel like it. If we must have wars, the ideal situation would be to have them waged by those who like them, by the same stroke relieving civilian life of a lot of its enemies and problems. But let us make them enlist, and stop wearing any name, insignia, or mark which might tend to commit those who don't want to be committed.

Perhaps it is a curious mentality which seeks to classify one war as more barbarous than another. "How terrible!" exclaimed a French woman, when she heard of the commandant at Ain Maatouf, conducting the defense for seventeen days from a stretcher after he had been shot through both thighs. Yet he had anti-tetanus serum, dropped from an airplane, and all the disinfectants and bandages he needed. A Spanish dispatch gloats over a battle in which five hundred Riffians were alleged to have been killed, adding that a thousand more died for want of medical attention. This is the atrocious thing about the blockade. How can any nation which wishes to be thought civilized cut off doctors and medicines from any people? Few are without guilt in this particular, but would not some good come of making it an issue every time that it occurs?

The Menace of British Empire

By SHAPURJI SAKLATVALA

[This article was written by Mr. Saklatvala, member of the British Parliament, as explaining his views to Americans in advance of his expected visit to the United States as a delegate to the meeting of the Interparliamentary Union. The action of our Government in refusing to grant him entrance makes his views doubly interes

MY chief crime is my strenuous opposition to British imperialism and my steady insistence—which is gaining growing support in Great Britain itself—that the world has reached the stage when the British Empire must be dissolved in the interests of world peace, human happiness, and especially for the preservation of at least that standard of life which the masses in the Western countries have so far reached after a struggle of nearly two centuries, not unaccompanied by enormous sacrifices. The last war is held up as a cause for the rapid wiping out of the standard of life in Europe, but on a closer analysis of facts and operative causes I unhesitatingly attribute this catastrophic result to the powerful imperialism of Great Britain. I am not opposed to Britain's sway in my country or elsewhere on a narrow nationalist basis of conceit or malice, but on the far broader basis of saving for human life what human effort has so far achieved. My bolshevism leads me to struggle along such lines where the highest results achieved by any group of workers—who are essentially the majority in all countries—are made applicable to all the weaker groups. The inevitable, even if pretending to be unintentional, tendency of British imperialism is to search for the lowest practicable standard of life and make it applicable to groups of workers with better standards by all the weight and gravitation of modern commercial competition.

As I have officially stated in the House of Commons it is a pity that the voluntary association of Australia and Canada with Britain is designated under the all-covering tern. of British Empire along with the enforced subjugation of India, Egypt, Africa, South China, etc., and naturally my remarks apply to these latter only.

I take the view that if genuine self-rule is in the hands of the Indians and if there exists a genuine Indianization of the Indian army, no Indian will be so despicable, just as no Britisher would be so despicable, as to say that he would hold that country and that army for the benefit of some people other than his own. The talk of the constitution and the alteration of the constitution, of a ten-year limit or a fifteen-year limit, these are nothing but details in the art of governing another nation by a sort of hypnotization. I tell my Indian friends, as I tell my British friends, that the same principles of life are in every European or Asiatic nation.

The world wants peace not through sentimental piety but because the world needs peace. Britain points her hypocritical finger to Aldershot Barracks and claims to be a model of self-restraint in the number of her army. But the British raj in the East first means her capacity to produce three to four million colored troops as gun-fodder on any battlefield at any moment. France is following her footsteps with her black regiments. What European or Asiatic country dare to disarm with equanimity in the face of this possibility? Every industrial workshop in Britain has proved to be convertible into a most effective arsenal, and during the last war Britain was able to arm seven million Allied troops.

Then comes the danger of British imperialism in peace time more devastating than in war. Her coolie labor, her Negroes, Hindus, Chinamen, and Mohammedans working in mines, docks, railroads, factories, and as individual craftsmen, and her hundreds of millions of enslaved and animalized peasantry tilling cotton fields, wheat fields, rubber, and tea plantations. They go to destroy hourly the life of nations in the West. Miners in Africa, India, China under range of British naval and aircraft guns are bringing coal to the surface from a dollar to a dollar and a half at the pit-mouth. Then German miners under military defeat and reparations are reduced to this coolie level by the law of competition. Then by the same law British miners themselves have to succumb to it, and if they tamely did so, the American miners must fall next. British imperial masters have erected seventy-five jute mills in Bengal, where average wages in the spinning department are five shillings per week and double that in the weaving department. Inevitably the Scotch lads and lasses in Dundee have to grade down to this level, which means the auction of souls of many innocent girls to keep themselves alive. How long will the American jute workers keep out of danger? British ships are repaired and painted in Bombay, Colombo, Hongkong, or Calcutta for twenty-five cents a full day of ten hours. What is the value of Western workers struggling to establish a minimum living wage in their countries? British patriotism, both of the Conservative type as well as of the right wing Labor type, talks glibly of "our Empire" and of the sunshine houses at Wembley, where the world is asked to see how Britain can soon produce all British raw materials, cotton for instance. America can give sufficient cotton to Britain, but the soul of British royalty-loving and aristocratic merchants loathes the idea of having to pay the American cotton-grower his comforts of life. Therefore they look to Sudan, Rhodesia, Mesopotamia, central India, and southern China, where a few hundred millions of humanity are enslaved and work in the fields for ten cents to twenty cents per day, to be the lands that will produce all-British cotton. Then will follow the effective downfall of the American standard of life. And where cotton begins to grow well, and Britain rules at the same time, spinning mills do not take long to raise their heads. Labor on twenty cents a day is spinning and weaving in the East, under the benign British protection in over thirty cotton mills. Another 300 more, with long-staple cotton growing in their backyard, and Europe and America will cease to work except on a coolie basis. Such are the glories and blessings of the British Empire and the Union Jack!

I shall not conceal the satisfaction with which I am looking forward to this visit to your great country, of which one of my brothers is a citizen, not that I aspire to alter or modify your noted institutions, which I am not yet closely acquainted with, but because I shall get my first opportunity in life to study them first-hand.

The Man Whom Coolidge Fears

By RENNIE SMITH

SAKLATVALA has, in Great Britain, two kinds of uniqueness. He is the only representative of communism on the floor of the British House of Commons. He is the Communist Party there in his own person; he is his own whip, his own office boy. He is also the only Indian in Parliament.

For the moment it is Saklatvala the Communist who is on the stage. That it is the Communist who is on the stage is largely of Saklatvala's choosing. But the world should understand, as he himself should understand, that it is not as a devotee and an exponent of the Russian doctrine of force that the core of his personality is revealed. Saklatvala is an Indian at a most critical stage of India's history. Saklatvala is an Indian—a lonely Indian—in the British House of Commons. The real man, the essential life-force and qualities of Saklatvala, can lie only in interpreting to one another and influencing these two great civilizations of the East and the West. He has the chance, such as has no other man in the British House of Commons, of assisting and guiding the great movement for the political and economic freedom of India. If he ends in tragedy it will be because Saklatvala the Communist has eaten up Saklatvala the Indian.

The moment he enters the House of Commons he is a man apart. His pale, tanned skin, dark eyes, protruding nose, the dark color of his hands when he throws them out in declamation, all these mark him as a member of another race. He is the circumference of the empire drawn into the center. He is India, ironic, mocking; he is India, hating, passionately appealing and declaiming—there in the heart of London.

The first thirty years of his life were spent in India, with Bombay as his birthplace. Rich family connections; ample opportunities for widest culture; he is in no sense by his ancestry and affiliations a proletarian. Through relations on his mother's side with the Tata family, which has developed in the last forty years a great iron and steel enterprise in India, he was able in the course of his own activities to share in the early stages of industrialism in India. He was able to watch the migration of British capital to India; to see railways established, to see the beginnings of modern forms of large-scale production, to see all the first fruits of urbanization and industrialism on a vast and complex Indian population.

With a mind hypersensitive to human suffering, the iron entered his soul as he contemplated the new capitalist cities of the East, and especially his birth city. Those who wish to appreciate the last touch of his bitterness, his invective, and the depth of his rebel temper must absorb for themselves the knowledge of how child labor has been treated in the factories of Bombay, how women fare, how wage-earners are housed and treated in the production of industrial wealth. Such knowledge begets charity. It yields a new understanding for the wounded spirit which lies behind wild utterances, behind the demoniacal torrential speeches that flow from him at times like a volcano in action.

It is twenty years since he first came to London and made it his home. His wife is English and brings the benefit of an English climate into his Oriental and rebellious temperament.

During this whole period in London Saklatvala has entered into the full tide of workers' politics; he has championed the cause of the Indian worker; he has encouraged Indian trade unionism; he has brought the whole story of low-grade living among the inarticulate masses of India steadily before the notice of all who would pay attention to him; he has taken his position on the extreme left in his advocacy of the cause of Indian freedom.

It is many years ago since first I heard him speak in an annual Independent Labor Party conference. His plea was for an international outlook. With strong, incisive words he insisted that the standard of life of the British worker was determined not on the banks of the Thames but the Ganges. The condition of the Indian worker was the inescapable self-interest of the British worker. It was hung round his neck like a millstone. Such a theme I heard coming from the mouth of a thin, wiry man, with long, clever fingers; a man dipped in a poet's flame of eloquence, enriched by sincerity, made somber by indignation. At the same time, something fanatical, authoritative, hard, and, as the Germans say, entweder-oder. That is the man as he first impressed me. Here was a burning core of truth poured out of a rich, cultured, musical, and rebel nature—a premature force (in one aspect) of the world's mind and conscience. At the same time an uncomfortable man to listen to. An eloquent man, rather than a logician. His eloquence runs away with him. That is why his recorded speeches contain so many contradictions.

Since those early years I have met him often, heard him speak often. In the House it has been his practice in this session to emphasize his representation of the Communist Party. He puts out of his way to do it. I have fancied that his rebel spirit finds some spiritual satisfaction in this emphasis upon his communistic loneliness in the House. The House has a reputation for fair play. The House tends to empty when Saklatvala speaks. It does not suffer him gladly. The House has a deep aversion to what is called the hurling of brick-bats, demagoguery, and sob-stuff.

That is the man who is refused admission to the Interparliamentary Conference at Washington. As a Communist he can make no reproaches. His own philosophy is put across him. But the world of man lives and thrives by other forces than the dialectic of force. It has other dialectics than the prevention of individuals from going down to the sea in ships. It has other methods than the stopping of human mouths with the deadly dust of unintelligent ages.

In the meanwhile I like to consider that one of Saklatvala's qualities is his power of silence. There dwell in him, too, the powers which have given the world the distinguished succession of Indian mystics. I should like to hear the melodies, the dreams, and the thoughts of which his silence is composed.

Poincaré's Guilt in the War

By HARRY ELMER BARNES

THIS article is intended as a specific and explicit reply to M. Poincaré's pronouncements upon war-guilt in the October Foreign Affairs, and not as an attempt at a systematic and logical resummary of the question. An understanding of this fact is necessary in order to explain the order and sequence of the material, which would be far different if we did not contemplate a point-by-point refutation of the distinguished French statesman.

> Is it possible that the power of a lie is even greater than it is pictured as being in the fine book of the Norwegian novelist, Johan Bojer? Its power sometimes disheartens those who seek to defend and bear witness to the truth. Those who have been closely connected with great events and who remember them in their minutest details feel that the truth must be obvious to any fair-minded person. But when they see the imagination of some and the dishonesty of others distorting facts out of all semblance to reality they feel inclined to withdraw into themselves, to give up counting upon the mind to refute such calumnies, and to wait for time in its wisdom to reestablish the balance. This is a mistake. For falsehood is thus given an opportunity to outdistance truth and legend is allowed to take the place of history.—RAYMOND POINCARÉ IN "FOREIGN AFFAIRS," OCTOBER, 1925.

Poincaré fires his opening guns by citing the views of Richard Grelling, Maximilian Harden, and Prince Lichnowsky in favor of the view of German responsibility for the war, and in charging that the revisionist historians are consciously or unconsciously victims of German and Soviet propaganda and dishonesty. Richard Grelling at the outbreak of the war published a savage attack upon the German Government as responsible for the war, entitled "J'Accuse." Having committed himself in a violently dogmatic fashion to the question of German guilt before any of the valid documentary evidence was available, he had neither the honesty nor the scholarship to look into the question and revise his views, but, like M. Poincaré, has rehashed the dogmas of 1914. His recent book has been pulverized by Count Montgelas. Likewise, Harden established his reputation for a generation upon the basis of being a "Kaiser-baiter"; like Grelling he has a vested interest in maintaining the thesis of German guilt. No one suspects him of competence as a historian of war-guilt. Lichnowsky's views were expressed between 1912 and 1914, when he could possess none of the cogent evidence since uncovered, which establishes the Franco-Russian guilt. The question of war-guilt, however, cannot be settled by the opinion of any single man, but solely by recourse to the authentic documents. Poincaré would scarcely be pleased to have the Crown Prince cite the opinions of Gouttenoire de Toury as those of the one "honest Frenchman" whose views could be accepted as absolutely definitive on the question of war-guilt.

The allegation that the revisionist scholars have either been duped by or have consciously sold themselves to the propaganda of Germany and the Bolsheviks is ridiculous. Revisionist scholars worthy of the name have founded their reconstructed views not upon controversial publications but upon the authentic documents in the foreign offices of Vienna, Berlin, and St. Petersburg. Poincaré would lead the uninformed reader to believe that the basis for the reconstruction of our views on war-guilt is the polemic pamphlets of Lenin, Trotzky, Bela Kun, Ludendorff, Von Tirpitz, and the Kaiser. In fact, the German documents were published not under the auspices of the friends of the Kaiser and his regime but by their enemies, who enthusiastically hoped to prove thereby the guilt of Austria and Germany. If the German documents had been garbled at all they would have been garbled against the German monarchy and Austria and not in such a way as to favor the white-washing of Germany. The German documents were edited by scholars from both the progressive and conservative camps in Germany, and no reputable authority has ever questioned their authenticity. The same holds true with regard to the Austrian documents; no serious question has ever been raised as to the competence, thorough scholarship, and honesty of their editor, Dr. Roderich Gooss.

Poincaré's case against the Russian documents is even weaker. We have, in the first place, the Siebert collection, which embodies the exchanges between London and St. Petersburg from 1908 to 1914 and was compiled by an aristocratic landlord years before the Soviets came into authority. The first two important editions of the exchanges between Paris and St. Petersburg were both made by Frenchmen, namely, by M. Laloy and by M. Marchand, the latter of whom prepared the "Livre Noir." Subsequently another edition of the Russian documents was prepared by a German scholar, Professor Stieve. No important discrepancies are to be discovered in these separate editions, and no informed scholar suspects forgeries or other garbling. What has been proved, however, is that the Russian "Orange Book," published in 1914 to clear the French and Russians of the charge of war-guilt, was most notoriously garbled, leaving out or distorting the incriminating evidence against Sazonov, Izvolski, and their French collaborators. If M. Poincaré believes that these Russian documents describing the Franco-Russian relations are inaccurate and misleading, why did he not throw open the French archives so that the allegations in the "Livre Noir" might be discredited? Why did he find it necessary, moreover, to have the French "Yellow Books" officially edited, with the damaging sections deleted? Why did he not turn over this task to reputable scholars? These questions become daily more pertinent and relevant since England has given consent to the publication of her pre-war archives under the editorship of the distinguished scholars G. P. Gooch and Harold Temperley.

Poincaré appears to derive great satisfaction from a speech of former Premier Herriot in the Chamber of Deputies, contending that there is nothing in the "Livre Noir" in any way establishing even partial guilt on the part of France with regard to war responsibility. Certainly no scholar would accept a political speech as a verdict upon the facts of history, least of all that of a French politician before the Chamber of Deputies. Let us see how a perusal of the "Livre Noir" affected a distinguished scholar, the late Baron Serge Korff, himself a vigorous enemy of the Bolsheviks:

> We find [says Dr. Korff] new light thrown upon the pre-war attitude of France, strangely but constantly connected with one big name—Poincaré. Pichon, Barthou, and many other familiar names are frequently mentioned, but none seems to have played any such prominent role in the building up and strengthening of the Franco-Russian alliance as Poincaré; and besides, with a very evident object—steady preparation for the coming conflict with Germany. The reader will put aside this volume with the inevitable conviction that Poincaré long before 1914 had one idea on his mind, the war with Germany. These documents give a most vivid picture of the French pressure exerted on Russia with that one object in view, a war with Germany. At times the Russians were even losing patience with the French, so little did the latter mind the Russian interests; they were willing to lend the Russians money, but only on condition that Russia would increase her army and build new strategic, but otherwise quite useless, railways.

From l'Humanité

WAR

Those who desire detail and documentation in regard to this charge by Dr. Korff may well consult the excellent, if severe, book of Gouttenoire de Toury, "Jaurès et le Parti de la Guerre."

Rhetorically once more Poincaré pleads that the very fact that a great number of nations were allied against the Central Powers proves that the latter were necessarily in the wrong. This assertion breaks down when one inquires why these various countries joined the Allies. Their action was determined by the relative advantages of prestige, territory, or spoil to be obtained by entry into the war. Even the United States did not come into the war because of what Germany did in 1914 but because of her subsequent actions.

Poincaré seeks immunity in the allegation that President Masaryk has contended for the superiority of the French system of government as over against the German system of 1914, and has alleged that France was characterized as much by a love of peace as was Germany by a desire for war. The point at issue, however, is not the relative excellence of the French republic or the former German monarchy—a debatable matter—but the military policies and aggressive acts prior to August 3, 1914, which brought on the war. French statistics show not only that in the spring of 1914 the French were possessed of a larger army and a better military equipment in proportion to their population than was Germany but that the French army and equipment were greater than the German, in spite of the fact that Germany was nearly twice as populous as France and surrounded by powerful enemies. And France was not scared into the army bill of 1913 by Germany, as France's bill was drafted before the French knew the nature of the impending German army act. Further, Poincaré's reference to the constitutional procedure of France and the responsibility of the Cabinet to the Chamber possesses no relevance in the matter of war responsibility in 1914. Whatever the theory, in the crisis of 1914 Poincaré's Cabinet did not consult the Chamber of Deputies at all. Poincaré persistently refused to submit the question of the determination upon war to the Chamber; he and his Cabinet took full personal responsibility for the decision, and after the war was on they relied upon the censorship, war psychology, and the assassination of Jaurès to induce the Chamber to approve their action. In the matter of the decision upon war in 1914 the action of Sazonov and the Czar was in no sense more irresponsible and autocratic than that of Poincaré, Viviani, and Messimy. And from 1912-14 many millions of francs were supplied by the autocratic Russians to lubricate the constitutional machinery of liberty-loving France. As to "open diplomacy" in France, the French Chamber in 1914 was not yet aware of the terms of the Franco-Russian agreement of 1891-93.

With respect to 1870 and the German peace terms Poincaré at least frankly admits that Prussia was not solely responsible for the declaration of war. But it is absurd to hold, as does Poincaré, that the Republicans never cherished the hope of revenge or of the recovery of Alsace-Lorraine by force. In fact, in an address to university students Poincaré frankly declared that "I could not see for my generation any reason for existing unless it were for the hope of recovering our lost provinces." Certainly one as familiar as M. Poincaré with European politics and international relations could not have supposed that they could have been recovered except by force. Surely, Poincaré can scarcely believe that none of his American readers have ever witnessed the ceremony of draping the Strasbourg statue in Paris.

The high point of Poincaré's demagogy and rhetoric is to be found in his calm assumption that by definition the Triple Alliance and all other German negotiations were offensive, while the Triple Entente and all international agreements of any members of the Entente were purely pacific and defensive, designed to "free Europe and the world from German domination." How about the Franco-

Italian and Anglo-Japanese alliances? If Franco-Russian relations had been purely defensive France would not have had to go to war against Germany in behalf of Russia in 1914, as it was Russia which took the initiative in mobilization. As to his assertion that the "Yellow Books" contain all of the Franco-Russian understandings, the burden of proof is on him until France throws open her archives. In fact, in several cases scholars have already been able to discover damaging documents which have been excluded.

Poincaré's interpretation of the Morocco disputes is equally remote from the facts. German manners in both 1905 and 1911 are certainly open to question, but that Germany had both moral and legal right on her side cannot be doubted. In 1905 she gave notice that Northern Africa could not be partitioned without taking some notice of German rights and interests, and in 1911 she protested against violations of the Act of Algeciras by France and Spain. Judge Ewart, after a careful examination of all the evidence, including that recently set forth by Thayer and Bishop as to the part played by Roosevelt, concludes:

> Germany was within her rights in insisting in 1905 upon a reference of her dispute with France concerning Morocco to an international conference. President Roosevelt was of that opinion. He warmly congratulated the Kaiser on his success in that regard. And the result of the proceedings of the conference—the Act of Algeciras—was to a large extent a declaration in favor of the German contention for international equality in Morocco, and a denial of the claim of France and Spain to exclusive domination.
>
> French and Spanish military operations in 1911 were subversive of the chief principle of the Act of Algeciras, namely, "the sovereignty and independence of His Majesty the Sultan." France so regarded the Spanish actions, and Spain so regarded the French. Germany, as a party to the act, was within her rights in objecting to these proceedings.

The contention that France was always a restraining and moderating influence upon Russian activity in the Balkans and Turkey is belied by a large mass of incontrovertible documents. From 1912 to 1914 Poincaré worked hand in hand with Izvolski in encouraging the growth of a strong and alert Russian interest in the Near Eastern question. By 1911 Izvolski had become convinced not only that the securing of the Straits should be the pivotal element in Russian foreign policy but also that they could not be obtained [illegible] strain Russia in the Balkans only when it seemed possible that France might get involved in such fashion that the crisis would not be capable of exploitation in the interest of the recovery of Alsace-Lorraine. Poincaré was for peace in 1912 because the Russians were not prepared for war and the French people had not yet been converted by the bribed press to a grave concern over the Balkans. On the other hand, France frequently urged Russia on to more vigorous and challenging policies than the Russian Government was willing to undertake on its own initiative. Sir Edward Grey worked for peace in 1912-13 by the same methods he refused to follow at Germany's suggestion in 1914. Poincaré says nothing of the decision of the Russian Crown Council in February, 1914, to await an imminent world war in which to take the opportunity to seize Constantinople, or of the Russian bribery and encouragement of Serbian officials and plotters.

From "Vie Nouvelle"

Joseph Caillaux

Perhaps the most inevitable, but also the most discreditable, phase of Poincaré's lame defense is his attack upon the departed Izvolski. The absent are always wrong, and the dead are very absent. He ridicules Judet's edition of Georges Louis's diary as being "dialogues of the dead," but he does not hesitate to indulge in a monologue at the expense of the dead. Poincaré gives the impression of himself as a person unwillingly dragged about by a man whom he hated and whose policy he opposed. Professor William L. Langer, bibliographic editor of the very journal in which Poincaré's article appeared, happens to have worked over Stieve's edition of Izvolski's communications to which Poincaré refers his readers, and concludes:

> But the gods were with Izvolski and against humanity. Everything changed as in a dream when, in March, 1912, Poincaré succeeded to the premiership. It was a disastrous event, for Poincaré, convinced of the inevitability of war with Germany, agreed entirely with Izvolski that the Entente must be strengthened and that the Central Powers must be shown that the days of their dictation were over. After the first conversations with the new premier, Izvolski felt like a new man. . . .
>
> The story is a long one, and not very edifying. Poincaré seems to have disliked Izvolski personally, and both appear to have distrusted each other. But in political matters they made an ideal team. There was no divergence in their views. And so they were able to cooperate, supporting and assisting each other in the attainment of the "great solution." Together they intrigued against the pacific French ambassador at St. Petersburg, Georges Louis, and Russian funds were put at the disposal of Poincaré and Klotz to enable them to silence the opposition and even to bring about Poincaré's election as President. And where they could not cooperate they supplemented each other. It was Poincaré's opposition that wrecked the agreement between England and Germany and it was Poincaré who effected the naval agreement between England and Russia in 1914, after Izvolski had already brought about the Russian-French naval pact of 1912.

Poincaré not only "put up" with Izvolski personally; he also cooperated with him in "putting up" several million francs of Russian money to bribe the French press to carry editorials or news designed to convert the French people to the support of the new and aggressive Franco-[illegible]ian policies in the Balkans. Izvolski wrote to Sazonov concerning his interview with Poincaré in July, 1913:

> From this interview I was convinced that M. Poin[illegible] in accord with us, considers the moment has finally arrived to realize the century-old aims of our traditional policy ("réaliser les aspirations séculaires"), and thereby restore the European balance of power by the return of the stolen provinces of Alsace-Lorraine.
>
> He anticipates the greatest difficulty on the part of the social radicals who are averse to any war, primarily on financial and business grounds, but especially to a war which begins in the Balkans. This party has very capable leaders: Caillaux, Herriot, Painlevé; it has at its disposal a considerable number of Deputies and newspapers.
>
> M. Poincaré believes with me that for this purpose a very great sacrifice on our part is necessary. I scarcely dare name the amount, namely, 3,000,000 francs, of which 250,000 francs alone is for the Radical, the organ of Senator Perchot.

When we take into consideration how insignificant such a sum is in comparison with the world changes which we expect to bring about thereby, perhaps you will undertake to submit this suggestion to the Cabinet for immediate action.

Poincaré suggests that Izvolski grossly misrepresented him in the communications published in the "Livre Noir." But why, then, did not Poincaré vindicate himself by ordering the publication of the French documents? Poincaré's attempt to dispose of Georges Louis's damaging revelations is as disingenuous and unconvincing as his assault on Izvolski.

Perhaps the most striking sentences in the whole article mark Poincaré's admission that, after all, the real causes of the outbreak of the war must be sought in the events after the assassination of the Archduke. "I do not claim," he says, "that Austria and Germany, in this first phase [July, 1914], had a conscious thought-out intention of provoking a general war. No existing document gives us the right to suppose that, at that time, they had planned anything so systematic." This is ungracious to Poincaré's friends like Simeon Strunsky, who have rather grudgingly admitted that while France and Russia precipitated the war in August, 1914, they were justified in doing so because of what Germany had brought them to in the period from 1905 to 1914. Now Poincaré admits that what happened prior to the last days of June, 1914, is, after all, irrelevant. Poincaré even concedes that there was no Potsdam Conference.

Poincaré's presentation of the events of the last fatal month begins by a footnote implying that Renouvin's recent book is a vindication of his article, something grossly misleading. In stating the circumstances with respect to the Serbian crisis he gives no hint whatever of the long-continued and menacing Serbian intrigues against Austria, of the German restraint of Austria in 1912-13, or of the most crucial fact of all, namely, the full official Serbian complicity in the plot for the murder of the Archduke. He does not admit at any point that Austria had a legitimate grievance or that past Austrian experiences with Serbia constituted grounds for Austrian skepticism as to the reliability of Serbian promises.

Poincaré severely criticizes the Kaiser for giving Austria a free hand in regard to Serbia on July 5, but this is exactly what Poincaré soon gave to Russia in regard to the same issue. And while the Kaiser actually disapproved of a punitive war believed essential to the continued integrity of the Dual Monarchy, Poincaré encouraged the aggressive intervention of Russia in a situation which did not concern her safety or integrity, and, if persisted in, was bound to involve all Europe in war. When the Kaiser saw that this proposed local war was likely to endanger Europe he put the strongest pressure upon Austria to desist and negotiate with Russia; when Poincaré saw that the Russian action threatened war he urged Russia on to more rapid and far-reaching military preparations. Poincaré's assertion that Germany favored the Austrian declaration of war on Serbia is flatly false. Whether rightly or wrongly, the Kaiser and his Chancellor believed the Serbian reply a satisfactory basis for negotiations and they strongly criticized the opening of hostilities.

Poincaré's picture of the German attitude from July 28-31 is wholly misleading. He denominates the vigorous German pressure to restrain Austria as "a slight change in attitude just at the end." Poincaré falsifies the situation further in declaring that on the 30th Germany relinquished her pressure and once more favored war. The German pressure on Austria grew stronger on the 30th and 31st, and at the very end Austria unwillingly agreed to negotiate with Russia, but the possibility of peace had been destroyed by the premature and unjustifiable Russian mobilization which France had encouraged. Poincaré's statement of Bethmann's attitude toward the telegram of George V is grossly inaccurate.

Sophistry, error, and evasion exude from every sentence of M. Poincaré's discussion of the Russian and French mobilization and the question as to whether Russian mobilization was equivalent to war. He represents the Russian mobilization as essential to the very safety of the Russian Empire. It was in no sense so. Even Sazonov admitted that he was convinced that Austria did not contemplate territorial aggression at the expense of Serbia; yet if she had done so Russia could with little propriety have objected, as she had been willing to suggest the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1908 when she expected to gain something at the expense of Serbian aspirations. There was no threat directly at Russia at all. Germany had not mobilized in any way, and Austria had merely mobilized twenty-two divisions against Serbia. But as early as July 29 Russia mobilized fifty-five divisions directly against Austria. The only thing which was menaced by the Austrian intervention in Serbia was the greater Serbia program of Russia and France. Months before the murder of the Archduke Sazonov had become convinced that Russia could get the Straits only through war, and 1914 was the year of all years for the war from the Franco-Russian viewpoint, as the success of the Anglo-German negotiations in June, 1914, seemed likely to reduce England's interest in the Triple Entente.

Mathias Morhardt has shown by quotations from their writings that not only Generals Obruchev and Boisdeffre, who concluded the Franco-Russian military convention in 1893-94, understood clearly that Russian general mobilization meant war but that Alexander III, Nicholas II, William II, George V, Poincaré, Dobrorolski, Paléologue, Viviani, Sir Edward Grey, and Lloyd George were equally clear and certain that it did. Far from determining upon war before knowing of the Russian mobilization, as Poincaré asserts was the case, the German Government did not declare war even after it learned of Russian mobilization, but endeavored to induce the Russians to suspend mobilization. Under the circumstances of the Russian prior mobilization against Germany, France was not obligated by her agreement with Russia to come to the aid of the latter, and hence it would not have been necessary for France to "tear up her defensive alliance." What actually held France in line with the aggressive Russian action were Poincaré's promises to Izvolski before 1914, his unqualified promise of French aid on his St. Petersburg visit, and the secret French encouragement of the Russian preparations and mobilization after he had returned to France. Poincaré is doubtless right about the impatience of Moltke and the German General Staff, but he openly confesses the same impatience on the part of General Joffre and the French General Staff. Poincaré makes much of the formal German declaration of war in 1914, but he says of 1870 that "it is vain to say that it was Napoleon III who declared war."

Poincaré's case for France's desire to delay and defend herself against German aggression does not hold water. The fact that the German ambassador at Paris could report on July 29 that peace was honestly desired in Paris simply shows how successful Poincaré, Viviani, and Messimy had been in deceiving him. The French authorities knew that Russian mobilization meant inevitable war; they knew that the Russian preparations were proceeding and mobilization was contemplated; and they knew that if forced into war Germany desired only a defensive war against Russia. Yet the French authorities made no effort whatever to restrain the Russians, but secretly urged them to speed up their preparations. But the most damning element in the whole case against France is to be found in the date of the official French determination upon war. Of this there is no doubt. At 1 a.m., August 1, Izvolski sent the following telegram to St. Petersburg:

> The French War Minister informed me, in hearty high spirits, that the Government has firmly determined upon war, and begged me to indorse the hope of the French General Staff that all of our efforts will be directed against Germany, and that Austria will be treated as a quantité négligeable.

This decision must have been arrived at some hours before Izvolski reported it to his home government, but even his telegram was sent sixteen hours before Germany declared war on Russia and two and a half days before Germany declared war upon France. France was, thus, the first country in Europe decisively to declare itself for war in the diplomatic crisis of 1914. Poincaré makes much of the refusal of the French Government to grant Joffre's original request for mobilization, which Izvolski explained to Sazonov thus:

> It is very important for France on account of political considerations relative to Italy, and most especially England, that the French mobilization should not precede the German one but form an answer to the latter.

Even Poincaré does not dare to assert that the French military preparations were not proceeding rapidly in secret in spite of the temporary withholding of the formal order for mobilization.

It is most astonishing that Poincaré should once more bring up the ten-kilometer withdrawal order of July 30 as a proof of defensive policy on the part of the French authorities. This has been riddled not only by historians but by both Viviani and Messimy. Poincaré asserts that this withdrawal order was a weakening of French military strength and was vigorously opposed by the General Staff. Both Viviani and Messimy denied this explicitly in speeches before the French Chamber on January 31, 1919, and Viviani admitted that diplomatic considerations were solely responsible for the withdrawal order. Messimy also informed General Joffre explicitly on this point in a telegram sent to him on August 1 at 5 p.m. These "diplomatic considerations" were the creation of a favorable impression on England, Italy, and the French people themselves by endeavoring to demonstrate that France was contemplating a defensive war.

M. Poincaré's "gates of hell" may not prevail against the fabric of Entente mythology and propaganda, but the much more relevant and substantial documentary facts of diplomatic history not only will prevail against them; they have already done so.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter is happy to announce that, contrary to common rumor, romance, even in a materialistic age, is not dead but alive and flourishing. In Italy a royal princess weds, with appropriate ceremony, a royal prince. Her train is four yards long and is borne by two little girls with golden hair; a king, two queens, and innumerable princes attend the marriage; twenty carriages of flowers do homage to the happy pair; the chapel in which the ceremony is performed is lighted by fourteenth-century candelabra, and the bride and groom kneel on crimson cushions before six crucifixes at the altar. These details, while unimportant to some, are of moment to the Drifter because they prove either that newspaper reporters are more given to reading fairy tales than he would have supposed possible or that a king and queen, in arranging the marriage of their daughter, are well enough versed in the tradition of fairy lore to do the thing up properly. It is only necessary to add that the young man who was in this case to win the royal princess, though himself a prince, is without either goods or kingdom, and the tale is complete.

* * * * *

THERE are those who do not look for romance in present-day Russia. But even there a fairy godmother has spoken; the Soviet Minister of Education has issued a decree abolishing all homework for school children henceforth. The Drifter well remembers the ogre of homework which the Soviet Government has now so obligingly slain; he recalls certain notebooks in which, in a painful, round hand, he wrote over and over some word of three syllables, some meaningless sentence, some simple problem in arithmetic; he remembers the gold stars for excellence which dotted some notebooks, although conspicuously lacking on his own. How welcome such an official order as that of the Soviets would have been to him in those days. If, as he sat licking his pencil under the lamp and from time to time making damp, deep marks on the lined page before him, he had heard such a release pronounced for him he imagines that the world could barely have contained his joyful spirit. That the same joy is rising in the breasts of Russian boys and girls he cannot doubt. Homework is not a national matter; it is as abominable in one language as another. To abolish it was certainly as important as the slaying of the Gorgon by Perseus, or as any number of fire-breathing dragons disposed of in a suitable manner by the proper hero.

* * * * *

FINALLY there is romance in the United States. We are not all given over to porcelain bath-tubs and the radio; there is at least one American citizen in whose heart trust in his fellow-men burns like a fire. William H. Anderson is in need of $45,000; he requires this sum not to further any great national movement but to free him "from personal burdens" which hinder his life work. And what does Mr. Anderson, this incurable romantic, do in such an emergency? Why, he does what any believer in fairy godmothers would do. He appeals to the public; he requests manna from the skies; he, in short, sends out a circular to whom it may concern asking that sufficient sums be sent him to release him from this unwelcome obligation. Who shall say that the manna will not fall? There will be ravens, there will be water from the rock, and the way out of the wilderness will be opened for him. The Drifter does not doubt that this touching faith will be rewarded. Romances must have their happy ending.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Palestine or Russia?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your columns being always open to anyone who pleads in a good cause, you will perhaps permit me to voice a warning of the most tragic import in a matter that concerns the fate of an entire people.

My morning paper brings me, through the Jewish Telegraph Agency, the news that the Joint Distribution Committee of American Jewry proposes to raise $15,000,000 for the assistance of Jews in Russia and other European countries. The Telegraph Agency adds a brief interview with Mr. Louis Marshall. I must take this interview as it is reported. In it Mr. Marshall is quoted as saying that this great drive will not interfere with Zionist activity in the United States but that he objects to the claim of the American Zionists that Palestine should have priority, on the ground that no benevolent activity has the right to a monopoly.

I am not a member of the Zionist organization. I have never paid my shekel and I don't think I ever will. I want to keep both my mind and my hands free. But after a fairly long and fairly thorough study of the Jewish situation in both Europe and Palestine I feel it my duty to protest with all possible vigor, with all possible urgency against the investment of one penny of Jewish money anywhere except in Palestine. No more disastrous, no more tragic error could be made. I am not impugning the good faith of the Soviet authorities in their scheme of settling Jewish farmers on Crimean lands. I impugn the conscious good faith of no one. I assert that there is no hope in Europe. It does not matter whether the regime is a red tyranny or a white, a capitalistic oligarchy tinged with monarchism as in Germany or a military despotism masquerading as a republic; it does not matter who are the "ins" or who are the "outs." At the first sign of popular tumult, whatever its cause, whatever its character, the people, whether in Soviet Russia or elsewhere, will rise up and smite the Jews. Promises count for nothing, the good faith of liberals is powerless, treaties are scraps of paper. If these Jews of today are not slaughtered, buried alive, crucified, shot, their children will be tomorrow. To spend one penny on keeping a Jew in Eastern or Central Europe is to subsidize murder. Palestine is not one form of benevolence among others. It is not benevolence at all. It is the only hope, the only duty, the only salvation.

Yesterday they pulled the beards of all the Jews on the streets of Riga; today they acquitted Hakenkreuzler in Silesia for destroying a synagogue. The Poles have made a gesture of peace. They want an American loan. If they get it they will reverse the gesture. If they don't get it they will blame the Jews. In Germany prices are rising. The people are told to smite the Jews. If France is other-minded, why does she not speak one word to curb the bloody Poles? If Italy is other-minded, whence these intrigues that seek to cripple us in the Near East? A thousand details could be gathered daily, nay hourly. And let not my American friends believe that there is or can be an exception. There is none. Did they themselves believe that the gates of America would ever be closed on the distressed of Israel? And if that could happen, what do they expect of Europe?

The causes of the hopelessness of the European situation are intricate. Yet they are clear when once they have been grasped. Christianity has never changed the real character of the pagan world. There are a few instinctive Christians everywhere and there are numerous Gentiles among them. But the broad masses of mankind are pagan barbarians, delighting in war and force, diverted by slaughter, instinctively wreaking irritation, discontent, or the mere playfulness of drunkenness on the weaker, the pacific, the minority, the different. To imagine that they have either gallantry or honor is as gross a superstition as to suppose that war can be anything but gruesomely relentless. Wherever the Jews must remain a small minority among a European people, there is no security nor health nor hope. The excuses of the majority differ from century to century. The Jew is not a Christian. The Jew is not an Aryan. The Jew is not . . . The Jew is . . . An inextricable mass of lies and self-deceptions. The Jew is in a minority. The Jew is a Jew. He has been murdered; he is being murdered; he will be murdered. There is no hope.

No hope—except in Palestine. We have the pledged word of the nations; we have the pledged honor of Britain that there we may some day become an effective if not an actual majority. With $15,000,000 we could come within sight of our goal. Crimean villages may be overrun by another Petlura or Denikin. Do our American Jews not remember that trail of blood? They have not seen, as I have, the children in Palestine who saw their fathers and their brothers buried alive. They have not seen, as I have seen, the whips and scorpions of Poland and Hungary. With $15,000,000 for Palestine we could so fortify and accelerate our work and make it so effective for the welfare and the civilization of the whole of the Near East that Britain may be tempted—as she needs but to be tempted—to include within the limits of the promised homeland the great and scarcely peopled tracts of Trans-Jordania with which our historical connection is hardly less clear than with the country from the Jordan to the sea. With $15,000,000 . . . But my imagination is staggered. For I can see Nahalal in the valley of Jezreel multiplied an hundred times, or Balfouria, or the lovely suburbs at the foot of the glory of Carmel. It was a Jew who said: "Man does not live by bread alone." He lives by an immortal and inexpugnable idea. The Crimean settlements will not flourish even while they are undemolished by Cossack or Tartar. There will be no health in them. It is useless to give bread to the Ghetto of Vilna. The bread will wither in the mouths of them that taste it. There is an idea alive today—an inspiration, an unquenchable, indomitable hope. Its name is Eretz Israel. I see outstretched hands of millions—stretched out not after the sour bread of charity, not after the cold clods of an alien and forever embattled land, but after the peace of Jerusalem and the excellency of Carmel.

Vienna, September 5 LUDWIG LEWISOHN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: A momentous gathering of American Jewry concluded a two-day session in Philadelphia on Sunday September 13. Leaders of all shades of opinion, radical and conservative, Zionists and non-Zionists, were present to consider the plan worked out by Dr. Joseph Rosen, representative of the Joint Distribution Committee in Russia for the last four years, for the settlement of thirty to forty thousand Jewish families in the Ukraine. It was at Dr. Rosen's suggestion that the J. D. C. had in 1924 allotted $400,000 as an experiment for settling 1,000 families on some of the most fertile land in southern Russia. Five thousand families were actually placed on some 500,000 acres of land furnished gratis by the Soviet Government. The success of this effort convinced Dr. Rosen of the feasibility of widening and extending this back-to-the-land movement. Of the 3,000,000 Jews in Russia 70 per cent are without means of earning a livelihood, in large measure because of the government policy of restrictions on private trade. Now that immigration to the United States is practically shut off, the hope of Russian Jewry, he felt, lay in removing as large a number as possible from the cities and towns to the land. This would make them economically independent and at once confer complete citizenship rights upon the settlers with three years' exemption from taxation and military service.

There was manifest at the national conference, held to raise $15,000,000 in three years to carry out Dr. Rosen's plan, a division of opinion as to its wisdom. Objection came principally from Zionists who feared that it would deter immigration to the Jewish homeland and in withdrawing financial assistance from the Zionist cause. The issue was squarely joined between the Zionists led by Rabbi Stephen Wise and the proponents of the plan led by Louis Marshall, who met the objections raised and the fears expressed concerning the attitude of the Soviet Government. On the assurance of the J. D. C. leaders that there was no intention to discourage the resettlement of Jews in Palestine, and that they were united with the Zionists in the upbuilding of the Jewish homeland, Zionist opposition to the Rosen plan was withdrawn.

Philadelphia, September 14 BENJAMIN GLASSBERG

French Colonies and Debts

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The cession of lands by France in connection with the liquidation of the war debt is not brought to your attention as a new thought—as you know it has been discussed both in French and American publications—but as an expression of a growing consciousness of many Americans of our need of larger tropical colonies for the production, under our own flag, of a larger part of our rapidly growing imports from the tropics and the need of naval harbors in the Pacific in relation to the Panama Canal and for better communications with the Philippines. In this connection let us consider the colonies held by France and how much territory she acquired as a result of the war. The area of the French colonies is approximately:

In Asia	[illegible]	square miles
In Africa	5,245,725	" "
In America	33,165	" "
In Oceania	[illegible]	" "
Total	[illegible]	" "

The territory acquired by France from Germany as a result of the war is:

In Africa	290,400	square miles
[illegible]	[illegible]	" "
Total	[illegible]	" "

For comparison let us also recall that France proper has an area of 212,660 square miles and a population of a little more than 39,000,000, practically at a standstill; the United States, including Alaska, an area of 3,560,920 square miles and a growing population of more than 112,000,000; and that the tropical colonies of the United States including Hawaii, Porto Rico, Guam, Samoa, the Panama Canal Zone, the Virgin Islands, and the Philippines have a total area of 125,365 square miles.

With the large colonial empire indicated in a previous paragraph, for which she has not the population nor the financial [illegible] for development within a reasonable period, it would appear that France, without suffering any loss of national [illegible] or wounds of future conquest, in the mutual advantage of both contracting countries might cede part of her colonies to the United States as part payment of her debt. I refer to the following countries:

French Guiana	32,000	square miles
French West Indies	1,665	" "
French Oceania	1,520	" "
New Caledonia	7,650	" "
Madagascar	228,000	" "
Total	270,835	" "

For these lands the United States could afford to pay a liberal price, the acquisition of which would enable this country to grow a large part of her imports of tropical vegetable products which now amount to approximately $1,500,000,000 per annum. Again, by the possession of the Marquesas and the Society Islands she would gain control of excellent harbors of great strategic importance in relation to the Panama Canal and strengthen her communications with the Philippines. Their value as colonies to France is negligible from whatever point of view. The advantage accruing to France from this arrangement would consist not only in relieving her of direct payment with attendant financial strain, but the cession of these lands would strengthen her finances by lessening her administrative expenses, which exceed the revenues by a considerable margin in most of her colonies. Finally, as a recognition of the value of American intervention, without which France probably would have been reduced in area and lost part of her colonies instead of adding thereto and sharing in the indemnity paid by Germany, the cession of these lands would cement the traditional friendship between the two great republics which may stand her in good stead in another war—and France still would be in possession of a colonial empire of 5,327,000 square miles, most of it contiguous territory within easy reach of the mother country. In its bearing upon the future the arrangement indicated might well rank in importance with the Louisiana purchase, without which the United States would not have been the deciding factor it was in the last war.

Rochester, Minnesota, September 21 P. J. WESTER

The Massacre of the Innocents

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Three hundred children are killed every year by automobiles in the City of New York. In Chicago 250 are killed annually. Thus we have a total of 550 children killed every year by automobiles in these two cities alone. By a simple calculation we may estimate that more than 7,000 children perish annually in this horrible manner in the whole of the United States.

How many children did King Herod slay in the massacre of the innocents?

What should we say if the Turks were to massacre 7,000 Christian children every year? What should we say, and do, if the criminal classes in the City of New York murdered 300 children every year?

Have we no pity? Are we Christians? Are we civilized?

It is a recognized fact that more than half of the automobile fatalities are due to excessive speed. At least half of these children might be saved from an agonizing and dreadful death, from extinction in the very beginning and dawn of their existence, by automatically limiting the speed of all automobiles to a point more consistent with public safety (say twelve miles an hour). This is in our power, in the City of New York, at least. Let us ask for a city ordinance requiring that every automobile in the City of New York shall accept and use a speed controller, limiting its speed automatically to a maximum of twelve miles an hour. I am aware that such a city ordinance would interfere with the amusement of speed lovers; but I maintain that human life should have the precedence.

Chicago, September 9 BERTRAND SHADWELL

Books and Plays

Ironies

By WYMAN SIDNEY SMITH

These are the smooth bent pins of life—

That we shall love and not be loved,
And see love killed by the mere turning of a rose petal;
That we shall live and miss ambition by a penny;
That we shall gain life's secret
And lose it at an evening's argument;
That we shall dream and see a thorn
On an old rose bush prick the dream.

Some lose their lives because a pulley slips;
In other days the dew made climbing dangerous,
Or wind dropped cocoanuts on heads from high palm trees.

Accidents?
How so?
Ironies are monkeys in us still.

The Lineage of Printing

The Invention of Printing in China and Its Spread Westward. By Thomas Francis Carter. Columbia University Press. $7.50.

The Literature of Papermaking, 1390-1800. By Dard Hunter. Chillicothe, Ohio: The Author. $30.

THE history of our civilization might be written in terms of the development of printing. For our civilization is essentially a book—and periodical—civilization. After the fashion of the Sultan who is alleged to have pronounced, following a most incredible story by one of his courtiers, "Now that I believe, because I read something of the sort in a book," we reverence the printed page. In America at any rate we have exalted literacy above all virtues. Yet in spite of our devotion to the printed word we have given inadequate attention to its history. To the relatively scanty literature of the subject Professor Carter and Mr. Hunter have made two notable contributions.

For his work, the first Occidental history of Chinese printing, Professor Carter has tapped the resources of the globe. Archaeological researches, hundreds of books in Oriental languages, and personal conference with scholars in all parts of the world furnish the sound basis for a volume which carries its learning lightly, is filled with human interest, quiet humor, and illuminating illustrations, and is informed with that sense of the vital unity of all human affairs which alone makes scholarship a living thing. Its method affords a lesson to the research scholar on the one hand and to the entertaining but inaccurate writer of special articles on the other.

Professor Carter brings to Occidental readers new and striking personages in the history of printing: Ts'ai Lun, who in the second century A.D. invented paper, making it from bark, hemp, rags, and fish nets; the Empress Shotoku, who gave enormous impetus to printing by having a million charms printed in order to prolong her life but who died while the last of the charms were being made; Wang Chieh, the first known printer of books, a work of his having been found with the date 868; Fêng Tao, the prime minister under whose direction the Chinese Classics were printed in 130 volumes between 932 and 953; Wu Chao-i, responsible for making literature available to the common people; Pi Shêng, the first experimenter with movable type. Figures like these emerge as builders of a cultivated civilization while most of Europe was in barbarism.

As to the possible line of descent from Chinese to European printing, Professor Carter finds the transmission of paper across Asia into Northern Africa, and then to Spain by means of the Moors, unquestionable. Also there is every probability that European block printing, first found in playing cards and image prints, came from China. There is only a mere possibility that the movable type of China and Korea—not so important to printing there because of the form of the languages—actually influenced European typography. Professor Carter believes, however, that reports of travelers as to the great diffusion of books in the Orient must have been a marked incentive to typographical invention in Europe.

Of as great significance as the facts in the book are two deductions. One relates to the parallelism of the human mind in East and West. As the author says, refuting popular notions of mysterious inscrutability in the Orient, "Given similar conditions, the two ends of the world have done similar things." An amusing concrete example is found in the fourteenth-century Chinese woodcut entitled Beauties Who from Dynasty to Dynasty Have Overturned Empires. The other deduction concerns the religious motive as everywhere the impelling cause for the advance of printing. The earliest printing in practically every country has been religious printing. It is a commentary upon human inconsistency that the very forces which have invariably stimulated the means of expanding human knowledge have frequently, as in our day, striven to prevent the dissemination of fact and opinion.

Mr. Hunter's contribution is a companion piece to his earlier volume, "Old Papermaking," which was the first book ever prepared exclusively by one man, from the writing of the text through the designing of the type, the making of the paper, the composition, and finally the press work itself. His new work, prepared in the same way, is an equally beautiful piece of printing and an equally sound pioneer study. It lists the seventy European and American works from 1390 to 1800 which deal with papermaking. The title-pages of the more important volumes are reproduced, each on paper as nearly like the original as possible. Moreover, the books listed, many of which are extremely rare, are described and summarized with so much insight and selective ability as to turn bibliography, dullest of subjects, into pageantry.

NELSON ANTRIM CRAWFORD

A Great Physician

The Life of Sir William Osler. By Harvey Cushing. Two volumes. Oxford University Press. $12.50.

SOLIDLY grounded in science, alive to the social implications of the medical discoveries of his day, and gifted with a compelling charm, Sir William Osler exerted an influence on the medical profession that has been equaled by few characters in the history of medicine. Born in 1849 of pioneer parents at Bond Head, Upper Canada, he early exhibited an exuberance of spirit combined with a certain roguishness and ingenuity. "Father" Johnson, his teacher at Weston, Ontario, was an omnivorous naturalist interested not only in the gross behavior of his young students but likewise in the microscopic appearance of whatever chanced to cross his path—whether delicate aquatic larvae or the molar of an old cow killed on the railway track. It was Johnson who first fired the imagination of William Osler and developed in him that power of observation which involves something more than seeing.

It is not wholly surprising that Osler, the son of a clergyman and the favorite pupil of Father Johnson, entered Trinity College with the expectation of following the ministry. There, however, he fell under the dominant influence of James Bovell, dean of the Institute of Medicine and professor of natural theology. Although Bovell was in the process of changing from medicine to the ministry his pupil at the age of twenty ferried in the reverse direction. Bovell became Osler's spiritual father: "I will honor as my father the man who teaches me the art."

Two years abroad in the clinics of London, Vienna, Paris, Berlin, and Munich successfully cross-fertilized Osler's mind so that on his return he was well equipped to assume the duties of professor of pathology at McGill. Charming in manner, prodigious in energy, enthusiastic in his work, he soon became the leader of a scientific renaissance. In 1884, at the age of thirty-four, while revisiting Europe he accepted a call to the professorship of medicine at the University of Pennsylvania. In Philadelphia as in Montreal Osler proved "a potent ferment," developing teaching in the wards and arousing the spirit of research in the laboratory. Then with the creation in 1889 of the Johns Hopkins Medical School he was called to Baltimore as chief.

The Baltimore years proved to be the flowering of Osler's career. Firmly grounded in the fundamentals of medicine, in love with his work and beloved by his students, he was also a prolific writer, turning out in those days a great proportion of the seven hundred and thirty titles of his bibliography. Osler realized his greatest joy and chief pride, however, in reviving the old-fashioned method of bedside instruction on the wards. As he once said: "I desire no other epitaph than the statement that I taught medical students in the wards." His depth and breadth of learning found even fuller fruition in his "Text Book of Medicine," a work that has been the unquestioned standard in the field ever since. The crisp style, the humble confession of the gaps in medical knowledge, the precision of thought helped to intrigue the interest of the Rockefellers in medical matters and played no small part in the evolution of the Rockefeller Institute of Medical Research.

But greater than his tangible work was the impalpable effect of Osler's engaging personality on the medical profession of his day. In a period of momentous scientific advances he immediately perceived the full implications of recent discoveries with regard to tuberculosis, syphilis, malaria, and typhoid fever, and possessed the personality and literary ability to enliven the profession to its full social duty.

Such prodigious expenditure of energy took its toll, however. When, therefore, the call to the Regius Professorship at Oxford came Osler seized the opportunity to limit his consulting practice and to devote his attention to the more scholarly aspects of medicine. He was not wholly successful in this, for his talent for leadership was inevitably recognized and utilized to the full. So widespread was the affection in which he was held that virtually every possible honor of the British medical profession was bestowed upon him. His home in Oxford, appropriately nicknamed The Open Arms, was constantly filled with English and American guests. On December 29, 1919, died "one of the most greatly beloved physicians of all time."

Such is the story which Dr. Cushing unfolds, or rather allows his subject to unfold, in fourteen hundred pages. For Dr. Cushing has entirely effaced himself, utilizing Osler's letters, Osler's speeches, and Osler's acts to construct a mosaic which is virtually autobiographical in nature. In fact, he has almost exceeded the limits of commendable modesty. That his scholarship and medical eminence were not the only grounds on which the biography of Osler was intrusted to him is indicated by the touching last chapters of the book.

It is interesting that in an age characterized by profound discoveries Osler, who made not a single fundamental contribution, should nevertheless be one of the great medical figures. His gifts were of the clinic rather than of the laboratory. Probably no physician of his day was more learned in the structural basis of disease, but he utilized his pathology to fortify a rare clinical acumen. The stern sense of reality engendered by his early training never allowed him to become a therapeutic faddist.

The work is bulky, but as a cyclopedia of Osleriana it will form an invaluable source book not only of the man but of the medical generation which he tends to symbolize. The excellent index and page headings will greatly enhance its value. The work is illumined by Osler's never-failing wisdom and charm, his sharp wit and gentle humor, and it is everywhere informed with Dr. Cushing's own literary skill and devotion to a great task. The "Life" constitutes a noble memorial. A biography, however, that will critically evaluate the contributions made by Osler to the science and art of medicine has yet to be written.

HERRMANN BLUMGART

The Long Journey

Wanderings. By Robert Herrick. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

IN 1895 Robert Herrick, then a young American idealist, published his first essay in fiction. Since then he has come a long and sorrowful journey, marking in novel after novel the stages of his increasing bitterness and disillusion until now in three of the four short novels which constitute "Wanderings" he has reached an ultimate pessimism. None of his works has achieved absolute greatness, none is sure of a permanent place in American literature; and yet, taken together, they form an impressive record of the life of a man who has spent his years in a serious effort to understand his age and who has found it less and less good. Their pages contain many an accurate picture of American life, many a shrewd comment upon it; and between the lines may be read an even more interesting story of the gradual embitterment of a passionate personality.

Mr. Herrick was never, to be sure, a facile optimist. Endowed with an austere, almost puritanical passion for rectitude and integrity, he was never one to see in the growing power and wealth of his country any palliation of the questionable means by which this growth was furthered. In novel after novel he described the rise of some business or professional man and set down with grim honesty the details of the bargains which he made. He never failed to show how commercial success was purchased at the price of sharp dealing or how professional advancement was achieved at the expense of professional integrity; and he never failed to make clear his opinion that, considered as a whole, the history of his generation was a history of the process by which honor, intellectual honesty, and the feeling for spiritual values were bartered for wealth, position, and power. Yet the sharpness of this criticism was, as such sharpness generally is, but the corollary of a passionate belief in the possibility of those things whose absence was so resolutely pointed out. Born of an idealism, Mr. Herrick's criticism revealed by the very vehemence of its protest against one tradition of life its belief in the possibilities of life itself; and he was, by the very fact that he chose usually to deal with sociological themes, constantly confessing his faith in mankind, since to discuss the evils of a social system is to assume that human nature is itself somehow capable of the good, the beautiful, and the great.

Step by step, however, his bitterness has grown. With increasing disgust he has watched the spectacle which his age affords, and his disillusion, growing deeper and deeper, has led him to question not merely his country and his time but existence itself. "Wanderings" is for him a new departure because it is the first of his major works in which his theme is not primarily sociological; in it he turns his back upon society and its problems, gives up, as it were, any hope of finding an adequate explanation of life's acrid flavor in the study of institutions and traditions, and gives himself to the analysis of characters and emotions which are operating in a social void. In these new stories his heroes have, like himself, surrendered the attempt to live in any close association with their fellows. They have abandoned the market-place and the street in the hope that in some remote and primitive corner of the world they could live uncorrupted lives, but even there they find existence inevitably bitter. Specifically, the stories deal, in a mood not unsuggestive of D. H. Lawrence, with baffled passion, with the inevitable frustration of that desire for complete understanding and complete union which produces the agony of love, but they have more than this specific significance since they constitute for Mr. Herrick a new order of problems and mark his acquiescence in a genuine pessimism. His stories have generally, it is true, been stories of dissonances, but here for the first time he devotes a volume to the study of dissonances which are unresolvable because of something inherent in life itself. Ceasing to be a sociologist who believes that it is in society that man can find the chief source of his mystery, he has become a psychologist intent upon understanding the profounder predicament in which the gods placed him when they fashioned him as he is.

This long journey which Mr. Herrick has come is the same which is commonly made by both races and individuals. They begin with the feeling that their lives or their societies have merely gone strangely and temporarily wrong; they are sure that they may somehow be made to go right as the lives or the societies of other times have gone; but as their criticism penetrates deeper and deeper, as they proceed from disillusion to disillusion, they come upon those dissonances which no manipulation can resolve, and whether they accept them with the wail of Thomas Hardy or the shrug of Anatole France they feel in them rather than in the details of time or place the real materials of philosophy and art. If in recording this journey as he made it Mr. Herrick has failed of the absolute greatness which he seemed as a young man to promise it is because, I fancy, he has not been completely frank nor told quite all he had to tell. Almost from the beginning there was in him a bitterness which his study of American society did not wholly explain, some more personal pain which helped bridge the gulf between the disappointed idealist which he was and the embittered recluse which he has become. Doubtless pride and delicacy have restrained any impulse to portray more intimately his emotions, and these are understandable things, but he has paid a price for his fastidiousness. His books, always interesting, seem always not quite complete expressions of the mood which produced them.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Talking of Taxes

Taxation and Welfare. By Harvey Whitefield Peck. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Public Finance. By Harley Leist Lutz. D. Appleton and Company. $4.

The Economics of Taxation. By Harry Gunnison Brown. Henry Holt and Company. $3.

The Taxation of Unearned Incomes. (Second edition.) By Harry Gunnison Brown. Lucas Brothers. $2.

The Social Significance of the Inheritance Tax. By Eugenio Rignano. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.75.

THE flood of tax books continues unabated. How high ought taxes to be? As low as possible, says the practical business man. As high, says the impractical theorist, as is required for the best division possible, from the standpoint of welfare, between public and private spending. Recent British studies suggest more public, as opposed to private, expenditure. Mr. Peck's interesting and useful volume is a reasoned attempt to show that state expenditure should increase faster than national income. Taxes, generally speaking, ought to rise, and ought, in the general interest, to be paid increasingly by the rich.

Mr. Lutz has added another to the long succession of dreary general texts on public finance. On the whole, it is one of the least bad of the lot, and it is likely to prove very useful to harassed teachers in this parched field. Safe and conservative in point of view, and traditional in arrangement, it brings the available information down to date, besides settling, by rather pontifical pronouncement, various questions which might otherwise occasion the student hours of troublesome thinking. It is always helpful to have difficult problems settled right.

Mr. Brown's two books are of a different sort. "The Economics of Taxation" is a careful deductive study, from the standpoint of fairly orthodox theory, of the incidence of taxes. A clear, excellent, and straightforward piece of work, it might well be commended to Secretary Mellon and those other obscurantists who cheerfully and invincibly believe that the consumer pays the tax, anyway. For lack of clear thinking, as Mr. Brown points out, much tax discussion is pure obfuscation. Not till we know who ultimately pays the various taxes can we decide which ones we want, on the basis of the results we hope to achieve. The question of what taxes are preferable Mr. Brown rigidly and properly excludes from this book; but in "The Taxation of Unearned Incomes" he gives scope to his predilection for a tax on land rent (or value) as the chief source of government revenue. It was full time for some competently equipped economist to take up the cudgels in behalf of the economically tenable parts of Henry George's doctrine. Mr. Brown has done it with zeal, and on the whole with skill. Of course this puts him outside the fold of the safe and sane economists, and the vigor of his onslaught has already occasioned some little fluttering in the academic dove-cotes. But say what we may, land does differ significantly, for purposes of economic analysis, from factories and railroad trains and other things that men make. The true economic scientist, then, if he is going to devise tax systems, must take account of those differences, and not simply foam at the mouth every time the single tax is mentioned.

By the same token, Mr. Brown ought not to foam at the mouth every time he mentions the socialists. Notwithstanding his lame defense of inheritance in pretty much its present length and breadth, his objections to private receipt of income from land rent lie almost equally against private receipt of income from interest on inherited capital. He has not demonstrated, and cannot demonstrate, that such receipt performs an essential economic function in the second case any more than in the first. The right of transmission to descendants, says Mr. Brown in effect, is essential to capital accumulation. So be it; but even though I will not save except for my children, yet even so it is unnecessary for their descendants to reap five per cent per annum to all eternity on the fruits of my abstinence. So comes Mr. Rignano with the ingenious suggestion that inheritance taxes be graduated, not only, as at present, according to size of estate and degree of relationship of beneficiaries, but also according to number of testamentary transfers of the various parts of the estate. At a man's death, what he has accumulated himself might be subject only to the present tax; his father's accumulation, which the man has inherited, might pay 50 per cent, his grandfather's, which has already been twice inherited, say, 100 per cent. Under such a scheme I can leave property to my son untroubled, and he can hand on half of it to my grandson; but my great-grandson must work for his own living, unless my son and grandson in their turn work and save for him. It is an ingenious turning of the tables on those who maintain that we cannot interfere with inheritance without discouraging work and saving. The device has difficulties enough; yet any plan of this sort offered to the American public with even the carefully guarded blessing of as wise and cautious a scholar as Professor Seligman deserves the attention of that great body of students who wish to preserve the benefits of private management and initiative and who yet realize the incompatibility of political democracy with cumulative economic inequality.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Circumstance and Character

Sex and Civilization. By Paul Bousfield. E. P. Dutton and Company. $5.

"THE condition of the sexual energies in civilized society, as it affects the relative position of men and women, and especially our conception of masculine and feminine ideals" is the object of his investigation, Dr. Bousfield tells us. And so, half a century after John Stuart Mill wrote shrewdly that we could predicate nothing about women's innate mental traits and emotional attributes until we had carefully studied the laws of the influence of circumstances on character, one of the first beginnings of such a study is made.

Whether the individual reader will think it fortunate or otherwise that so much of the pioneering work in this important and curiously neglected field should be done by scientists who are frankly preoccupied with one only of the various motivations of character, and are concerned to elucidate and extend theories so highly debatable as some of those grouped under the general heading of psychoanalysis, he cannot fail to recognize the valuable contribution they offer. Perhaps the best way to describe the impression this book has made on me is to confess that although it often seems irritatingly diffuse and didactic, and although many of the psychoanalytic tenets adduced as the basis of the feminist argument do not gain my belief (the castration complex in particular seeming to me fantastically untenable), the book has won half a dozen rereadings from me in the last few months.

Among the various speculations it starts, possibly the most interesting is started by Dr. Bousfield's central theory as to the creation of sex traditions—suggested in part, as he candidly explains, by Dr. Beatrice Hinkle's previously published statement that instead of thinking of people according to sex she had substituted type, and in part by the Vaertings's theory of the dominant sex, but nevertheless his own. Certain attributes and qualities, he says, come at a given time and place to be considered as belonging to the sex then dominant. When the male sex happens to be dominant, these qualities are called masculine; when the female sex is dominant the same qualities are called feminine. Since the male has now been dominant in Europe for many centuries, the qualities that have therefore come to be called masculine seem to us innately masculine. The theory is open to the objection that the Vaertings eventually may not be sustained in their thesis, but nevertheless it has positive value. I rather fancy that Dr. Bousfield hit upon the valuable core of this notion as a result of personal observation and speculation, and that he thereupon quite unnecessarily buttressed it with an elaborate and possibly not entirely sound anthropological argument.

One of his most valuable contributions he shares with Dr. Hinkle, the discovery that the attempt on the part of many individuals to have, or to pretend to have, the characteristics quite arbitrarily assumed to belong to their sex, and only those, has been productive of much unfortunate warping and straining, and so of individual unhappiness and social waste.

His main argument is equally valuable. The repression of sexual instincts dictated by society to girls, he says, often results in an unconscious and diffused sort of sexuality that saps their energy and results in sexual perversions which may involve permanent maladjustments. It will be remembered that Freud, and in fact the generality of untechnical writers as well, believe this diffused sort of sexuality to be as normal in women as it would be abnormal in men, and therefore one of the marks, as one of the causes of their inferiority. Dr. Bousfield makes out a vigorous case for its being abnormal, with the corollary that therefore the physical inferiority resulting from it is artificial. The book is of interest to the layman, and it is indispensable both to the analyst of human behavior and to the feminist.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS

Books in Brief

The Secret of the Coup d'Etat; Unpublished Correspondence of Prince Louis Napoleon, MM. De Morny, De Flahault, and Others, 1848-1852. Edited with an Introduction by the Earl of Kerry and a Study by Philip Guedalla. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

Karl Marx once said of the coup d'etat of 1851 that it was perpetrated "in order to pay off the debts of the Bonaparte family." Marx, however, wrote just after the coup d'etat and based his judgment on little more than a prejudiced suspicion that the numerous studies written since his time have not confirmed. This collection of letters—which parades under an entirely misleading title—exchanged principally between the Count de Flahault and M. de Morny, two important participants in the coup d'etat, lends no further evidence in support of Marx's contention. And yet one rises from the reading with a feeling that the proponent of the materialistic interpretation of history was right. Flahault and Morny, father and illegitimate son as they were, expressed themselves much more candidly in their letters to each other than in statements intended immediately or ultimately for the public ear. One hears, therefore, amidst all the usual cant regarding the saving of society, love of country, and fidelity to a cause—in which both gentlemen undoubtedly considered themselves thoroughly sincere—the occasional chink of silver and the rustle of banknotes. The true secret of the coup d'etat will be revealed only when we learn more about the actual motives impelling the various conspirators. It may be that the intuitive insight of Marx revealed to him what the scientific incumbrances of historians have concealed from them and that he alone perceived the secret of the coup d'etat. But it may be, too, that there was no secret, after all, and that the coup d'etat was nothing more than its historians have maintained.

The Scientific Study of Human Society. By Franklin Henry Giddings. University of North Carolina Press. $2.

In his latest book Mr. Giddings elaborates his fundamental thesis that society can be studied scientifically through an analysis of what he calls "societal patterns and societal variables." With an understanding of the patterns and the variables he couples case-counting and the statistical method, and especially dwells on the significance of casual groups and their relation to the fundamental patterns. Despite the fact that this is essentially a technical book for serious students of sociology, Mr. Giddings has not escaped from giving a number of acute generalizations on present-day society. For advanced university courses the work should prove a valuable text, and all students of society will find it a definite contribution to the methodology of their field.

Drama

Second Flight

TIME and circumstance conspired to aid Messrs. Anderson and Stallings in achieving their first great success. Circumstance saw to it that one of them should be sent to gather his material in pain and peril, while time prepared the moment of robust cynicism which served to generate their mood and to prepare the understanding of their audiences. They themselves are doubtless fully aware of the fact that whatever god looks over the fate of playwrights made an important third in their collaboration; and it was not, for this reason, to be expected that in their second effort they should be able to begin where they left off before. "First Flight" (Plymouth Theater) is, indeed, no unqualified success, for it lacks the force and the speed as well as the timeliness of "What Price Glory"; yet it is no discouragement to those who look to its authors for many important contributions to the American stage, since it shows that they are, even when unaided, capable of breaking new ground. Their play is not great, but it is the first native historical drama which is neither merely a stately tableau nor a mildly galvanized wax-works.

Taking Andrew Jackson as their hero they have managed to escape the curse of dignity which falls upon nearly all who attempt to treat a historical personage, and they have sought to capture the peculiar atmosphere of his times in the full realization that it had nothing to do with the stateliness of history. Somehow they have managed to grasp the fact which ought to be obvious to every one who can read, but which somehow no writer has ever fully grasped—the fact, that is to say, that the dominant characteristic of the remoter States of the American Federation was simply the grotesque melange of barbarism and dignity which the spectacle of their life afforded. Actually, the citizens of these communities were inhabiting a wilderness, actually, their family estates were, in many cases, at least, the rude dwellings of frontiersmen, and their customs were those of any savage community where personal prowess is the deciding factor in any dispute. But because they had lived for no more than a generation or two in these primitive conditions they had not wholly forgotten the traditions of another life. They pretended that settlers who had lived for twenty years in the same spot constituted a landed aristocracy; they spoke of the blackleg lawyer who had read a few books in the intervals of coon hunting as though he were a second Blackstone; and they began with the ceremony appropriate to a court ball a dance in a log cabin which would end before morning in a free-for-all fight. Oratory rolled from their mouths in such sonorous phrases that the leader of an Indian raid became, as his health was elaborately drunk in corn liquor poured from a jug, second only in generalship and historical importance to Hannibal himself; and oratory was a habit of life as well as speech. By the license of rhetoric the Free State of Franklin was transformed into an ancient and sovereign Power comparable in wealth and polish at least to France in the days of le Roi de Soleil.

Perhaps there was nothing ever quite like it before, perhaps no such band of courtly backwoodsmen ever existed in any other community, and certainly nothing else in all the history of America was quite so uniquely picturesque. No historian could ever do it justice: he would be too grave. No patriot could ever really picture it: he would be too much impressed. But someone with enough gusto to enjoy its vigor coupled with enough irony to relish its contrast could make it something superb, and the authors of "First Flight" have—well, come close enough to suggest that they may sometime be able to realize the opportunity which they deserve great credit for having at least perceived.

Their evocation of the atmosphere is excellent and their drawing of character, while not so distinguished, highly satisfactory; but there is in the action of the play an unmistakable drag, which is, perhaps, the result simply of the fact that in their eagerness to treat only a single, self-contained incident the authors have not allowed themselves sufficient material. Actually their story ends at the close of the second act, and they are faced with a good three-quarters of an hour to fill. The average playwright, I fear, would have given us an Inaugural Ball in tableau or something almost as banal, and though the present authors have done nothing quite so bad as that they have, nevertheless, sent the young Jackson back for an extended love scene which is not only tame but which involves, also, a disastrous change in mood from the roystering to the sentimental. On the whole the play is one which presents many points of interest to the critical spectator, but it is not a "good show."

"The Vortex," first of three plays by the English actor Noel Coward to be produced in New York this season, revealed itself at Henry Miller's Theater as a thoroughly interesting piece which begins as satiric comedy and slides almost imperceptibly into something very near tragedy. The material which it employs is actually rather slight, it might easily have become entirely trivial, but there is a dexterity in the handling which keeps it always alive and always engaging. What Mr. Coward has to offer is not profundity and not any remarkable strength but a certain freshness of personality which he is able to communicate not only through his acting but through his writing as well. Both the character of the humor and the method by which the tale is gradually unfolded reveal a touch sufficiently individual to impart to each a freshness too slight to analyze but sufficient to make the play stand out among the usual banalities of the theater. "The Vortex" is, indeed, among the two or three plays of the new season indisputably worth seeing.

"The Pelican" (Times Square Theater) provides Margaret Lawrence with a series of situations of the sort in which emotional actresses always delight. The playwright has seen to it that the heroine of the drama, a much enduring mother, shall be called upon to make an impressive series of sacrifices and, though it is pretty obvious that most of them should never have been made, she is given every opportunity for noble suffering; and such, I take it, was his chief purpose.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE
Evenings (except Monday), 8:30 sharp.
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp.
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
All Performances—Orchestra, $2; Balcony, $1.50.

BAYES Theatre, 44th St., W. of Broadway. LACKAWANNA 6745
EVENINGS, 8:30 MATINEE SATURDAY, 2:30
The Yiddish Art Theatre Players in Maurice Schwartz Production of
A Biblical Drama by Paul Heyse
King Saul
Complete Synopsis in English with Program

DEBATES LECTURES

RAND SCHOOL
7 E. 15th Street
V. F. Calverton
"Social Interpretation of American Literature"
Fridays, 8:30 P. M., Oct. 2 to Nov. 6
Joseph M. Osman
"The Psychology of Personality"
Tuesdays, 7 P. M., Sept. 29 to Dec. 22
Marius Hansome
"A Critical Approach to Sociology"
Tuesdays, 8:30 P. M., Sept. 29 to Dec. 22

NATIONALISM
Six Lectures on the most important World-problem today
By Carlton J. H. Hayes, Ph.D., LL.D.
Professor of History in Columbia University
In the COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM
Park Avenue and 34th Street
On Thursday evenings, Oct. 15, 22, 29
Nov. 5, 12, 19, at 8:15 o'clock
Course tickets, $3.50, may be secured in advance at the office of the Community Church, 12 Park Avenue.
Single Admission, 75 cents.

International Relations Section

British Labor and the Empire

By L. HADEN GUEST

I

AT the 1922 and 1923 general elections in Great Britain very little was said of the empire from Labor platforms and when Labor came into office in 1924 it found itself confronted with the test of the governance of a world dominion. It is true we had men of knowledge and experience in empire affairs in our party and we conducted an empire policy at least as well as, and in some ways better than, other parties in the state. The Labor Government's scheme for migration to the dominions, its administration of tropical dependencies, its understanding of the greatness of the problems of empire politics showed its fitness for government in no uncertain way. But the Labor Party did not have a generally agreed upon and accepted empire policy, a policy which would help us to apply to the empire as a whole ideas of the same general order as we have applied to our own policy in home affairs. That policy we are now setting out to create, and interesting steps can be traced in the annual reports of the British Labor Party for 1923, 1924, and in the agenda for the annual conference in 1925.

In the 1923 report there is some vigorous language about imperialist exploitation of lands overseas; in the 1924 report there is the record of an important resolution of bulk purchase of food, largely from the dominions, moved and seconded at the 1924 annual conference by George Lansbury, M.P., and Tom Johnston, M.P. But in the preliminary executive-committee resolutions for the annual conference in 1925 there is presented for the first time a series of resolutions dealing comprehensively with the Labor attitude on empire policy from the point of view of a democracy in control.

II

The first attempt to gather together a conference of Labor parties in the British Commonwealth of Nations was made in 1924, but so few delegates were able to attend that only a series of informal meetings and conversations took place. But this year, 1925, a conference met on July 27 and the five following days in the rooms of the Empire Parliamentary Association, Westminster Hall, London. Its agenda included the discussion of migration within the empire, the Geneva protocol for the pacific settlement of international disputes, international labor legislation and the question of the ratification of the eight-hour day, anthrax, white-lead, and other conventions, inter-dominion trade relations, including, of course, trading relations with Great Britain, conditions of Indian labor in British colonies, and industrial legislation and labor protection in mandated territories. Representatives from Australia, Canada, South Africa, Newfoundland, Ireland, India, and Palestine were present, a fraternal delegation of the International Federation of Trade Unions, and strong contingents from the executive committee of the national Labor Party, the general council of the Trades Union Congress, and the Parliamentary Labor Party.

The fact that this conference met in the year of the twenty-fifth British Labor Party Conference gives an indication of the rate of growth of labor as a political power in the empire as a whole. How often the conference will meet in future years is undecided, but it has already been determined to make such conferences periodical, and a resolution affirming this principle appears on the preliminary agenda of the British Labor Party Conference for September. What the influence of such a conference will be also remains for the future to determine, but with Labor taking an increasingly important share in the dominions and in India, with a growing recognition of the first-rate importance of labor problems in the mandated territories and in the dependent empire it is certain that there exists a great role for this conference to play in the affairs of the British Commonwealth of Nations.

Politically these conferences link up the Labor parties of the British Commonwealth of Nations more closely with the general labor movement of the world and with one another, but their main work, of course, is economic. They face one of the greatest difficulties in the economic organization of the world as a whole—the conflict of the standards of life of white and colored labor.

It is possible to have a policy of a white Australia. It is not possible to have a policy of a white empire without cutting the empire in pieces. What the solution of the conflict of standards of life will be, or whether there will be any solution, is, of course, not possible to say. But at least we are working toward a solution when Australian experience meets the South African. In South Africa the demarcation of work between white and black, the "color bar," and race questions are in the very forefront of political and social questions. This problem of the conflict of differing standards of life has forced itself to the front of British Labor politics also. During the present session of Parliament the Parliamentary Labor Party has appointed a special committee to consider its policy toward "sweated goods." The practicability of the exclusion of goods made under sweated conditions is being carefully considered. Similar economic reasons have forced on the British Labor Party the consideration of the policy of imperial preference, and a recent division in the House of Commons when nineteen members voted for imperial preference and twelve others, compulsorily absent, expressed their support of the principle shows how acute the question has become. Among those supporting were Mr. J. H. Thomas, Labor Colonial Secretary, and the Clydeside group, including Mr. Wheatley.

One result of the conference will inevitably be the broadening out of the conception of Labor throughout the empire. It is recognized that it is necessary to have not a British policy or an Australian policy or a Canadian policy but a policy for the British commonwealth as a whole. And it is no longer a question of theory or of some far-distant date. In 1924 a Labor Government was in office in Great Britain, at an early date a Labor Commonwealth Government will be in office in Australia, in a year or two more a Labor Government may again be in office in London—presumably aided by an effective majority. That is to say, in a few years—and a few years more or less are of no great importance to the historical and political significance of the event—Labor will be in power over the British commonwealth as a whole, and in effective power because backed up in Australia, in New Zealand, in Canada, in South Africa, and other regions of the empire either by majorities supporting governments or by strong minorities vitally influencing opinion. Labor ruling the whole dominion of the British Commonwealth of Nations will have to face the most difficult tasks of the world, for all the great problems the world is called upon to face are found within the British Empire. Labor has been preparing for this task for many years. The problems of the government of Indian have been as much the subject of earnest thought as the problems of the government of Great Britain. In the impending discussions of Indian policy it is certain that Labor will take a leading share. The same consideration applies to the problems of the tropical territories in Africa, where over 300 different black races, speaking widely separated languages and with customs ranging from cannibalism to complex Moslem civilizations, present a bewildering array of detailed tasks. Nor must we forget the tasks of empire in the West Indies or in South America or in the East Indies. And to the preliminary consideration of these great responsibilities Labor in Great Britain is now calling into conference Labor in the dominions. Truly a change from the time, twenty years ago, when those of us who are now working in the great world-wide movement were standing on orange-boxes or borrowed chairs at street corners speaking of the need of the industrial and political reorganization of the workers for the bringing about of socialism. There was truth in our words and a power greater than we knew.

III

When the Labor Government found itself in office in 1924 and in a difficult position representing a balancing minority, we were at once faced with tremendous tasks. But our line of approach to our tasks was in most cases quite clear—on foreign policy we were in no doubt, in industrial affairs our line of action was clearly mapped. But with regard to the British commonwealth as a whole our policy was not sufficiently determined. The problems of a world-wide federation of nations demand closer study than any party has yet given them. Despite flag-wagging and sentiment the Conservatives and the Liberals were as uncertain of this policy as Labor. Nor could this be otherwise. For example, the problems of tropical Africa are only fifty years old, the problem of Kenya is only ten years old. And not before the Labor Government came into office was a special commission sent out to East Africa to study conditions on the spot and to report on policy. Mr. Ormesby-Gore, the Conservative, Major Church, the Labor, and Mr. Linfield, the Liberal representative, went to East Africa, and their report is a historic document of great interest and one which will have an important effect on policy.

The reaction of Labor in facing unknown problems was to demand knowledge. And while the commission in East Africa did its work and a delegation visited South Africa and later on Jamaica, the Labor members in the House of Commons especially interested in empire affairs joined together to form a group for study and discussion called the Labor Commonwealth Group. We elected Mr. Royce, Labor M.P. for an English agricultural district, as our first chairman, but he unfortunately died when governor-designate of Tasmania. On his death George Lansbury was elected chairman. The present writer has been secretary of the group since the beginning. From small beginnings the group has grown to over ninety members in a party of 150, and our discussions have ranged over Canadian, Indian, South African, and Australian affairs, with latterly a very great deal of attention being given to the consideration of imperial preference and possible socialist alternatives to fiscal preference. This intensive study of empire affairs has already exerted great influence in the Labor movement in this country and it has exerted it by the spread of knowledge and the force of facts. At an early stage the group expressed a strong view in favor of the setting up of the Imperial Economic Committee and influenced opinion in the parliamentary party very considerably. When the imperial-preference resolutions came up for discussion in the 1924 Parliament during the Labor Party's term of office five members of the group, including myself, supported preference against the front bench, which was free trade. This year the division of opinion was more pronounced, so that the vote on the imperial-preference resolutions in the budget was left as a free vote.

The significance of this vote will be misunderstood if it is thought to indicate an opinion in favor of taxation preference in principles. What it means is, first, a sincere desire to cooperate with the dominions, and, secondly, a desire to do the one thing possible at the moment to help the dominions. A full alternative to preference is not yet worked out. But it is intended to give by organization of marketing facilities, by cheapening of transport, by bulk purchase and similar measures assistance to the dominions of even greater financial advantage than those given by preferential duties as such.

There is now in the Labor Party as a whole an overwhelming support for the policy of closer economic and political relationship with the dominions. Those members of the Labor Party who opposed preference as well as those who supported it made this abundantly clear. Such matters as exclusion of "sweated goods," licensing of imports, and financing of "pools" have all come up recently for earnest discussion inside the Labor Party. And while these things are not taxation preference they are equally certainly not free trade in the old sense.

In the internal affairs of Great Britain the rise of the Labor Party has meant the transfer of attention from the shopkeepers' and consumers' to the producers' point of view. No member of the Labor Party in Great Britain would tolerate bad conditions here on the ground that a change would cause a rise in prices.

While the party remained to a certain extent ignorant of conditions of production in other countries it was possible to concentrate attention only on cheapness of imports without respect to what that meant elsewhere in the world. Labor has, of course, always been against sweating in every part of the world and vigorously protested against it. But now Labor recognizes the need for organizing against it, and whether by tariff preferences or by more complicated and more thoroughgoing methods is the only question in dispute.

Certain older members of the Labor Party who have got themselves stuck in well-marked ruts of thought consider that the new move in the Labor Party toward dominion coordination is a sign of decadence. Younger members believe that the new movement is an attempt to apply the ideas of socialism to a great problem of world-organization. Some of us even cherish the hope that in the years to come when Labor is in power over all the great British Commonwealth of Nations we may be able to lead the world in the solution of those urgent questions of the conflict of races and standards of life which menace our future.

As David Kirkwood said in the House in the last preference debate: "If we cannot understand those in the world who are our own kith and kin, how shall we understand those who are not?" But if by knowledge, intelligence, and good organization we can lead our own commonwealth to security, to high standards of life, and to peace, we shall be able to make the better contribution to the solution of the whole world's problems.

Contributors to This Issue

DABNEY HORTON is instructor in English at Ohio State University. He served for thirty months during the war in the Lafayette Flying Corps.

M. M. KNIGHT has been assistant professor of economics at the University of Utah and assistant professor of history at Columbia. He is author of the "Dictionnaire Pratique d'Aéronautique" and co-author of "Taboo and Genetics." He has served with the French, Rumanian, and American armies, and has recently returned from Morocco.

SHAPURJI SAKLATVALA is an East Indian member of the British Parliament, representing the Communist Party. The United States Department of State has just refused him entrance to this country.

RENNIE SMITH, a Labor member of the British Parliament, is in the United States to attend the Interparliamentary Conference and deliver lectures.

HARRY ELMER BARNES, professor of historical sociology at Smith College, is a recognized authority on the causes of the war.

WYMAN SIDNEY SMITH is at the University of Wisconsin.

NELSON ANTRIM CRAWFORD is director of information for the United States Department of Agriculture and author of "The Ethics of Journalism."

HERRMANN BLUMGART is on the staff of the Thorndike Memorial Laboratory of the Boston City Hospital and is assistant in medicine at Harvard University.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, formerly managing editor of The Nation, is professor of economics at Wellesley College.

ALICE BEAL PARSONS recently resigned as business manager of the World Tomorrow to devote her time to writing.

L. HADEN GUEST is a British physician and Labor member of Parliament.

The Fall Book Number of The Nation

will contain an article on James Joyce by Edwin Muir, Ludwig Lewisohn's chapter in the series on artists in America, and articles, verse, and reviews by H. L. Mencken, Harold J. Laski, Henry W. Nevinson, Genevieve Taggard, Lola Ridge, M. T. McClure, Samuel C. Chew, James Rorty, Anna Louise Strong, and others.

Next Week.

To know the theatre is to know all the Arts better

FIND, if you can, another [illegible] Theatre which includes painting, sculpture, design, costume, music, the dance, poetry, pathos, humor, tragedy—the summing up of life and the history of life.

Theatre Arts Monthly is the standard authority and guide on the arts, the technique, the personalities and the practical work of the theatre in every civilized country. To read it is to know all the arts better.

In Each Issue

Reviews of the current New York stage—One-act plays by [illegible] dramatists—articles of leading figures in the world theatre—and articles on every department of theatre arts. All for $4.00 a year or Fifty Cents a copy.

THEATRE ARTS MONTHLY

7 EAST 42ND STREET NEW YORK

You Need It Every Day—

If you value correctness and scope of vocabulary—accuracy of information about words, people, places—convenience in securing facts on a wide variety of daily questions—then you are in need, every day, of the ready fund of knowledge offered in

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY

The Best Abridged Dictionary

It is based upon Webster's New International

[illegible]

New Words

[illegible]

Cloth, $5.00; Thumb-Index, $6.00; Buckskin, $6.00; Leather, $7.50.

G. & C. Merriam Co.
Springfield
Mass.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 14, 1925 No. 3145

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 395

EDITORIALS:
- In Chinatown and in China 398
- Lives and Times 399
- Russia—Guest or Ghost? 400
- The Trustification of Germany 400

THE POLICE RUN WILD IN CLEVELAND. By Russell T. Herrick .. 401

SWEET LAND OF LIBERTY 402

WORDS FOR THE CHISEL. By Genevieve Taggard 403

BIRD MUSIC. By James Rorty 403

CONTEMPORARIES. By Lola Ridge 403

BRITISH TRADE UNIONISM AT SCARBOROUGH. By J. Ramsay MacDonald 404

BRITISH LABOR TURNS TO THE LEFT. By Scott Nearing 405

COMPLETION. By James Daly 406

THE BRITISH MINER'S PROPHET. By Wilson Midgley 407

PROTOCOLS, PACTS, ALLIANCES. By Robert Dell 408

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 409

CORRESPONDENCE 410

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- White Terror In Liberal Chile. By Arnold Roller 412
- The Tacna-Arica Plebiscite. By Amy Woods 416

FALL BOOK SECTION

JAMES JOYCE. By Edwin Muir 421

CAN AN ARTIST LIVE IN AMERICA? By Ludwig Lewisohn 423

ALL THAT BY ANY FEAT OF LIGHT. By Raymond Holden 424

BOOKS:
- First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 426
- The British Parliamentary Scene. By J. A. Hobson 426
- Yezoo's Favorite. By H. L. Mencken 428
- "Ramsay Mac." By Henry W. Nevinson 429
- A Modern Heraclitus. By M. T. McClure 430
- Two Nations. By Harold J. Laski 431
- The Culture of a Section. By William B. Cairns 433
- Olive Schreiner in Part. By Ruth S. Alexander 435
- Shakespearean Studies. By Samuel S. Chew 436
- Enough to Go Round. By Stuart Chase 438
- Terror and Furore. By Charles J. Finger 439
- Books in Brief 440

MUSIC:
- Arnold Schönberg. By Richard Specht 444

DRAMA:
- Should Lawyers Lie? By Joseph Wood Krutch 445

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, EDITOR

ASSOCIATE EDITORS

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

MANAGING EDITOR LITERARY EDITOR

FREDA KIRCHWEY MARK VAN DOREN

CONTRIBUTING EDITORS

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, ADVERTISING MANAGER

SUBSCRIPTION RATES: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York. Cable Address: NATION, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THERE ARE LETTERS which make an editor's life worth living—letters which show that his shots have hit their mark. Evidently The Nation's recent comments on California Justice stung:

California State Prison
at San Quentin
Office of the Captain

THE NATION
No. 20 Vesey Street
New York City

GENTLEMEN: We regret to advise you that in the future inmates of the institution will not be permitted to receive copies of your publication, The Nation.

At present, your subscription list includes the following:

38109 Childs
30704 Schmidt
37637 Mellman
38794 Stewart
31921 Mooney.

We would suggest that you make arrangements to have these inmates transfer their subscriptions elsewhere. Otherwise we will be obliged to destroy the papers.

Trusting you will give this matter prompt attention, we are Very truly yours,

CALIFORNIA STATE PRISON
E. J. HOBBS, Captain of the Yard.

San Quentin, September 30

Mooney is "Tom" Mooney, who, to California's everlasting shame, has been in jail for ten years on evidence proved false; Schmidt is under life sentence for participation in the MacNamara affair; the three others are I. W. W. prisoners convicted under California's law which makes mere membership in that organization a crime. All three are suffering for loyalty to their class. And now California's prison czars will not let them read a magazine that dares say so. Are there Californians with the will and determination to stop this petty tyranny?

CAILLAUX'S FATE rests today, as so large a share of the world's destiny does, in the hands of the international bankers. Is his five-year agreement sufficiently satisfactory to induce them to lend large sums to bankrupt France? If the answer is Yes, doubtless the French Parliament will give its assent; probably the American Congress would reluctantly approve the settlement if its temporary character were underlined. If the bankers refuse to hazard their credits Caillaux is again in the pit of ill-fortune. No one can feel very happy at the outcome. Mr. Coolidge, who last summer talked of a settlement with France on the lines of England's 62-year 3½ per cent debt settlement, must feel chagrined at emerging with only a promise to pay 1 per cent interest for five years. Winston Churchill, who cleverly made England's settlement with France conditional upon America's agreement to accept the same terms, is left very much in the lurch with his British public. Caillaux goes home with his hands almost empty, able only to plead that he made the best offer France had yet made, and was refused. What the bankers think is still a mystery.

THE ROOT DIFFICULTY about these negotiations lay in the existence of the transatlantic telegraph and mail system. It is today almost impossible to humbug two peoples at once. Mr. Mellon, proclaiming the vastness of the annual payments offered by M. Caillaux, might have fooled America into believing that he had obtained a great victory and won substantial payments, but his claims of victory would at once have been cabled to Paris and pounced upon by M. Caillaux's political opponents. M. Caillaux, on the other hand, might have juggled the same figures into the appearance of victory for himself, pointing out how trifling these sums were when translated into interest on the capital involved, but the American press would have printed his paeans the next morning in type so large and black that it would have doomed the settlement in Congress. Doubtless, left to themselves, Messrs. Mellon and Caillaux could have come to an understanding, but while the American people demand payment in full and the French people feel that any payment is more or less blackmail public agreement is impossible. Only one solution suggests itself—a sort of Dawes Plan by which neutral experts assess France's capacity to pay. Would France permit that? Does America want it?

WHAT IS A PARTY? Is it a boss in Washington or New York, or the people who have voted and vote its tickets? That is the question which Senator Butler and the Republican chiefs in Washington must face in deciding whether they will cast out "Young Bob" La Follette, fresh from a three-to-one victory over the Coolidge Republican in the Wisconsin Senatorial election. The Republican voters of Wisconsin want La Follette. The Administration moguls hate him. Because he bolted the party last autumn to manage his father's Presidential campaign they may feel safe in consigning him to outer darkness and refusing to recognize him in making committee appointments. We rather hope they do, for The Nation wants to see Western insurgency crystallized into an independent political party, untrammeled by any association with either of the old-party organizations. But from the point of view of their old party the chiefs had better think before they act. Some of the conservatives of today were Progressive bolters with Roosevelt in 1912. Borah and Norris, accepted as Republicans, are just as independent as "Young Bob." If the Coolidge chiefs establish the principle that no one with opinions of his own can be a good Republican they may wake up some day to find themselves in large sections of the West without any party at all.

SOMETIMES THE DEAD refuse to stay buried, and the odor of rottenness leaks up through the soil. It is so with the Wood candidacy of 1920. Leonard Wood, historians will recall, had Presidential ambitions, and a gentleman named Procter sought to buy the Republican nomination for him. "Colonel" Procter, it seems, was a business man, and thought he could advertise Leonard Wood into the Presidency. He found others who agreed with him to the extent of helping underwrite a million-dollar fund—$1,120,000, to be exact—which was used in the vain effort to "sell" Leonard Wood to the Republicans. His fellow-underwriters left the colonel to pay the bills; and to recover from them he has had to resort to court proceedings. These have revealed not only the vast sums wasted, but also the fact that Colonel Procter and his associates deliberately lied to the Borah committee investigating campaign expenditures. What protection has the public against such unscrupulous millionaires as "Colonel" Procter? It is no particular consolation to think that Harry Daugherty, chumming with the "boys" in his hotel bedroom, outwitted Procter and won the nomination for Warren Harding. The only real consolation is the thought that the event exiled Leonard Wood to the Philippines; and that, for the Filipinos, is no consolation at all.

SAKLATVALA, barred from this country by Secretary Kellogg, had such an audience at the meetings of the Interparliamentary Union in Washington as the Parson in the flesh could never have obtained. Men who would have crossed the street to hear him speak until a foolish government ban made him famous pored over his speeches and denounced the wrong done him. Britain's fierce fears for her rule in India became manifest as Saklatvala alone could never have made them. But there was another shadow over the sessions of the union. Two delegates sat in the sessions as representatives of Haiti. The State Department welcomed them as it welcomed the delegates of real parliaments. But who were these men? Whom did they represent? Haiti has had no parliament since Smedley Butler, gun in hand, put an end to Haitian self-government in 1916. Our Government, acting through puppets of its own making, rules Haiti without the pretense of democracy. Although even the constitution which Franklin Roosevelt wrote for Haiti nearly a decade ago provides for elections, we have not permitted Haitians to vote. The reason is simple: an election would show the people of Haiti overwhelmingly opposed to the tools of Washington whom our marines keep in office. It was that false Government which sent representatives of a non-existent parliament to misrepresent Haiti in Washington.

LORD GREY'S STORY of a secret memorandum in which President Wilson, through Colonel House, pledged his aid to the Allies as early as February, 1916, adds to the mystery which none of Woodrow Wilson's admiring biographers has yet penetrated. When did Wilson make up his mind to go into the war on the side of the Allies? There is the story, familiar to the Washington correspondents, of the "sunrise conference" in which Wilson sought to persuade Claude Kitchin, Champ Clark, and Senator Stone to turn the Democratic Party warwards at about the time of the House-Grey memorandum. All of the participants are dead, and the stories they are said to have told their friends differ somewhat. If it be true that, all through the campaign when "He Kept Us Out of War" was his party's slogan, Woodrow Wilson was planning to sweep his country into war, that even before the campaign he had made preliminary attempts to win the necessary support—then Woodrow Wilson deserves rank as one of the great conspirators of history. But can it be true? How can that be reconciled with the evident sincerity and moral passion of the "too proud to fight" and "peace without victory" days?

THE UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD was a creation of the war, and what took place under it stands out in memory as perhaps the most glaring record of waste, incompetence, and fraud of the period. The organization seems never fully to have recovered from the debauching environment of its birth, and remains today as the principal incubus of the Coolidge Administration. The trouble does not seem to be primarily one of either personnel or method, but largely of morale. We are not prepared to take sides in the quarrel between the Shipping Board and the head of its Emergency Fleet Corporation, Admiral Palmer. We do feel that the quarrel emphasizes the unsatisfactory character of the present organization and we would welcome a change toward simplification and economy. If the Administration is committed to selling the government fleet as rapidly as possible, there seems to be no reason why the task could not be turned over to a bureau in the Department of Commerce, with a great saving in personnel, friction, and expense. The Shipping Board is right in calling attention to the extravagance of the organization of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, with Admiral Palmer getting a salary of $25,000 and five vice-presidents receiving $18,000. But isn't the Shipping Board itself living in a glass house?

SIGNOR MUSSOLINI, in the conduct of his many affairs, has succeeded uncommonly well in stifling public criticism. The Turin Stampa, rated the second greatest newspaper in Italy, has recently been suppressed for criticism of the army; the powerful Corriere della Sera has been rendered harmless and will probably suffer the confiscation of its valuable plant and offices. Indiscreet foreign correspondents have been sent home or have had their mail rifled—James Murphy, writing articles to The Nation from Rome on Fascist syndicalism, found that only the first of his articles ever reached America and that checks and letters sent him from London in payment for other articles were confiscated. But from an unexpected quarter criticism has come; and a good Fascist, with all the best strong-arm methods at his command, does not quite know what to do about it. The Osservatore Romano, official newspaper of the Vatican, came out recently with a sharp criticism of Fascist terrorist tactics.

SEVERAL FASCIST PAPERS replied and were answered with even more indignation and no apology. The Vatican newspaper denounced the Fascist use of force, and deplored instances of violence toward certain Catholic clubs and organizations. In vain the Fascisti have protested, citing Christ's routing of the money-changers from the temple as precedent for violence in the name of righteousness. The Papal organ remains firm and will not remain silent. An ordinary newspaper would be suppressed at once. But it is suspected that the Pope himself, a man of reason and sound judgment and well-versed in politics, is behind the attacks. No one knows just how far it would be legal, or expedient, for the Government to go in such a case. The Vatican itself enjoys territorial immunity from government control; the question is whether its newspapers are included in this immunity. A perplexing question for a simple Fascist; and one likely to become more disturbing.

IN A RECENT ISSUE of The Nation we commented editorially upon the fact that a pamphlet which we had received setting forth the achievements of the George Peabody College for Teachers at Nashville, Tennessee, contained no reference to its stand upon the evolution question. Since then we have received a copy of the Peabody Reflector for November, 1924, which contains a message from the trustees of the college as it was delivered to the graduating class by the Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D.D., and we are glad to be able to record that in referring to the impending agitation it frankly states a complete belief in the facts of evolution. Peabody College at least was not afraid to let it be known on which side it stood, and it deserves the recognition due its sincerity.

THIS YEAR, as in other recent years, the numbers of students applying for admission to American colleges has enormously increased; and the rate of increase is itself increasing. The colleges are building dikes—academic and sometimes social—to hold back these floods of young Americans. Some of the rejected candidates for the Eastern colleges go home to play golf and help mother around the house, or to play golf and help father in the store. More of them wash back into the flooded confines of the State universities, determined to go to college even if Yale or Vassar turns them away. This rising tide of would-be college men and women is at least as much an indication of national prosperity as of a lust for learning; and among women it doubtless coincides with the growing demand for freedom and a profession. But it cannot be met merely by restrictions. If certain colleges choose to limit their numbers and use the pressure from the outside as a lever to hoist their own standards of scholarship, this should be allowed. But other colleges must be built to take care of those who want to go and are prepared; and the State universities must continue their interesting experiment in heterogeneous wholesale education. What cannot be allowed are barriers of race or color or class, and tests to determine manners and morals rather than mind and training.

WHEN AT FIFTEEN, Marion Talley amazed the leaders of the musical world by the power and range of her voice, The Nation welcomed her as a prodigy who was not to endure the traditional path of prodigies. No unhappy years of poverty and exploitation were to be hers. At fifteen she had proved her voice, and already had ample funds to cultivate it as it should be cultivated. For this good fortune she was indebted to Kansas City, long the butt of effete Easterners who wished to deride the uncultivated West. Kansas City had put up the money; she was taking care of her own. Now that Marion, having attained the age of 18, has a contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company and is to sing this coming winter, Kansas City can sit back and wait for the debut, conscious of a task well performed. When the date is finally announced on which Marion is to sing, one suspects that there will be a prodigious activity on the Missouri, a refurbishing of opera hats, a vast purchasing of gowns and cloaks, plans for trips East, and a sold-out house in New York. Kansas will continue to stand by. Marion is fortunate in her choice of a native town; and evidently Kansas City is as happy as its prodigy.

IN LÉON BOURGEOIS [illegible] great survivors of pre-war days. Bourgeois was never a dramatic, combative figure like Poincaré or Clemenceau or Caillaux, but for forty years he had drifted in and out of office [illegible] ministries. He had not been prime minister for [illegible] turned to him as a premier ministre en disponibilité. Never a commanding force, he none the less stood head and shoulders above most of his colleagues in one respect: [illegible] Hague peace conferences he consecrated himself to the idea of international arbitration. Almost alone among French statesmen he was genuinely devoted to the conception of the League of Nations, echoing President Wilson's pronouncements in war-time and championing the cause against the dominant cynicism of Clemenceau. At Geneva his was a voice universally respected, a voice that expressed a principle rather than the passing mood of a group of politicians in office.

In Chinatown and in China

INTO the Chinatowns of Cleveland, Chicago, Boston, Philadelphia, New York, and other cities the police swooped again and again last month, smashing down doors, arresting thousands of peaceful Chinese waiters, laundrymen, merchants, and laborers, jailing them without warrant, surrounding theaters and emptying them, firing revolvers at those who tried to escape and making every visitor show papers to prove his right to existence, leaving broken homes open and unguarded—and when this epidemic of lawlessness was over the police and federal agents announced that they had been acting in the name of law.

"I have put the federal Government in Chinatown and I am going to keep it there," said United States Attorney Emory R. Buckner, in New York, after violating in the most outrageous fashion the elementary principles of law upon which this republic is founded. His agents had just, without the slightest shadow of legal authority, told some hundreds of Chinamen whom they had illegally arrested and then released that if they found them in Chinatown again after nine o'clock at night their certificates would be revoked and they would be deported. Since the hateful days of Mitchell Palmer there has been in this country no such sweeping and utterly outrageous abuse of power.

Possibly the police went further in Cleveland than elsewhere—probably not, for the "heathen Chinee" has always been treated as a person without rights in this country. Russell T. Herrick, telegraph editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, describes elsewhere in this issue the brutal lawlessness of the Cleveland police and the stout stand for law and order made by two brave Cleveland judges. So strong was the reaction in Cleveland that three members of that "hard-boiled" tribe, the newspaper reporters, sat down after hours and wrote indignant accounts of the affair to The Nation, only one of which, unfortunately, we are able to print. It may be, we say, that the police were worse in Cleveland than elsewhere. Certainly we know of no "director of public safety" in any other city who has had the effrontery to say, as Cleveland's Mr. Barry did:

> Some of these Chinese [at the time, in his own words, he had "every Chink in the city" in jail] know who committed that murder and we're going to keep them all in jail until they tell. Not a Chinese restaurant or laundry will be permitted to open in the city until we get the information we want.

For brazen, downright anarchistic defiance of the law, that goes beyond any expression which we have noted in other cities. But the newspaper accounts of the raids in New York City seem to us sufficient to warrant the removal of several federal and municipal "law officers," and not a newspaper in the city has peeped a protest. After all, Chinese in America are only "Chinks." It is different with Americans in China.

In New York City, after a series of minor raids, the police started in earnest on September 14. That evening federal agents drew a cordon about Chinatown, stopped every Chinaman on the streets and made him show credentials, searched every house in Doyer and Pell streets and the Chinese part of Mott Street. They surrounded two theaters where Chinese plays were in progress, and ordered the audience to get up and march out. When one man stepped onto a fire escape the police fired at him. More than a thousand Chinese were examined; 600 were taken to the Federal Building for appearance before United States Commissioner Cotter, and 134 finally sent to the Tombs to be held for deportation. Most of these were seamen who had come here during the war, when the demand for cheap Chinese labor was intense, and had overstayed their leave. Some of them said they had tried to return but had been unable to find berths. That there is some truth in their claim is evidenced by the statement of the authorities that it would be months before they could find ships to take the deportees back to China. "Most of the 206 Chinese ordered deported by Commissioner Cotter will remain at the immigration station on Ellis Island for months," the Times reported, "before they can be started on their way back to China. They have expressed a willingness to return as seamen and the Government's difficulty will be in finding berths for them." No evidence was announced to show that any of the men examined or held was in any way connected with the Tong murders which were the official excuse for this official lawlessness. It was simply a fishing expedition.

On September 18 a Chinaman was shot dead in Mott Street. Using that as an excuse the New York police, acting under the leadership of the federal district attorney, broke loose again. Once more they put a cordon around Chinatown, arresting men en masse and holding impromptu hearings on the sidewalks. They did not pretend to have any warrants; again they went on a fishing expedition in defiance of the law. Vague rumors of captures of "hatchets, pistols, and knives" were given to the newspapers, but no arrests were made for illegal possession of weapons. As before, the arrests were indiscriminate and most of those taken into custody had to be released. In both of these raids, according to citizens of Chinatown, the police broke doors without waiting to knock, and neglected to leave guards when they had removed the inmates, so that Chinese returned from custody to find that their homes had been sacked. Naturally these Chinese, cowed by official lawlessness, hesitate to bring further police ill will upon themselves by starting damage suits; but it is to be hoped that American citizens will step forward and insist that they be given the redress to which they are entitled. A policeman should be no more immune from prosecution for illegal action than any other citizen.

On September 4 the American Government joined the other benevolent Western Powers in sending a note to the Chinese Government. One sentence of it read:

> The Government of the United States desires to impress upon the Chinese Government the necessity of giving concrete evidence of its ability and willingness to enforce respect for the safety of foreign lives and property and to suppress disorders and anti-foreign agitations which embitter feelings. . . .

In the light of our own inability to protect Chinese in the United States—or, worse still, of our official intention not to give them the equal protection of the laws, the wording of that note is either an insolent joke or mere hypocrisy. It would seem appropriate for the Chinese to demand extraterritorial rights for Chinese in the United States.

Lives and Times

ELSEWHERE in this issue we print a list of important fall books and a glance at it reveals no falling off in that renewed interest in biography which began to show itself several seasons ago. Doubtless Mr. Lytton Strachey deserves a considerable portion of the credit which he is generally given for this state of affairs since he did invent a new style and demonstrate the possibility of making biography a best seller; but the phenomenon is too large to be explained by the influence of any one man even though he be as clever as Mr. Strachey certainly is. The primary fact is neither "Eminent Victorians" nor "Queen Victoria," but that natural human appetite for life which for several decades had been fed upon a starveling diet of bulky but unnourishing biographies in the conventional two volumes. People were accustomed to complain that there was no interest in biography when the primary fact was simply that there were few really interesting biographies.

For some reason or other the famous Victorian compromise gave way in every other department of literature long before it ceased to be the generally asssumed basis for biographical writing. The new drama, the new novel, and the new poetry had accustomed people to a changed attitude toward the facts of life. Realistic, frank, iconoclastic, and disrespectful, the current imaginative works nourished a generation which had no respect for reticence and scant faith in the decorous legend; but biographers continued to observe the proprieties, to suppress the unheroic detail, and to tell no more than they thought should be told. They set up plaster images for the admiration of an age that was not afraid of flesh and blood and they forfeited the respect of a generation which wanted the whole truth. People did not, as a result, lose interest in life but they did come to believe that they could find more of it in those books which pretended to be merely fiction than they could in those which called themselves true.

Under the new dispensation, however, the liveliness and the impudence of the contemporary novel have invaded the field of biography, and as a result readers are buying Lives and Times as eagerly, almost, as they are buying fiction. Nor can it be said that there is any great tendency toward standardization. The fall list includes a variety ranging from Ida M. Tarbell's "The Life of Elbert Gary" to Charles J. Finger's "Romantic Rascals," and from Louis P. Lochner's "Henry Ford: America's Don Quixote" to Katherine Anthony's "Catherine the Great" and Mary Agnes Best's sketches of quaker personalities called "Rebel Saints." But perhaps on the whole the most interesting tendency of all is that to explore our national past in a manner not always too gravely decorous. Thus Thomas Beer describes various American figures in "The Mauve Decade," Don C. Seitz discusses some "Uncommon Americans," and Samuel Wandell and Meade Minnigerode devote two volumes to Aaron Burr, while Herbert and Edward Quick undertake to present "Steamboating on the Mississippi and Its Tributaries."

In biography as in every other branch of literature it will probably be found that those books will do most good which least solemnly undertake to do anything of the sort. Writers of school histories and those who have the schoolmaster's idea of the dignity of history and the duty of presenting the noble ideal have succeeded in defeating their own purpose. The general reader goes uninstructed because he will not read them, and the schoolboy, forced against his will to read what he will later forget, learns no lesson, perhaps because he quite understandably sees no connection between the impeccable patriots of his schoolbooks and the fallible men who inhabit the world he lives in. But those who write with no end but to present truth interestingly succeed in imparting whatever lessons the past may have to teach because, first of all, they are read, and because, also, they are believed. Doubtless they will bring many heroes down from their pedestals, and doubtless too they will remove a good deal of glamor from various times as well as various lives, but for some reason or other the beautiful idealization has ceased to have the ennobling influence which it is supposed to have had upon other generations. We, at least, learn nothing from times which are not critically surveyed or from those heroes who do not consent to come down from their pedestals.

We have acquired a new interest in our national past but we have acquired at the same time a new contempt for our national legend. We are, if anything, a little too anxious to see the funny side of our ancestors and a little too eager to suspect the worst when we have to deal with the principles and motives which animated the great of history; but at bottom our sense is sound. We are, on the whole, right in assuming that it is from the contemplation of things as they are and not, as the older moralists used to fancy, from the contemplation of things as they ought to be, that we learn our lessons.

Russia—Guest or Ghost?

CHICHERIN sleeps in Berlin while the British, French, and German delegates discuss security at Locarno, but his shadow stalks wherever his Western neighbors meet. Wild rumors of Russian attempts to sabotage the proposed agreement fill the columns of the newspapers, and an uneasy sense of insecurity dominates the gentlemen who have come together to establish Europe's security. "What will Russia do? What is Chicherin up to?" are questions on every lip.

And why not? The Allies, after six long years of futile palavers, have at last come to the obvious, commonsense conclusion that in planning the security of Europe they must take Germany into consideration. Guaranties must be mutual; Germany must be protected as well as France; she must be treated as an equal and given the same promises as are exacted of her. Those kindergarten lessons are proclaimed today in every French newspaper, where only a year ago the Poincarist mood of ultimatum and compulsion still ruled. The Prime Minister of France has publicly proclaimed that "Franco-German reconciliation is like the keystone of European civilization," and no man denies him. But although Germany is at last admitted to the inner councils Russia is still left out, and the arguments which apply to Germany apply equally well to Russia.

It is Western Europe's fault if the uninvited Mr. Chicherin fills the security conference with alarm. He frankly regards the proposed security pact as a British plot directed against Soviet Russia; and the English have made no effort to unconvince him. It is, he says, a mutual security alliance among the enemies of Soviet Russia, and he suspects secret understandings regarding possible military action against the incubus in the East. Perhaps he is all wrong; possibly there is a substantial germ of truth behind his suspicions. In any case, left in isolation, it is natural that he should endeavor, both in Warsaw and in Berlin, to make his own agreements for the safety of his country. Stresemann has just negotiated a commercial treaty with him—through which some of the American capital recently lent to Germany will find its way into the forbidden land of Russia—and Poland appears to have listened to Chicherin with a new friendliness.

That, too, is natural—and well. A year ago France was insisting upon the right to send troops across Germany in order to defend Poland and Czecho-Slovakia. Germany naturally refused this invitation to become a sort of second-hand battlefield. France has not yet withdrawn her demand, but the new amicability of her prime minister indicates that she has lost interest in her old military program. So Poland feels deserted and joins eagerly in conversations with her Eastern neighbor—a simple act of common sense, however disturbing to the dovecotes of Allied diplomacy.

Germany, meanwhile, basks in a new sunshine. Courted by Russia, she can afford to be coy with France. The Locarno conference is largely of her making; its program is essentially her program; the Allies have refused her demand that the question of war guilt be reopened courteously enough, on the plea of avoidance that a security conference is not the proper occasion. The vistas seem magnificent.

But those who have followed the negotiations of past years, who recall the reiterated reports of brilliant progress, will smile a little sadly at the new communiqués. For until Russia is a guest, not a ghost, at these conferences they cannot move much further than their predecessors.

The Trustification of Germany

ALMOST simultaneously come reports from Germany of proposed industrial amalgamations in steel, in oil, in chemicals. Prince Donnersmarck, an intimate friend of the ex-Kaiser, is said to be the dominating figure in a combination of steel firms in Upper Silesia. Five great companies are mentioned: among them Otto Wolff, August Thyssen, and the Rhein-Elbe-Union. Three or four years ago Hugo Stinnes made a special trip to Italy to consult Judge Gary as to the feasibility of a German steel trust. Stinnes died before his dream came true, but who knows if, hard in hand, he is destined before long to look over the rim of heaven and see it realized. It was Stinnes, furthermore, who proposed for our inspection the plan for a "vertical" trust, controlling a commodity from natural resources to finished product. Meanwhile, most of the erstwhile Stinnes oil properties, the Haniel-Rieb[illegible] Petroleum Gesellschaft, Deutsche Erdöl, Rumpler Werke, and perhaps others are rolling their way toward a loose confederacy in oil. And certain great chemical companies headed by the powerful Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik are following suit in the chemical industry.

The reasons behind the move are the usual ones. Consolidation means fewer overhead expenses, separate advertising, separate sales agencies, over-diversification of products to meet all markets. Consolidation means standardization; specialization—"each firm being allotted certain types of manufacture for which it is best fitted from the viewpoints of geographical location and other factors which figure in determining selling prices and profits"; the combination of importing, sales, and distribution agencies; and the elimination of the great burden of competitive overhead costs. If prices can be maintained or not greatly lowered, operating costs will be so reduced under a regime of consolidation that profit margins, even on the basis of an inflated capitalization, will reach heights hitherto unknown.

Out of the same relentless logic the United States Steel Corporation and the Standard Oil Company were born and nourished. Even as we strive to copy the superior technical efficiency of the Germans in treating materials, they are copying America's superior technical efficiency in floating financial consolidations. Which raises again the problem whether, from the point of view of the wayfaring man, industrial monopolies are good things or bad things. They are obviously bad—as all the yeomanry of trust-busting have pointed out—in being greedy, rapacious, labor-baiting, corruptors of legislatures, staunch maintainers of the principle of all the traffic will bear. They are also obviously good—as the trust-busters have failed to point out—in eliminating a large margin of industrial waste; in attempting to coordinate production to demand, to steady employment and prices; in balancing the industrial load. In regions where competitive salesmanship has reached the dizzy heights known in Western civilization, a good tight monopoly is one of the greatest cost reducers ever heard of. Even if the monopoly grabs the lion's share of the margin brought about by such economies, the public may still receive substantial benefits in steadier and sometimes lower prices, to say nothing of the benefits of standardization and a dependable supply. Furthermore, if and when the public, through the agency of government, or cooperative associations, or industrial unions, is ready to regulate or control the means by which it is sheltered, fed, and clothed, the transition from the basis of a trustified industry is immensely less complicated than from the basis of competitive industry. A good share of the necessary technical coordination has already been accomplished.

And there we are. The personnel, the arrogance of the private trust is usually intolerable; the appalling loss, leak, and friction of the dog-eat-dog performance of competitive industry are also, and increasingly, intolerable. It will take more astute and more unprejudiced economists than we have produced to date to say where the balance lies. Other things being equal, one would suspect that the passage of German industry through an era of monopoly would tend to be rather less of an evil and more of a benefit to the underlying population than has been the historical course in America. Of course other things are not equal today. Germany's speculation period, reaching its frenzied climax in the days of the Ruhr invasion, left her trade unions powerless and her workers on the bare subsistence level. The Dawes Plan, which has stopped the financial madness, is a program of salvation by business. But the Germans—with no windy visions fed on unlimited natural resources and on an unlimited alien population to exploit—have, after all, some sense of state. It is just possible they may realize the benefits of industrial coordination, while keeping their kings of steel and oil and chemicals from the manners and policies which have distinguished their compeers in this republic.

The Police Run Wild in Cleveland

By RUSSELL T. HERRICK

[The recent wave of official thuggery against Chinese in America, discussed in an editorial article on page 398, possibly reached its crest in Cleveland. On the other hand, it is evident from the account below that, contrary to experience elsewhere, there was a considerable reaction of indignation on the part of the public. Cleveland was the largest city to cast a majority of its votes for La Follette in 1924.]

ABOVE Cleveland's Chinatown rises the gray spire of what Cleveland calls affectionately the "Old Stone Church." There, many years ago, worshiped John Hay and there, presumably, he imbibed some of the lofty idealism that led to the enunciation of the Open Door in China.

If the spirit of John Hay lurks over the old church, this is what it has seen during recent days:

Six hundred and twelve Chinese, old men and children, merchants and laundrymen, laborers and students, arrested and thrown into jail without warrant or other legal process.

More than 100 Chinese business places peremptorily closed by police action; scores of Chinese shops and dwelling places broken into by these same police.

This "round-up" that out-Palmered Palmer in the weird days of the Red hysteria that followed the World War was carried out under the direct orders and supervision of the Director of Public Safety and indorsed by the City Manager of the fifth city of the United States. It was explained as a necessary police measure to punish the Chinese of Cleveland for allowing one of their number, Yee Chock, to be murdered on September 22.

Yee Chock, an obscure member of the Chinese community of Cleveland, was found slain in a Chinatown tenement, his head nearly separated from his body. The cry went up: "Chinese tong murder," and the police department, under the orders of the Director of Public Safety, Edwin D. Barry, rolled up its sleeves and waded in.

Practically the entire available police force was put to work "cleaning up" Chinatown. Chinese laundrymen were pulled from behind their ironing boards; waiters and proprietors of eating places were taken away from their tables. The Chinese population of the city was dragged to the police stations. Pedestrians were taken up on the sidewalks, even students at Cleveland institutions of learning were swept up in what the headline writers like to call the "drag-net."

Barry was busy and boisterous.

"The Chinese know who did this murder. They won't tell us. We'll keep them in jail until they do. They defy us, but we'll break the rule of the tong," the Director of Public Safety is reported as saying.

For nearly two days the "round-up" continued. The Chinese overwhelmed the cell space at police headquarters. The "bull pen" was so crowded that many of the prisoners were forced to stand up all night. Among these all-night standees were several old men.

It was announced that all those arrested would be fingerprinted and examined as to their right to be in the United States. The intimation of the newspaper stories on the day following the raids was that scores and possibly hundreds would be deported as having no legal right to be in the United States. Yet on September 26, five days after the beginning of the outbreak, all but thirteen had been released, and these thirteen were held merely for "further investigation" by federal officials.

That all Cleveland is not as Prussian as the heads of its police department was evidenced the days after the raids, when protests began to pour in. Two judges before whom habeas corpus proceedings were brought denounced the police action as high-handed and ordered the release of the prisoners. Police prosecutors frankly admitted that there was no legal ground upon which the great bulk of the prisoners could be held.

Perhaps the most effective protest came from the pastor of the Old Stone Church, the Rev. William Hiram Foulkes, who in an open letter to the City Manager, William R. Hopkins, expressed his indignation at the wholesale flouting of the constitutional rights of a considerable group of Cleveland's citizens. He pointed to the fact that for thirty years his church had been conducting a Sunday-school class for Chinese and that it once numbered John Hay in its membership.

"Shall the city that claimed him [John Hay] as one of its most illustrious citizens allow itself to be belittled by such work as was done yesterday?" he wrote.

Yet the police are sticking to their guns. Barry, replying to Dr. Foulkes, declared that the Chinese of Cleveland had been warned to keep the peace. He construed the murder as a defiance of this police order.

Some months ago there was a shooting in Chinatown, laid to the tongs. Shortly thereafter representatives of the Hip Sing and On Leong tongs were called to a peace meeting in Barry's office. They were duly admonished to be good and to live [illegible].

After the courts had ordered the release of all the prisoners who brought habeas corpus proceedings the police relented and allowed the restaurants to resume business, but refused them their dance permits, which many of the larger ones had had for several years. Saturday was approaching when Cleveland must have its week-end shirts and collars, and the laundries were allowed to get busy again. There has been a considerable financial loss to Chinese business interests and there is talk of suits against the city. In some instances Chinese laundrymen when ar[illegible] They left the fires in their laundries going. They were kept over night at police headquarters and at least one fairly serious fire resulted. The interiors of several other laundry shops were badly damaged by steam.

Protests to the Chinese Legation and a request to the Department of State for an investigation and report have taken the quarrel outside of Cleveland. China has no marines to land, as would have been done had the situation been reversed, but possibly the Cleveland incident may prove one more obstacle to the cause of peace in the Far East and better understanding between the white man and the yellow.

Sweet Land of Liberty

A GOOD bird's-eye view of the state of civilization in the United States is found in the monthly reports of the American Civil Liberties Union. What follows is a condensation of the bulletin for August:

Lynchings

Mississippi. Sidney Townes, a wounded insane Negro, held for murder, was taken from Sheriff Front at Scobey on August 12 by a mob of 100 men and lynched.

Missouri. Miller Mitchell, Negro, was taken from the city jail at Excelsior on August 7 by a mob of 500 men and lynched. He was charged with assault upon a white woman.

Mob Violence and the Ku Klux Klan

North Dakota. One hundred and eighteen members of the Agricultural Workers' Union No. 110, I. W. W., who had been arrested for riding freight trains en route to the harvest fields, were turned over to an armed mob on August 25 by Sheriff Rose of the Cass County jail and deported into Minnesota.

Massachusetts. Five men were shot in a riot after a meeting of the Ku Klux Klan at the Libby Forum, Framingham, on August 10, when anti-Klan groups attacked the dispersing Klansmen. Seventy-five arrests were made.

Maryland. On August 17 a mob of 500 white residents of Baltimore forced Samuel Krayer, a white landlord, to refund the rent of a house on Lamont Avenue to a Negro family and compelled the family to leave.

Michigan. Dr. Alex L. Turner, Negro graduate of the University of Michigan, and three other Negro families of Detroit were evicted from their homes recently and their furniture smashed by a mob of white people.

New York. M. M. Robertson, a real estate agent, and five others were indicted by the Richmond grand jury on August 28, charged with conspiracy to coerce Samuel Brown, a Negro postman, and his wife, a public school teacher, to leave a white neighborhood in Staten Island.

Louisiana. Lured by a fake telegram, an unknown young woman was tarred and feathered by a mob of women in the yard of the Tremont Lumber Company at Enos, Jackson Parish, on July 27, and ordered to leave town. She had been attacked similarly two weeks before for alleged immorality.

New Jersey. In a riot which ensued when Italian Fascisti raided an anti-Fascist meeting in Newark on August 10 [illegible] persons were hurt.

Criminal Cases

Kentucky. Bruce I. Susong, managing editor of the Kentucky Post at Covington, was arrested in July charged with violating the new "gossip law," on complaint of Mayor O'Donovan and City Auditor Murphy, whose administration of city finances he had criticized.

Pennsylvania. Four members of the Young Workers' League were arrested at Philadelphia on August 9 charged with distributing seditious literature, which consisted of circulars protesting against the expulsion of Samuel Miller from the Citizens' Military Training Camp at Camp Meade.

New York. Charles S. Sumner, superintendent of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, accompanied by a detective, raided the Craftsman Bindery Company in New York City on August 18 and seized on a search warrant 680 copies of "My Life" by Frank Harris. Jacob Sidowsky and Harry J. Lebovits, employees, were arrested charged with printing an obscene book.

Illinois. Police raided the offices of the Joint Board of the Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America at Chicago on August 15. Of the members arrested 14 were held on charges of conspiracy to intimidate strike-breakers, on complaint of the International Tailoring Company.

Connecticut. William Simons, organizer of the Workers' Party, was arrested for selling the Workers' Monthly at a picnic at Derby, on August 16, and fined $10 and costs for "peddling without a license."

Arkansas. On complaint of the Greenwood Coal Company, Gomer Jones, vice-president of District No. 21 of the United Mine Workers of America, and S. A. Robertson, another official, are cited to appear in the Chancery Court at Fort Smith, for planning a parade in violation of a 1917 injunction.

Civil Cases

Illinois. Judge Hugo Pam of the Superior Court of Cook County on August 10 upheld the constitutionality of the recently enacted anti-injunction act of Illinois in refusing a blanket anti-picketing injunction to the International Tailoring Company of Chicago against the Amalgamated Clothing Workers.

New York. An injunction against peaceful picketing by members of the Retail Shoe Salesmen's Union of New York City was issued in July by Supreme Court Judge Tierney.

Ohio. The Butcher Workmen's Union of Cincinnati are appealing to the Ohio Supreme Court against an injunction issued by Judge Roettinger of the Hamilton County Common Pleas Court perpetually enjoining them from picketing. The president and the union were fined $100 each for picketing.

West Virginia. Van A. Bittner, organizer, and a number of officials of the United Mine Workers of America were served notice of a permanent injunction which had been issued in 1924 restraining their union from organizing in Logan County, on their arrival there on August 25. Later they were ordered to leave town by a committee of the Chamber of Commerce.

Pennsylvania. Judge E. C. Newcomb, of Scranton, in issuing an injunction recently restraining Meat Cutters and Butchers' Union No. 111 and E. F. Grady, organizer of the American Federation of Labor, from picketing the market of Frank Carr, defined the attempt to unionize a plant as "an unlawful purpose."

Academic Freedom

New York. The dismissal six years ago of Benjamin Glassberg, a teacher in the Commercial High School of Brooklyn, for alleged radical opinion was sustained by the State Board of Education on August 11.

Professor Manley H. Harper, head of the Department of English and director of the summer school, and Professor Harry B. Smith, his assistant, in the Geneseo Normal School, are appealing to Commissioner Graves against their dismissal, without a hearing, on vague charges of radicalism.

New Jersey. Professor A. R. Ackerman, teacher of mathematics and general science for three years at the Phillipsburg High School, who was requested on May 13 to resign because of "inferior work," is demanding a hearing of the State Board of Education. He insists that his political views are the real reason.

Iowa. Professor Aldena Carlson, head of the English Department of Ellsworth College at Iowa Falls for four years, was dismissed by the trustees at a recent meeting for "unpatriotic activities" in the La Follette campaign.

Ohio. A temporary injunction restraining the Board of Education of East Liverpool from permitting teaching of the Bible in the public schools was granted by the Common Pleas Court on August 22 on application of R. H. Perry, taxpayer.

Words for the Chisel

By GENEVIEVE TAGGARD

The moss will creep upon your name
And fill the cleft of mine,
And scraggly grasses grow and frame
The granite's oblong line.

This unsubstantial air we cleave
To rear us massive form
Will aid the moss, the viney weave,
The little clumsy worm

Within whose body all the crust
Of earth is powdered so
Often—with such patient lust
Against such passive woe.

Bird Music

By JAMES RORTY

The singing of birds is as certain as the long
Stroke of the March rains on the waning snows
Of winter; when the white-throat's quiver of song
Is shaken on the wind that blows
A rippled path upon the thawing lake,
Halt if you will that clear annunciation, hush
If you can the peepers' chant, or push Back in the twig the tender-strong
Pink buds of the willow.

Earth that awakes in leaf and flower needs
Voices no less; there is a potency that breeds
Blue-birds upon the misty air,
Flying and calling; in that slow
Ecstatic warble I can hear
Earth melting and the flow
Of climbing sap, and the incessant sound
Of seeds that whisper underground. . . .

As mutely as an April dawn
Flowers the sky, the cherry boughs
Leap into blossom; the new leaves are born
Into the sunlight without sound. . . .
This silence is the living seed
Of music planted in the ground
Or drifting, falling
Out of the air with the oriole's calling.

Now in the summer do I find Myself according with the simple, blind,
Triumphant logic of the pines that rear
Gray shafts of certitude and power
From earth to heaven; here
Music is constant as the light, and strong
As that blue curve of mountain; hour on hour
The vireo's song is woven on the green
Hush of the forest. . . . Summer is a bright
Stain on the cloak of silence thrown
From star to star, from night to night;
Nothing shall fade it; forever sown
On the face of darkness, the late gods who reel
Beneath the sleet of frozen worlds shall feel
A flutter of brave immutable wings. . . .
Fire in the ice . . . silence that sings.

Contemporaries

By LOLA RIDGE

Still Water

I know you flower darkly, and perceive—
As one eavesdropping on your silences
That hold as sluggish waters in duress
Their huddled lilies—the dream-shapes you weave
As gaudy as your hair—avowals spun
To match its golden candor where light clings
As light might to a crocus or such things
As share the mother favor of the sun.

Pit-patter silver, little feet of rain
Soft on our skylight, whence the night—alit
In wonted secrecy—looks down at you,
Whose eyes meet smoothly over an old pain
As water the pale corpse consigned to it
Incloses—and stays continently blue.

Shadow

Though—statued to a savage innocence
That wills to seize and, seizing, to devour—
You hold your head stately as a flower
Of cactus, your wit tempered and made tense
To parry, as with medieval lance,
Life at its point, yet with a dread surmise
As one who fears old ambush you advance—
Rimmed in the golden distance of your eyes
A gone horizon reeling—and the stench
Of death—and only your eyes' roving spark,
Not all the rain of centuries can quench,
Two points of amber fire in the dark. . . .
And, nailed with stars above some Tyrian tree,
Night stretching a vast cross of ebony.

After the Recital

Who knows—not they who in their hearts yclept
Him black doll of the world—if, in the night
That clasped him like a mate, dark watch he kept,
Or if, goaded by soliciting light
Audacious as hibiscus flowers, he,
Five-pierced with old pain uncomforted,
Dreamed a free island like a spindling thread
Unraveling silver in some mooned sea.

Who cared—amid the suave-shoed, white-skinned day
That scanned his body—if beneath her fires
Yet throbbing like five wounds unhealed he lay,
Back turned—as one not caring overmuch
To see her golden head upon the spires
And all the windows flower at the touch.

British Trade Unionism at Scarborough

By J. RAMSAY MacDONALD

[At Scarborough, in early September, the British Trade Union Congress, an account of which appears in Scott Nearing's article on page 405, adopted a resolution advocating world-wide unity of the trade-union movement, including the Russian unions; another denouncing British imperialism as a form of capitalist exploitation; and a third advocating the formation of shop committees in all British work-shops. A resolution giving power to the general council of the congress to call a strike in all trades was defeated. The session, however, marked a distinct surge to the left among the British trade unions. "Emperor" Cook of the miners declared that "the trade-union congress is the parliament of the future."

The trade-union action, together with recent criticisms of party action or inaction by George Lansbury and others, led many to expect the Labor Party congress at Liverpool in the closing days of September to register a similar radical trend, but its first act—to affirm by a 9-to-1 vote the exclusion of Communists from the British Labor Party—seemed to indicate that the moderates led by ex-Premier MacDonald were still in firm control.]

London, September 21

THE words of political personages are studied too often in these days not that they may be understood but that they may be twisted for political propaganda, and in this country at the moment that is particularly true of Liberal critics of the Labor Party. American readers have therefore to be very guarded in their acceptance of Liberal writers who take Labor speeches as their texts. The comments on the transactions of the Scarborough Trade Union Congress make me write these sentences. The Scarborough meeting was held at a time when the peculiar truce in the coal trade, and the means by which it was secured, gave a special importance to what is known as "direct action," to the numerically small but active section that finds inspiration and funds from Moscow and to those who, under pressure of the distress that is prevalent and the difficulty of devising immediate remedies for it, feel the necessity of relieving themselves by demonstrations and crying out.

The nerves of many of our people are on edge. One section is as sensitive as a man with the gout, sees red everywhere, and is sure that a combination of Jews, Bolshevists, and Socialists are plotting the rape of persons and the destruction of the state. When I was at Stockport taking part in the by-election this week, I was left in no doubt of the existence of these timorous people. Many of them are rationally with us but emotionally on the point of stampede, torn in their faith, seeking refuge in what they know to be but a ramshackle shanty, the Tory Party, obeying the most primitive of herd instincts like the untrained soldier who cannot help ducking his head at the whiz of a bullet. Among them Scarborough had done execution. Both Liberals and Conservatives "boohed" incessantly to make a stampede against Red Ruin, and Mr. Baldwin in his letter to the electors deplored the fact that a Liberal candidate was dividing forces that ought to be united in repelling the common unconstitutional enemy. Our Tory Party with its Irish record is a constitutional bulwark to be joked about rather than relied upon, but the popular mind when disturbed is irrational and gregarious. In spite of all this we pulled off Stockport with far greater decisiveness than appears in the face of the figures.* It was touch and go, however, at one time, owing to Scarborough, and during the next year many things will happen to raise again and again this troublesome question of the limitations of the political method in democratic progress. Students of this problem will do well to keep their eye upon immediate developments here.

Writing to The Nation for August 26 on the specific question of the patched-up peace in the coal trade, I drew attention to the impetus it had given to industrial action as opposed to political, and The Nation in the following week made some critical comments raising issues which in actual practice we are facing here every month. The position of the Labor Party has been that the political and industrial methods are not separate and exclusive but are complementary and should be coordinated into a policy with a conscious social aim and purpose, and that the constructive conceptions of socialism can be carried out with greatest security, stability, and benefit by political action. The test of that philosophy undoubtedly comes in times like these when two evils are playing havoc with people's minds. The first is the subversion of democratic political methods by unscrupulous party agents charged at any cost to produce party victories, by stunt newspapers, by wealth and social influence used to rouse emotions of fear and so snatch decisions at a general election which in no way represent the normal mind of the electorate. A panic is created for a few days, the election day being included; a majority is given which may determine for four or five years what opinions and interests are to rule the country; and the public speedily find, like Moses in "The Vicar of Wakefield," that they have been outrageously spoofed. This, unfortunately, is no fancy picture. Furthermore, once the Government is elected, hidden and private influences grip and mold its policy almost hour by hour. The other difficulty is that the economic and political problems which beset this country owing to the war are unusually difficult and may well baffle the wisest and ablest of men.

In The Nation's comment, reference was made to "a wistful odor of eighteenth-century political philosophy" as the explanation why some of us still believe in political methods as the way of social change. That begs everything. As a matter of fact, the Labor constitutionalists (hateful word) can claim to be distinguished from their Moscow opponents, and from all who more or less belong to that school, not by the musty odors they sniff but by the hard facts they see. Always keeping in mind that our policy is devised on the assumption that there is a place and function for industrial action in democracy, the real issue is between us and two well-defined coteries who have little in common except that they regard themselves as minority movements. The first is the camp which, moved deeply by the ills of society and holding to an expectation that if certain reorganization were to take place these ills would be removed, find it irksome or dull or impossible to devise ways and means of transformation. To these, patient (which to me means honest) work upon the details of transformation—the work which consists in doing the maximum of good day by day, led by the belief that a partial change if made as a stage in an evolutionary system will lead to further and progressive changes—cannot command the allegiance of public opinion or keep up the fighting spirit of a party. They have a poor conception of the public intelligence. They remain in the propaganda stage and, on parliamentary committees and the public platform, make exactly the same speeches, which are semi-religious testimonies against things as they are, expressive of general ideas to which they are unable to give a practical content. Their method, when they are driven to confess to it, is that if we get opinion against the existing order there will be no difficulty in setting up a better one. With these one can have little patience. Heads that are at one moment lifted up into the heavens and the next buried snugly in the sand are not of much use in the work that lies before us. The other section, far more realist and far bolder in the way they face the facts, take the simple communist view that force must be the midwife of progress, that political power must be seized by some coup and cannot be won through the ballot box. There are also floating margins that toy with all the positions. Such are the movements within the progressive tides in British life today.

* The Labor candidate won the seat with 20,219 votes; the Conservative had 17,892, and the Liberal 17,296 votes. At the last election Conservatives won both Stockport seats.

Is it possible to rescue from these eddies any truth at all and fix it as a guiding post in the stream? I believe it is. I believe it is vain to expect from industrial action much of a reconstructive character; its character value is defense; it can check. I believe that the economic power which controls so much of our political life today can only be subordinated to the common weal by an invigoration of the political life itself. That does not abandon the political field, in the meanwhile, to economic control; the actual problems of the day must be met as they arise by action designed to meet them, sometimes purely industrial, sometimes purely political, sometimes a mixture of both. Where political (that includes moral) instincts are weak and economic ones are strong, economic conflicts will be frequent and will occupy a great part of political attention, but a government that allows political initiative to be lost and to turn the state into a mere police force or a bribing agency is playing the game of those who wish for a separation between industrial and political labor and is creating in practical action an anti-parliamentary movement.

The disquieting weakness of democracy is its caveman herd mind, but neither by revolutionary nor direct action is that to be got over. It robs successful action of any real gain. It has to be educated out. Therefore, eighteenth-century constitutionalism has been an essential and permanent contribution to the historical growth of popular liberty, but to add nothing to it or to refrain from building upon it stories of political truth that carry us nearer to a completed fabric is as unscientific and as foolish as to put it away in the museums which we visit, to laugh at the errors of our fathers, and as detached and enlightened children to marvel at their demeanors and their costumes. These issues, as interesting to the political philosopher as to the man of action, are being fought out in this country today. Liverpool, where the Labor Party Conference meets in ten days, will be an interesting and pertinent comment on Scarborough.

British Labor Turns to the Left

By SCOTT NEARING

London, September 12

BRITISH labor flung the threat of revolt in the teeth of British employers at the Trade Union Congress which opened in Scarborough September 7. From the address with which the president, A. B. Swales, opened the congress to the brilliant pleas for world labor unity voiced by Fred Bramley, J. W. Brown, and M. Tomsky, there were warnings against the "conspiracy between the capitalists and the government" and declarations that "the time has come for labor to take matters into its own hands." Mr. Swales at the first session hit straight out from the shoulder:

> This movement of ours has learned many lessons during these years of reaction engineered by the employers, and one of the lessons is that a militant and progressive policy, consistently and steadily pursued, is the only policy that will unify, consolidate, and inspire our rank and file. . . . Everything points to a period of industrial strife and conflict. . . . There are surely signs over the whole field of industry which indicate that vast and revolutionary changes must take place in industrial structure to meet the changed conditions. . . . Some day assuredly our people will sweep away the system that produces such appalling conditions, and erect in its place a structure based upon cooperation in which every man and woman shall be assured the full fruits of their labor.

It is impossible, in a few sentences, to convey an impression of the power with which these ideas were driven home. Only after the rounds of applause had died away did the auditors realize that they had been listening, not to a demand for immediate economic improvements, but to a survey of the forces that are sweeping the British labor movement to a realization of its role [illegible] to play in the building of a new social order.

Equally convincing were the words with which Fred Bramley, secretary of the General Council and president of the Amsterdam International Federation of Trade Unions, presented the issue of world trade union unity:

> We consider it our duty to stand by the working class of Russia [he said]. The attitude of the International Federation of Trade Unions heretofore has been that Russia must affiliate with the International first and discuss afterward. The Russians desired a conference before they affiliated. The attitude of no discussion before affiliation we believe to be a wrong attitude.

This was a direct challenge to the Amsterdam International, of which the British unions constitute the largest group. Mr. Bramley then turned his attention to Russia.

> We must consider Russian problems in relation to the past history of Russia [he said]. The Russian revolution is the first revolution in all history that has aimed at and secured the overthrow of exploitation. It is also the world's first experiment in the working-class control of public [illegible]. There is one great lesson that the Russian revolution has taught us. You may cut off the heads of kings and queens; you may abolish royal families and imprison emperors; you may launch devastating wars upon the world and slaughter millions; you may still be forgiven and accepted into the comity of nations. We have had experience with these matters in our own country and in our own day. But if you disturb the landed interests and abolish the exploitation of the wage-earner, you will be attacked and attacked by the whole capitalist world. You will be compelled to face what Russia faces now. Russia, from our point of view is a mystery, and we cannot [illegible] only to stand by the struggling working-class movement of Russia.

Cheers greeted the speech, and the resolution, which indorsed the efforts of the General Council to secure "world-wide unity of the trade-union movement through an all-inclusive federation of trade unions," was passed by acclamation.

Savage attacks were made upon the Dawes Plan, which was denounced by A. J. Cook of the miners as "damning not only the German workers but damning the British workers too." Harry Pollitt described the plan as the interference of the "American financial dictatorship to prevent a social revolution in Germany."

Only one delegate spoke in defense of the plan; when he had finished the congress passed with a shout the resolution condemning "the enslavement of the German workers under the Dawes Plan," and pledging the British labor movement "to assist the German workers in every possible way to improve their standard of life."

But when it came to the application of these generalizations to the immediate problems before the British workers, the congress proceded with true British caution. At its first working session, the congress considered a resolution granting more power to the General Council (the executive committee of the congress). The resolution was hotly debated. The recent mine crisis is still fresh in the trade-union mind, and constant references were made to it. On one side were a number of small-craft unions and conservative trade-union leaders. Ranged on the other side were the miners and a number of the more progressive delegates. "It is only power that counts," cried A. J. Cook of the miners. "No union ought to fight alone. The time has gone by. You will be smashed. In the trade-union movement we must have centralized power."

"Power is essential, but common sense is sometimes necessary," answered J. H. Thomas of the railwaymen. "The power already held by the General Council is sufficient."

Here was an acute issue: a sharp struggle for power. American visitors leaned forward. "Something will happen," they told one another. But J. H. Clynes, W. J. Brown, and E. Bevin followed "on the side of caution," as Clynes phrased it. The congress then deferred action for a year!

The congress is a unique body. There were 724 delegates at this, the one hundred and fifty-seventh session, representing about 4,343,000 members. A dozen women were accredited delegates. Among the seven hundred men there were a few gray heads, but most were in the prime of life, and many were under thirty-five. The majority of the delegates were union officials, but a number had come straight from the shops. Probably two hundred of the delegates were first- or second-rate speakers. For the most part they used no notes. Their remarks were thoughtful, and to the point. There was nothing like an American steam roller in the congress. The length of speeches is rigidly limited: ten minutes for the mover of a resolution, seven minutes for the seconder, and five minutes for discussions from the floor. If the delegates have heard enough discussion, they begin to call out: "Agreed! Agreed!" or "Vote! Vote!"

The language used at the congress is picturesque, racy, and quite largely socialistic. Neil McLean's broad Scotch follows the finished parliamentary diction of the Right Honorable J. R. Clynes. One delegate remarked that Tomsky's Russian was almost as difficult to follow as Herbert Smith's Yorkshire brogue. A. J. Cook's fiery staccato contrasts with the deliberate, homely phrases of J. H. Thomas.

To be sure, this was a "left" congress. A. B. Swales, A. A. Purcell, head of the British trade-union delegation to Russia; George Hicks, Fred Bramley, and their co-workers had things all their own way after the first day. Still the movement is far bigger than the personality of any one man or of any small group of men. The British workers, face to face with the economic disintegration of the British Empire, are rapidly preparing themselves and their movement to take control of the economic activities of the United Kingdom. Day after day, at this congress, it was made clear by the delegates that this process of shifting control would be accomplished economically rather than politically. Ramsay MacDonald is personally popular among the delegates, but the late Labor Government is a by-word of reproach.

Completion

By JAMES DALY

The ferns had waited long—but she came to them with a spontaneity phenomenal in one of whom the slower pace seemed more expressive.

On a wicker table, by the mottled wall,
the ferns had waited long.
And she was sprightly in her coming,
and in her hand she held a book.

What if she never read?
She saw the birds, she saw the birds,
she saw them all, and heard them sing,
and lent a meaning to the waiting ferns.

Oh, in her hour of summing up,
do not forget:
Swiftly she came, whose pace was old and measured—who lent a meaning to the ferns.

The British Miner's Prophet

By WILSON MIDGLEY

A LITTLE over five years ago the man who has inflicted on Premier Baldwin the only defeat he has suffered was working eight hours a day tearing coal out of a deep seam in a Welsh mine. As secretary of the Miners' Federation of Great Britain A. J. Cook made the Prime Minister reverse his own decision at a few days' notice, call off a threatened strike by undertaking an official inquiry, and guarantee a subsidy to miners' wages which will amount to several million pounds and last for several months until the inquiry concludes.

Of course the miners' victory was won because Cook was backed by older and wiser heads than his on the miners' executive, by the great transport unions, and by a general feeling on the part of the public that the miners had at least some kind of right on their side; but the fact that the public believed that Jack was the giant-killer, that he could be called "Emperor Cook," and that he could arouse, as he has done, the hatred of the reactionaries and the fears of the liberals shows that Cook stands for something in himself.

As a matter of fact, he is the mental and physical embodiment of the typical British miner of the present day. He is a man of forty with an eager, almost boyish, face, simple blue eyes, the red hair of courage, and a body marked with those nasty bluish scars that are left by wounds in a mine. He conceives his plans in loneliness and then carries them out like an embodied energy, sweeping everybody along by his infectious enthusiasm and love of human beings and their company. He talks like a prophet pleading for the soul of the world in long, tireless, impassioned speeches. He loves humor and ease and books, but he has little time for them in his life and no use for them in his speeches. He represents the miner's almost fierce resentment and despair that all the inquiries and all the promises and all the schemes do not improve his position radically; he represents his determined mystical hope that somehow things are going to be radically altered and that he will be able once again to give way to that natural cheerfulness which has been under a cloud now for many years.

Cook was reared in that classical breeding ground of rebel miners, the Rhondda Valley. It is one of a series which the high mountains of South Wales, stretching like the fingers of a hand down to the sea, shut out from the sunlight and almost from the air. A single road runs up them, and everything that goes up must come out by the same route. They are cul de sacs to the body and too often to the mind. The Welsh miner lives and works in these valleys where often there is not room for the river and the road and the railroad to run side by side, where houses are cracked from ridge to basement by the undermining, where a football field may be the only level ground for miles, where the miner still washes off the muck and sweat in a tub on the hearth for which his wife must carry the water from a standpipe outdoors and heat it in kettles on the fire. Cook was not born in the Rhondda. He lived as a boy in the green fields of Somerset and something of their freshness must have begun the fever of unrest which has worked like a ferment in him ever since. Its first outlet was in preaching at the age of sixteen. For most Welsh miners religion takes the place of sunlight. The old type of miner was happy to divide his life between periods on his knees before the coal-face and on his knees before his God. He is, of course, a Fundamentalist, but the chief consolation of his religion is a febrile emotion. Into that movement young Cook was swept up and and as speedily thrown out when his mind opened out to wider ideas. The socialism in his mind began to get into his sermons. The position was strained when he asked permission for his Sunday-school football team to undress in an ante-room of the chapel. It was refused; the football team attached itself to a public-house which naturally did not think changing your trousers for football some kind of sin, and Cook was in the wilderness.

> Felt in the blood and felt along the heart

Respectability and hypocrisy had hit him and he began to hit back. In those constant disputes which gather round mining work he became known as one of those who naturally speak up and take the lead. Perhaps because he has red hair he spoke more vigorously than was always necessary, perhaps his red hair looked like a danger signal to foremen and masters; but Cook began to be known. He did not conceal his hatred for the life and conditions of himself and his mates, and when a man had to be dropped it frequently happened to be Cook. His was a Spartan life. He was a total abstainer, an athlete, a man with a rage for work. He loved difficulty and welcomed danger and so he could always get employment, but when the need for a special man had passed he could always say or do something which made him lose it again.

When his boy was born he had been out of work for some weeks; when a little girl followed he managed to get back to work the day before she arrived. But between these events he had had his contact with both culture and life. He won a scholarship at the age of twenty-two to the Central Labor College in London. His young wife and he gave up their home. She went uncomplainingly to live with her parents, but after a few months Cook had to come back and start earning money for the young lady just mentioned. He probably got in those few months as much as college teachers could give him. They showed him how to handle books. They opened his eyes to the wider meaning of socialism, and to this youth who had never lacked confidence in his cause they gave confidence in himself.

The war by this time was playing havoc with life in the Rhondda. The youngest and the strongest had gone, but the Government was demanding more and more coal. While they were asking the unions to see that they got more coal, their military representatives were carrying out the duty of military representatives and, in complete ignorance of problems of safety or the physical capacity of those left behind to stand the strain, they were impounding all the men they could steal away. They drew up a batch of young men in one of the pit-yards and marched them off to the recruiting officer. They were still drawn up in line while the tedious formalities were under way when a wild-eyed figure, coal-black from head to foot, dashed into their presence. Cook read the military and the miners a lecture on the situation.

He quoted rules and regulations; he gave the men details about their rights and then he marched them "right about" out of the very hands of the soldiers. He fought the food-rationing system in the same way, until inspectors came down from London to see who this troublesome fellow was with his allegations that the miners must have more food or produce less coal. He took the officials to a line of men waiting to descend the pit and showed them one dinner-pail after another with nothing it it but dry bread. He took part in a public discussion on the rationing system, and then there happened what must have happened frequently to this fluent, blue-eyed gospeler: he could not believe that he had said what he was accused of. One of the kindliest and most intelligent magistrates in the British Isles had to send him to jail, but he went and had talks with him in his cell. Cook kept himself from going frantic, he told me once, by composing the speeches he would make when he got out.

When he did get out he had regained respectability. His respectable chapel judges of the past were reconciled by his opposition to a higher respectability. He began to lecture on Marxian economics. Six nights a week he delivered what he called lectures, but what more often were harangues and prophecies, to hundreds of men at a time, the men who had come back from the war looking for the new world of which there seemed to be no promise, or rather nothing but promises.

By a vote like a flood he was elected one of three organizers for the Rhondda Valley unit and then in the national strike of 1921 he took quite naturally the position of the leader of the Rhondda, the leader of the advanced section, the leader of the new movement in South Wales, and a sort of prophet of the new order. As we walked through the village streets together in that strike children ran in front of him to get his notice for a moment, old men came up to touch him as if he had a magic power.

Frank Hodges, a man reared by the same experiences, except that he was formed before the war, cool, polished, a crack student, quite a French scholar, resigned the secretaryship of the Miners' Federation, and to the surprise of everybody including themselves the federation found that it had chosen the famous firebrand Cook to succeed him in office.

The change was symbolical of the times, but we all prophesied that Cook would be sobered or broken by office. Neither horn of that dilemma has impaled him. In office as out he has gone on making his revolutionary speeches, often, I have no doubt, to his own surprise next day. Sometimes he may alarm his followers, but the times are desperate. The miners are fed full of facts and theories and statistics which will prove that an unendurable life is all there is for them to endure. Inquiries seem to produce no action and only confirm their own convictions and provide their opponents with more ammunition. For A. J. Cook as for most of them nationalization shines like a star. It is not a creed formulated in terms so much as a gospel offering the only visible hope. The British miner is not a revolutionary; he hates trouble, but he knows that in the present desperate circumstances men like Robert Smillie and A. J. Cook represent his feelings and his needs better than any member of the "old guard"; and now that Smillie has retired, Cook has inherited his allegiance, because at any rate he thinks he can see daylight, and has the vision, the courage, and the creative energy to fight his way through to it.

Protocols, Pacts, Alliances

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, September 17

THE Assembly of the League of Nations, after its flare-up of last year, has relapsed into its habitual tameness. The center of interest has shifted from Geneva to Lausanne, or Locarno, or wherever the forthcoming conference about the proposed Western Pact is to be held. It is not, of course, the fault of the League that the important matter of the moment is one outside its immediate supervision, or rather it is only indirectly the fault of the League. It is because Germany and Russia are not members of the League of Nations that the League is unable to tackle effectively the problem of European peace, and Germany at least is not a member of the League of Nations because the League as a whole had not the courage to resist the French determination to keep her out of it. Now, by a turn of the tables, France is imploring Germany to come in and even insisting that she shall as a condition of signing any pact. What a comment on French policy of the last seven years!

Although one speaker after another has proclaimed at Geneva his fidelity to the protocol, it is clear that that document in its present form is as dead as Queen Anne. I should suppose that half the governments that voted for it in the Assembly of last year did so in the hope that it would never be ratified. And the more people study the protocol the less they like it. Their dislike is from different reasons. No doubt the present British Government dislikes the principle of compulsory arbitration, which is of course a limitation of national sovereignty, but the uneasiness felt about the protocol in its present form by a large part of English and other opinion of the Left has other grounds. On the one hand it is felt that the protocol as it stands would be or might be an instrument for stereotyping all the existing territorial arrangements in Europe. On the other hand it is feared that the protocol could hardly make disarmament possible, since it compels every signatory Power to maintain an army for the purpose of the military sanctions for which it provides, and allows France to maintain all her separate military alliances.

What the League of Nations should have done last year was simply to agree on a protocol providing for compulsory arbitration in all international disputes without going any further for the moment. Once countries became accustomed to submitting disputes to arbitration, no government would dare to resort to war, and eventually disarmament would become possible. But France would not have compulsory arbitration pure and simple. French policy in this has never changed. It was the same under Herriot, and is the same under Painlevé, as it was under Poincaré. When the predecessor of the protocol, the Treaty of Mutual Assistance, was being discussed at Geneva, M. Henri de Jouvenel insisted on behalf of the Poincaré Government on the continuance of separate alliances, and Lord Cecil weakly agreed. The Treaty of Mutual Assistance was killed.

Last year, when the protocol was being discussed, exactly the same demand was made by M. Paul Boncour on behalf of the Herriot Government. The British delegation opposed the demand and finally proposed as a compromise that all separate alliances should come to an end five years after the ratification of the protocol. The French delegation, of which, by the way, M. de Jouvenel again formed part, as he does this year, would not hear of any limitation, and Ramsay MacDonald instructed the British delegation to yield. He should have sacrificed the protocol rather than consent to such a condition. If all countries agree to submit all disputes to arbitration and to combine against any country violating that undertaking, what possible need can there be for defensive military alliances? One is reluctantly obliged to say that the insistence by France on the maintenance of such alliances is not evidence of a sincere desire for peace, for separate alliances have always been and always will be one of the principal causes of war.

The truth is that French policy has two principal aims: the stereotyping of all the territorial arrangements made by the peace treaties and the maintenance of the French alliances with Poland, Belgium, and other countries. It is because the French believe that the protocol is an instrument for securing those aims that they support it. Their idea of arbitration is a purely juridical one. The arbitrators are not to go into the question at issue on its merits, but simply to apply the "law," that is, the sacrosanct peace treaties. Last year the French and their satellites were terribly alarmed at MacDonald's proposal of compulsory arbitration, until the ingenious M. Benes saw how it could be used to stereotype existing territorial arrangements. Then he and M. Paul Boncour worked together on those lines and succeeded in obtaining the consent of the not very wide-awake British delegation to an instrument which in their opinion would do the trick. How can one help being suspicious about the protocol when one reads articles in its favor in papers like the Gaulois and the Figaro, to say nothing of the more conservative Temps?

Any attempt to stereotype the existing territorial arrangements in Europe must lead sooner or later to war. Hitherto frontiers have been altered by war or the threat of war. It is most desirable to make war impossible, but in that case provision must be made for altering frontiers, when necessary, by peaceful means. Otherwise there will be an explosion. To suppose that such frontiers as the present frontiers of Poland, which defy alike justice and common sense, can be permanent is madness. Protocol or no protocol, they will be altered sooner or later, if not by peaceful means, then by force. And they are by no means the only frontiers in Europe in the same case.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter, up to very recently, could see little merit in the claims of certain books of etiquette. He could read large headlines: "Do you know how asparagus should be eaten?" or "Is it correct to shake hands with a lady?" and remain quite unmoved. The details of the proper trousseau for (1) a bride whose husband is a millionaire, (2) a bride who will have a comfortable income, (3) a bride who must live modestly for several years interested him not at all, except in so far as it was never assumed that the modest income was to be a permanent affair. But now he can see how mistaken he was. A book of etiquette may have meant nothing to him, but it has its uses: if he were rich, he would count it his duty to see that a copy of one of these works was placed in every laboring man's cottage in this broad land. If his friends consider that a rash, or perhaps unfortunate expenditure of wealth, even imaginary wealth, he can point to the plight of one Isadore Walpuff, who was lately desirous of becoming a citizen of the United States. Unhappily, Mr. Walpuff, in his eagerness to take out his final papers, neglected to put on a collar and tie.

* * * * *

NATURALLY, the excellent judge was horrified; his courtroom had never before been so desecrated. And he refused to grant citizenship papers to one who had so far forgot himself and the traditional attire of an American gentleman.

* * * * *

IF Mr. Walpuff had only had a book of etiquette, he might have read, perhaps on page 389 et seq., the correct apparel for one about to attain to the accolade of citizenship. A neat morning coat, a pair of pearl gray trousers, a white (linen) collar, and something refined but individual in the way of neckwear—how much more comfortable he would have felt garmented thus than in his ugly work clothes, and how quickly His Honor would have welcomed him as a member of the inner circle. If it be advanced that Mr. Walpuff, being a laboring man, probably had permanently mislaid his pearl gray trousers, then the question arises: "Should a laboring man be admitted to citizenship under any conditions, even supposing he had been so foresighted as to hire the proper clothes for the occasion?" Would it not be more suitable to limit the benefits of naturalization to gentlemen of the leisure class, persons who would never be at a loss either in a courtroom or before a plate of asparagus?

* * * * *

THE Drifter has himself always felt very kindly toward those alien born who take the trouble to become citizens of his country; they must first learn some of the ways of a strange land, they must acquaint themselves at least partially with its language, they must master certain of its laws when possibly laws in their own country were completely unknown to them. And they do this, with definite pain, for some tangible benefits and for many vague and intangible ones. The Drifter has always felt like stretching out a hand to them, partly, perhaps, because the benefits they hope to derive may so easily elude them. [illegible] charms. In this case he feels that were he to do his duty he would at once establish a class for prospective citizens, giving instructions in wearing apparel and other matters vital to the life of the republic. But he rarely does his duty; and in the matter in hand his sympathies lie with the policeman who, set to watch at a polling place and encountering a discomfited would-be voter, inquired the cause of his discomfiture. "He say I no citizen," the would-be voter explained. The reply of the officer was instant and hearty: "Sure you're a citizen; don't you live here?"

* * * * *

WHICH strikes the Drifter as being a sensible solution of the problem and one that could safely be recommended to judges and immigration officers.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Does Prohibition Prohibit?

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: "These are not exceptional incidents," says Leonard Cline in his article Behind This Prohibition in the September 2 issue of your paper. They are "not exceptional" in the experience of Mr. Cline, as he is obviously a drinking man; but they would be very exceptional in my experience, as I am not a drinking man.

All that Mr. Cline shows in his sloppy and silly article is that there are men and women in this country, including public officials, who are willing to violate the liquor laws, and that there are others, like Mr. Cline, who are willing to aid and abet them.

This is hardly news, even to a total abstainer like myself. I am perfectly well aware that there are people willing to handle liquor today when there is a law against it, just as there are people willing to carry concealed weapons, sell opium and other drugs, race automobiles, commit theft and murder where there are laws against these offenses. The criminal, even in official positions, is no new phenomenon. But never until the prohibition criminal appeared have we had him and his indecent acts presented as an argument for repealing or modifying the law which he doesn't like.

In what he says about New York Mr. Cline is not only silly but misleading. He can get a drink in New York, of course, because he is "in cahoots" with the criminal conspiracy against the government in that city. But what about the man who is not thus advantaged? A dozen years ago a common man like myself, with no inside "dope," could get a drink on every corner, sometimes on three and even four sides of a corner. Today this common man would find it difficult to get a drink, and unless he is a confirmed tippler would not think the gain worth the trouble of a hunt. New York, I am ready to believe, is "wet"; but general public conditions are so much better today in this regard than they were when I first knew New York, eighteen years ago, that I would not have them changed back again for worlds.

We have drinkers with us, and we shall have them for a long time. They will get their liquor, for they prefer their selfish appetite to the public weal, and where there is a will there is a way. But these constitute only that inevitable body of criminality which exists under the operation of every law. In these early days of prohibition law-enforcement they are flourishing mightily; but the "set" of public sentiment is dead against them, and in due time they will become as relatively few, and as completely contemptible, as dope-fiends, wife-beaters, and bandits.

New York, September 3 John Haynes Holmes

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Mr. Holmes, in his denunciation of my picture of New York under prohibition, does little more than affirm, it seems to me, that total abstainers like himself can now no longer get a drink. Men who do drink, he admits, will get their liquor, for "where there's a will there's a way." That was, of course, what I attempted to prove.

I undertook to show also that the way is easy. Mr. Holmes says that it is difficult, and then declares he has never tried. He perceives that since prohibition many of the old saloons have closed their doors. He goes on the assumption apparently that those remaining, ostensibly to serve near-beer and pop, actually do sell nothing else.

Mr. Holmes's attitude toward the prohibition law is draconic. The fact that it is multitudinously violated is no argument for its repeal, he contends; and men who take a drink will eventually become—if, indeed, they are not so already in Mr. Holmes's opinion—as contemptible as "dope-fiends, wife-beaters, and bandits."

I do not wish to be understood to predict a revolution over rum. But nearly two centuries ago a king and his parliament passed a law, and the violators of it flourished so mightily that they discarded king and parliament together and constituted themselves the United States of America. Laws can be passed that are so unpopular they can never be enforced. The only recourse of a sagacious government is to repeal or modify them.

And as for the contemptibility of drinking men, wife-beaters, and bandits: In England centuries ago, I believe, they hanged a man as readily for stealing a penny's-worth of bread as they did for murdering the curate. Today, tempering our justice with a better sense of values, we discriminate.

Amawalk, New York, September 19 Leonard Cline

Diet

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The Nation having encouraged me to tolerate others' views, no matter how contrary to mine, I hereby extend an invitation to the reviewer of "Rational Diet" by Otto Carqué to visit us and witness the practical working out of the main idea expounded in "Rational Diet." If he will only be fair-minded and at all reasonable, I promise not to call him uncomplimentary names.

May I suggest that you have a man who is interested in modern dietetics, and has read a few modern authorities on the subject, review this book?

Zephyrshills, Florida, September 15 Rose Y. Chenkin

The Pies That Mother Made

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Your recent article on cooks of this generation and another was well timed and of great interest. But I would ask you to clarify your point in favor of grandmother by defining a good cook. In one important sense a good cook may be a bad cook; just as "good eating" is often the worst kind of eating.

Here is my protest: Proper ministration to the alimentary demands of man requires infinitely more than a knowledge of cookery—it requires the rare and priceless knowledge of nutrition.

In the preparation of their delectable offerings our mothers' only guides were taste, appearance, and abundance. Master chefs knew no better—few do to this day. Scientific dietetics was greatly in the dark. The facts hadn't been unearthed.

Two achievements of this generation are (1) the newer knowledge of the chemistry, the physiology, and notably the biology of nutrition; (2) the development of methods for organizing and disseminating such knowledge through a multiplicity of agencies.

True, our wives can't cook as our mothers cooked. They can't and, what's more, they won't—because they know better.

Glenside, Pennsylvania, September 7 Robert H. Lewis

A Reasonable Demand

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Inclosed please find $2 for six months' subscription, as offered in your last issue. I think it would be fitting that I take the place in your fold of readers vacated by that distinguished Southern brother who left because he thought you did not soak the Catholics hard enough. The accident of birth has made me a Catholic, but I will listen to reason. I shall not expect you to defend the Catholic church, for I know it is too vulnerable. But I shall expect that you continue to denounce that modern imitation of the Spanish Inquisition, the Ku Klux Klan, not because it is anti-Catholic but because it is anti-liberal.

Sawtrelle, California, August 31 E. J. O'Connell

Some Notable Fall Books

BIOGRAPHY, MEMOIRS

Anthony, Katharine. Catherine the Great. Knopf. $5.
Baring-Gould, S. Further Reminiscences. 1864-1894. Dutton. $6.
Barrus, Clara. The Life and Letters of John Burroughs. Houghton Mifflin. 2 vols. $12.50.
Best, Mary Agnes. Rebel Saints. Harcourt, Brace. $3.50.
Bigelow, Poultney. Seventy Summers. Longmans, Green. 2 vols. $10.
Bishop, Joseph Bucklin. Notes and Anecdotes of Many Years. Scribner's. $2.50.
Bordeux, Jeanne. Eleonora Duse. Doran. $6.
Bradford, Gamaliel. Wives. Harper. $3.50.
Buck, Mitchell S. The Life of Casanova. Frank-Maurice. $2.
Bullard, Robert Lee. Personalities and Reminiscences of the War. Doubleday, Page. $5.
Coit, C. W. Charles the First. Houghton Mifflin. $4.50.
Cole, G. D. H. Robert Owen. Little, Brown. $4.
Daudet, Leon. The Memoirs of. Edited and Translated by Arthur Kingsland Griggs. Dial Press. $5.
Dickson, Harris. An Old-Fashioned Senator. Stokes. $2.
Errazuriz, Pedro Subercaseaux. Saint Francois D'Assise. Marshall Jones. $25.
Ervine, St. John. Parnell. Little, Brown. $4.
Finger, Charles J. Romantic Rascals. McBride. $3.
Fitzpatrick, John C. The Diaries of George Washington. Houghton Mifflin. 4 vols. $25.
Geer, Walter. Napoleon and Marie Louise. Brentano's. $5.
Grey of Fallodon, Viscount. Twenty-Five Years. Stokes. 2 vols. $10.
Harte, Bret. Letters of. Ed. by Geoffrey Bret Harte. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
Hellman, George S. The True Stevenson. Little, Brown. $6.50.
Herzen, Alexander. My Past and Thoughts. v. IV and V. Knopf. ea. $2.
Hirst, Francis W. The Life and Letters of Thomas Jefferson. Macmillan.
Howe, Frederic C. Confessions of a Reformer. Scribner's. $3.50.
Lawton, Mary. A Lifetime with Mark Twain. Harcourt, Brace. $3.50.
Lochner, Louis P. Henry Ford, America's Don Quixote. International Publishers. $3.
Lucas-Dubreton, J. Samuel Pepys, a Portrait in Miniature. Putnam. $2.50.
Marquand, J. P. Lord Timothy Dexter of Newburyport, Mass. Minton, Balch. $3.50.
Melville, Lewis. Beau Brummel. Doran. $7.50.
Melville, Lewis. Life and Letters of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
Mother Jones. The Autobiography Of. Charles H. Kerr.
Murdock, Kenneth Ballard. Increase Mather. Harvard University. $6.
Paine, Albert Bigelow. Joan of Arc, Maid of France. Macmillan. 2 vols. $10.
Powys, Llewelyn. Skin for Skin. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Prescott, William Hickling. His Life and Writings Shown in His Correspondence, 1833-1847. Edited by Roger Wolcott. Houghton Mifflin. $6.
Queen Victoria. The Letters Of. 1862-1878. Edited by George Earle Buckle. Longmans, Green.
Raleigh, Lady, Ed. The Letters of Sir Walter Raleigh. Macmillan. 2 vols.
Russell, John. The Later Correspondence of, 1840-1878. Edited by G. P. Gooch. Longmans, Green. 2 vols. $10.
Scudder, Janet. Modeling My Life. Harcourt, Brace. $3.50.
Seitz, Don C. Uncommon Americans. Bobbs-Merrill. $3.
Smith, Theodore C. Life and Letters of James A. Garfield. Yale. 2 vols. $12.
Starr, Harris E. William Graham Sumner. Holt. $4.
Tarbell, Ida M. The Life of Elbert H. Gary. Appleton. $3.50.
Wandell, Samuel H. and Minnigerode, Meade. Aaron Burr. 2 vols. $10.
White, William Allen. Calvin Coolidge: The Man Who is President. Macmillan. $3.50.
Wilstach, Paul Ed. Correspondence of John Adams and Thomas Jefferson. 1812-1826. Bobbs-Merrill. $2.75.

DRAMA

Carter, Huntly. The New Theatre and Cinema of Soviet Russia. International Publishers. $6.
Cheney, Sheldon. The Art Theatre. Knopf. $3.
Ervine, St. John G. Anthony and Anna. Macmillan.
Flecker, James Elroy. Don Juan. Knopf. $2.
Galsworthy, John. The Show. Scribner's. $1.
Malevinsky, M. L. The Science of Playwriting. Brentano's. $5.
Masefield, John. The Trial of Jesus. Macmillan. $1.75.
Moses, Montrose J. Representative Plays. v. II. Dutton. $8.
Nathan, George Jean. The Autobiography of an Attitude. Knopf. $2.50.
Sayler, Oliver M. Inside the Moscow Art Theatre. Brentano's. $3.
Zucker, A. E. The Chinese Theater. Little, Brown. $7.50.

ECONOMICS, INDUSTRY, POLITICS, SOCIOLOGY

Abbott, Edith. Historical Aspects of the Immigration Problem. University of Chicago. $4.50.
American Statistical Association Meeting. Population. Houghton Mifflin. $4.
Barnes, Harry Elmer. History and Social Intelligence. Knopf. $4.
Beer, M. Social Struggles and Thought. Small, Maynard. $2.
Blum, Solomon. Labor Economics. Holt. $4.
Buell, Raymond Leslie. International Relations. Holt. $6.
Burian, Stephan Count. Austria in Dissolution. Doran. $6.
Bywater, Hector C. The Great Pacific War: A History of the American-Japanese Campaign of 1931-32. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.
Campbell, C. G. Common Wealth: A Study in Social Philosophy. Century. $3.
Carpenter, William S. Democracy and Representation. Princeton University.
Carver, Thomas Nixon. The Present Economic Revolution in the United States. Little, Brown. $2.50.
Chase, Stuart. Men and Machines. Macmillan. $2.50.
Commons, John R.; Draper, Ernest G.; Lewisohn, Sam A., and Lescohier, Don D. Can Business Prevent Unemployment? Knopf. $2.
Dunn, Robert W. American Foreign Investments. Viking Press. $5.
Fachiri, Alexander P. The Permanent Court of International Justice. Oxford University. $5.
Feldman, H. The Regularization of Employment. Harper. $2.50.
Flexner, H. A. Universities. Oxford University. $4.75.
Gentleman Without Desire, A. The State of England. Putnam. $1.75.
Goodrich, Carter. The Miner's Freedom. Marshall Jones. $2.
Graham, Stephen. The Dividing Line of Europe. Appleton. $2.
Greer, Guy. The Ruhr-Lorraine Industrial Problem. Macmillan. $2.
Harding, W. P. G. The Formative Period of the Federal Reserve System. Houghton Mifflin. $4.50.

Coolidge, Charles E. The Pathway of Peace: Representative Addresses, 1920-24. Harper. $4.
Judson, Harry Pratt. Our Federal Republic. Macmillan. $3.
Kautsky, Karl. The Labour Revolution. Dial Press. $2.50.
Langdon-Davies, John. The New Age of Faith. Viking Press. $2.50.
Lippmann, Walter. The Phantom Public: A Restatement of the Theory of Popular Government. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Lodge, Henry Cabot. The Senate and the League of Nations. Scribner's. $4.
Mitchell, William. Winged Defense. Putnam. $2.50.
Moulton, Harold G. and Lewis Cleona. The Financial Problem of France. Macmillan. $2.50.
Munro, William Bennett. The Invisible Government of the United States. Macmillan.
Nearing, Scott and Freeman, Joseph. Dollar Diplomacy. Viking Press. $2.50.
Pearl, Raymond. The Biology of Population Growth. Knopf. $3.
Rockow, Lewis. Contemporary Political Thought in England. Macmillan.
Saposs, David J. Left Wing Unionism. International Publishers. $1.50.
Spender, J. A. The Public Life. Stokes. 2 vols. $7.50.
Speranza, Gino. Race or Nation. Bobbs-Merrill. $3.
Stocking, George Ward. The Oil Industry and the Competitive System: A Study in Waste. Houghton Mifflin. $3.50.
Stoddard, Lothrop. Social Classes in Post-War Europe. Scribner's. $2.
Toynbee, Arnold J. Survey of International Affairs 1920-1923. Oxford University. $9.
Trotsky, Leon. Whither England? International Publishers. $1.75.
Von Klarwill, Victor. The Fugger News Letters, Second Series. Putnam. $5.
Warren, Charles. Congress, the Constitution and the Supreme Court. Little, Brown. $3.
Willoughby, W. W. Opium as An International Problem: The Geneva Conferences. Johns Hopkins Press. $4.50.

ESSAYS, CRITICISM, LITERARY HISTORY

Bahr, Hermann. Expressionism. A. and C. Boni. $5.
Bell, Aubrey F. G. Contemporary Spanish Literature. Knopf. $3.
Benchley, Robert. The Cult of Assininity. Holt. $2.
Bennett, Arnold. Arnold Bennett's Adolphi Dummy. [illegible]
Blanchard, Frederick T. The Great Fielding. Yale. $6.
Boyd, Ernest. H. L. Mencken. McBride. $1.
Braybrooke, Patrick. Considerations on Edmund Gosse. Lippincott. $2.50.
Capek, Karel. Letters from England. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Carpenter, Edward and Barnefield, George. Psychology of the Poet Shelley. Dutton. $2.
Chevalley, Abel. The Modern English Novel. Knopf. $2.50.
Collins, Joseph. The Doctor Looks at Biography. Doran. $3.
Collis, J. S. Shaw. Knopf. $2.
Crevecoeur, St. John de. Sketches of Eighteenth Century America. Ed. by S. T. Williams and others. Yale. $3.
Douglas, Norman. Experiments. McBride. $2.50.
Gerould, Katharine Fullerton. The Aristocratic West. Harper. $3.50.
Goldberg, Isaac. The Man Mencken. Simon and Schuster. $4.
Gosse, Edmund. Silhouettes. Scribner's. $3.
Gould, Gerald. The English Novel of To-day. Dial Press. $2.
Hurden, Maximilian. I Meet My Contemporaries. Holt. $4.
Huxley, Aldous. Along the Road. Doran. $2.
Jones, Llewellyn. First Impressions. Knopf. $2.50.
Lilian Love. Restoring Shakespeare. Knopf. $3.
Le Gallienne, Richard. The Romantic '90's. Doubleday, Page. $2.50.
MacDonald, J. Ramsay. Wanderings and Excursions. Bobbs-Merrill. $3.
Massingham, H. W. "H. W. M.": A Selection from His Writings. Harcourt, Beare. $5.
Murry, Middleton. Pencillings. Seltzer. $3.
Nevinson, H. W. More Changes, More Chances. Harcourt, Brace. $4.
Priestly, J. B. English Comic Characters. Dodd, Mead. $2.50.
Redman, Ben Ray. Edwin Arlington Robinson. McBride. $1.
Rusk, Ralph L. The Literature of the Middle West. Columbia University. 2 vols. $7.50.
Saurat, Denis. The Three Conventions. Dial Press. $2.
Sherman, Stuart P., Ed. Letters to a Lady in the Country. Scribner's. $2.
Sitwell, Osbert. Discursions. Doran. $6.
Smith, Logan Pearsall. Words and Idioms. Houghton Mifflin. $2.
Tandy, Jennette. Crackerbox Philosophers in American Humor and Satire. Columbia University. $2.50.
Tolman, Albert H. Falstaff and Other Shakespearean Topics. Macmillan. $2.50.
Van Doren, Carl and Mark. American and British Literature Since 1890. Century. $2.50.
Villard, Oswald Garrison. Prophets True and False. Seltzer. $2.50.
Waldman, Milton. Americana. Holt. $5.
Weigand, Herman J. The Modern Ibsen. Holt. $3.75.
Wharton, Edith. The Writing of Fiction. Scribner's. $2.

FICTION

Allen, James Lane. The Landmark. Macmillan. $2.50.
Andreyev, Leonid. Sashka Jigouleff. McBride. $2.50.
Armstrong, Martin. At the Sign of the Goat and Compasses. Harper. $2.
Asch, Nathan. The Office. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Barbusse, Henri. Chains. International Publishers. 2 vols. $4.
Barrington, E. Glorious Apollo. Dodd, Mead. $2.50.
Belloc, Hilaire. Mr. Petre. McBride. $2.50.
Benoit, Pierre. Jacob's Well. International Publishers. $2.
Beresford, J. D. The Monkey Puzzle. Bobbs-Merrill. $2.5[illegible]
Bojer, Johan. The Emigrants. Century. $2.
Boyd, Thomas. Samuel Drummond. Scribner's. $2.
Brackett, Charles. Week-End. McBride. $1.50.
Bromfield, Louis. Possession. Stokes. $2.
Capek, Karel. Krakatit. Macmillan. $2.50.
Cather, Willa. The Professor's House. Knopf. $2.
Cline, Leonard. God Head. Viking Press. $2.
Cocteau, Jean. The Grand Ecart. Putnam. $2.
Conrad, Joseph. Suspense: A Napoleonic Novel. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Coppard, A. E. Fishmonger's Fiddle. Knopf. $2.50.
de Gourmont, Remy. A Virgin Heart. Tr. by Aldous Huxley. Adolphi Company. $2.50.
Doll, Eimar. Runaway. Doran. $2.
Du Quesne, Ega. The Rule. Knopf. $2.50.
Erskine, John. The Private Life of Helen of Troy. Bobbs-Merrill. $2.
Fifteen Authors. Canadian Stories, 1925. Putnam. $2.50.
Fitzgerald, F. Scott. All the Sad Young Men. Scribner's. $2.
Frederick, John T. Green Bush. Knopf. $2.50.
Galsworthy, John. Caravan. Scribner's. $2.50.
Hermets, David. The Sailor's Return. Knopf. $1.75.
Hilo, André. The Various Scandals. Knopf. $2.50.
Horler, Maxim. The Story of a Novel and Other Stories. Dial Press. $2.50.
Travis, Robert. My Head! My Head! Knopf. $2.
Hamsun, Knut. Benoni. Knopf. $2.50.

Hauptmann, Gerhart. The Island of the Great Mother. Viking Press. $2.50.
Herrick, Robert. Wanderings. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Heyward, Dubose. Porgy. Doran. $2.
Hull, Helen. The Surry Family. Macmillan. $2.
Hunt, Frazier. Sycamore Bend. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Hutchinson, A. S. M. One Increasing Purpose. Little, Brown. $2.50.
Jameson, Storm. Three Kingdoms. Knopf. $2.50.
Kennedy, Margaret. The Ladies of Lyndon. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Kuprin, Alexandre. Gambrinus: And Other Stories. Adelphi Company. $2.
Lady Murasaki. The Tale of Genji. Tr. by Arthur Waley. Houghton Mifflin. $3.
Lubbock, Percy. The Region Cloud. Scribner's. $2.50.
Machen, Arthur. The Canning Wonder. Knopf. $3.50.
MacKaye, Percy. Tall Tales from the Kentucky Mountains. Doran. $2.50.
Mackenzie, Compton. Coral. Doran. $2.
McKenna, Stephen. Tales of Intrigue and Revenge. Little, Brown. $2.50.
Merezhkovsky, Dmitri. December the Fourteenth. International Publishers. $2.
Meynell, Esther. The Little Chronicle of Magdalena Bach. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Morand, P. Closed All Night. Seltzer. $2.
Morley, Christopher. Thunder on the Left. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Muilenburg, Walter J. Prairie. Viking Press. $2.50.
Nicholson, Meredith. And They Lived Happily Ever After. Scribner's. $2.
Norris, Kathleen. Little Ships. Doubleday, Page. $2.
O'Flaherty, Liam. The Informer. Knopf. $2.50.
O'Higgins, Harvey. Clara Barron. Harper. $2.
Pirandello, Luigi. The Outcast. Dutton. $2.50.
Poole, Ernest. The Hunter's Moon. Macmillan. $2.
Powys, T. F. Mockery Gap. Knopf. $2.50.
Richardson, Dorothy. The Trap. Knopf. $2.
Rolland, Romain. Summer. Holt. $2.50.
Schnitzler, Arthur. Fräulein Else. Simon and Schuster. $1.50.
Sedgwick, Anne Douglas. A Fountain Sealed. Houghton Mifflin. $2.50.
Snaith, J. C. Thus Far. Appleton. $2.
Steele, Wilbur Daniel. Taboo. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Strachey, J. St. Loe. The Madonna of the Barricades. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Suckow, Ruth. The Odyssey of a Nice Girl. Knopf. $2.50.
Swinnerton, Frank. The Elder Sister. Doran. $2.
Tarkington, Booth. Women. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Transatlantic Stories. With an Introduction by Ford Madox Ford. Dial Press. $2.50.
Tully, Jim. Glass Houses. A. and C. Boni. $2.
Van Doren, Carl. Other Provinces. Knopf. $2.50.
Van Vechten, Carl. Firecrackers. Knopf. $2.50.
Walpole, Hugh. Portrait of a Man With Red Hair. Doran. $2.
Ward, Christopher. Foolish Fiction. Holt. $2.
Wassermann, Jacob. Faber, or The Lost Years. Harcourt, Brace. $2.50.
Waugh, Alec. Kept. A. and C. Boni. $2.
Wells, H. G. Christina Alberta's Father. Macmillan. $2.50.
Werfel, Franz. Verdi. A Novel of the Opera. Simon and Schuster. $3.
Whitman, Walt. The Half-Breed and Other Stories. Edited by Thomas O. Mabbott. Columbia University.
Wood, Clement. Folly. Small, Maynard. $2.
Wylie, Elinor. The Venetian Glass Nephew. Doran. $2.50.
Yezierska, Anzia. Bread Givers. Doubleday, Page. $2.
Young, Francis Brett. Cold Harbour. Knopf. $2.50.
"Zélide." Four Tales by. Scribner's. $3.75.

FINE ARTS

Alastair. Fifty Drawings. With a Note of Introduction by Carl Van Vechten. Knopf. $15.
Beardsley, Aubrey. Uncollected Works of. Dodd, Mead. $12.50.
Bewick, Thomas. The Memoir of. 1822-1828. Dial Press. $4.
Blake, Vernon. Relation in Art. Oxford University. $6.
Brackett, Oliver. Thomas Chippendale: A Study of His Life, Work and Influence. Houghton Mifflin. $15.
Cortissoz, Royal. Personalities in Art. Scribner's. $3.
Covarrubias, Miguel. The Prince of Wales and Other Famous Americans. Knopf. $3.
Downes, William Howe. John S. Sargent. Little, Brown. $8.
Gardner, Helen. A History of Art. Harcourt, Brace. $4.
Hall, Gertrude. The Wagnerian Romances. Knopf. $2.75.
Hassam, Childe. The Etchings and Dry-Points Of. Scribner's. $17.50.
Laver, James. Portraits in Oil and Vinegar. Dial Press. $3.50.
Pennell, Joseph. The Adventures of an Illustrator. Little, Brown. $12.50.
Phillips, Claude. Emotion in Art. Houghton Mifflin. $4.50.
Place, Charles A. Charles Bulfinch, Architect and Citizen. Houghton Mifflin. $15.
Vollard, Ambroise. Paul Cézanne: His Life and Art. Frank-Maurice. $3.
Vollard, Ambroise. Rénoir: An Intimate Record. Knopf. $3.50.
Warde, Frederique. Bruce Rogers: Designer of Books. Harvard University. $10.
Weitenkampf, Frank. Famous Prints. Scribner's. $25.

HISTORY

Ashley, Percy. Europe from Waterloo to Sarajevo. Knopf. $3.50.
Bader, C. Women in Ancient India. Knopf.
Bainville, Jacques. History of France. Appleton. $3.50.
Beer, Thomas. The Mauve Decade. Knopf. $2.50.
Belloc, Hilaire. A History of England. Putnam. v. I., B. C. 55 to A. D. 1066. $3.75.
Bowers, Claude G. Jefferson and Hamilton: The Struggle for Democracy in America. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
Brooks, Sidney. America and Germany, 1918-1925. Macmillan.
Carter, Thomas F. The Invention of Printing in China and Its Spread Westward. Columbia University. $7.50.
Childe, V. Gordon. The Dawn of European Civilization. Knopf. $6.
Davis, Oscar King. Released for Publication. Houghton Mifflin. $5.
Delaporte, L. Mesopotamia: The Babylonian and Assyrian Civilization. Knopf. $5.
Dodwell, Henry. A Sketch of the History of India from 1858 to 1918. Longmans, Green. $2.25.
Ellwood, Charles. Evolution, Eugenics and Progress. Studies in the Halley Foundation. Harvard University. $1.
Evans, Joan. Life in Medieval France. Oxford University. $5.25.
Glotz, Gustave. The Aegean Civilization. Knopf. $6.
Gooch, G. P. Germany. Scribner's. $3.
Green, Theodore. Our Naval Heritage. Century. $4.
Gwynn, Stephen. Ireland. Scribner's. $3.
Hardy, G. Gathorne. Norway. Scribner's. $3.
Kenton, Edna, Ed. The Jesuit Relations. A. and C. Boni. $5.
Lawrence, D. H. Movements in European History. Oxford University. $3.50.
Morison, Samuel Eliot. The Rise of the Spanish Empire in the Old World and in the New. Macmillan. v. 3. $5.50.
Moffit, L. W. England on the Eve of the Industrial Revolution. International Publishers. $3.00.
Mowat, R. B. The Diplomatic Relations of Great Britain and the United States. Longmans, Green. $5.50.
O'Connor, James. A History of Ireland. Doran. 2 vols. $12.

O'Hara, Valentine, and Makeef, N. Russia. Scribner's. $3.
Parkes, Joan. Travel in England in the Seventeenth Century. Oxford University. $7.
Pollard, A. F. Factors in American History. Macmillan. $2.50.
Schechter, Frank I. The Historical Foundations of the Law Relating to Trade-Marks. Columbia University.
Spengler, Oswald. The Decline of Western Civilization. Knopf. $7.50.
Sullivan, Mark. A History of the United States in Our Own Time. Scribner's. v. I.
Temperley, H. W. V. The Foreign Policy of Canning. Harcourt, Brace. $7.50.
Von Hoffman, General. The War of Lost Opportunities. International Publishers. $3.50.
Webster, C. K. The Foreign Policy of Castlereagh, 1815-1822. Harcourt, Brace. $7.50.
Weigall, Arthur. History of the Pharaohs. Dutton. v. I.

PHILOSOPHY, PSYCHOLOGY, RELIGION, ANTHROPOLOGY, EDUCATION

Ananikian, Mardiros, and Werner, Alice. Armenian-African Mythology. Marshall Jones. $8.
Bukharin, Nikolai. Historical Materialism. International Publishers. $3.25.
Collins, Mary. Colour Blindness. Harcourt, Brace. $4.50.
De Lima, Agnes. Our Enemy the Child. Republic. $1.
Fite, Warner. Moral Philosophy. Dial Press. $3.50.
Frazer, James George. The Worship of Nature. Macmillan.
Hirsch, Emil G. My Religion. Macmillan. $5.
Joad, C. E. M. Mind and Matter. Putnam.
Kautsky, Karl. Foundations of Christianity. International Publishers. $4.
Kretschmer, E. Physique and Character. Harcourt, Brace. $5.
Lipsky, Abram. Man the Puppet. Frank-Maurice. $2.50.
Locke Alain. The New Negro. A. and C. Boni. $5.
Ludovici, Anthony. Lysistrata. Dutton. $1.
MacCurdy, John T. The Psychology of Emotion: Morbid and Normal. Harcourt, Brace. $7.50.
Margolin, Arnold. Jews of Eastern Europe. Seltzer. $2.50.
Mencken, H. L. Americana—1925. Knopf. $2.50.
Montague, William Pepperell. The Ways of Knowing, or the Methods of Philosophy. Macmillan.
More, Henry. Philosophical Writings of. Oxford University. $3.50.
Newman, Louis I. Jewish Influence on Christian Reform Movements. Columbia University. $5.
Nilsson, Martin P. A History of Greek Religion. Oxford University. $4.25.
Peers, E. Allison. Spanish Mysticism. Dutton. $5.
Roback, A. A., Ed. Problems of Personality: A Volume of Essays in Honour of Morton Prince. Harcourt, Brace. $6.
Russell, Dora. Hypatia. Dutton. $1.
Santayana, George. Dialogues in Limbo. Scribner's. $2.50.
Sinar, Theophile. The Race Myth. Seltzer. $4.
Stokes, H. F. Scott. Persons, or of Dragons. Dutton. $1.
Sturt, Mary. The Psychology of Time. Harcourt, Brace. $3.

POETRY

American Poetry, 1925. A Miscellany. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Anderson, Maxwell. You Who Have Dreams. Simon and Schuster. $2.
Barnes, Nellie, Ed. Indian Love Lyrics. Macmillan.
Benét, Stephen Vincent. Tiger Joy. Doran. $1.75.
Bynner, Witter. Caravan. Knopf. $1.50.
Coffin, Robert P. Tristram. Dew and Bronze. Seltzer. $1.50.
Cook, George Cram. Greek Coins: A Book of Verse. Doran.
Deutsch, Babette. Honey Out of the Rock. Appleton. $1.50.
Divine, Charles. Road to Town. Seltzer. $2.
Edman, Irwin. Poems by. Simon and Schuster. $2.
Ellis, Havelock. Sonnets With Folk Songs from the Spanish. Houghton Mifflin. $3.
Field, Michael. Selected Poems. Houghton Mifflin. $1.75.
Gibson, Wilfrid. I Heard a Sailor. Macmillan. $2.
Johnson, James Weldon, Ed. The Book of American Negro Spirituals. Viking Press. $3.50.
Kennedy, R. Emmet. Mellows: Negro Work Songs, Street Cries and Spirituals. A. and C. Boni. $7.50.
Kilmer, Aline. The Poor King's Daughter. Doran. $1.25.
Leonard, William Ellery. Two Lives. Viking Press. $2.
Lowell, Amy. What's O'Clock. Houghton Mifflin. $2.25.
Masters, Edgar Lee. Selected Poems. Macmillan. $2.50.
Miller, Marion Mills. The Songs of Sappho. Frank-Maurice. $20.
Neihardt, John G. The Song of the Indian Wars. Macmillan. $2.25.
Sapir, Edward, and Barbeau, Marius. Folk Songs of French Canada. Yale. $4.
Sarett, Lew. Slow Smoke. Holt. $2.
Scarborough, Dorothy. On the Trail of Negro Folk-Songs. Harvard University. $3.50.
Sitwell, Edith. Troy Park. Knopf. $1.75.
Sitwell, Osbert. Out of the Flame. Doran. $2.
Sitwell, Sacheverell. The Thirteenth Caesar. Doran. $2.
Stephens, James. Collected Poems. Macmillan. $3.50.
Weaver, John V. A. More in American. Knopf. $1.50.
Yeats, William Butler. Early Poems and Stories. Macmillan. $2.50.

SCIENCE

Burtt, Edwin Arthur. The Metaphysical Foundations of Modern Physical Science. Harcourt, Brace. $5.
Lodge, Oliver. Ether and Reality. Doran. $2.
Low, A. M. The Future. International Publishers. $2.
Morgan, Thomas Hunt. Evolution and Genetics. Princeton.
Nordmann, Charles. The Tyranny of Time. International Publishers. $3.25.
Russell, Bertrand. The A. B. C. of Relativity. Harper. $2.
Slosson, Edwin E. Sermons of a Chemist. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Thompson, J. Arthur, and Geddes, Patrick. Biology. Holt. $1.
Voronoff, Serge. Rejuvenation by Grafting. Adelphi Company. $6.
Wolf, A. Essentials of Scientific Method. Macmillan.
Yerkes, Robert M. Almost Human. Century. $3.

TRAVEL, GEOGRAPHY, NATURE, DESCRIPTION

Amundsen, R. By Air to the Arctic. Dodd, Mead.
Ayscough, Florence. A Chinese Mirror. Houghton, Mifflin. $5.
Beebe, William. Jungle Days. Putnam. $3.
Belloc, Hilaire. The Road. Harper. $3.
Conrad, Joseph. The Mirror of the Sea. Harper. $2.
Deutsch, Babette. Honey Out of the Rock. Appleton. $1.50.
Divine, Charles. Road to Town. Seltzer. $2.
Edman, Irwin. Poems by. Simon and Schuster. $2.
Ellis, Havelock. Sonnets With Folk Songs from the Spanish. Houghton Mifflin. $3.
Field, Michael. Selected Poems. Houghton Mifflin. $1.75.
Gibson, Wilfrid. I Heard a Sailor. Macmillan. $2.
Johnson, James Weldon, Ed. The Book of American Negro Spirituals. Viking Press. $3.50.
Kennedy, R. Emmet. Mellows: Negro Work Songs, Street Cries and Spirituals. A. and C. Boni. $7.50.
Kilmer, Aline. The Poor King's Daughter. Doran. $1.25.
Leonard, William Ellery. Two Lives. Viking Press. $2.
Lowell, Amy. What's O'Clock. Houghton Mifflin. $2.25.
Masters, Edgar Lee. Selected Poems. Macmillan. $2.50.
Miller, Marion Mills. The Songs of Sappho. Frank-Maurice. $20.
Neihardt, John G. The Song of the Indian Wars. Macmillan. $2.25.
Sapir, Edward, and Barbeau, Marius. Folk Songs of French Canada. Yale. $4.
Sarett, Lew. Slow Smoke. Holt. $2.
Scarborough, Dorothy. On the Trail of Negro Folk-Songs. Harvard University. $3.50.
Sitwell, Edith. Troy Park. Knopf. $1.75.
Sitwell, Osbert. Out of the Flame. Doran. $2.
Sitwell, Sacheverell. The Thirteenth Caesar. Doran. $2.
Stephens, James. Collected Poems. Macmillan. $3.50.
Weaver, John V. A. More in American. Knopf. $1.50.
Yeats, William Butler. Early Poems and Stories. Macmillan. $2.50.

SCIENCE

Burtt, Edwin Arthur. The Metaphysical Foundations of Modern Physical Science. Harcourt, Brace. $5.
Lodge, Oliver. Ether and Reality. Doran. $2.
Low, A. M. The Future. International Publishers. $2.
Morgan, Thomas Hunt. Evolution and Genetics. Princeton.
Nordmann, Charles. The Tyranny of Time. International Publishers. $3.25.
Russell, Bertrand. The A. B. C. of Relativity. Harper. $2.
Slosson, Edwin E. Sermons of a Chemist. Harcourt, Brace. $2.
Thompson, J. Arthur, and Geddes, Patrick. Biology. Holt. $1.
Voronoff, Serge. Rejuvenation by Grafting. Adelphi Company. $6.
Wolf, A. Essentials of Scientific Method. Macmillan.
Yerkes, Robert M. Almost Human. Century. $3.

TRAVEL, GEOGRAPHY, NATURE, DESCRIPTION

Amundsen, R. By Air to the Arctic. Dodd, Mead.
Ayscough, Florence. A Chinese Mirror. Houghton, Mifflin. $5.
Beebe, William. Jungle Days. Putnam. $3.
Belloc, Hilaire. The Road. Harper. $3.
Conrad, Joseph. The Mirror of the Sea. Harper. $2.
Colum, Padraic. The Road Round Ireland. Macmillan. $3.
Franck, Harry A. Roving Through Southern China. Century. $5.
Huntington, Ellsworth. West of the Pacific. Scribner's. $5.
Hurley, Frank. Argonauts of the South. Putnam. $5.
Norton, E. F. The Fight for Everest. Longmans, Green. $7.50.
McFee, William. Sunlight in New Granada. Doubleday, Page. $3.50.
Smith, Lowell H., and Others. The First World Flight. Houghton Mifflin. $6.

International Relations Section

White Terror in Liberal Chile

By ARNOLD ROLLER

[The New York Times for October 2 reports that President Alessandri of Chile has once more resigned, following a dispute with Colonel Ibanez, Minister of War, in which the latter refused to resign when requested to do so by the President. Colonel Ibanez was the leader of the group which recalled Alessandri to the presidency in January, 1925. A presidential election, in which the leading candidate is Senor Emiliano Larrain, will be held on October 24.]

IF any further proof were needed of the apathy with which people in these United States regard affairs in South America, it might be found in the almost unanimous indifference toward recent events in Chile. Two miltary coups d'etat within five months, involving the eclipse of the patrician class until then in the ascendancy, the exile and triumphal return of a president, and the promulgation of a new body of laws and civil guaranties—these were only the beginning. There followed what has been catalogued by the press as a "Bolshevik revolt," embellished with seizures of factories, red and white flags, and a fabled leader wearing a "Russian uniform." The revolt reduced to prose turns out to have been only a strike in the nitrate fields, undertaken rashly under the aegis of the brand-new laws and liberties. But its suppression was genuine enough.

In the elections four years ago the middle-class elements in Chile, with the support of the workers, wrested the presidency for the first time in Chilean history from the clerical conservative patrician families. This aristocratic bloc had considered officialdom as its private domain, necessary to the maintenance of its special privileges. Arturo Alessandri came into power on a tide of grandiose promises. He did nothing. Obstructionist tactics, he explained, were responsible for his inactivity. But the reactionaries were restive under the new regime notwithstanding that its accomplishments were negligible. The mass of Chileans lost interest in the great change. A carefully planned coup by army and navy officers thus succeeded easily in recapturing power for the old reactionaries in September of last year. Alessandri was handled politely but given to understand that he ought to "see the world."

The hasty dismissal of middle-class job-holders in the Government and the repression of labor, however, quickly crystallized an opposition. The younger elements in the army, drawn from the rising bourgeoisie, the young intellectuals, the anti-clerical Masons joined forces, and in January overthrew the dictatorship. A civil war seemed imminent. But the working-class elements, which had watched the changes with apparent indifference, now stepped in. The Chilean Federation of Labor, the Communist Party, and others came out in support of the latest regime. The reactionaries, apparently persuaded by this gesture that they were quite alone, abandoned the struggle. The liberal government promised large reforms to the working class in appreciation for its support at a critical moment. The Chilean middle class had thus taken control, and the ancient rule of the landed aristocracy seemed definitely ended. Remembering how the masses had permitted the first Alessandri government to be ousted, the new government lost no time in trying to convince the people of the sincerity of its promises. A vast number of social and labor reforms were decreed into existence. Some of them were modeled on the labor laws of Soviet Russia, others on the labor legislation of Mexico. The right to organize, to strike, to enjoy complete civil liberty was declared and guaranteed.

All liberal and radical elements, including the Communists, formed a "united social republican front." Alessandri was summoned home and was received like a conquistador. However, he had spent a large portion of his exile in Italy, where he seemed to have fallen under the influence of Mussolini. When the question of a new constitution arose he insisted on a "presidential" system similar to that in the United States as against the "parliamentary" system of France and England. He would not, as promised, call a constituent assembly. Instead, he offered a hand-made constitution for ratification as a whole by popular vote.

It was soon after the return of the President and the announcement of the new labor and social reforms that disquieting news began to come from the nitrate fields, the northern provinces of Tarapaca and Antofagasta. There were hints of revolt, factory occupations, soviets. A dispatch through Lima seemed detailed enough: "The Coruna plant was one of the first occupied by the Reds. A soviet was established. . . . The Reds' leader, a man named Garrido, who was later killed, wore a uniform resembling a Russian costume, with a white hat and a red sash." And so on. But no labor papers crossed the border. They had, in fact, been suppressed. Not until later was it possible to reconstruct the tragedy.

The nitrate plants are all in the desert. The workers live in special camps erected by the company, which supplies them with food and water. The camps are policed by private guards, drawing their salaries from the company. The complexion of the local governments, the police, and the judiciary in these districts is similar to that of North American company towns.

When the news of Alessandri's reforms penetrated, the workers tried to organize. They asked for more sanitary dwellings and more decent wages. But the petty local tyrants took no cognizance of the legislation in the capital. As a matter of long-established routine they proceeded to break up meetings and drive out union organizers. Those who were suspected of sympathy with union ideas were summarily dismissed—twenty workers in one plant, thirty in another. Gendarmes invaded the homes of active unionists, and did not spare the women and children in clubbing the household into submission. Early in June this situation resulted in a strike in one plant. The others quickly took it up. The authorities immediately prohibited the publication of the three Communist dailies and the one anarcho-syndicalist weekly in the northern provinces. The printing plant and offices of the Communist daily El Despertar in Iquique were completely wrecked. Company guards led by a plant manager raided the office of the Chilean Federation of Labor in Coruna. In the latter place the workers defended their building and in the struggle two of the guards were killed, several of the workers were wounded. At this point the local authorities acting under orders from the plant management wired to Santiago that the workers had armed themselves, taken possession of the plants, and established "soviets." The occupation of the plants was probably a euphemism for the "strike on the job" declared in one of the plants. The Alessandri regime at once declared a state of siege, and a warship was sent from Valparaiso. Artillery and machine-guns were landed. In two days the revolt was officially reported "crushed." The victorious general reported to Alessandri that he "had to use artillery and bombard the encampment of the soldiers, because they had destroyed houses and factories; and when, after the first bombardment the workers raised the white flag and the troops approached, then the workers again defiantly raised the red flag, whereupon the artillery had to recommence the bombardment from close distance." He reported with pride that the leader in the Russian uniform was killed. The workers fled, he continued, carrying many of the wounded with them, but fifty-nine dead were found on the field of battle and many wounded, of whom several soon died. The local press in the Peruvian papers reported 400 to 500 killed. And the victory was cheap, not a single soldier was killed or wounded. A commission, appointed by the trade unions in the capital, sent to the spot a few weeks later, reported 2,000 dead, mostly women and children.

From the general's report, as well as conservative press reports, it appears that the bombardment was directed against the camps, and not against the plants. It is specifically stated that not one plant was damaged in the bombardment. The "occupation" of the plants was therefore on the face of it a piece of fiction useful in declaring a state of siege.

The liberal President officially congratulated the general on his expeditious work, explaining that he "regrets that perverse and misguided elements, crazed by hate and will to destruction, poison the healthy soul of the people with impossible utopias. . . ." The liberal Minister of War cabled the heroic general: "I regret the misfortune of so many citizens, because no doubt a great number of them were innocent . . ." but . . . "I hope you will continue in your salutary work by applying the extreme punishment to those responsible for the revolt."

On the strength of the revolt in the northern provinces, stringent action has been taken against all suspected radicals everywhere. Already a most timely bomb has exploded in a southern mine, although no one was hurt. Warnings against the "red terror" are being sounded by the reactionary press, giving justification for wholesale arrests and deportations.

The foreign owners of the nitrate plants, it may be presumed, have watched this situation very closely. At any rate President Alessandri gave, at the time of the "revolt," an interview to the United Press about Chile's need for foreign capital. He explained that the labor laws were no obstacle. They were really intended to prevent conflicts between capital and labor, "but if they should prove detrimental in some way to the natural development of industry, the Government will have to find immediately the necessary remedies."

And the central committee of the right-wing moderate liberal Radical Party declared candidly in a public statement that the "extreme measures applied in the nitrate fields must be ascribed not so much to the necessity of repressing a subversive element as to the necessity of submitting to the requirements of foreign capitalists."

The Tacna-Arica Plebiscite

By AMY WOODS

[Recent telegraphic dispatches have reported the withdrawal of the Peruvian Boundary Delegation from the Commission headed by General Pershing to settle the Tacna-Arica frontier dispute. The Peruvian delegation allege attacks on their members and other extreme measures used by Chileans to intimidate Peru and influence the result of the coming plebiscite, and demand guaranties from Chile that the plebiscite will be carried on without any attempt to coerce or prejudice voters.]

"WAR Clouds are Gathering between Chile and Peru" according to the widespread advertisement of the Literary Digest of September 12. How many of us in the United States know any of the facts which form the basis of such rumors and the significance to every citizen of the United States if such a war comes about?

A small item in an inconspicuous corner of a large daily paper states that a certain person was killed in Arica, the center of the plebiscite region, and it is thought that it may be the work of a Peruvian sympathizer (italics are mine) but little or nothing of the real situation in the Tacna-Arica plebiscite area has seeped through to the American public.

A young Englishman in charge of large manufacturing interests in Peru writes from Callao, the post of Lima:

> They are now straining every nerve to raise funds for the plebiscite over Tacna and Arica. Many of the wealthy citizens have given huge sums of money; one alone the other day gave $12,000. The Government has to pay for transporting the people to Arica and back in order to vote, so it will be a very costly undertaking. Nobody seems to care to venture an opinion as to how things will go, but if it does go against Peru there will be a noise and plenty of fun here.

Something of what is happening in the provinces of Tacna and Arica can be gathered from the cable which Sarah Wambaugh sent to her father, long a member of the Harvard law school. Miss Wambaugh, author of a "Monograph on Plebiscites," has been retained as an expert adviser by the Peruvian Government and is now in Arica as a member of the Peruvian delegation. On August 7 Miss Wambaugh and Miss Maggie Conroy of Lima, who is acting as her interpreter, landed in Arica and while walking through the town were followed constantly by police. Upon their return to the official Peruvian ship two women of Arica with whom they had talked were arrested by the Chilean police on the charge of having conversed too freely with the Peruvian delegates. Miss Wambaugh attempted to send the following cable to her father asking him to make it public:

> Tell newspapers spies follow us everywhere. Peruvian inhabitants terrorized dare not speak to us. Two women jailed for speaking. Military control absolute. Chilean governor today decrees no inhabitant can go from town to country or contrariwise without special police permit which must be shown at every picket post, and they can travel only by designated roads controlled by carabineers. If Chilean troops not evacuated, Arica will be grave of Monroe Doctrine. Note Chilean censor refuses to pass this so am relaying via Lima.

STATEMENT OF THE OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT, CIRCULATION, ETC., REQUIRED BY THE ACT OF CONGRESS OF AUGUST 24, 1912, OF

The Nation

Published weekly, Wednesday, at New York, N. Y., for October 1, 1925.

State of New York, } ss.:
County of New York. }

Before me, a Notary Public in and for the State and county aforesaid, personally appeared Oswald Garrison Villard, who, having been duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he is the editor and publisher of The Nation and that the following is, to the best of his knowledge and belief, a true statement of the ownership, management (and if a daily paper, the circulation), etc., of the aforesaid publication for the date shown in the above caption, required by the Act of August 24, 1912, embodied in section 411, Postal Laws and Regulations, printed on the reverse of this form, to wit:

1. That the names and addresses of the publisher, editor, managing editor, and business managers are:

Publisher—Oswald Garrison Villard,
20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

Editor—Oswald Garrison Villard.
20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

Managing Editor—Freda Kirchwey,
20 Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.

Business Managers—None.

2. That the owner is: (If owned by a coporation, its name and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding one per cent or more of total amount of stock. If not owned by a corporation, the names and addresses of the individual owners must be given. If owned by a firm, company, or other unincorporated concern, its name and address, as well as those of each individual member, must be given.)

The Nation, Inc., 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

Katherine S. Dreier, Central Park West, New York City.

Agnes Brown Leach, 160 East 64th Street, New York City.

Ellen McMurtrie, 1104 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mary McMurtrie, 1104 Spruce Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Maria C. Scattergood, 355 Bourse Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

R. L. Selene, 334 California Street, San Francisco, Cal.

Fanny Garrison Villard, 525 Park Avenue, New York City.

Oswald Garrison Villard, 20 Vesey Street, New York City.

Edward S. Waters, 52 William Street, New York City.

Maurice Wertheim, 44 Pine Street, New York City.

3. That the known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 per cent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages, or other securities are: (If there are none, so state.)

None.

4. That the two paragraphs next above, giving the names of the owners, stockholders, and security holders, if any, contain not only the list of stockholders and security holders as they appear upon the books of the company but also, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, is given; also that the said two paragraphs contain statements embracing affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner; and this affiant has no reason to believe that any other person, association, or corporation has any interest direct or indirect in the said stock, bonds, or other securities than as so stated by him.

5. That the average number of copies of each issue of this publication sold or distributed, through the mails or otherwise, to paid subscribers during the six months preceding the date shown above is ——. (This information is required from daily publications only.)

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 16th day of September, 1925.

[Seal] MARY E. O'BRIEN.

(My commission expires March 30, 1926.)

Wisdom Is Not So Rare

One of the satisfactions of life is to look back upon something done in the past, some bit of foresight, which now is a source of comfort. Perhaps it was a single provision against the future which has provided where all else failed.

That there is, whatever doubting philosophers may think about it, a good deal of forward-looking in all walks of life, is indicated by the records of this company, which show 28,000,000 Prudential life insurance policies in force.

If true wisdom be in foreseeing, wisdom is not rare. The millions who are Prudential policyholders have it.

THE PRUDENTIAL
INSURANCE COMPANY of AMERICA

EDWARD D. DUFFIELD
President

Home Office
NEWARK
NEW JERSEY

The All American Cable Company an hour later returned the message by the Chilean censor stating that it was impossible to transmit the message because of its contents. It later reached the United States by wireless from a Peruvian steamer to an inland Peruvian city and thence to Lima. The Peruvian Ministry of Foreign Affairs considered this message as personal and unofficial and admitted that it was beyond its power to give any facilities or assurance to independent investigators who might wish to enter the province of Arica to survey conditions. The Peruvian delegation forwarded a memorandum to General Pershing, chairman of the Plebiscite Commission, that they would bring up the question of Chilean police action against the free movement of citizens in the province.

A letter from a leading woman in Lima says:

> This cable and the article in the West Coast Leader upon it are the best possible criticisms of the Coolidge award as a practical and fair settlement of our problem. I hope that appeal has had in your country the publicity it deserves, but the indifference shown the Tacna-Arica question up to the present by the press of the United States, and its thorough lack of realization that the future of Uncle Sam's relations with Latin America is as much or more at stake there than in the exchange of amenities between Secretary Kellogg and the President of Mexico, makes me doubt it. As far as I can see the situation is getting very difficult in Arica for the Chileans and Americans.

This is probably a near-analysis of the political emergency in Chile as well as Peru, if the United Press covers the whole situation. The following cable was published in a Peruvian paper of August 14:

> Santiago, Chile, August 14. This morning President Alessandri of Chile reviewed the Telegraph Battalion and afterward attended a luncheon at which he made a speech as follows: "Though Chile has occupied the provinces of Tacna and Arica for thirty years Peru has continued to utter pained and complaining words imputing to us deeds and crimes we have never committed. Peru is from day to day straining our patience and will oblige us suddenly to give up the peaceful intentions of which we have given proof on many occasions. Perhaps the hostile attitude of Peru may oblige us to adopt a course contrary to the government's way of thinking in order to repress the unusual temperament which Peru has exhibited." Alessandri was noisily applauded on finishing his speech. Rising once more he very solemnly uttered the following: "The President who now speaks to you can assure you that the last revolutionary labor movements in the north zone of the republic are the products of the corrupting influence of Peruvian gold and influence. . . ."

Alessandri has a tremendous internal problem on his hands to reconcile the army, which is the old aristocracy, with the growing strength of the proletariat. He was, undoubtedly, playing for popular support. The Chilean people are not particularly interested in the Tacna-Arica question, except to get it out of the way. When I was in Santiago last spring they quite frankly said so. They knew that whatever decision was rendered by the arbitrator could not affect them economically or nationally. Their interest lay in the great rise of the labor- and middle-class groups which have become self-conscious and were at that time forcing the return of Alessandri, despite the political manipulations of both the army and navy and the families which they represent.

Chilean companies have grown rich upon the nitrate

The Child, The Parent and the World They Live In

THE FIRST PARENTS' CONFERENCE on the study and bringing up of children will be held at the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, New York City, October 26-28.

Among the speakers are: Dr. Beatrice Hinkle, psychologist and author of "The Re-creating of the Individual"; Dorothy Canfield Fisher, lecturer, novelist and student of children; Dr. Miriam Van Waters, whose "Youth in Conflict" has caused such a stir; William T. Russell, teacher of teachers and dean of Teachers' College, New York City; Mrs. Helen T. Woolley, assistant director of the Merrill-Palmer School, Detroit; and Dr. Frankwood E. Williams, Medical Director, National Committee for Mental Hygiene.

For details, write to the Child Study Association of America, Inc., 54 West 74th Street, New York City, under whose auspices it is being held.

Announcement

Chairmen of Entertainment Committees:

BEFORE MAKING FINAL ARRANGEMENTS FOR YOUR SOCIAL AFFAIR, DINNER, DANCE, SMOKER, OR SUPPER DANCE, SEE OUR BANQUET AND BALL ROOMS. CHARGES NOT HIGHER THAN ELSEWHERE.

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

THEODORE KEMM, Managing Owner

GRAMERCY 4900 TO 4907

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

of the province of Tarapaca, which was wrested from Peru by the War of the Pacific, and they control Bolivia's exports by holding the port of Antofagasta. These interests are not involved in the plebiscite. Arica has value only as the terminus of the railroad covering the shortest distance from the capital of Bolivia, La Paz, to the coast. The rest of the plebiscite area is practically of no commercial significance.

It is not to be wondered at that the citizens of the United States see no connection between their personal or even national interests and the possibility of war between Chile and Peru, over this old entanglement of interests. But every nation of South and Central America and of Europe, too, is watching our foreign policy today. With our President as arbitrator and our commander-in-chief of the armed forces during the World War as chairman of the Plebiscite Commission, every citizen of the United States, in the eyes of other nationals, will be held responsible for the outcome of the Tacna and Arica decision.

Contributors to This Issue

RUSSELL T. HERRICK is telegraph editor of the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

GENEVIEVE TAGGARD has written two volumes of verse: "For Eager Lovers" and "From a Hawaiian Hill-top," and edited the Masses anthology, "May Days."

JAMES RORTY won The Nation's poetry prize in 1921.

LOLA RIDGE is the author of "Ghetto" and "Sun-Up."

RAMSAY MACDONALD was the first Labor prime minister of England.

SCOTT NEARING is an economist and teacher, author of "The American Empire."

JAMES DALY is a poet living in Chicago.

WILSON MIDGLEY is American correspondent for the London Daily News.

ROBERT DELL is The Nation's correspondent in Paris.

ARNOLD ROLLER is associated with the Russian Telegraph Agency in New York.

AMY WOODS has recently returned from South America.

EDWIN MUIR is a critic and essayist. He is writing a series on modern British authors for The Nation.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN is the author of "Up Stream." His new book on Palestine appears this fall.

RAYMOND HOLDEN is connected with the Raymond and Whitcomb travel bureau.

J. A. HOBSON is the author of "Gold, Prices, and Wages."

H. L. MENCKEN is editor of the American Mercury and a contributing editor of The Nation.

HENRY W. NEVINSON is bringing out a new volume of essays, "New Changes, New Chances."

M. T. MCCLURE is professor of philosophy at Illinois University.

HAROLD J. LASKI, formerly of the Harvard faculty, is on the teaching staff of the London School of Econon

W. B. CAIRNS is associate professor of American literature at the University of Wisconsin.

RUTH S. ALEXANDER is a writer living in Cape Town.

SAMUEL C. CHEW is professor of English at Bryn Mawr.

STUART CHASE is an economist in the Labor Bureau, and the author of a new book, "Work and Waste."

CHARLES J. FINGER has been editor of Reedy's Mirror and All's Well. He wrote "Highwaymen" and other books.

RICHARD SPECHT is a music critic in Vienna, author of books on Mahler, Strauss, and Korngold.

:: Where to Buy Books ::

BRENTANO BUILDING

Brentano's

New Store
No. 1 West 47th Street

A cordial invitation extended to inspect our new premises.

Art Books in All Languages
CATALOGUES SENT
Old Maps and Flower Prints
E. WEYHE
704 LEXINGTON AVENUE NEW YORK

BOOKS in Foreign Languages at reduced prices
B. WESTERMANN CO., Inc.
13 West 46th Street New York

A Bookshop Brought to You
Wherever you are, we offer intelligent, individualized service. Specialize [illegible] a specialty. Books sent anywhere postfree. Write for our 142 Book Notes.
THE POST-BOX BOOK SERVICE
25 West 42nd Street, New York

"WE MODERNS"
by Edwin Muir with a [illegible] introduction by
H. L. Mencken First Edition
Published at $2.00, our special price $1.00, postpaid.
[illegible] other books.
STECHERT, National Book Sellers.

W. BEYER, Inc., now in new quarters at 259 Fifth Ave. (28th-29th) offer from their large and representative stock of German Books
the following choice items:

"Goethe," by Friedrich Gundolf,

"Der Zauberberg,"

"Meister der Politik,"

"Beitraege zu einer Kritik der Sprache," by Fritz Mauth-

"Gestaltwandel der Goetter," $8.50

"Meyers Lexikon," d up-to-date. o far, $7.50 each.

Ask for German catalogue.

The Offer of the Season

[TWO MONTHLIES AND A WEEKLY!
THE IDEAL MAGAZINE ASSORTMENT]

The New Republic
The Atlantic Monthly
The American Mercury

All three for one year

$10.00

Or either monthly with
The New Republic for $7.50

BUY these magazines over the counter and you spend $18.60. Send back the strip below and you save $8.60. The offer is temporary: it will be withdrawn shortly; act promptly.

Subscriptions may start now or at the expiration of current subscriptions. They may be sent to the same or to different addresses. This offer is invalid through agents. It is subject to immediate withdrawal.

REPUBLIC

I enclose $10.00 in acceptance of your offer of one year's subscription to each of the following magazines: The New Republic, The Atlantic Monthly, The American Mercury; or, I enclose $7.50 for one year's subscription to The New Republic and ☐ The Atlantic Monthly or ☐ The American Mercury.

Name .....

Address .....

In full .....

James Joyce*

By EDWIN MUIR

NO other novelist who has written in English has had a greater mastery than Mr. Joyce of language as an instrument of literary expression, and no one else, probably, has striven so consciously to attain it. "Dubliners" was an ideal apprentice piece for an artist; in it Mr. Joyce set himself to describe accurately the things he saw, attempting at the beginning what most writers achieve toward the end. "The Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man" marked a further stage. That book was as much a recreation of language as a record of experience. The marvelous dialogue which appeared first in it was not like the transcriptions of ordinary talk in "Dubliners"; it was a second language which was used consciously to vary and complete the lingual pattern of the work. That pattern of speech seemed complete in itself, a thing of different nature from, but as real as, the events and experiences, many of them sordid, which it described. There were thus two values in the novel, separate, yet necessary to each other: the value of language and that of life, the value of art and that of experience. To Mr. Joyce the first of these is pure, the second mixed. Art must descend into life, the word must seek out all it can and enter into it; yet, having entered into it, it returns and remains pure in the consciousness of the artist. Life cannot soil it, but only a disobedience of its own laws.

In "The Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man" Mr. Joyce acquired the mastery of language, the knowledge of and reverence for its mysteries, which prepared him for "Ulysses." He learned, too, for the second time, the strict realism which, because it demands perfect exactitude in the rendering, is valuable as a discipline, makes an intensive demand on the artist's powers of expression, and, by putting a strain on them, enhances them. In embracing this realism he discarded the facile sensibility of his time, which was occupied only with the secondary phenomena of consciousness—with the psychological effect of the object rather than the object, with distinctions rather than with things—and which in that preoccupation while seizing the shadow lost the substance. "The Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man" not only left Mr. Joyce with a greater command over English than any other novelist had possessed; it was as well a sort of self-inoculation against a sensibility grown burdensome. Without either of these, "Ulysses" could never have been written. For in "Ulysses" the dual values of "The Portrait," the values of life and art, of reality and imagination, are developed side by side until each attains its maximum of expression, and the discrepancy between them issues in a form of humor which through its intellectual profundity becomes universal. It is a humor not of fashion, nor of character, but of the processes of life, those processes which create history and produce religions and civilizations while leaving the great part of the human race, the average sensual man outside us and within us, spiritually unchanged and apparently spiritually unchangeable. It sets the dreams of religion, the magic of language, the splendors of the intellect, the revolutions of history, over against the simple facts: the naivete of physical desire, the functions of the body, the triviality of the floating thoughts the body sends up into our minds. A theme so tremendous could only be expressed in great tragedy or great comedy, could only in one of these two ways be lifted into a plane where it no longer overwhelms us, and where, having passed through it, we are freed from its worst oppression. Had Mr. Joyce not inoculated himself against sensibility by an overdose of realism, he could never have attained this emancipating comic vision of the entire modern world. Had he not been so sensitive that he suffered monstrously from his sensibility his comedy would have had no driving power behind it. One feels again and again in "Ulysses" that the uproariousness of the farce, the recklessness of the blasphemy is wildest where the suffering of the artist has been most intense. A writer whose sufferings were so great and so conscious needed a more elaborate technique than most writers do, as much to put a distance between himself and his sufferings as to express them.

"Dubliners" and "The Portrait" were a necessary preparation, an apprenticeship strengthening the artist against life. They were exercises working out a part of Mr. Joyce's problem; but in "Ulysses" the whole problem is faced and to the extent of Mr. Joyce's present powers resolved. That problem must needs have been the problem of all the things from which he suffered, for the sincere artist is distinguished from the rest by the fact that his essential concern is with the things which make him suffer, the things, in other words, which stand between him and freedom. There is thus a necessary and an organic relation between him and his work, to create being, as Ibsen said, an act of emancipation. But when, as in "Ulysses," the creation is encyclopedic, when it attempts to gain freedom not from one but all the bonds, all the suffering, of the artist's soul, the impulse from which it started becomes a part of the autobiography of the book as well as of the writer. What Mr. Joyce suffered from in writing "Ulysses" was obviously in its completeness the life he had known; our modern world in all its intellectual manifestations as well as its full banality: in its beliefs, its hopes, its charities, its reverences; its religion, patriotism, humanitarianism, science, literature, politics; its illusions as well as its realities. How could the full volume of all those burdensome hopes, theories, sensibilities, banalities, cruelties, meannesses, sensualities be rendered in a work of art? Obviously not in a story, an action having a beginning, a development, a climax, and an end, but rather in a record of the most obvious unit of time in which all these could manifest themselves, in that unit of time which begins with something recalling birth and ends in something resembling death: in a day. "Ulysses" is a complete course, a set banquet, of the modern consciousness. And being that, no other unit could have served; the author could not have got into the record of a year what he has got into the record of a day.

* This is the first of a series of articles by Mr. Muir dealing with [illegible] and T. S. Eliot.

But this banquet of the modern consciousness was to be a comic summing up as well as a banquet; it was to be not only abundant but so burdensomely, absurdly abundant that all the courses would be made to appear ridiculous, as Rabelais made the courses of the medieval banquet ridiculous. And as Mr. Joyce's encyclopedic plan justified the time unit of his chronicle, so his comic intention justified the minuteness of his portrayal, his huge accumulation of imaginative material. His humor is on one side, like that of Rabelais, a piling up of one burden on the mind after another until the breaking-point is reached—the breaking-point of laughter. It operates by oppressing us consciously with all the things which oppress us unconsciously, and by exaggerating all this until it seems ridiculous that we should bear it, or more exactly that it should exist at all. A sense of this or that anomaly in social relations, the sense which finds expression in polite comedy, is far too light to shift this immense weight. To do that comedy must include as many factors as the greatest tragedy; it must embrace not only man but all that he believes in, the whole anthropomorphic cosmos. But even when the absurdities of the spirit are piled up in this way they are still not in the realm of universal comedy; the last touch is still wanting. That is given by a running contrast between the vast symbols invented by man and his simple earthy reactions, between the extravagance of belief and the simplicity of fact, the decency of civilized life and the unseemliness of instinct. That was the mainspring of Rabelais's humor, and it is also that of Mr. Joyce's. The more absurd and minute the description of physiological reactions the greater obviously the effect. On the one hand an infinite vastness, on the other an infinitesimal smallness; the intellectual dreams and spiritual struggles of Stephen Dedalus in the one balance, the vagaries of Leopold Bloom's instincts in the other; around us the vast phantoms our minds have created, and within us the utilitarian functions of our bodies. And as the intellectual shapes which man has conceived to be first a release and then a burden are exaggerated, so his physical idiosyncrasies, his trifling thoughts, are refined upon. There is in Mr. Joyce's obscenity, as in that of Rabelais, an intellectual quality, as if in searching the recondite secrets of the natural processes of the body he were trying to penetrate to an unconscious humor of the cells, of those elementary principles of life which have built up not only the body but all this phantasmal structure which we call thought, religion, and civilization. His emphasis on the unseemly, on what, in other words, we have surpassed, depend upon, and wish to forget, is, at any rate, a necessary element in this kind of humor and an essential part of the plan of "Ulysses." It is perverse—that is to say, intellectualized deliberately; but so it had to be to achieve its purpose.

The vision of the world whose mainspring is in this radical sense of contrast is one which, if it did not issue in humor, would be nightmare. In "Ulysses" it does not always issue in humor. The brothel scene is horrible partly because it is a misshapen birth, because, conceived as a grand example of the humor of horror, it attains, through its failure, an atmosphere of horror which, because it is unintentional, is strictly monstrous and incapable of being resolved either into art or into human experience. It is a work of genius; it is more astonishing than anything else Mr. Joyce has written; but it has the portentous appearance of something torn from the womb of imagination, not the completeness of something born of it. We derive from it a vivid notion of the monstrous suffering through which the artist is passing; but here he has not passed through it; and we suffer equally as participators in the horrors of a raw experience and as spectators of a heroic but unavailing attempt to escape from it and set it in the realm of freedom and of art. Had Mr. Joyce succeeded with this gigantic scene he would have produced something supreme in literature and not merely something supremely astounding and terrifying. It was obviously designed to be the climax of the work; in it the last resources of the theme were to be brought on the stage; the unconscious desires which up to now had been allowed only a chance or oblique expression were to come nakedly to the surface and attain freedom. They do not attain freedom. The brothel scene is not a release of all the oppressions and inhibitions of life in our time; it is rather a gigantic attempt to attain release.

But if we grant this crucial failure in the book and a number of minor failures, there remains more comedy in the grand style than has appeared in our literature since the Elizabethan age. The last chapter is an acknowledged masterpiece, but there are others only less admirable. The pub scene produces, by an openly mechanical technique, Mr. Joyce's sense of contrast between an ordinary happening in all its banality and richness and the fantastic and etiolated symbols which the desires of men and the conventions of literature discover for it. Here it is the obviousness of the means, the mechanical ease with which the simple event assumes conventional or lofty forms in the fancy, that is at the root of the humor. We seem to see the illusions at their normal work. The banal fact and the fantastic interpretations are both present before our eyes, are both obvious and credible, the one arising spontaneously from the other, and are both ridiculous. The scene in the hospital, which has been so much criticized, is still more remarkable. There we see the figure of Mr. Bloom passing, as it were, through a comic pageant of the English spirit. In his progression he assumes a sort of absurd universality; he is a man "of Israel's folk . . . that on earth wandering far had fared"; he is "childe Leopold" and "sir Leopold that had for his cognisance the flower of quiet," and "Master Calmer," and "Leop. Bloom of Crawford's journal sitting snug with a covey of wags," and "Mr. L. Bloom (Pubb. Canv.)." He is a type, and a succession of types through history, and a multiplication of types in space; one person in himself and many persons in time and in the minds of men. In this scene Mr. Joyce's comic imagination is at its height; it raises Mr. Bloom into a legendary figure and gives him history and the world for his stage. But in doing that it fulfils once more the requirements of Mr. Joyce's humor, for to squat Mr. Bloom on the center of that stage was to attain a comic vision of the world and of history.

What is it that through this use of contrast, this breaking of our resistances by accumulation, Mr. Joyce tries to set in the plane of low comedy? First of all, professional seriousness of all kinds; and secondly, the objects about which people are serious in this way: religion, to which the comic reaction is blasphemy; patriotism, to which it is little less; literature, to which it is parody; the claims of science, to which it is an application of anti-climax; sex, to which it is obscenity. When comedy attempts to become universal it has perforce to include blasphemy and obscenity, for these are the two poles of this comedy, just as the soul and the body are the two poles of human existence. To see religion with the eyes of comedy is not, of course, to laugh it out of existence, any more than to see sex comically is to destroy it. All that comedy can destroy is strictly the second-rate, everything that is not in its mode the best, everything less genuine than the genuine—a class of thoughts and emotions which makes up the preponderating part of the experience of most people and of all ages, and is a permanent burden which at times may become unbearable. Books such as "Ulysses" and "Gargantua" can be written only out of an almost insupportable feeling of oppression; for humor on this scale the sense of oppression is needed as a driving power. The load of oppression which Rabelais cleared away we can see now clearly enough; it is more difficult to realize, although it is easy to feel, what it is that oppresses in our age a creative writer like Mr. Joyce. But when the reverences of any time are taken very seriously and not very intensely, when a belief in enlightenment, progress, and humanity becomes habitual and men act and think with a fearful eye on it and on the most mediocre of its priests, it has already become as injurious to the creative impulse as the strictest obscurantism could be. It is a weight of second-rate sentiment and thought, and the time comes when the only thing to be done is to clear it away.

To destroy so completely, as Mr. Joyce does in "Ulysses," is to make a new start. Or more exactly, the new start must have been made before the destruction began, for the new thing destroys only that it may have room to grow in freedom. But what is new in this sense in "Ulysses" it is too early yet to attempt to say. There are flashes, for instance, of a peculiar kind of humor less like Rabelais than Shakespeare, a humor full of intellect and wit, as when Mr. Joyce makes one of the prostitutes in the brothel scene say: "It was a working plumber was my ruination when I was pure." This is a humor of half-serious play, intellectual through and through but without intellectual purpose. It seeks out analogies or contrasts which are so remote that they seem almost irrelevant, and which yet in their apparent irrelevancy are more universal than any more obvious analogy or contrast could be. But the most remarkable mark of originative genius in "Ulysses" is a certain immediacy not only of vision but of attitude. It is as if Mr. Joyce had resolved to discard the aesthetic sense of the last three centuries and in discarding that to return to the aesthetic consciousness in itself, an aesthetic consciousness which should not be selective, as the more it is developed and refined it tends to become, but should include everything. There are failures in this truly heroic attempt, but there are also magnificent successes. "Ulysses" gives one a lively notion of how difficult it is for a great work of art to be born and after inconceivable hazards to come to completion in our day; but it shows also, what is still more important, that this achievement is not impossible.

Can an Artist Live in America?*

By LUDWIG LEWISOHN

NO one, so far as I know, has defined the terms of our question. For if the definition were clear and if we agreed as, I suppose, we should, that we mean: Can an American artist be productive in America? then it would become obvious to any reflective mind that the question is superfluous. There are other possible interpretations: Can an artist make a living in America? Can he be happy and free in America? To such questions various answers are possible. To the essential question: Can an American artist be productive in America? there is but one answer: Nowhere else.

I do not mean that the American artist should not go abroad or live abroad for a space of time. A well-stored American mind may be extraordinarily enriched by such experiences. It may, indeed, from the vantage-point of these fresh and fascinating perspectives come to see its American material in new and more concentrated and more plastic form. But I have no patience with the silliness of the professional artistic "expatriate" with his theory that you—an abstract you evidently—can work in Paris and not in Philadelphia, and have masterpieces happen to you in Cordova which would have remained unwritten in Connecticut.

Europe is delicious; Europe is adorable. Even that phosphorescence of decay which today is often the only spiritual light it has to offer is not unpleasing to the natural morbidezza of the artist's temper. And spring comes, spring with more song-birds than an American ear has ever heard, and you stroll through long avenues of blossoming chestnuts to an upland meadow. On the hill-edge of the meadow is a garden, with chairs and tables and country wine. And your European friends talk art and philosophy with a richness and grace that comes of long, inherited, easy familiarity with the things of the mind. Money isn't, thank heaven, involved. Your European friends haven't any and are not interested in it. The wine and bread cost a few pennies. Of course, one loves it. Of course, one thinks of the American spring alternative: crowded hotels, poisonously vulgar and expensive road-houses; at best, a grimy backyard in Greenwich Village and a little surreptitious synthetic Chianti. Of course . . .

Only, for us, this is diversion not life, rest and not art. It is rational enough to wish to have been born and to have lived here, even though at this moment of time Europe is artistically almost unproductive. But art needs the stuff of life; you cannot create out of nothing. And this is not our life, this is not our material. We can never learn it. No one can create out of a life that he has to perceive consciously. In this matter all must be instinct or must, at least, have become instinct. It does not matter whether you contemplate a lyric or an epic. Life and landscape strained through language have soaked into your marrow in one country only. I know the German language as well as most Germans. It does not matter. I know life here only from without and with my mind. I know American life with physical antennae, with the tips of my fingers; I know it through little tones and odors; I know its inarticulate meanings. I see man in that landscape, against that sky, with those sounds on his lips.

* This is the sixth of a series of articles by American writers of the first rank, answering in the light of their personal experience the question: Can a literary artist live and function freely in the United States? Articles by Willa Cather and Floyd Dell will follow. Mary Austin, Theodore Dreiser, Sherwood Anderson, Zona Gale, and Edgar Lee Masters have hitherto contributed.

I shall, no doubt, be reminded of Shelley and of Browning in Italy and of Henry James in England. But both Shelley and Browning worked within a tradition and convention, the Italianate classicizing renaissance tradition which they themselves did much to exhaust and which has long been finally spent. They both instinctively, and prior to expression, translated their material into the symbolic terms of that great tradition in which they lived and moved. To attempt to write in that tradition today is to become quite hollow, to be feebly decorative at best. One can imagine Mr. Cale Young Rice permanently abroad, but neither Mr. Robinson nor Mr. Frost; Mr. Robert Chambers, like the late Marion Crawford, could weave his tales anywhere; Mr. Dreiser settled at Alt-Aussee or Mr. Anderson ensconced on the hills of Capri would be neither happy, productive, nor at home. The case of Henry James is immensely, as he would have said, to the point. His work at its best is exquisite. But it is, after all, only exquisite. A fatal Alexandrianism is its mark. Byron, another expatriate, took through the Continent the "pageant of his bleeding heart." Henry James dragged about Europe the spectacle of a faint distaste, a fastidiousness without energy.

It has all happened before. Longfellow went abroad in one generation, went during his own formative period, and came back writing like Uhland at his feeblest; in a far later generation Henry Harland went to Paris with the result that the stories in "Grey Roses" are, after all, not so good as Daudet even at his most sweetish moments. I forget neither Mr. Pound nor Mr. T. S. Eliot. Nor do I question their talent. But Mr. Pound rewrites a minor Latin poet and Mr. Eliot produces macaronic verses.

The very youngest generation of expatriates whose work appears in Broom and Secession and S4N all belong to the eternal Alexandrians. It is their aim, to quote a young friend of mine, to get away "from the realistically convincing and true to life" and to stress "the more rhetorical properties of letters." They play with letters as an earlier simpler generation played with elaborate acrostics. It is a delightful game for the player. Its connection with literature is slight. It has been in all ages the refuge of those who have more taste than talent, more cleverness than creative vitality. And, by a pathetic irony, that most advanced Europe for which, presumably, these young rhetoricians write persists in reading Whitman and Sinclair Lewis. For Europe naturally has a good memory. It remembers the Greek rhetors who played with certain properties of letters so very long ago; it remembers the acrostics; it knows the DaDa was half a sign of exhaustion and half sheer blague. Both Werfel and Duhamel are terribly, agonizedly concerned with life. Even expressionism is dead in Europe. In brief, this whole question of the artist in America has been raised primarily by youths who, in their innocence, are striving after a moment in the literary history of Europe which Europe itself has almost forgotten.

I shall be committing no indiscretion if I report how [illegible] told me in Vienna the other day that it was time for him to go home and refresh within him the feeling of American life, nor if I repeat the story of how Miss Millay, intensely charmed by the freedom and variety of existence in Europe, suddenly declared that, for creative purposes, life didn't "smell right"; and hurried home. The authentic artist in letters has no ultimate choice. The landscape, language, life of his country are his material, his work, the body of his creative self.

This is not to say that it is easy for the artist to live in America. Nor does it apply to the practitioners of all the arts. The musician cannot, for instance, exist without Europe. He cannot master his technique at home; he cannot ally himself with the fundamental traditions and moods of his art. But the comparative and immediate universality of his medium gives him an initial freedom. The writer who can attain universality only at the price of an original home-rootedness must make the best of his given environment. He must, in America, through the activity of a rational opposition, liberate his soul from the heavy pressure of the fundamentalists, the rabid moralists, the stupid censors. He must try to take a long view and possess his soul in peace. It is possible to live a decent and moral artistic life even in America. It may take more courage than it is always comfortable to exercise. The artist can be consoled by the reflection that his conflict today may ease some better man's tomorrow. Of course, if he is a mere littérateur and wants midnight cafés and endless conversation and cénacles and movements, he will feel lonely and dispirited in America. The artist, though he may like and relish all these things at times, is utterly independent of them. The great European writers live as quiet and withdrawn a life as their American colleagues. They are the reverse of gregarious. I can imagine no better place for high creative activity than a New England village or one in the lake country of southern Wisconsin. The artist could not be happy in the lynching belt, but neither could he be in Poland or Hungary. "Even in a palace life may be well lived." Even in a Cincinnati flat poetry may be well written. The prospect from a Venetian window will be richer and lovelier. But the plumbing will be dreadful. And I am not so sure whether in the long run and to an American artist the plumbing is not as important as the prospect. Our spirits are housed in bodies and our bodies are dependent on time and place and circumstance. All artists everywhere should visit the countries of their dreams. But they must live at home.

All That by Any Feat of Light

By RAYMOND HOLDEN

All that by any feat of light appears
Is now upon his eyes. The circle of sound
Converges at his ears, and on the ground
His footfall lays its tangents without fears.
He, that without the sheaving cord of her,
Loose and unpropped, went with the different airs,
Now stands erect and ripeningly wears
The shift of those that broke him with their stir.
And no one, no one, not with any word
Knows how to gather into breath the name
Of that which she has worked, who purely heard
The rustle of his scattered straws that came Across a hiatus [illegible]
Held them and lent her life to keep them corded.

Books

First Glance

M. AURELIEN DIGEON permitted his study of "The Novels of Fielding" (Dutton: $4.50) to be translated into English in the hope, he says, that the book "might persuade a few more of his [Fielding's] countrymen to turn again to one of the greatest writers ever produced by their race." For "although one cannot say that he is neglected by English readers today, he does not seem to enjoy his full share of glory." M. Digeon, I venture to say, is mistaken upon this not too important point. Fielding may still be missing his full share of glory, since that is very great; but he is so far from being neglected, at least in the United States, that I doubt if any old novel is read as often now as "Tom Jones" is, or universally ranked so high. Several recent editions testify to a renewed demand for Fielding's masterpiece, and it has not been so long since Professor Wilbur Cross's most copious and panegyrical "History of Henry Fielding" stated for once and all the claims of the novelist upon this generation. So that M. Digeon's study of the four famous novels, if it did no more than call attention to their existence and their excellence, would be superfluous—interesting enough, of course, as a tribute from France, and welcome enough as a sign that Fielding's vogue abroad, always considerable, had not died; but hardly calling for translation into the language out of which it had drawn its substance.

M. Digeon, however, has a few new things to say, and he has a new way of saying them. Fielding has seldom or never been subjected to subtle analysis and delicate appreciation by a critic of his own race. Perhaps because he is so clear and satisfactory a writer, perhaps because he has been so hugely and obviously a success, he has been paid for the most part with common coin. Englishmen and Americans without number have indicated their helplessness before "Tom Jones," and this is high praise; few have taken the trouble to trace the history of its author's genius through all the books in which it manifested itself. Professor Cross by his very amplitude produced a biography which had many of the qualities of Fielding himself; yet the scale upon which he worked prevented him, it would seem, from saying the last, the subtlest word upon many a point. Professor Cross must remain for a long time the standard critic as well as the standard biographer of Fielding. M. Digeon, however, must also be remembered as one who added a valuable chapter upon the precise nature of Fielding's temperament, upon the fine truth of his art. With remarkable penetration he has written the separate history of this artist's advance through "Joseph Andrews," "Jonathan Wild," "Tom Jones," and "Amelia," pointing out parallelisms and discovering interrelations by the way. He has actually found something fresh to say about the rival careers of Fielding and Richardson. No one, not even Professor Cross, has surpassed him in understanding and love of Parson Adams. And he has made a distinct contribution to his subject in those scattered paragraphs which trace the precipitation of Fielding's moral ingredient. The parodist who wrote "Joseph Andrews," the ironist who wrote "Jonathan Wild," the moralist who wrote "Tom Jones"—these, mingling with the Bow Street justice, became the moralizer who wrote "Amelia." "Thus bit by bit the magistrate in him was killing the artist." Thus the humanitarian whose magistracy, according to Mrs. Dorothy George, "marks a turning-point in the social history of London" ceases to be the prose Homer whose narratives determine the whole history of an art.

Professor Cross's "Life and Times of Laurence Sterne," regrettably out of print for several years, now reaches a new edition in two handsome volumes roughly uniform with the three volumes of the "Fielding" (Yale University Press: $7). In addition to many minor changes in the text there are a number of hitherto unpublished letters, including all of those contained in Sterne's "letter-book." No new edition could have been more welcome.

MARK VAN DOREN

The British Parliamentary Scene

The Public Life. By J. A. Spender. F. A. Stokes Company. Two volumes. $10.

NO formal study of the theory of the English constitution, or of the recent political history of the country, will be half so useful to American students of English politics as these two volumes. For many years the editor and chief political writer of the most influential liberal daily in London, the Westminster Gazette, Mr. Spender had unequaled access to the governing mind in the Liberal Party, and himself played a considerable part in molding the opinion and policy of governments. Close personal acquaintance with many of the leading figures in the political scene for some forty years has given him that inside view and warm appreciation of personalities so essential to the interpretation of political history in any country.

His chief theme is the House of Commons, the center of legislative and executive government, the great arena of debate and education in British methods of political conduct. After briefly tracing the streams of politics which from the early eighteenth century onward converged upon the House of Commons and made it the supreme authority, he illustrates the life of Parliament by a series of skilful portraits of the great parliamentarians of the nineteenth century, bringing the gallery up to date by personal appreciations of the party leaders of our time. We thus see parliamentary government as an organism drawing sustenance from hidden sources in established usages and public sentiments and adapting itself with greater ease than could be expected to the needs of new times. Mr. Spender is at his best when assessing the qualities and defects of Parliament men.

Punch bears out his shrewd remark that "the British people seem even to like slightly ridiculous qualities in their heroes"—something that lends itself to caricature. There is more importance than at first appears in his observation: "It is an ingrained habit of the British people to regard their politicians as 'sportsmen' and to apply the sporting code to a large part of their abilities." High intellectual integrity and nice scrupulosity are out of place in the game of politics. Deportment plays a great part in determining success or failure. But Mr. Spender has a great opinion of the working honesty and efficiency of the parliamentary system. There is plenty of loose logic in his methods and procedure. British statesmen seldom or never attempt to work out abstract principles or long-time [illegible] success in the game. For though Mr. Spender professes great veneration for the House, and imputes a high level of public spirit to most of its leaders, he leaves us with the feeling that except in rare moments of national emergency the scene is one of a great game. For the majority of members of the House politics is certainly not a science, or an expert profession, or a spiritual calling. If expert knowledge is required for the use of Parliament, it must be provided from outside. Common sense, a certain clarity of intelligence and speech, and general experience in the handling of affairs are sufficient for the intellectual equipment even of a great parliamentary leader. A Gladstone, a Morley, or a Balfour may possess a higher brand of intellectualism, but if they apply it to politics, at any rate in the House of Commons, they are likely to go wrong. So, too, with high ideals and enthusiasms: they are out of keeping with the gray atmosphere of the place.

To many readers the most informing part of Mr. Spender's book is his discussion of the relations between politicians and the press, and the part played by the latter in the formation of public opinion. He notes the growing commercialism and sensationalism of the general press of the country as a distinct peril to political education, but consoles his readers with the reflection that "the British people have something in them which resists all the experiments of the writing tribe." This "something" gave to the Liberals the sweeping victory of 1906, with almost the entire press against them. The Labor Party has made its recent great advances with very little newspaper backing. But his account of the rapid recent development of the art of press propaganda in Britain and elsewhere leaves us with an uneasy feeling that a press which gave "what the public wants" is everywhere giving place to one which gives "what the public can be made to think it wants"—something different and much more dangerous.

Mr. Spender is frankly disconcerted by the appearance of the Labor Party. Parliament, as he sees it, can only be properly conducted on two-party lines. A third party, if it has come to stay, is extremely inconvenient, inviting weak and short governments, awkward "arrangements," and possibly a "bloc" system such as prevails upon the Continent. So long, however, as three effective parties exist Mr. Spender sees Liberalism as the golden mean between a reactionary or unprogressive Toryism and a revolutionary Laborism. Here one approaches the limitations of our guide. In his discussions of the economics and the ethics of government he fails to appreciate the necessity of the rise of the third party, by reason of certain deep inherent and permanent defects of English liberalism. The theme is too large for adequate discussion here. But the failure of the Liberal Party and its governments throughout its period of prosperity and power even to approach, much less to solve, the vitally important problems gathered under the caption The Condition of the People convinced the dawning intelligence of the working classes that they could not expect to get from liberalism the substance of the Liberty and Equality for which it professed to stand. Mr. Spender is himself no belated adherent of the old Manchesterism, is not tied up to narrow laissez-faire individualism, and is even ready for considerable experiments in the relations between capital and labor as regards distribution of income and control of industry. But I do not think he adequately realizes either the intricate ramifications of economic injustice or the difficulties of getting voluntarily from the master classes an adequate surrender of that personal power which is prized more highly even than the property with which it is so closely linked and through which it is so strongly exercised. But, then, neither do I think that foreign policy, and the safety of civilization which hinges thereon, can be safely trusted in the future, any more than in the past, to statesmen such as those who made and consolidated the Triple Entente, trapped the British nation unwittingly into the Great War, and contrived a peace so thickly sown with the seeds of folly, hatred, and misery as to overtax the wisdom of our new generation of statesmen in their efforts to escape its consequences. But these differences of opinion with Mr. Spender do very little to abate my admiration for the profundity of knowledge, force of understanding, and firmness of judgment which distinguish every chapter of his admirable treatise.

J. A. Hobson

Yazoo's Favorite

An Old-Fashioned Senator: A Story-Biography of John Sharp Williams. By Harris Dickson. Frederick A. Stokes Company. $2.

SOME months ago, essaying a literary survey of the Republic, I animadverted sadly upon the dreadful barrenness of the great State of Mississippi. Speaking as a magazine editor, I said that I had never heard of a printable manuscript coming out of it. Speaking as a frequenter of the Athenian grove, I said that I had never heard of it hatching an idea.

Instantly there was an uproar from Iuka to Pascagoula. The vernacular press had at me with appalling yells; there were demands from the Ku Klux that I come down to Jackson and say it again; Kiwanis joined the Baptist Young People's Society in denouncing me as one debauched by Russian gold. Worse, the indigenous intelligentsia had at me, too. Emerging heroically from the crypts and spring-houses where they were fugitive from Rotary, they bawled me out as ignorant and infamous. Had I never heard, they demanded, of Harris Dickson, the Mississippi Balzac? Had I never heard of John Sharp Williams, the Mississippi Gladstone?

I had, but remained unmoved. I continue unmoved after reading Balzac's tome on Gladstone. It is, in its small way, a tragic book. Here, obviously, is the best that Mississippi can do, in theme and treatment—and it is such puerile, blowsy stuff that reviewing it realistically would be too cruel. Here the premier literary artist of Mississippi devotes himself con amore to the life and times of the premier Mississippi statesman—and the result is a volume so maudlin and nonsensical that it would disgrace a schoolboy. The book is simply mush—and out of the mush there emerges only a third-rate politician, professionally bucolic and as hollow as a jug.

Yet this Williams, during his long years in Congress, passed in Washington as an intellectual. Cloak-room and bar-room gossip credited him with a profound education and very subtle parts. Such ideas, when they prevail in Washington, perhaps need and deserve no investigation; the same astute correspondents who propagated this one now couple Dr. Coolidge with Aristotle and Pericles. But maybe there was some logic in it, after all; Williams, at some time in the past, had been to Heidelberg and knew more or less German and French. That accomplishment, in a Southern politician, was sufficient to set the capital by the ears. So the Williams legend grew, and toward the end it rose to the dignity of a myth, like that of Dr. Taft's eminence as a constitutional lawyer. Even the learned hero's daily speeches on Teutonic mythology during the war did not drag him out of Valhalla himself. The press gallery gaped and huzzahed.

But the Heidelberg chapter in Mr. Dickson's book leaves the myth rather sick. It starts off, indeed, with a disconcerting couplet:

> In Germany 'twas very clear
> [illegible] the rapery for beer.

And what follows is distressingly silent about cultural accretions. Young Williams's main business at Heidelberg, it appears, was putting the abominable Prussian Junker in their place. They naturally assumed that their American fellow-student could be thrown about with impunity. Encountering him on the sidewalk, they tried, in the manner made historic by the Creel Press Bureau, to shove him off. Presently one of these fiends in human form came melodramatically to grief. Williams challenged him, and, "according to Prussian ethics," named the weapons—pistols. A shock, indeed! The monster expected sabers, at which he was diabolically expert, but Williams didn't "intend to go home with his face all slashed, and have folks jeer at him for getting his jaw cut on a beer glass." Facing cold lead, the Prussian was so scared that he

NOTABLE FALL BOOKS

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN CO.

Life and Letters of JOHN BURROUGHS
Clara Barrus

A splendid and realistic portrait done in the Boswellian manner by the physician and confidante of the great naturalist, and made up largely of extracts from his journals. Illustrated, 2 volumes, boxed. Ready in October. $12.50

The Tale of GENJI
Lady Murasaki

"I find Murasaki's narrative persistently reminding me of Fielding's 'Tom Jones,' with music by Debussy. . . . The story is vigorously alive. Its petals drift on eternal flesh and blood. . . . It reads like the wind."—Witter Bynner in the New York Herald Tribune. $3.00

ANDREW BRIDE OF PARIS
Henry Sydnor Harrison

How a brilliant and disillusioned young American went to Paris to live forever—and what happened then. $2.00

SOAMES GREEN
Margaret Rivers Larminie

British critics are calling this delightful story "the nearest approach to Jane Austen that we have today." $2.00

A FOUNTAIN SEALED
Anne Douglas Sedgwick

"As clean cut and sensitive a piece of work as its author has ever done."—Boston Transcript. Uniform with "The Little French Girl." $2.50

JOHN KEATS
Amy Lowell

"It is a notable biography and it is to this rather than to any other that the lover of Keats will turn."—"Æ" (George W. Russell) in the Irish Statesman. "Criticism as refreshing in its rightness as it is titanic in its proportions."—Mark Van Doren in the New York Herald Tribune. Lavishly illustrated, fifth large printing, 2 volumes, boxed. $12.50

Ready October 23

Washington's Diaries

It is with particular pleasure that we announce for publication in October under the auspices of the Mount Vernon Ladies Association the first complete issue of the Diaries of George Washington, giving an illuminating and authentic portrait of the Father of his Country, in his own words. Edited by John C. Fitzpatrick. Frontispiece, 4 volumes, boxed. $25.00

Ready November 6

Jefferson and Hamilton
Claude G. Bowers

The author of "Party Battles of the Jackson Period" vividly describes the memorable ten years' struggle between Jefferson and Hamilton to determine whether or not this should be a Democratic Republic.

Illustrated. $5.00

If you are interested in books and the men and women who write them, we invite you to know and read this coupon.

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY
2 Park Street, Boston, Mass.

Please send me, without charge, The Bookman, a periodical devoted to books and book makers, including the special autumn and Christmas issues.

Name . . . . . .

Address . . . . . .

Released for PUBLICATION
Oscar King Davis

Written with extraordinary frankness, giving new and unconventional glimpses of such men as Roosevelt, Taft, Beveridge, Borah, La Follette, Hiram Johnson, and Hughes, this book is of absorbing interest as well as of rare historical value. Illustrated. $5.00

Formative Period of the FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM
W. P. G. Harding

Eight years a member and six years Governor of the Board, Mr. Harding is able to write with authority the financial history of the United States from 1914 to 1922. Illustrated. $4.50

CITIES OF MANY MEN
H. C. Chatfield-Taylor

Brilliant and delightful portraits of people in the public eye and of life in general during the last half century in London, Paris, New York, and Chicago. Illustrated. $5.00

HERBS AND APPLES
Helen Hooven Santmyer

A story of life in Ohio, told with a beautiful realism and passionate intensity. $2.50

THE GREAT PACIFIC WAR
Hector C. Bywater

A full and graphic account of the American-Japanese conflict of 1931-33 written by the author of "Sea-Power in the Pacific" after prolonged study and investigation. $2.50

WHAT'S O'CLOCK
Amy Lowell

"Poetry forever alive with the lawlessness of fancy and the instinct of beauty. . . . A glittering sheaf of lovely things that you will read and read, and put aside to take up and read again."—Boston Transcript. "Sublimes cue in beauty, . . . unerring instinct for the word, the phrase, the line."—New York Times. $2.25 fired prematurely. Worse, he so lost his wits that he addressed his antagonist as "Freiherr Williams." That antagonist fired into a snowbank. Some time later, having got all that was worth while out of Heidelberg, "he came sailing home full even then of his ultimate intention: he'd go in for politics, he'd become a professional politician."

A professional politician he remained for thirty years, always in office, first in the House and then in the Senate. His start was slow—he practiced law for a time—but once he was on the payroll he stayed there until old age was upon him. For a number of years he was Democratic leader in the House; twice he got the party vote for the Speakership. In the Senate he was technically in the ranks, but on great occasions he stepped forward. His specialties, toward the end, were the divine inspiration of Woodrow Wilson, the incomparable valor of the American soldier, the crimes of the Kaiser, the superiority of the Anglo-Saxon, the godlike bellicosity of the Confederate gentry, and the nature and functions of a gentleman. On these themes he discoursed almost every afternoon. The boys in the press gallery liked him, and he got plenty of space. Always his rodomontades brought forth dark hints about his esoteric learning, and the news that, next after Henry Cabot Lodge, he was the most cultivated man in the Senate.

Mr. Dickson prints extracts from some of his speeches. Criticism, obviously, is an art not yet in practice in Mississippi, even among the literati. I used to read him in the Congressional Record; he was really not so bad as Dickson makes him out. His career, seen in retrospect, seems to have been mainly a vacuum. Once or twice he showed a certain fine dignity, strange in a Southern politician. He opposed the Prohibition frenzy. He voted against the bonus. But usually, despite his constant talk of independence, he ran with the party pack. For years a professional Jeffersonian, he brought his career to a climax by giving lyrical support to the Emperor Woodrow, who heaved the Jeffersonian heritage into the ash-can. During the La Follette uproar he was one of the most vociferous of the witch-burners. He passed out in silence, regretted for his rustic charm, but not much missed.

I commend "An Old-Fashioned Senator" to all persons who are interested in the struggle of the South to throw off its cobwebs. Both as document and as work of art the book makes it very plain why Mississippi's place in that struggle is in the last rank.

H. L. MENCKEN

"Ramsay Mac"

Wanderings and Excursions. By J. Ramsay MacDonald. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

YOU should have seen what a dinner we enjoyed in honor of "Ramsay Mac" on the night of May 22! When I say we, I mean that some two hundred of us went at the invitation of T. P. O'Connor, the redoubtable journalist and Irish patriot, Father of the House of Commons, and when I say dinner, I do not refer to the food but to the quality of the guests. Leaders of all three political parties were there, and a crowd of men who take no interest in party politics at all—dramatists like James Barrie, actors like Arthur Bourchier, novelists like Jerome K. Jerome, poets like Binyon, economists like F. W. Hirst, and heaven knows what others! Such a gathering was proof of two remarkable facts at least: first, that in this country an honest man can always hope to overcome unpopularity, in matters of opinion and sincerity, that Ramsay MacDonald possesses the power of exciting wide sympathy and affection.

If that number of guests had been invited for such an occasion ten years ago, or even five years ago, hardly a dozen would have come. The rest would have written to plead other engagements, or would have asked T. P. O'Connor if he meant to insult them by inviting them to meet such a man—a man who had denounced the war, was a mere pacifist, and therefore no better than a traitor. But now it was all roses, roses, all cheers and rapture, all trying in vain to sing "He's a jolly good fellow"—a stupid doggerel that modest Englishmen always try to sing while pretending they are not singing; which indeed calls for no pretense. And in the second place, the character of the assembly, so representative of all that is distinguished in English life, proved that our ex-Prime Minister is no mere politician bound to the formulae of his party but a man of fine nature, wide interests, and sweetly reasonable intellect.

The same is proved by this little book—a book so different from anything that any previous Prime Minister could have written. Here we are shown a man whose most genuine delight is in the solitudes of wild nature, or in passing unobserved among strange peoples. I might almost say that so long as the nature or the peoples are utterly different from the politicians of London and from the regions of London society he is entirely happy. Last autumn I passed with him through north and midland England, and far away into South Wales. Even then I observed his delight in beautiful and uninhabited nature wherever we came through it. But we were in a motor, and afoot is for him the right way of going; and we were on a vast political campaign, and to shake off all thought of politics is his delight.

In the first part of these fascinating essays are collected short glimpses of walks or visits to his own native mountains, streams, and people. One immediately perceives the Scotsman's devotion to his own land, so small, so varied, and so lovable. With shameless adaptation of Walter Scott I said of MacDonald the other day: "His heart's in the Highlands avoiding the deer." Every line of these descriptive essays shows I was right in fixing what some in your country would perhaps denominate the "location" of his heart. Most of us children of the mountains are like that. We seem to be bodily present at work in London or Birmingham or some other hell-hole where busy manufacturers have made a wilderness and called it wealth. But we are really far away among our mountains and, in the words of a greater poet, "we hear lake water lapping with low sounds by the shore."

Ramsay MacDonald writes with almost (not quite) equal enjoyment of English scenes through which he has passed afoot, especially of England's historic castles and scenes of splendid or terrible memories. Walking somewhere near Banbury not far from Oxford, he met the owner of an ancient castle who invited him to breakfast. The name is not mentioned, but I think it must have been Compton Ricketts, the family home of the Lords of Northampton. He writes:

> Then we went through its myriad passages and stairways. This is the England of romance. The stairways are worn by the feet of many generations. Here kings slept, in this cupboard fugitives hid, at this altar men whose memories will live forever received sacrament. In a great barn-like room at the top a whole regiment slept before Edge Hill, and to a small isolated chamber approached by a secret stairway came John Hampden, John Pym, Sir Harry Vane, Warwick, and Essex, to lay their plans. We walked away out of fairyland into peace—into the memories of England's past among the obscured pathways into the villages, the churches, the inns.

Yes, that is England, and it pleases me to think that I too was in a sense present at that council in the Civil War. For John Hampden was my mother's great (I don't know how many greats) grandfather. But "our Ramsay Mac" does not limit himself to his own country or to mine. I suppose he has traveled further than any other prime minister on record, though Disraeli in his youth learned much about Palestine and the Near East. MacDonald, so far as I remember, is the first to have visited India and to have studied the problems of that

Charles Scribner's Sons Announce —

HIGHLAND ANNALS
By Olive Tilford Dargan

Here, from the pine-scented uplands of North Carolina, is one of the most delightful books of years. Mrs. Dargan is known as a poet of distinguished achievement—this book will place her among the first writers of American fiction. $2.00

SAMUEL DRUMMOND
By Thomas Boyd

"The course of the life of a farmer in northwest Ohio, with whom all goes well until he is drawn into the Civil War. Warm, rich, and beautiful; recommended to everybody."—The New Yorker. $2.00

AND THEY LIVED HAPPILY EVER AFTER!
By Meredith Nicholson

The ancient phrase, which is usually linked with the stat... "and so they were married," has ironic intent as the title of Mr. Nicholson's new novel, which begins at the point where most ... leave off. In swift, direct, graphic narrative he presents a slashing ...

THE LOST GOSPEL By Arthur Train

Suppose a fifth Gospel were found, one in which the recorder ... Christ at length? What would result? These questions seized upon Arthur Train and gave him no rest until he had written this story.

The Unique Book for Boys and Girls

THE FLYING CARPET
Edited by Cynthia Asquith

J. M. Barrie, Thomas Hardy, A. A. ... distinguished contributors to this notable book. It is beautifully illustrated. These are original contributions, done especially for The Flying ...

BEYOND HATRED
By ...

LETTERS TO A LADY IN THE COUNTRY
Edited by Stuart P. Sherman

THE WRITING OF FICTION
By Ed...

Forthcoming Books

CONFESSIONS OF A REFORMER
By ...

A WILD-ANIMAL ROUND-UP
By ...

THE DRIFTING COWBOY
By Will Ja...

THE SENATE AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS By Henry Cabot Lodge

This intensely interesting and important record of Senator Lodge's work in the Senate during the second Wilson administration begins with the Mexican situation. It discusses the attitude of the President and of the country at the beginning of the Great War, the inside story of the Lusitania notes, and the famous alleged postscript, the entrance of the United States into the war, and finally the many controversies between the President and the Senate over the ratification of the Peace Treaty. Published October 16th. $4.00

NOTES AND ANECDOTES OF MANY YEARS
By Joseph Bucklin Bishop

... Edwin L. Godkin, Theodore Roosevelt, and many others, with much pith as well as wit and fun. $2.50

BUSINESS POWER THROUGH PSYCHOLOGY By Edgar James ...

Every large aspect of business is examined in the bright light of ... able information. $3.00

WEST OF THE PACIFIC
By Ellsworth Huntington

SOCIAL CLASSES IN POST-WAR EUROPE
By Lothrop Stoddard

... political and historical significance. $2.00

FROM IMMIGRANT TO INVENTOR
By Michael Pupin

... Dyke's New Romance

HALF TOLD TALES By Henry ...

... $4.00

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS, FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK

great semi-continent on the spot. Very few of our statesmen have taken that trouble. Curzon was, of course, an exception, and so was Montagu. But though John Morley always hoped to be Secretary for India, he never went there, and his actions when he actually became Secretary were often marred by his ignorance. MacDonald's book on India, though small, is still a guide to Indian affairs.

Besides, he has visited Egypt, Greece, Turkey, and the Caucasus, that glorious region inhabited by the noble Georgian race, now suffering under Russian Soviet tyranny much as I saw them suffering under the Russian Czar's tyranny nearly twenty years ago. His sense is as keenly alive to the charm of history as to nature. In writing of Constantinople three years ago he says:

> There are places—sometimes great cities like Rome, sometimes only buildings like the Tower of London or the castles of Edinburgh and Stirling—into which time and event have breathed the breath of life and they have become as living souls. We think of them as brooding over their past and looking upon the generation around them with the detachment of one whose thoughts are fixed elsewhere, or with the pity of one who endures in the midst of a world that is fussing, fuming, and passing into a shadow.

The man who can think and write like that can never become the ordinary dull politician or economist. It is, I think, that reserve of passionate sensibility, thought, and knowledge that gives him his influence over his opponents, and even over his followers and most intimate enemies—a far more difficult influence to maintain. The concluding chapters of the book deal with politics more directly. They are A Letter to a Young Liberal, A Letter to a Communist, and notes on Jean Jaurès and Keir Hardy. If one seeks knowledge of Ramsay MacDonald's own political position and the difficulties that surround and threaten it, chiefly owing to his very knowledge and sweet reasonableness, one may find it in those chapters.

HENRY W. NEVINSON

A Modern Heracleitus

Experience and Nature. By John Dewey. Chicago: Open Court Publishing Company. $3.

HERACLEITUS was called the Dark, the Obscure, the Profound. His sayings were thought to be obscure, remarks Mr. Santayana, only because they were so disconcertingly penetrating. After all, to be profound often means no more than being simple and naive, provided, of course, one is simple and naive enough.

The readers of Mr. Dewey almost always complain that he is difficult to understand. The reason is that they fail to grasp the profound simplicity, the utter naivete of the man. Those who find their way into philosophy through the elaborate technique of epistemological analysis, or through the rigorous analysis of mathematics and physical science are too sophisticated to understand him. They expect to find in him more of the same kind of thing. But his philosophy is not the perpetuation of a tradition, it is not the further refinement of inherited doctrines, it does not move within the limits of customary distinctions and conceptions. Like Francis Bacon's, his philosophy is not a renovation but an innovation.

The key to the understanding of Mr. Dewey lies in the grasping of a fundamental distinction, a distinction that runs through all of his writings and which gives point to his penetrating criticisms of historical philosophy and sets the context for his original conclusions. There is an essential difference between the realm of being and having and acting on the one hand and the realm of interpretation and knowing on the other. There is much within experience that is of no cognitive significance and is entirely devoid of intellectual character. Anyone may distinguish between the act of picking up a glass of water and drinking it when one is thirsty and the act of reflecting upon water when the aim is to determine its properties. The former act is primarily concerned with the action and moves in the realm of being; the latter is essentially a matter of reflection and moves in the realm of knowing. The life of reason is secondary to the life of action. Water exists primarily to be drunk, not to be thought about. Man is essentially a creature of action and only secondarily a creature of reflection. Reflection emerges in the course of man's struggle to gain control over his environment. So long as things adequately serve our purposes we use them rather than think about them. It is only when their uses are insufficient and when their possession is precarious that they become objects of thought. That is to say, things are possessed before they are thought. Experience is primarily an affair of being and having, of suffering and enjoying, of loving and hating, of desiring and seeking. Not in thought but in action, not in inference but in immediacy lies the substance of experience, while interpretation and cognition are its derivatives and secondary forms. The immediate data of experience are not ideas but the things we do and the things we have done to us. Reflection, which is a relatively late stage in experience, supervenes in order that the things we have may be had in a more secure and enduring form.

In the previous writings of Mr. Dewey this separation of our knowing experience from our having and enjoying experience has been developed largely on the side of its implications for a theory of logic. The outstanding feature of the present book is the systematic development of the implications of the distinction for a theory of nature and metaphysics.

The metaphysical aspects of experience may be described from the standpoint of either of the terms in this distinction; that is, from the standpoint of the direct and immediate qualities of experience when taken on the level of action or from the standpoint of reflection when things are taken in the context of analysis. Now, which of these two approaches yields a more penetrating insight into the character of existence and nature? Do we discover more about the ultimate character of reality through intellectual analysis or through pointing to those aspects of nature and life which portray themselves on the level of prereflective experience?

Traditional metaphysics has almost without exception arrived at its conclusions through the indirect method of reflection. What things are has been an inference guided by logic. The dialectical movement of thought has been carried over and made the basis for an interpretation of the processes of nature. And since inference and interpretation have been thought to be the elementary and universal forms of all experience, the result has been to identify metaphysics with logic and consequently to deduce a theory of reality from a theory of thought.

Now, the naivete of Professor Dewey, the naivete that is so confusing to those readers who have been trained to trust the method of idealistic logic, is his simple acceptance of the stirrings and perturbations of immediate and non-reflective experience as directly existential and truly metaphysical. The entire book may be said to be an analysis of the metaphysical implications of [illegible]. It is based on the firm belief that the aspects of immediate having and direct enjoying are a lucid revelation of the ultimate character of reality. He attempts to tell us what things are when taken on the level of action. Life as immediately lived is in part stable and in part precarious, it has its consummations and its finalities as well as its frustrations and its anticipations. These qualities of experience are inwrought into the very structure of nature.

So much, then, is clear. Since there is a fundamental distinction between being and knowing, we can hardly expect to encounter being in the realm of knowing. Since metaphysics is an affair of existence, if we want to know what existence is

First Installment of
A NEW UNNAMED WORK
BY JAMES JOYCE

with number one of "1601"

MARK TWAIN'S DARING
SUPPRESSED MASTERPIECE
Given to the Reading Public for the first time with number two of

TWO WORLDS

A Literary Quarterly devoted to the Increase of the Gaiety of Nations

EDITED BY SAMUEL ROTH

Contributing Editors

Arthur Symons Ezra Pound Ford Madox Hueffer

LIMITED TO 450 SUBSCRIBERS	Every copy is beautifully printed, bound and boxed.	THREE DOLLARS A COPY TEN DOLLARS A YEAR

CONTENTS OF NUMBER ONE

Out Now

LIFE AND LETTERS
A NEW UNNAMED WORK (First Installment) — James Joyce
A PARABLE OF TIME — Louis Zukofsky
LES DEMOISELLES DE BIENFILATRE
Translated by Arthur Symons from the French of — Villiers de l'Isle Adam SONGS FOR THE ENTERTAINMENT OF MY LADY JOAN — Francis Page
OUTLAWS OF LIFE: A Play — Arthur Symons
PROLOGUE — David Zorn
THE MILK OF HEAVENLY KINDNESS (A novel concerning the upper regions) — Samuel Roth

¶ TWO WORLDS offers with every issue, complete, a novel, a play, a short story, and verse, when good sound verse is to be obtained;

¶ TWO WORLDS appears promptly on the 15th of every September, December, March and June;

¶ To maintain independence in the choice of its material TWO WORLDS limits itself to 450 subscriptions which are executed by express;

¶ TWO WORLDS can only be had by subscription, which is $3 for one issue, $10 for a year of four issues.

¶ AS THIS ADVERTISEMENT GOES TO PRESS THERE REMAIN ONLY ONE HUNDRED AND SEVEN SUBSCRIPTIONS WHICH CAN BEGIN WITH NUMBER ONE. NEEDLESS TO ADD, THOSE WHOSE SUBSCRIPTIONS COME IN FIRST WILL BE GIVEN PREFERENCE;

¶ The existence of 107 copies of the first number should interest those who have been paying bootleg prices for it.

The whole world has heard about this grotesquely charming, Rabelaisian study in Social Conversation at the Fireside in the Time of Queen Elizabeth—probably the most remarkable sketch of its kind in the whole range of American Literature. "Print it, Mark. You have never done a greater piece of work than that," advised David Gray, but, hemmed in by the obscene puritanism of his time, poor Mark saw the manuscript wander from hand to hand unpublished, unheeded. Its final publication against all opposition is a literary triumph. The complete novel for this issue of TWO WORLDS is White Streams by David Zorn—a sensitive account of the awakening of a boy.

TWO WORLDS will also publish in later issues two novels translated for the first time into English from the works of Giovanni Boccaccio.

CONTENTS OF NUMBER TWO

Out Dec. 15th

LIFE AND LETTERS
"1601" — Mark Twain
OURSELVES ARE GREAT — Waverly Root
MORE SONGS FOR LADY JOAN — Francis Page
HELEN LOOKS AT THE MOON (A Play) — Arthur Symons
A NEW UNNAMED WORK (2nd Installment) — James Joyce
TALES OF A CRUEL COUNTRY: Lumpy — Samuel Roth
WHITE STREAMS — David Zorn

You may order 1 number or 4, enclosing $3 or $10. Every number will be precious to the Collector.

TWO WORLDS PUBLISHING COMPANY (Suite 405-8)
500 Fifth Avenue, New York City

Gentlemen: I enclose $..... for which enroll me as a subscriber for ..... subscriptions of TWO WORLDS, beginning with No.

Name .....
Street .....
City .....

we must face existence where it is. But a traditional difficulty arises. Is not experience a personal and subjective affair, and how will an analysis of experience reveal anything of importance about the nature of external reality? Do we not need a dialectic to enable us to pass from experience to nature, just as the idealistic logic required an epistemological technique to bridge the gap between thought and reality? According to Mr. Dewey, there is no difficulty here at all. Nature and experience are continuous. Non-reflective experience is an extension and projection of nature into the realm of man. Sensation is a natural event. Sense data, therefore, are not subjective modifications of consciousness, discontinuous with the outer world of physical reality; they are transparent objects in the natural world. And so, too, our emotions, by overflowing and suffusing inanimate existence, inextricably bind natural objects to human experience; and thus, by making aesthetic objects truly existential, not only is nature embraced by experience but [illegible] this that constitutes the naivete of Mr. Dewey. And it is for [illegible] reason that anthropology and aesthetics afford a more instructive approach to metaphysics than mathematics and physical science. But nature also generates intelligence. It does not follow, however, that man as a reflective being comprehends nature and finds his place therein. The function of intelligence is not to contemplate nature, nor, as has so often been done, to contemplate, in moments of exceptional dialectical lucidity, those ideal projections which express nothing but the illusion of the eternal and the final. Intelligence is not an end in itself; its function is to guide experience, to make the nature in man more secure, more stable, more like ourselves, more worth the having.

But all of this is not to naturalize man; it is to humanize nature. It is just this warm sympathy, even with objects inanimate, that makes Mr. Dewey the kindliest and most humane of living philosophers.

M. T. McClure

Two Nations

Germany. By G. P. Gooch. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.
Ireland. By Stephen Gwynn. Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.

HISTORY such as these volumes represent is one of the great peace-making factors in the modern world. They are not only well-balanced and judicial; they do in a real sense explain the spiritual ethos we call nationality. Their scope is wide; and the forces they attempt to assess are not often brought upon the same plane of discussion. But the more widely they are read the more chance there is of this old and feverish Europe becoming not only conscious of its common interests but able to plan for the realization of those common interests in the form of institutions.

Of the two volumes before us, good as Mr. Gwynn's is, Mr. Gooch's is by far the more remarkable; indeed, it is not too much to say that there is no other living scholar who could have written it. It has all Mr. Gooch's width of learning, his passionate toleration, and his power to see events as the embodiment of ideas. No other volume on post-war Germany is likely to give the reader so fair or so full an insight into the forces at work there. If it has a fault, it is that Mr. Gooch's generosity of temper sometimes tempts him into excessive eulogy. It is very difficult for a sober scholar to take Rudolf Steiner seriously. If he had eloquence, he belonged to the school which mistakes great platitudes for institutions in operation. So, too, with Keyserling. Five or six years from now I believe that the uncritical enthusiasm which has been lavished upon his "Diary" will be ashamed of itself; and it will emerge that the value of the book lies less in its own qualities than in the index it provides to the fevered mind of the Germany which greeted it. I could, indeed, venture to wish that the pages given to these eloquent but windy philosophers had been devoted to a fuller expo-

Recent Books from Putnams

SAMUEL PEPYS
A Portrait in Miniature
By J. LUCAS-DUBRETON
[illegible] $2.50

PETER THE CZAR
By KLABUND

The story of the primitive, [illegible] his wild, mad career to the night of his death. An extraordinarily powerful, moving novel. The translation from [illegible] $2.00

ARGONAUTS OF THE SOUTH
CAPTAIN FRANK HURLEY
Here is a story of experiences in the Antarctic, written by the official photographer for Sir Ernest Shackleton and Sir Douglas Mawson on their famous expeditions. This book [illegible] the thrills of perilous exploration. Illustrated with beautiful and unusual photographs. $5.00

ENCHANTERS OF MEN
By ETHEL COLBURN MAYNE
Biographical sketches of Diane De Poitiers, Jeanne Du Barry, Jenny Lind, Adah Isaacs Menken, Marie Antoinette and a score of other famous women whose great personal allure has made their names immortal. The author had no need to color such fascinating material. With 23 reproductions of portraits. $5.00

A HISTORY OF ENGLAND
By HILAIRE BELLOC
The first volume, now ready, of Mr. Belloc's history deals with Pagan and Catholic England from the landing of Julius Caesar to the Battle of Hastings. The main object of the work, to be completed in four volumes, is to show that the chief political and social phenomena of national history are religious in origin. With maps. $3.75

To be published in October
AARON BURR
[illegible] and
MEADE MINNIGERODE
The first complete and accurate biography of the great American, the result of twenty years' research by Mr. Wandell, presented in Mr. Minnigerode's fascinating style. In two sumptuous volumes. Illustrated. $10.00

At all booksellers
G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS
2 West 45th Street New York City

sition of Troeltsch and Max Weber, emphatically two of the great thinkers of our time. But Mr. Gooch is, of course, entitled to his own emphasis; and I cannot more fitly praise this volume than by saying that it is worthy even of his reputation.

Mr. Gwynn's volume is much more a personal essay on the present tendencies in Ireland, with some historical analysis as their perspective. It is a most illuminating and interesting book. It is not, perhaps, overoptimistic in outl[illegible] cile the sentiment of North and South does not invite to optimism. What, I think, Ireland most needs is an improvement in the standards of her education. She has now much that a mere Englishman must envy. Her leading figures are all young. Her thinkers are not either divorced from the main stream of life or regarded, in their public adventures, as negligible and eccentric artists. Her freedom, moreover, seems to be giving her relief from the predominating grip of the priesthood. A new Ireland is in travail, and it is difficult not to believe that it will be a great Ireland. There is something fine and arresting in the experimental temper with which she has approached her great tasks; and nothing, as Mr. Gwynn sees, is more hopeful than the way in which a political revolution has had, immediately, consequences of social import. No one, looking at the grim racial bigotry of Ulster, would dare to say that the new Ireland is safe; but no one, either, could deny that her prospects are brighter than, half a decade ago, one would have dared to hope.

HAROLD J. LASKI

The Culture of a Section

The Literature of the Middle Western Frontier. By Ralph Leslie Rusk. Columbia University Press. Two volumes. $7.50.

TWICE in the progress of American settlement from the Atlantic to the Pacific conditions have led the West to a fairly independent literary development. During the early decades of the last century the people just beyond the Alleghanies, and at a later period the people of the Pacific slope, found themselves cut off from a ready supply of books and periodicals and from a sufficient opportunity to pri[illegible] own writings; and they endeavored to meet their needs by the establishment of literary and publishing centers within their own borders. With the opening of easier means of communication these centers lost their importance, and the region they had served became tributary to the national literary centers of the East. These sectional movements were, however, interesting phenomena, significant not so much for the intrinsic importance of the writings produced as for the fact that the Western element in American literature was for a time self-isolated and offered itself in a relatively unadulterated state for analysis. It is the older, the less self-conscious, and by far the more significant though not the more picturesque of these movements that Mr. Rusk has chosen for study.

These two volumes are clearly the work of a man to whom scholarly compilation is a labor of love. Only a student who has himself worked in some small part of the same field can appreciate the size of his undertaking. His results are presented simply, wholly without sectional prejudice, and in a manner that gives confidence in the accuracy of his statements of fact and usually in the soundness of his few conclusions. The expression "literature of the Middle Western frontier" is interpreted liberally. Writings of all sorts, and not only writings by Westerners but writings about the West, are included, the treatment of the accounts of British travelers being especially full; and there is much information about matters only incidentally related to literature. Detailed accounts of newspapers and magazines, with data regarding publishers as well as editors, are given in one of the longer chapters. A hundred pages are devoted to the Drama. Of these, nine pages tell of the principal plays produced, with statistics of the number of

Autumn 1925

This month will bring to you the first of our Autumn publications—a list of particular interest to Nation readers. REGARDEZ!

Edgar Saltus
A Revival

We Are Reprinting the Complete Works of Edgar Saltus. Historia Amoris, Imperial Purple, Lords of the Ghostland, Daughters of the Rich, Mr. Incoul's Misadventure and the Anatomy of Negation. They Appeared on Our Former List. The Latest Republications Follow:

Mary Magdalen
by Edgar Saltus

Even as, in his "Imperial Purple," Edgar Saltus made live the story of the Caesars so in this record of a courtesan's career, he has vitalized a character who, above all the disciples, was a true [illegible] with a remarkable [illegible] in Judea, and later tells of Juda's love for Mary and his jealousy of Jesus. But it is Mary's conversion rather than [illegible] insight. $2.00

The Philosophy of Disenchantment
by Edgar Saltus

Mr. Saltus is a [illegible] satirical, as interesting and as insolent to humanity as are [illegible] an Affliction?" $2.00

Vainglory
by Ronald Firbank
Author of "Prancin Nigger" and "The Flower Beneath the [illegible]"

[illegible] characters. $2.00

The Red Cord
by Thomas Grant Springer

[illegible]

Idiot Man or The Follies of Mankind
by Professor Charles Richet

[illegible]

Forty-two [illegible] AT THE [illegible] STORES

[illegible]

Publishers BRENTANO'S New York

performances of each; eight pages enumerate with slight critical comment "plays on Western life and by Western writers"; the rest of the chapter treats such matters as the history of dramatic performances and their financial successes and failures, the careers of actors and of managers, the buildings used as theaters, the manners of Western audiences. In the chapters on Fiction and on Poetry there is relatively little critical evaluation. The author has apparently preferred to adhere to unquestionable fact and to avoid as much as possible the expression of opinion of any kind. There is almost no attempt to give a summary of tendencies, to show the probable influence of Western writings before 1840 on later American literature, or even to trace the working of forces that must have been operative during the pioneer period itself.

It would be unfair to complain that Mr. Rusk has not written a book of a different kind, when he has given us a treatise that is so valuable. Still one cannot restrain the desire to encounter him, to ply him with questions, conscious that, although his impressions might not have the certainty of the facts that he relates, his acquaintance with the subject would make them immensely valuable. What, for example, of Western oratory? It is spoken of only as florid, with varieties of grandiloquence perhaps derived from different sections of the Atlantic seaboard. Was there nothing that pointed toward the manner of Lincoln's debates? Lincoln delivered his important utterances later, but by the close of Mr. Rusk's period he was a man past thirty, and his tastes and ideals must have been fairly well established. Must we think of him as sui generis? Or was the Western spirit itself developing, along with the turgidity of revivalist preachers and ranting jury lawyers, a feeling for the plain happily phrased appeal to reason and common sense? Again, what models, aside from the inevitable Scott and Byron, were chiefly followed by Western versifiers? Mr. Rusk refrains from commenting on even the most conspicuous imitations in manner and matter, such as that of Wigglesworth's "Day of Doom" in the selection from William Downs. To be more general, what were the distinctive marks found in these Western writings, so that we may search for them in the literature of the next generation, when the writers of Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois were publishing in Boston and New York?

In the last chapter the author seems to imply a mild surprise that so much attention was given by Western writers to contemporary English literature. This was in reality what was most to be expected. Western literature was not primarily produced, like that of the Hartford Wits in the preceding century, because of the feeling that the West must make a great contribution to the world, but to a great extent because local needs required to be supplied. True, the Westerner was patriotic, and wished the world to know of the region that he was developing; but he also felt keenly his isolation, was troubled by it, and sensitive over it. One of his desires was to read promptly the latest best sellers of London and New York, or to read about them if they could not themselves be made available. The departments of literary intelligence in Western periodicals are often ludicrous in their inadequacy and in their dependence on slight and roundabout sources of information, but they show great and genuine eagerness to know what is happening in the world of letters. If the reviewer may hazard an impression based on studies still incomplete, the literary criticisms in Western magazines, though often written by men of inadequate scholarship and training, are on the average more earnest, more sincere, less devoted to an exhibition of cleverness and to the exploitation of prejudices, than are those of their Eastern contemporaries.

A comprehensive bibliography of Western publications occupies the greater part of the second volume. Both this and the historical chapters will be invaluable to every future student of Western American literature. With these aids and this in-

A novel of the American scene

P.A.L.

By Felix Riesenberg

Author of "Under Sail"

Christopher Morley writes: "It bursts and runs with humor, has real human interest and vital comedy. The Hero, Becker Clock Control, and Lola Nola Nash, and Hobart Tumbler, and Shannon Peabody—what a living panorama of comic figures, all in a Homerian dimension." $2.00 net

A Romance of Amnesia

Mr. Petre

By Hilaire Belloc

22 Illustrations by G. K. Chesterton

"One of the cleverest, most brilliant pieces of satirical writing published within the last decade."—Boston Evening Transcript. $2.50 net

That soupçon of decadence

Week-End

By Charles Brackett

A novel for the frivolous. 2nd printing. $1.75 net

NEW YORK IN SEVEN DAYS

By Helena Smith Dayton and Louise Bascom Barratt. A week's tour of discovery in New York which is a revelation and a delight, with maps. $1.50 net

SASHKA JIGOULEFF

By Leonid Andreyev. One of the most poignantly beautiful of his writings. $2.50 net

NOW AND FOREVER

By Samuel Roth, with a preface by Israel Zangwill, discussing in dialogue form "The Jew and the Future." $1.75 net

THOSE NOT ELECT

By Leonie Adams. Forty lyrics by a gifted American, of whom Louis Untermeyer says, "I know of no younger poets from whom one can expect more." $1.50 net

MODERN AMERICAN WRITERS

Brief biographical and critical studies of leading American writers of the day. Now ready: H. L. MENCKEN, by Ernest Boyd; THEODORE DREISER, by Burton Rascoe; EDITH WHARTON, by Robert Morss Lovett; JAMES BRANCH CABELL, by Carl Van Doren. Each $1.00 net

THE GOBLINS OF HAUBECK

By Alberic Vaurmont. An exceptionally charming story for younger readers. Illustrated. $1.50 net

PSYCHOLOGY AND MORALS

By Joseph Jastrow. The best and soundest exposition of the relation of the new psychology to ethics. $2.00 net

Forthcoming

FIGURES OF EARTH. By James Branch Cabell. With 12 full page illustrations by Frank C. Papé and a new preface by Mr. Cabell. $3.00 net

EXPERIMENTS. By Norman Douglas, author of "South Wind." $2.00 net

FRIENDS OF MR. SWEENEY. By Hilary Pollard. A delightful tale for young readers. $1.00 net

At all booksellers. Add 10% for postage when ordering direct.

ROBERT M. McBRIDE & COMPANY Publishers New York

centive it may be expected that other workers, it is to be hoped under Mr. Rusk's guidance, will soon resolve some of the critical questions that he has refrained from discussing.

WILLIAM B. CAIRNS

Olive Schreiner in Part

The Letters of Olive Schreiner; 1876-1920. Edited by S. C. Cronwright-Schreiner. Little, Brown and Company. $5.

THE English edition of these letters appeared last year. All of the important English papers reviewed it at a fair length, and though some of them praised the editing of the letters and some did not, all of them seemed to believe that the "real Olive Schreiner" stood here revealed. Some found the revelation extraordinarily interesting, others found it disconcerting and lamentable. All seemed perfectly satisfied that the actual letters contained in this volume were a fair and representative collection and reflected truthfully the personality as a whole of the writer.

The English reviewers were gravely mistaken, and their mistake has led them to countenance and to perpetuate a cruel injustice to the memory of a very great woman. Had they known her better the grotesque caricature which emerges from the pages of this large, handsome, plausible volume would have been immediately apparent; had they been more at leisure it might have occurred to them to classify the letters presented. The task, though laborious, would have yielded interesting results. Mr. Cronwright, who since the publication of his "Life of Olive Schreiner" has resumed his own name "except for literary purposes," made his selection from a total of nearly six thousand letters. Out of these he printed extracts—he gives hardly any letter in full, and frequently prints a single sentence—from about nine hundred and fifty. About a hundred are addressed to himself, about two hundred to various friends and acquaintances, and the remaining six hundred, almost two-thirds of the volume, to Mr. Havelock Ellis.

It is on the Havelock Ellis letters, inevitably, that the interest of the book is centered. Written mostly between the years 1884 and 1890, they form, even in the piecemeal editing, a human document such as rarely finds its way into print. The woman who wrote them was new to London, new to Europe, new even to her own recent fame. She was young and beautiful, and intensely alive, with that blazing vitality which flickered in her up to the day of her death. People she did not know at all were pestering her with visits and letters; the most distinguished men of her own day were eagerly seeking her acquaintance. First among these was Mr. Ellis. She found him exceedingly sympathetic; their friendship ripened rapidly. It is clear from the letters themselves that he wished to marry her; she did not, she then said, feel that she had the right to marry anyone. But she loved him very tenderly and trusted him absolutely. She wrote to him almost daily, sometimes oftener, and everything she experienced, thought, or suffered she poured out to him with the joyful abandon of one who, for the first time in her life, feels secure of an understanding and a loving hearing on all matters. Not that she was too often joyful. The physical pain which clouded all her life was already a formidable thing to be endured; the ugliness and misery of a big city struck to her heart; she was overborne, as she was all her days, by the sorrows of her friends, the wrongs of this or that people or individual. Moreover, she was herself in a state of mental and spiritual ferment. To write whatever came into her head to Havelock Ellis rested and refreshed her. Whatever he wrote to her with the same freedom we are not in a position to know. But we do know, from her husband, that the correspondence continued long after her return to South Africa, and that it survived his marriage in 1891 and hers in 1894. In 1917, however, when she was again in England, she began to beg him to

Joseph Conrad's last novel—

SUSPENSE

This is a romance of the Mediterranean in the stirring days that led up to Waterloo.

It is unfinished, the last work that Conrad set his pen to—but it is real Conrad—and Conrad readers recognize it as such.

Sixteen thousand have bought this book within two weeks of its publication.

SUSPENSE

$2.00

Doubleday, Page & Co.

Send 10 cents for the biographical and bibliographical booklet, "JOSEPH CONRAD—A SKETCH," illustrated by Edward A. Wilson.

Doubleday, Page & Co.
Garden City, N. Y.

Please send me your illustrated booklet, "Joseph Conrad—A Sketch," for which I enclose 10 cents in stamps or coin.

Name

Address

City

State

return or destroy her letters. She implored him, "even with tears," says Mr. Cronwright, and adds that Mr. Ellis did finally agree to burn "her later letters." I am in a position to state with certainty that she persisted fruitlessly to beg Mr. Ellis for the return or destruction of all the letters until the last months or so of her life. On her death, Mr. Ellis handed them over to her husband, with the result that is now before us.

Of the publication of these letters it is difficult to write temperately. The appearance of almost any one of them in print would have seemed to the writer too horribly a violation of privacy to be imagined. How the two men whom she loved so beautifully and so loyally justify to their own hearts this violation of the rights of the helpless dead it is difficult to imagine. There is not, even for the most part, the excuse of any intrinsic interest. Many of the letters are mere cries of pain, explanations of the changing of an appointment, or loving inquiries. Here and there we do get a letter or a part of a letter which makes the great woman speak again, and of these [illegible] which it would be possible to read with a pleasure unqualified by the intolerable sense of eavesdropping which grows upon one as one reads Mr. Cronwright's book.

In them we have "the real Olive Schreiner," the Olive Schreiner whom men and women in the four corners of the earth miss and mourn not less but more as the years pass without this incomparable friend, this wise and tender counselor. The title of Mr. Cronwright's book is a shocking misrepresentation. Leaving aside altogether the five thousand letters which Mr. Cronwright has not included, there are hundreds of letters, covering the same space of time, the existence of which must have been at least suspected by him and of which he has taken no steps to avail himself. Among these are letters to the Rt. Hon. J. K. Merriman, P. C., Mr. F. S. Malan, the Rt. Hon. W. P. Schreiner, her favorite brother, and General Smuts, in South Africa. In England the late Mr. Massingham, Sir Ray Lankester, Mrs. Drew, Lady Constance Lytton, and many others were her correspondents over long periods of time; and it is exceedingly unlikely that the whole mass of their correspondence has been destroyed.

RUTH S. ALEXANDER

Shakespearean Studies

A Topographical Dictionary to the Works of Shakespeare and His Fellow Dramatists. By Edward H. Sugden. Longmans, Green and Company. $21.

Restoring Shakespeare. By Leon Kellner. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.50.

Shakespeare in France: Criticism: Voltaire to Victor Hugo. By C. M. Haines. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

THESE three volumes, each excellent in its way, are representative of three kinds of Shakespearean scholarship. The first is a compilation of encyclopedic proportions, indispensable as a work of reference for the comparatively few people who will need it; the second is a severely technical textual study; the third is a graceful and humane essay in "comparative" literature. The books have, then, nothing in common in method; their common purpose is to shed light upon Shakespeare.

In beginning his "Topographical Dictionary" Professor Sugden (who has worked under the severe handicap of residence in the antipodes) intended to supply students of Shakespeare with a brief account of the places mentioned in the plays and to add illustrative quotations from contemporary dramatists; but the hunt for such parallel passages in the works of other playwrights quickly revealed the fact that their place-names stood in need of elucidation. The scheme was consequently broadened to embrace the entire corpus of Tudor and Stuart drama, with additional examples chosen from the non-dramatic literature of the period, including all the place-names in Milton. The result is a closely printed encyclopedia of some six hundred pages in

The Most Fascinating Book of the present Season

CARL VAN DOREN in The Century

ANATOLE FRANCE HIMSELF

By His Secretary, JEAN JACQUES BROUSSON

Translation and Foreword by JOHN POLLOCK

A Boswellian record—amusing, erudite. "To read the Brousson book is to listen in on the intimate talk of a great and entertaining man."—Burton Rascoe, Arts and Decorations. Frontispiece. Unusually beautiful format. Two printings. $5.00

EDGAR ALLAN POE LETTERS—Till Now Unpublished

Introduction and Commentary by MARY NEWTON STANARD

Never until now has been seen on printed page a letter that passed between Edgar Allan Poe and his foster-father, John Allan. The appearance of this century-old correspondence is a literary event. From time-yellowed pages the wayward genius of Poe, for the first time, pleads its own cause. A strictly limited edition of numbered copies. Fac-similes of all letters and 15 illustrations, including the rarely shown Sully portrait of Mrs. Allan. The edition is a work of art. $15.00

THE DREAMER

By MARY NEWTON STANARD

A romantic [illegible] of the Lifestory of Edgar Allan Poe. From its pages rises an unforgettably human figure of the tragic poet, "dreaming dreams no mortal ever dared to dream before." An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound, with eight unusual illustrations. $3.50

THREE MASTER-BUILDERS AND ANOTHER

By PELHAM BOX

Studies in modern revolutionary and liberal statesmanship. Four living and keenly discerned studies of Wilson, Lenin, Venizelos and Mussolini, by an astute student of foreign politics. With four portraits. $3.50

CONSIDERATIONS ON EDMUND GOSSE

By PATRICK BRAYBROOKE, Author of "J. M. Barrie," etc.

A critical and appreciative study of a man who is generally recognized to be our foremost literary critic, with an introduction by Gilbert Frankau. $2.50

MARVELS OF THE UNIVERSE

Introduction by LORD AVEBURY

"[illegible]," "The Bird with Hands," and over 400 other authoritative articles on plant, animal and natural phenomena. 64 Magnificent color plates, 1,590 illustrations. 2 Beautiful volumes. $20.00

THE OLD MISSION CHURCHES AND HISTORIC HOUSES OF CALIFORNIA

By REXFORD NEWCOMB, M. Arch. A. I. A.

A pilgrimage to the Hispanic shrines of California, vividly reconstructing the golden age of the missions and the picturesque days of the Dons. A complete study of the old churches and Spanish houses, their history, [illegible] and interest and delight to all architects, artists and lovers of beauty and romance. Colored frontispiece, 217 illustrations and measured drawings and 24 line drawings. $15.00

THE LIFE OF CHARLES DICKENS

By JOHN FORSTER

[illegible] the most sumptuously illustrated edition of the famous "Life" ever published. 500 Portraits, facsimiles, playbills, [illegible] and contemporary prints. The most complete collection of [illegible] 2 Volumes. $15.00

At All Bookstores

J. B. LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

London PHILADELPHIA Montreal

double columns. Only the employment of a system of drastic abbreviation of titles has held the work within these liberal bounds. The individual articles vary in length from a few lines to many pages, the more important ("London," "England," "France," "Italy") being subdivided and separately indexed. Obviously this is not a book to be read through consecutively; but for those who enjoy antiquarian lore it is something more than the work of reference which is its primary use. The scores of articles on the streets, shops, taverns, wells, gates, and districts of London are, for example, filled with interesting and picturesque information. Under the heading "Italy" we find not only historical and topographical allusions but also the national characteristics of the Italian people as reflected in the English drama, their dress and personal appearance, food and cookery, music and dancing, art, horticulture and literature, their professions, trades, and other occupations. The arrangement of such long and complicated articles is admirable. Judging from dozens of tests selected from obscure and recondite [illegible] in the plays, one may pronounce the "Dictionary" quite exhaustive. The printing, though the type is necessarily small, is impeccable. Several contemporary maps and views of London are provided and there is an excellent "sketch map of the [illegible] of Elizabethan London" on a large scale.

Professor Kellner of the University of Czernowitz, after more than a decade of indefatigable research, now publishes his "critical analysis of the misreadings in Shakespeare's works." For some years it has been a commonplace of textual scholarship that the prime necessity for a student venturing upon the arduous task of "restoring" the true readings in the plays is a thorough knowledge of Elizabethan handwriting. The good old days of happy guess-work are gone forever. Various scholars, notably Mr. J. Dover Wilson, the editor of the "New Cambridge Shakespeare," and the Dutchmen Van Dam and Stoffel, have obtained this needed equipment of paleographical k[illegible] before venturing to tamper with the text. That this is necessary in dealing with dramas and not so necessary for the emendation of non-dramatic texts is of course due to the fact that the playwrights, having parted with all claims to their productions, had seldom any opportunity to correct the errors of the press. Most letters in the Elizabethan handwriting (whether "secretary," "Italian," or "mixed" script) are formed in a variety of ways. The forms of one letter very frequently resemble those of another or of more than one other. The chances of error on the part of the printer setting up from manuscript were therefore numerous, the more so when he used a transcript made from the author's original text. Moreover, in faulty passages there is almost always the possibility of more than one plausible emendation, the letter b, for example, resembling h, k, l, t, or v. Professor Kellner's exhaustive survey of all possible misreadings of all letters, combinations of letters, abbreviations, wrong divisions of words, and the like results in a solid and invaluable sub-structure for the rebuilding of a correct text. When, however, he comes to the task of emendation, of "restoring Shakespeare," he treads upon insubstantial ground. [illegible] tabulating those errors in quarto or folio which are corrected in one or the other text he lists all misreadings the corrections of which have been received into most or all modern editions. But he goes further and submits some 265 new "readings" discovered by himself. In the nature of the case it is unlikely that any one scholar could make so many successful emendations of Shakespeare's text. Occasionally his suggestions are happy, though none is so happy as Mr. Dover Wilson's "I think thee, Ariel" for "I thank thee, Ariel" (a change which Professor Kellner does not record). More often these new "readings" are of a flatness that can be accounted for only by the fact that English is not this scholar's native tongue. "Rump-fed ronyon," for example, may not be an altogether satisfying epithet as applied by the sailor's wife to the witch, but Professor Kellner's alternative, "ramp-seed ronyon," will find few [illegible] more space at command scores of these emendation[illegible]

FOLLY

by

CLEMENT WOOD

author of

"NIGGER," "THE MOUNTAIN," etc.

A MOST unusual historical romance of the early [illegible]th century in which a Madcap beauty's keen wit matches her shining blade to the mental and moral discomfiture of many a noble swaggerer on the English Olympus of the day until she finally achieves her purpose and rescues her brother.

FOLLY LEIGH is one of those characters in fiction that make an indelible impression on [illegible] less, lovable and clever as [illegible]

$2.00

at all booksto[illegible]

Small, Maynard and Company

Publishers [illegible]

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation.

pleasant matter for discussion. It will be seen, then, that the value of this book lies in its thorough survey of the paleographical data and in the general principles of emendation that it lays down rather than in the specific application of those principles.

Mr. Haines's book is the second instalment of the "survey" of Shakespeare's fame in foreign lands undertaken by the Shakespeare Association. It deals with certain aspects only of the large problem of Shakespeare in France. For the most part it reworks soil that has often been turned over and treads upon familiar ground. There is, however, an understanding of the French "classical" point of view that has never before been very evident in the work of English scholars upon this subject. The gradual emergence of Shakespeare's reputation and prestige from the early days of Voltaire's patronizing interest, through the period of Voltaire's bitter hostility, and on to the days of Chateaubriand and De Staël, is admirably traced; and the book ends with the Shakespearean vogue of the full-blown Romantics.

SAMUEL C. CHEW

Enough to Go Round

Wages and the Family. By Paul H. Douglas. The University of Chicago Press. $3.

THERE are about 30 million adult males gainfully employed in the United States. If you gave them all a wage sufficient to maintain a family of five at the level of the budget of health and decency, it would take 50 billion dollars. If you paid the women and children already gainfully employed at the health and decency level, it would take 8 billions more—a total wage bill for the country of 58 billions. Meanwhile the national income is about 70 billions. Ten per cent for savings (new capital construction) knocks off 7 billions. Rent, interest, and profit knock off another 8 or 10 billions. Differentials for highly skilled workers above the basic rate knock off a final 7 billions. Twenty-two from 70 leaves 48 billions—or 10 billions short of meeting the minimum budget. No, there isn't enough to go round.

"But wait," says Mr. Douglas; "I know there isn't enough to go round, but that's a cock-eyed way of stating the case." As indeed it is. Your humble reviewer, following the lead of the learned family budgeteers, has used it repeatedly. But with Mr. Douglas's book in hand, he makes haste to announce that he has been an ass. A statistical ass. For, as the author points out, if you paid all adult males the equivalent of the support for a family of five, and you paid the working women and children to boot, you would provide the support not for 110 millions—the present population of America—but for 158 millions, for 48 million non-existent people! Five to the family is not the average in real life—it is less than that; and there are some 9 million unmarried male workers with no families to support at all.

Under capitalism to hold out for a family wage (of five) as a minimum for all adult male workers is an impossible goal in the opinion of Mr. Douglas. There simply isn't the income available. Even if you took all the rent, interest, and profits away from the forthright captains of industry and instituted a sort of socialism, he doubts with learned statistical support if the budget could be met—with the necessary differentials for skilled workers.

This is very logical, but I think there is an Ethiopian concealed somewhere. If we cut under the dollar signs and examined the facts on the basis of the physical output of goods and services, a very different conclusion might be reached. The shifting of physical production—necessitated by the shift in purchasing power—to the necessities and plain comforts might conceivably produce a tremendous gain in real income, and throw all the neat tables out of gear. The industrial system would be a different thing altogether.

IMPORTANT DORAN BOOKS

A new novel by Floyd Dell

RUNAWAY

An entirely new sort of novel by Floyd Dell which marks his progress from the leadership of "the younger generation" to a position of real stature as a novelist. It is the exciting tale of a vagabond father and a madcap daughter. $2.00

❖ ❖ ❖

Stimulating essays by Aldous Huxley

ALONG THE ROAD

Edwin Bjorkman calls Aldous Huxley "the most interesting of the young writers in England," and there are many who share that opinion. Here are engaging essays by Mr. Huxley on a rich variety of subjects that show him to be a very human, a very mellow person. $2.00

❖ ❖ ❖

A new tale by

Elinor Wylie

THE VENETIAN GLASS NEPHEW

Exquisitely wrought, refreshingly different is the romance of the fragile youth Virginio—who lived and breathed although made of spun-glass—and of the bewitching fiery child Rosalba. A love theme as profound in its significance as it is delicate in its conception. By the author of "Jennifer Lorn." $2.00

❖ ❖ ❖

An important novel by

Cyril Home

CRUEL FELLOWSHIP

"This novel is true enough to be an indictment of society, of education, of sex supression, of a thousand curable evils that may corrupt a human soul."—N. Y. Herald Tribune. By the author of "Wife of the Centaur." $2.00

❖ ❖ ❖

A fine character study of a Southern negro

PORGY by Du Bose Heyward

The color and the slumbrous charm of Charleston pervade this dramatic story of negro life, that shifts from a bizarre negro funeral to scenes of poignant beauty, told with rare understanding by an author who comes of an old Charleston family, and who is already well known as a poet. $2.00

❖ ❖ ❖

Ballads and lyrics by

Stephen Vincent Benét

TIGER JOY

Ballads of pirates and fiddlers, marshland and mountain, as well as the author's famous ballad on King David, followed by quixotic love lyrics, make up this new collection of Mr. Benét's verse. $1.75

At all booksellers or from

GEORGE H. DORAN COMPANY

244 Madison Avenue New York

But to go on with the author's argument. Instead of fighting and striking for a hopeless goal, why not pool wage payments on the basis of a decency budget of one for the bachelor worker, of two for the married childless worker, of three, of four, of five for the married worker with one or two or three children—and so on. A wage system based on living standards and the number of dependents, rather than a wage system based on the job, as at present.

To many this may sound like a wild proposal. Yet every country in Europe is experimenting with it, as well as Australia. The thing is actually in operation for some 6 millions of workers. It is no academic arm-chair dream. The concrete cases are all laid before us. Mr. Douglas promises that the plan will eliminate poverty, prolong the school period of children, cut down infant mortality, brighten communities. I think he is probably right.

But—from my own arm-chair—I wonder. If you are going to tinker with the price system in any such wholesale way, why not go the whole hog, coordinate industry on the basis of adapting production to human requirements (as we began to do in the war), cut out the 50 per cent margin of waste and leakage in industrial performance, and thus provide that assured abundance of physical goods of which dollar signs are only illusive shadows.

Still, if employers can be jimmied into the former and not the latter, I'm for the author's plan. But it must—as he well says—be administered under the joint control of employer and employee. Otherwise the Lord help organized labor. Finally, I have seldom read a book of research which was so concise, so logical in its development, and so blissfully short in its chapters.

STUART CHASE

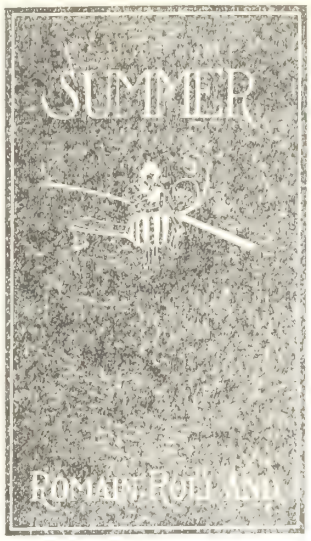
Terror and Furore

Under the Black Flag. By Don C. Seitz. The Dial Press. $4.

HAIL, Don Seitz, chronicler of Braxton Bragg, of the gloriously insolent Paul Jones, of bull-hearted buccaneers! Also look well to your laurels, all you who glory in the telling of tales of pikes and fusils and flashing cutlasses, of black-flag terrorists, of carbuncle-faced avengers, of grim-browed scoundrels, of murderous plot and riot, of half-naked desperadoes most vehement, of tall black ships and sulphurous belching cannon! Look well to your laurels, I say, for here is a man most cunning in his work, who captivates the imagination, who parades no fine sentiments as do inefficient workmen, who paints vice and folly and recklessness in true colors, who exerts neither patronage nor favoritism, who tells his tale with enthusiasm and is a stranger to wearisome ennui; a very noticeable man indeed to write a book of derring-do. And, be it said, Don Seitz has not retold old and worn tales such as are known to every high-spirited boy and to every man with a boy's heart. His are rare tales of those who tried to make life luxurious for themselves at heavy cost, tales almost unknown except to specialized students. To be sure he gives us Captain Kidd, but not Kidd of the ballad, the unworthy Kidd, the Kidd who, having played fast and loose with life, at the end warned solemnly with

> Come all ye young and old, see me die, see me die,
> Come all ye young and old, see me die,
> Come all ye young and old,
> You're welcome to my gold,
> For by it I've lost my soul, and must die.
>
> Take warning now by me, for I must die, I must die,
> Warning take by me, for I must die,
> Take warning now by me,
> And shun bad company,
> Lest you come to hell with me, for I die.

For your true pirate was not given to anchoring his conscience to a responsibility, nor to a discovery of something fine



Romain Rolland

the author of "Jean Christophe," has written an equally penetrating story of a woman in his new trilogy, "The Soul Enchanted."

SUMMER

is the succeeding volume to "Annette and Sylvie" and continues the career of Annette Rivier, now in the first flush of maturity and facing life without love, fortune or respectability. This volume can be read as a complete novel in itself. Translated by Van Wyck Brooks. $2.50

Henry Adam's

DEMOCRACY

A sensation in its day, its authorship is now revealed for the first time. This new edition contains an introduction by Henry Holt. "Remarkable, brilliantly written. Among the best American novels." —Boston Transcript. $2.00

Mrs. E. M. Ward's

MEMORIES OF NINETY YEARS

Mrs. Ward's interests have been wide and varied. She has known the celebrities of the English social, political and artistic worlds during three generations. Her autobiography is wise and mellow, and replete with amusing anecdotes. A beautiful volume with 42 illustrations. $3.00

Maximilian Harden's

I MEET MY CONTEMPORARIES

Mr. Harden displays extraordinary breadth of political and cultural knowledge in these brilliant chapters on Wilson, Lloyd George, Clemenceau, Lenin, Sarah Bernhardt, Stinnes, Hindenburg and many other notable figures. Illustrated. $4.00

Milton Waldman's

AMERICANA

For the first time all authentic information on our early books, letters, documents and manuscripts, the source materials of our national history and literature, have been gathered together in one complete reference [illegible]. Illustrated. $5.00

Christopher Ward's

FOOLISH FICTION

The author continues his hilarious parodies on the season's popular novels. Illustrated. $2.00

H. G. Langworthy Taylor's

The* SADDLE HORSE

A treatise on the training and [illegible] care of the horse for the average owner. Illustrated. $3.50

At all booksellers

HENRY HOLT & COMPANY
19 West 44th Street, New York City

and significant in death. Rather was he one not to be immured among conventions and received opinions, like that fire-flashing Boyga, who, being sentenced to death, tried to cheat the gallows by cutting his throat with the top of a tin can and was hanged while sitting in a chair; or like the hell-roarer who took a solid and defined position by leaping into the powder magazine with a lighted match; or like Master Roberts, who, taking a somewhat muddled view of religion, impounded a minister of the gospel to "make punch and say prayers for the pirates"; or like the martinet John Phillips, who aimed at order in disorder and deplored the lack of discipline on pirate crafts; or like that London burglar who turned to buccaneering as a pastime and wrought with reckless valor; or like the eloquent Captain Misson, who talked about the "Yoak of Tyrannie"; or like Joe Bradish, brisk and efficient man of business, who buried his jewels on Nassau Island in time of stress; or like Jack Martel, who had a nice taste for gold dust and elephant tusks; or like Quelch of Massachusetts, who flew a flag with "in the middle of it an Anatomy with an Hourglarse in one hand and a dart in the Hart with three drops of Blood proceeding from it in the other," and dwelt upon his art with a certain gleesomeness; or like Bill Lewis the romantic, who, being given to drowse and brood, was at last murdered in his sleep; or like Tom White, the man of Devon, who, under soberer circumstances, might have been a pillar of society—or, to come to the end of a long story, like many another who sailed into action in the glory of music and banners, infinitely courageous, and often came out of the fray with decorations much damaged, valor not being alone on the side of the pirate.

CHARLES J. FINGER

Books in Brief

Beatrice d'Este and Her Court. By Robert de la Sizeranne. Translated by Captain N. Fleming. Brentano's. $3.50.

"Although she belonged to that small number of women worthy of perpetual regret and eternal remembrance, such a premature death is not really a misfortune for her, for, since we must all die one day, those are more favored who die young and who, after having lived through a happy youth, are ignorant of the countless calamities of this sad world and the trials of old age." So wrote Maximilian, King of the Romans, on the death of Beatrice d'Este to her husband, Ludovic the Moor; and his words are an epitaph not upon Beatrice only but upon the whole Renaissance. Dr. Charles Mayo remarked in a recent address that the average length of human life in the sixteenth century was thirty years. But what a day they had, these women of the house of Sforza! If it was brief, it was glorious. The splendor and wealth, the state and pageantry, the admiration and flattery that would have sufficed for a hundred women were crowded into their little span. The precious fabrics enumerated in this volume make certain pages of it read like a museum catalogue. And their taste for rich foods was quite as keen. It is gratuitous to assume, even in the annals of the house of Borgia, that the numerous early or sudden d[illegible] were due always to poison.

Public Employment Offices: Their Purpose, Structure, and Methods. By Shelby M. Harrison and Associates. The Russell Sage Foundation.

This book, for at least the next decade, will be the text-book of students interested in the purpose, structure, and methods of government employment offices. Written by persons formerly connected with State or federal employment bureaus, it gives a complete history of the development of such agencies. The analysis of the case is clear, concise, and closely reasoned. The conclusion—in favor of government as opposed to private agencies—is reached by meticulous examination of other types and methods of connecting worker and job. Only one type of

INTERNATIONAL

LITERATURE, ART, SOCIOLOGY, ETC.

By LEON TROTSKY
WHITHER ENGLAND?
[illegible]
LITERATURE AND REVOLUTION
[illegible]

By Karl Kautsky
FOUNDATIONS OF CHRISTIANITY
A [illegible] into origin of the Christian Church, from the materialistic viewpoint. [illegible]

By Nikolai Bukharin
HISTORICAL MATERIALISM A SYSTEM OF SOCIOLOGY
[illegible]

By Hamilton Carter
THE NEW THEATRE AND CINEMA OF SOVIET RUSSIA
A valuable [illegible]

By C. K. Ogden, James Wood, and I. A. Richards
THE FOUNDATIONS OF AESTHETICS
An important contribution to [illegible]

RUSSIA TODAY
[illegible] pp. Paper, [illegible]

By David J. Saposs
LEFT WING UNIONISM
[illegible]

By Louis F. Lochner
HENRY FORD—AMERICA'S DON QUIXOTE
[illegible] of Henry

By W. H. Emmett
MARXIAN ECONOMIC HANDBOOK
A [illegible] primer [illegible] Marx's "Capital." 8vo. 350 pp. $3.25

By Prof. L. W. Moffitt
ENGLAND ON THE EVE OF THE INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION
An [illegible] system. [illegible] $7.50

By Prof. A. M. Low
THE FUTURE
A fascinating [illegible] will revolutionize individual and social life. [illegible] $2.00

By Charles Nordmann
THE TYRANNY OF TIME
[illegible] gist of Einstein theory told in [illegible] $2.25

By General Von Hoffman
WAR OF LOST OPPORTUNITIES
[illegible] the military operations [illegible] to the collapse of the Central Empires. [illegible] $3.50

By W. E. Williams
THE CRAFT OF LITERATURE
An exposition of the development [illegible] of literary [illegible] 192 pp.

NEW FICTION

Published October 15th CHAINS
by
HENRI BARBUSSE
"A Great Epic"—Say French Critics
[illegible] greatest vision- [illegible]
Author of "Under Fire," etc. 12mo. Two Volumes. Each [illegible] pp. $4.00

By Dmitri Mereshkovsky
Author of
DECEMBER 14TH
An [illegible] historical novel dealing with one of [illegible] Russian history, the Dark Middle Ages. 12mo. 320 pp. $2.00

Stories of New Russia
FLYING OSIP
Eleven short stories written since the Revolution, revealing the new literary trends. 12mo. 320 pp. $2.50

[illegible] for complete catalog and advance information of future publications.

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS
381 FOURTH AVENUE NEW YORK

real importance is given scant study—the employment office operated by trade unions. Moreover, the most dramatic picture to be drawn in favor of federal appropriation for employment bureaus is scarcely touched on. One hundred million or more dollars are spent annually in "help and situations wanted" advertising in daily newspapers. No analysis of this sum—not even a rough verification of it—is made. Yet the newspapers' revenue from this source in one year no doubt would establish a fund the income of which would be sufficient to run adequate government employment offices forever. Furthermore, no proposed bill for legislative enactment, federal, State or local, was drafted as an appendix to the volume. Such a draft would have been valuable. Unfortunately, publication was delayed so long that the immediate usefulness of the book is doubtful. The Sage Foundation in this respect suffers from the general ailment of all mammoth organizations. Had the study come out in 1920 it might well have been a real influence in offsetting the blunders of the chief of the United States Employment Service, thus helping those who fought, vainly enough, for the continuance of extensive federal activity in employment work.

Government and the Will of the People. By Hans Delbrück. Translated by Roy S. MacElwee. Oxford University Press. $3.50.

The chief interest of these lectures on the governmental system of the Bismarckian empire, delivered by Professor Delbrück at the University of Berlin a year before the World War, consists in an Epilogue written in 1920, containing observations on the radical change of this system brought about by the work of the Weimar National Assembly. Professor Delbrück reiterates his well-known views about the perfection of the old German Constitution as a "dualism" preserving a happy balance between popular representation in a Reichstag based upon universal suffrage and "a certain degree of autocracy" embodied in the sovereign of Prussia, the army, and the federated governments of the empire. Absence of corruption, nonpartisan care for the popular welfare, and efficiency of expert administration are dwelt upon as the outstanding virtues of this system, in comparison with which the much-vaunted democratic achievements of parliamentary governments as exemplified by England, France, and the United States appear as sham phrases hiding the exploitation of the people by parliamentary groups and industrial interests. Yet it is noteworthy that Professor Delbrück sees in the new Weimar Constitution certain features which he cannot help acknowledging as improvements upon the constitution of the old empire.

Die Pfalz unter Französischer Besatzung. Kalendarische Darstellung von Einmarsch 1918 bis November 1924. München: Süddeutsche Monatshefte.

A bare, chronological record of events without so much as a word of comment on the part of the chronicler. It is not the total Rhineland occurrences but only those taking place within the narrow bounds of the Palatinate which are here disclosed. In sharp distinction from the typical French tale, the outstanding feature of the German version is the omnipresence of the French civil and military authorities. The German work, too, presents Separatism as a fact; but it exhibits it as stirring in only a few disgruntled heads and makes it clear that it would never have mobilized for action had it not been supported from the first and without reservation by the action of a vast body of French agents under the direction of General de Metz himself, the commander of the army of occupation. The seizures of property, the arbitrary arrests and imprisonments, the eviction from the province of thousands of local officials and citizens by a barbarous procedure indistinguishable from kidnapping, the rape of women by black troops, and the frequent murder of harmless residents by drunken soldiers constitute a record of suffering somehow peculiarly moving because making no effort to move.

OXFORD BOOKS

THE EARLY LIFE AND LETTERS OF CAVOUR, 1810-1848
By A. J. Whyte Net $5.00
Presents for the first time the results of recent researches, and a full translation of early letters.

POPULATION
By A. M. Carr-Saunders Net $1.00
A new treatment of this important subject.

A HISTORY OF GREEK RELIGION
By Martin P. Nilsson Net $4.25
A highly civilized people having lived in Greece before the Greeks, the history of the Greek religion commences in the Minoan-Mycenaean age.

TRAVEL IN ENGLAND IN THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY
By Joan Parkes
With 46 illustrations and a map. Net $7.00
An account of the roadways and riverways of England, and the sea routes; the conveyances used; the accommodation of travellers; and the perils and pleasures of travel in the seventeenth century.

MOVEMENTS IN EUROPEAN HISTORY
By D. H. Lawrence
With 80 illustrations and 14 maps. $1.50
Library edition. Net $3.50
The first illustrated edition of a work first published (under the same title in full as by "Lawrence H. Davison") An account of the general course of European history from the time of the Romans, the guiding thread throughout being the most salient features of history rather than its minute details.

LIFE IN MEDIAEVAL FRANCE
By Joan Evans Net $5.25
Miss Evans [illegible] of Picardy history to a great extent and is not primarily [illegible]

THE SCIENCE OF PRICES
A Handbook of Economics (Production, Consumption, and Value)
By J. A. Todd $2.00
[illegible]

THE PERMANENT COURT OF INTERNATIONAL JUSTICE — ITS CONSTITUTION, PROCEDURE, AND WORK
By Alexander P. Fachiri Net $5.00
[illegible]

SURVEY OF INTERNATIONAL AFFAIRS, 1920-1923
By Arnold J. Toynbee Net $7.00
[illegible]
national affair.

THEN AND NOW
Economic Problems after the War a Hundred Years Ago
By Mrs. H. A. L. Fisher
With an introduction by the Rt. Hon. David Lloyd George. $1.75
[illegible]

THE WELLESLEY SEMI-CENTENNIAL SERIES
[illegible]
Eighteenth Century England, by Elizabeth W. [illegible]

The Fruit of the Family Tree. By Albert Edward Wiggam. Bobbs-Merrill Company. $3.

Mr. Wiggam's second book on the inheritance of human traits is reliable in matters of scientific fact and for the most part entertainingly written. While it is happily devoid of the mystical verbiage, the undue formulation and dogmatism, that marked the author's earlier (and widely popular) work on the same subject, it has some literary defects of its own. There is a recurrent artlessness of phrase, a periodic use of "the good Lord did this, intends that," and occasional recourse to a ridiculous example (e. g. the twins that selected identical sets of china), all of which may unfortunately obscure for many readers the solid merits that the book possesses. In both books the same general subject matter and the same broad ends are the author's concern. Both treat of human heredity and both preach the gospel of eugenics. In the earlier the data of biology are presented in a very general way and the social applications are announced in no uncertain tones; in the later the reader will find a more detailed statement of the facts of genetics and a more persuasive plea for the general employment of this knowledge.

Art Treasures in Soviet Russia. By Sir Martin Conway. Longmans, Green and Company. $5.50.

Sir Martin visited Russia to learn what had become of the vast collections of pictures and other treasures of ancient and modern art known to have been in Imperial Russia. His book sets at rest rumors of mutilated pictures and the sale of crown jewels. He found not only all the old treasures of the museums but a wealth of new paintings and other objects garnered from the private collections of the few Russian nobles who chose wisely and with taste. Of the Hermitage museum he says: "Both the building and its contents have never been so well attended to, displayed, and studied as they are now." Since the revolution the Winter Palace itself has been added to the Hermitage, and there are now ten miles of gallery. The British visitor trekked happily for days, finding the Giorgiones, the Van Eycks, and the Rembrandts he sought intact and radiant. He visited the imperial palaces in Leningrad and Moscow, and he furnishes minute descriptions of the state rooms and homely descriptions of the private apartments of the czars. He went to see everything, and he did.

Reamer Lou. By Louis Forgione. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

Reamer Lou's adventures as related in this book are those of a man blessed with an intellect and with an astonishingly alert eye for beauty. Since the story is told in the first person, one may say of him (as of his author) that he is numbered among those fortunate beings for whom, in the words of Théophile Gautier, the visible world exists. "Reamer Lou" is not a "hobo book"; it is not even the crude narrative of an honest working-man. There is an engaging and rather curious guilelessness about the story which at moments defines sharply its sophistication, but oftener than not it is a polished literary performance. Lou is himself; he is neither a damaged soul nor a noisy protestant against the hard lot of labor. Through many scenes and circumstances he moves with the pagan detachment of the picaresque but with a certain cleanness and health of body and soul and an unsentimental seriousness that are quite his own. It is a life conditioned far more to the unsullied properties of air and fire and sunlight than to the grimy reality of quotidian labor.

Knowledge and Virtue. The Hulsean Lectures for 1920-1921. By P. N. Waggett. Oxford University Press. $4.20.

Aside from the homiletic proficiency of this book and its sometimes merely unctuous but often genuine fervor, it contains little to help us either to knowledge or to virtue, although our need for both, and for one as a means to the other, is

Publications of the New York University Press

Sovereign States and Suits before Arbitral Tribunals and Courts of Justice. By James Brown Scott, president of the American Institute of International Law.

This distinguished contribution of a distinguished authority is a measured justification of judicial settlement from the breakdown of diplomacy to the submission of a dispute to a court of international justice, based upon the experience of the States of the American Union but as applicable to the nations of the world at large. Price: $6.00.

The Parthenon: Its Science of Forms. By Robert W. Gardner. Price: $15.00.

Coffee: The economic species of the Genius Coffea L. By Prof. Ralph Holt Cheney, Sc.D. Price: $4.50.

World-Developments in the Cotton-Industry, with Special Reference to the Cotton Piece Goods Industry in the United States. By Louis Bader, M.C.S. In press. Price: $3.00.

The Barnburners—New York state politics, 1830-1852. By Herbert D. A. Donovan, Ph.D. In press. Price to be announced.

THE NEW YORK UNIVERSITY PRESS
81 WASHINGTON SQUARE, E. NEW YORK CITY

A New Volume in the Musicians Library

MODERN SCANDINAVIAN SONGS
(TWO VOLUMES)

Edited by REINALD WERRENRATH

Issued in two editions
For High Voice For Low Voice

In heavy paper, cloth back, $2.50 net
In full cloth, gilt, 3.50 net

Volume I: Fifty Songs (Alfven to Kjerulf)

The nations which produced a Grieg, a Sinding, a Sibelius could not have failed to give us other composers of like talent and distinction. To bring these song writers to the knowledge of American singers is the congenial task to which Mr. Werrenrath (whose father was a Dane) has set himself. Arranged alphabetically, the composers represent Norway, Sweden, Denmark and Finland. All the songs have the original text and an English translation; and the volume contains a group of interesting portraits.

OLIVER DITSON COMPANY,
178-179 Tremont St., Boston, Mass.

Chas. H. Ditson & Co., 8-10-12 East 34th St.
New York, N. Y.
Order of your local dealer.

convincingly enough felt. The point is also made that we may pass from mere rote learning through felt realization in active experience to an explicit and illuminated comprehension of meanings in life and reality. But the book may serve to illustrate two commonplace weaknesses of orthodox religious theorizing. There is first that irrefutable fallacy which discovers and proclaims a supernatural sanction for even the most ordinary teaching and for all, even the most natural and rational, ideals. And there is second that literal and factual version of Christian myths which forces us to give up all their meaning by turning them into incredible absurdities. One wonders, so far as knowledge and virtue are concerned, whether one is much worse off in a California where fundamentalists attempt to interfere with elementary education than in a Cambridge where a Hulsean lecturer, reading in the University Church, takes as literal truth the most pathetically materialistic hopes and fears of Christian belief. Christianity, like all genuine religions, helps man's rational endeavor when in moving poetic symbolism it sanctions his ethics and expresses his ideals; but, as Santayana adds, in pretending to deal with matters of fact it not only gives rise to the bitter controversies of sects but actually loses its own dignity and power; instead of saving, it pollutes men's souls.

The Windlestraw. By James Mills Whitham. Boni and Liveright. $2.50.

Mr. Whitham, who has been quietly publishing his novels of the English countryside since 1912, is confessedly, both in material and technique, a follower of the Wessex master. Though he is the author of eight solidly conceived, gravely executed volumes, he has never exacted the serious attention he deserves. "Silas Braunton," probably his finest book, fell, in 1923, almost still-born from the press. The present volume is not quite so fine.

Harvest in Poland. By Geoffrey Dennis. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

Written to show that there is nothing beyond good and evil, this is still a great tale, as exciting as "Treasure Island." Mr. Dennis has written an epic of mystical Puritanism with a strange, almost hysterical genius flaring unsteadily through it.

Representative American Dramas, National and Local. Edited by Montrose J. Moses. Little, Brown and Company. $4.50.

The complete text of fifteen American plays ranging in time from Hoyt's "A Texas Steer" to George Kelley's "The Show Off." A catholic taste has led the editor to include works like Fitch's "The City," which have only historical interest, as well as readable and significant contemporary plays like "The Emperor Jones," "Dulcy," and "The Adding Machine."

Glamour: Essays on the Art of the Theater. By Stark Young. Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.

These essays, reprinted from various magazines, are by one of the very few American dramatic critics who have anything to say. It is Mr. Young's defect that he sometimes loses himself in the blue, but he has set himself especially the task of discussing one of the most intangible of the attributes which belong to every work of art. He calls it style, and it is, whatever name one may give it, the essential thing which distinguishes between that which is art and that which is not. There are few critics willing to undertake the discussion of a quality so elusive.

The Drama Year Book: 1924. Edited by Joseph Lawren. Joseph Lawren.

A statistical summary dealing with "those plays first presented in the English language upon the New York stage" during the calendar year. It differs from Burns Mantle's annual volume, "The Best Plays," in omitting the condensed versions of the "best plays" and in substituting a larger

BOOKS FOR NATION READERS

Four books published by the Columbia University Press which have particular appeal to the intellectual reader are described below. Complete List of Publications, descriptive circulars and announcements will be sent upon request. Please refer to this advertisement.

THE INVENTION OF PRINTING IN CHINA AND ITS SPREAD WESTWARD

By Thomas F. Carter

Late Professor of Chinese in Columbia University

Printing, "Mother of Progress," was a highly developed art in China centuries before it became known in Europe. Professor Carter, after studying the Chinese written records and comparing their accounts with archaeological evidence in European museums, traced the course of printing westward from China to Europe. Complete with photographic illustrations including the world's first printed book, earliest paper, block printing and movable type, historical chart and map, reference notes, bibliography and index. Just published. Price $7.50

THE HISTORICAL FOUNDATIONS OF THE LAW RELATING TO TRADE-MARKS

By Frank I. Schechter, J. D.

All who are interested in the fascinating topic of gilds—their life, law and discipline—and all who speak of the evolution of trade morality, as well as lawyers, business men and advertising men, will wish to read this study of seven hundred years of trade-mark law and piracy. "It sheds 'the gladsome light of jurisprudence' over commerce with most happy effect," says Notes and Queries. Recently published. Price $6.00

THE SOUTHERN PLANTATION

A Study in the Development and the Accuracy of a Tradition

By Francis Pendleton Gaines, Ph.D.

A Southerner educated in the North placed the glass of scientific criticism over the American tradition of romance and chivalry in the days of Negro slavery—and produced this widely-reviewed book. He traced the tradition as it is found in literature, on the stage and in popular song, and then compared it with life on the Southern plantation as it [illegible] was. Recently published. Price $3.50

RECENT CHANGES IN AMERICAN CONSTITUTIONAL THEORY

By John W. Burgess

Emeritus Professor of Political Science and Constitutional Law in Columbia University

This little volume, by the creator of the first school of political science in America, is addressed to his 10,000 former pupils. He issues a warning against the decline of [illegible] from the ultimate point in our political and constitutional forms. Professor Burgess traces the [illegible] tendency which reached its culmination during the World War. "In a single proposition," he says, "the government of the United States is now [illegible]." He urges as a possible remedy drastic constitutional amendments. Price $1.75

COLUMBIA UNIVERSITY PRESS

2960 BROADWAY
NEW YORK
NEW YORK

amount of valuable reference material. In addition to a cast of characters and a synopsis of scenes for every new play there is an alphabetical list of actors and their roles, directors and their plays, and producers and their productions for the year. A bibliography of new books about the theater and of published plays, as well as a condensed bibliography of periodical literature on the same subject, is also included. A very valuable reference book.

From a Pittman's Note-Book. By Roger Dataller. The Dial Press. $2.50.

This is the diary, edited by John Middleton Murry, of a young man who wants to be "an artist with a flowing tie, a broad-brimmed sombrero, and a villa in Capri," but who unfortunately is bound in a place where are "gutters running sludge; the slattern women dragging babes around; the dozy, poky shadowy shops; the Carnegie Free Library low and sprawling, cold as any tomb, with great cards slung about the place: 'YOU ARE REQUESTED TO OBSERVE SILENCE.'" Notwithstanding his faults of labored style and attempted elegance, there are times when the author forgets he is writing and produces spontaneous and magnfiicent pictures.

Bryan and Darrow at Dayton. By Leslie H. Allen. Arthur Lee and Company. $1.75.

The World's Most Famous Court Trial. The Tennessee Evolution Case. National Book Company. $2.

The first gives a running story of the Dayton trial, with copious extracts from the record. The second is a complete stenographic report.

Music

Arnold Schönberg

IT is the strangest case in the entire history of music. Here the flow of evolution seems to be interrupted by an individual who suddenly and violently hurls himself into the unknown. To new shores, asserts one group. Into nothingness, into absurdity, into mechanical abstraction, says the other group. To the first he is fulfilment; to the second, his music has in common with what was called music before only the material of tones—no longer the laws of harmony, the plastic of melody, the traditional form. To the first he is the greatest musician living and one of the greatest who have ever lived; to the others he is a mistaken dogmatic, if not a fool or even worse.

But there is no doubt of his sincerity. He has suffered for his convictions as few before him, has walked a martyr's road, has borne scorn and ridicule and misunderstanding without turning a hair's breadth from what he conceived to be right. Also, he has proved that it was neither lack of simplicity nor lack of ability which made him discard tradition. Even if his ways were different from those of the classics, he has shown in numerous compositions, large and small, the characteristics we admire in important creative composers; melodic invention of the most marvelous kind, sustained over long passages and full of emotional depth; crystal-clear form in wide patterns; marvelous orchestral color; and high intensity of mood. There is the stirring and beautiful string sextet "Verklärte Nacht"; there is the melancholy, mysterious tone poem "Pelleas und Melisande"; there are the two string quartets, one of which shows that he has come into the heritage of the latest Beethoven; and there are the short songs of surpassing lyricism. In all these Schönberg proved that he commands everything which makes a genuine musician, and that he had a right to abandon a form of expression which did not suffice [illegible] way.

Thus he has laid a duty upon every serious music lover to wait until his new works open themselves out as his earlier compositions did; to wait even if these new works should for

THE WOMAN'S PRESS
600 Lexington Avenue New York, N. Y.

FUNDS AND FRIENDS 1.50
By Tolman Lee
[illegible] Recommended by the Rt. Rev. William Lawrence, Halsted Ritter, Charles H. Mackintosh. Bought by churches, community chests and social agencies.

SAINTS AND LADIES 1.50
[illegible] The part women have played in [illegible] church history and the opportunities before them.

LITTLE ROBIN STAY-BEHIND 1.75
By Katharine Lee Bates
[illegible] dramatic production. Charming plays in [illegible] with the freshness and zest of the [illegible]ethan masque.

UNUSUAL AUTOBIOGRAPHIES

FIFTY YEARS OF SPORT
By Lt.-Col. EDWARD D. MILLER
The title might well read: fifty years of sport, soldiering and society. The author is very popular and probably the best known of living sportsmen. One of his chapters is on "[illegible] in America." $6.00

YOUTH AND THE EAST
By EDMUND CANDLER
The English Review says of this unconventional biography: "The best thing of the kind we have ever seen. . . . Few novels are in the same street with it." $6.00

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., N. Y.

Gambrinus
AND OTHER STORIES
by Alexandre Kuprin
The author of Jarmarok and Yama has written five stories that will live. Wm. Dean Howells has called Kuprin one of the four great Russian realists. $2.00

Genius and Disaster
by Jeannette Marks
[illegible] Professor of English Literature at Mount Holyoke College, in the manner of Lytton Strachey she discusses Poe, De Quincey, Coleridge and others who did their work under the effect of drugs or drink. $3.00

Adelphi Company, Publishers
10 East 43d Street, New York

FREE By Elizabeth Irons Folsom
A thrilling and moving protest against the yoke of [illegible] and the self-sacrifice of woman in love. The story of the Middle West small town [illegible] along the pattern of "Main Street."
$2.00 Net
[illegible] NEW YORK

a time be incomprehensible and alien, even tantalizing—as they actually still are to many. This duty to wait becomes still more imperative when one remembers the hostility with which his first compositions were received. People felt in those much of the eclectic, heard many foreign voices, above all the voice of Tristan, but also those of Brahms and Beethoven; yet much, too, that was peculiarly his own, subtle as a colorful dream, breathing harmonies of the sleeping sea and of the summer wind, of the woods and of the meadows. It was all so personal and new, and yet so compelling, that it was met with violent opposition and misunderstanding; almost every Schönberg composition (with the exception of the "Gurrelieder") caused an uproar at its first performance. And today we feel these works to be almost classical and cannot understand what could create so much opposition and revulsion. How much patience and reverence we must learn: patience, until we have really experienced the new works, reverence toward one who never made it easy for himself, who remained true to his ideas and who had to walk for their sake a path of poverty and loneliness.

To be sure, Schönberg does not make it easy for others; and those new compositions of his are hard to comprehend for anyone who does not approach them entirely unprejudiced and listen to them as if he knew no other music. Whoever measures them with Beeethoven or Wagner must be bewildered and stunned. I must confess, if a subjective utterance may be permitted, that this has happened to me in spite of my fifteen years of loving preparation. I find no entrance to them; I hear a foreign language; and even those promising passages of greatness and sudden light are lacking, such as I once felt in the works of the early moderns, Wagner, Bruckner, Mahler, Strauss—in the midst of incomprehensible passages which forced me to push farther and farther into a new world. Nevertheless I believe that the fault is mine, and that Schönberg's new music will yet reveal itself to me—even while I fear that his last phase, which I feel to be too constructive and theoretical, must remain strange to me.

Already in the "Kammersinfonie," which appeared simultaneously with the quartet with voice, there are sounds of a most unusual kind; and in the piano pieces, the songs of Stefan George, the "Pierrot Lunaire" melodramas, a rupture with everything that preceded becomes noticeable. The first recognizable landmarks are a brevity and concentration which lean to the aphoristic and a harmony which abandons the feeling of tonality and of the difference between consonance and dissonance. Schönberg achieves the strangest combinations of sound, a melody without cadence—rapid, rhythmically varied, ending with widely alternating intervals, and therefore without distinct ending, and for this reason at first not satisfying. The harmony of the classics is replaced by a structure in fourths which later again is replaced by still more complicated structures; the technique of reprise, even the mere repetition of a theme, is avoided. The whole effect is heightened by the prevalent mood of grotesque fright and apprehension. Schönberg also has painted pictures, and practically all of them are visions, distorted faces, nightmares in color. I don't believe I am wrong when I say I find the same expression in the lightless, joyless music which he was writing at the same time.

In Schönberg's superb book "Harmonielehre," which is one of the most living and sparkling of artistic documents, the composer has confessed that the laws by which he works at present are unknown to him. He feels their order without being able to formulate them, and without being able to demonstrate their rightness. He proved that many rules of traditional harmony are not right, or not alone right; and he enlarged the old harmony without destroying it. Since then, however, he has reached a formula which he calls "Die Lehre von der Komposition mit zwölf Tönen"; he refers to the twelve tones of the chromatic scale which take the place of the seven tones

Background Studies of the Southern Negro

The Negro and His Songs

By Howard W. Odum and Guy B. Johnson. $3.00

"It is done with a scholarly acumen for detail and dispassionate notation on the specimens." Countée Cullen, in Survey Graphic.

"As the work of Southern white men, this book is a decided achievement." Eric Walrond in The Saturday Review of Literature.

Workaday Songs of the Southern Negro

By Howard W. Odum and Guy B. Johnson. $3.00

This is the second volume of The Negro and His Songs presenting an entirely new series and arrangement of secular creations, some of which are centered around personalities and types, such as John Henry, Left Wing, etc. Ready in January.

Folk-Beliefs of Southern Negroes

By N. M. Puckett. $3.00

The most important collection of folk beliefs of southern negroes yet attempted. Mr. Puckett has done a scholarly piece of work and presents his findings in a most interesting volume. Ready in January.

At all bookstores or from

The University of North Carolina Press

Chapel Hill, N. C.

The American Task in Persia

A. C. MILLSPAUGH

Administrator-General of Persia's Finances

DR. MILLSPAUGH in this book recounts his experiences as the head of an American Mission engaged in the reconstruction of an ancient oriental country. He tells the story of the events that led to his employment by the Persian Government, his arrival in Persia, his adventures in the collection of taxes and controlling expenditures, and his efforts, as an adjunct and instrument of the Persian progressive movement, to lay the foundations of economic development in a country which in many respects is one of the world's last and most amazing frontiers. He explains how the so-called oriental "psychology" affected the work of the Mission, how it was opposed by the intrigues of reactionary elements and how honest and progressive Persians finally rallied triumphantly to his support.

Dr. Millspaugh believes that the desire and capacity of the Persian people for effective self-government are sincere and genuine.

Illustrated. Price $3.00.

THE CENTURY CO.: NEW YORK AND LONDON

To advertisers, please mention The Nation of any diatonic scale and out of which are selected those which form the basis of a theme. This pattern is stated forward and backward, to form the "Krebsgang" (crabstep). The intervals of this "crabstep" are then inverted and the whole forms the material for the entire movement. It may be said that Schönberg in the working out of his latest compositions approaches more clearly the old master forms. But if I understand the whole theory I cannot suppress my dislike of a too mechanical proceeding, or my objection to the tendency toward poverty and monotony which follows when the variety of twenty-four scales of seven degrees is replaced with twelve fixed tones, and when the contrast between consonance and dissonance, as well as the contrast between tonality and atonality, is abandoned.

Just the same, it is not theory which decides but living intuition; and if this is there, it is much stronger than all objections and every tradition. The ear adapts itself to everything new if it is truly experienced and imaginatively heard. And again, it remains a duty toward a master like Schönberg, whose behavior as a man and an artist alone compels respect, and who today is honored as one of the most important arrivals in the art of the entire world, to approach his work again and again, to study it over and over. He who has stormed the future with such admirable courage, power, and audacity was until a few years ago an object of controversy. Today we know better. We have to trust Schönberg, wherever he may lead us.

RICHARD SPECHT

Drama

Should Lawyers Lie?

EUGENE BRIEUX is by nature less a dramatist than a debater. He has, it is true, learned from some of the least worthy of his compatriots certain tricks of the trade and he knows as well as Henri Bernstein himself how to contrive a scene of glittering theatricality, but his real passion is for icily abstract problems in morality and his natural mode of expression is the casuistry of the forum. His habitual method of procedure is to select some problem in social ethics, to write a debate upon it, and then to contrive by hook or crook some series of incidents which will serve both to provide an opportunity for the debate and to keep an audience superficially engaged until the moment for it at last arrives. The result is a curious combination of portentous moral earnestness with theatrical clap-trap of a frequently shabby sort; the result is, that is to say, "The Red Robe," "The Americans in Our Midst," "Damaged Goods," and "Accused" (Belasco Theater), the last of which happens to be the latest of his works to reach America.

This time M. Brieux has chosen for his disputation the question, "To what extent is a lawyer justified in attempting to convince a jury of the innocence of a person whom he knows to be guilty of the charge upon which he is being tried but who nevertheless deserves, because of extenuating circumstances, to be acquitted"; and though the problem may seem to be a slightly academic one, he has managed to write upon it a genuinely eloquent debate which constitutes the climax of his play. But because his real talent is merely that of the casuist, because he has no power either to invent living characters or to imagine a genuine situation, he has embodied this question in a fable which not only involves all the stale situations which arise in the theater when the wronged woman is brought to trial but which rests entirely upon a false psychology. Specifically, M. Brieux, who, it must be remembered, poses not as an entertaining trickster but as a solemn student of the fundamental problems of contemporary civilization, asks us to believe that a woman accused of murder but holding in her hands certain proof of her justification will risk probable death and certain disgrace in the eyes of everyone whom she loves merely

THEATER

¶ Actors' Theatre presents "The Call of Life," by Arthur Schnitzler, English version by Dorothy Donnelly, with a distinguished cast; staged by Dudley Digges; settings by Jo Mielziner; at the Comedy Theatre. Phone Penn. 3558. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

¶ Subscription books open for the program season. Address David Wallace, Actors' Theatre, 45 W. 47th Street.

THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE 466 Grand

Evenings (except Monday), 8:30 sharp.
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp.

The Grand Street Follies of 1925

All Performances—Orchestra, $2; Balcony, $1.50.

BAYES Theatre, 44th St., W. of Broadway. LACKAWANNA 6565
EVENINGS, 8:30. MATS. SAT. & SUN., 2:30

The Yiddish Art Theatre Players in Maurice Schwartz Production of
A Biblical Drama by Paul Heyse
Complete Synopsis in English with Program

King Saul

DEBATES LECTURES

RAND SCHOOL
7 E. 15th Street

V. F. Calverton
"Social Interpretation of American Literature"
Fridays, 8:30 P. M.

David P. Berenberg
"A Literary Workshop"
Mondays, 7 P. M.

Marius Hansome
"A Critical Approach to Sociology"
Tuesdays, 8:30 P. M.

NATIONALISM
Six Lectures on the most important World-problem today
By Carlton J. H. Hayes, Ph.D., LL.D.
Professor of History in Columbia University
In the COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM
Park Avenue and 34th Street
On Thursday evenings, Oct. 15, 22, 29
Nov. 5, 12, 19, at 8:15 o'clock
Course tickets, $2.50, can be secured in advance at the office of the Community Church, 12 Park Avenue.
Single Admission, 75 cents.

BOOKS

Blind Author's Allegory
THE SHIP BEAUTIFUL
A Two-fold Tale By C. R. ALLEN

Are you tired of the recent glut of fiction with its inevitable sex element? If so you will enjoy reading a striking story by a new author, revealing a touching human story of authorship as a relief to blindness.

THE SHIP BEAUTIFUL

Described as a two-fold tale because of the double interest of a life of a boy and his master, its appeal is equally to grown-ups or children.

THE SHIP BEAUTIFUL

met with universally excellent press reviews in England, and the first edition was sold out shortly after publication.

Price - - - - - - - $2.50

Frederick Warne & Co., Ltd., 26 East 22nd St., New York

When answering advertisements, please mention The Nation because she would be compelled in clearing herself to confess to the lawyer who is defending her that she loves him, a thing which her delicacy will not permit her to do. Now, such scruples as these may possibly have affected the conduct of the most extravagant of the troubadours; they have certainly survived in the factitious romances of a much later period; but no one can possibly believe that in the twentieth century which M. Brieux professes to study any sane woman would behave as his heroine does. Life has its terrible dilemmas and doubtless lawyers see many of them, but this one surely never existed save in the mind of a romancer, and any writer who uses it confesses the essential unreality of the world in which his imagination dwells.

Granted its factitiousness, the play is as well written and as well produced as it possibly could be. Conventionally "strong" situations succeed one another with rapid precision; Mr. E. H. Sothern lends all the resources of his eloquent voice to the speeches of the lawyer; Ann Davis acts the emotional role with a really extraordinary virtuosity, Lester Lonergan gives another fine performance, and over all hovers the deft hand of Mr. Belasco. Yet even while one admires the various talents displayed one cannot help wondering why anyone would choose to lavish so much upon a production which cannot in the end be other than hollow and meaningless. I am well aware that for ten years at least critics who have marveled at Mr. Belasco's resources have remonstrated with him for his waste of them without disturbing either his financial success or his own contentment. I know that he consciously, deliberately, and confessedly keeps his hands off any drama which has literary value and that though he will produce either unpretentious or pretentious plays he demands that all shall have an element of falsity in them. I cannot help protesting again. "Accused" will be a success; people will once more admire its producer's unfailing skill and many, even among the more intelligent, will find themselves at moments forgetting the emptiness of the play. Yet they will go away without ever having been really touched at any moment. They will, perhaps, have had a certain illusion of emotion; tears may perhaps be wrung from their eyes; but the illusion will vanish utterly before they have been half an hour away from the theater. No incident in all the play is real enough to come home to their bosoms, to give them one flash of new insight into the hearts of real men, or to enrich them by the comprehension of one genuine human emotion. Surely Mr. Belasco could do better things if he would. Others have shown him that today, at least, equal financial returns can be reaped from plays that have thought, meaning. and life in their lines. Mr. Belasco has a genuine passion for the theater. Why, then, will he never, even by way of experiment, permit it to be more than the ingenious toy which he has brought to perfection?

"The Butter and Egg Man" (Longacre Theater) is pretty continuously funny and yet in spite of that fact it is something of a disappointment to those who have come to expect from George Kaufman a fresh satiric truth. From the title one hoped for a really racy slice of Broadway life, but one got instead a thoroughly conventional farce which might well have been written by a man who had never observed anything except the theater; the fact that it is, in its way, sufficiently amusing does not quite make up for the disappointment. "A Holy Terror" (Geo. M. Cohan Theater), in which George Abbott gives one of his usual ingratiating portraits of an amiable ruffian, begins as a highly promising melodrama, but develops such an unsuspected fund of sweetness and light among its characters as to lose a good deal of its verisimilitude in spite of one excellent portrait—that of the army officer, excellently played by William Goddard. "Merry Merry" (Vanderbilt Theater) is a lively and rather informal musical comedy which had perhaps best be described as glorifying the chorus girl.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The SONGS OF SAPPHO

Translated into Rimed Verse by Marion Mills Miller, Litt.D.

Greek text prepared and annotated by David M. Robinson, Professor of Archaeology and Lecturer on Greek in the Johns Hopkins University. With introduction by Professor Robinson on the recovery and restoration of the Egyptian relics, and a critical Memoir of Sappho.

A definitive edition of the writings of the Lesbian Poetess including the recent Egyptian discoveries, and of the classic poetic tributes to her genius, containing also Ovid's romance of "Sappho and Phaon."

"An important addition to Sapphic lore."—Boston Transcript.

This edition is limited to 750 numbered copies, printed on rose laid antique paper, bound in parchment back and Fabriano boards, stamped in gold, and illustrated with rare ancient pictures of Sappho and Sapphic scenes and symbols. Octavo. Price $20.00 per copy.

FRANK-MAURICE, INC., Publishers
15 West 37th Street New York City

Progressive Education

October Issue

THE SOCIAL STUDIES

Accounts of curriculum reconstruction in various New Schools. Articles on—

Curriculum Making in Women's Colleges
The City as a Social Laboratory
Science as a Social Factor
Education for Citizenship

Reports of the Educational Conventions at Edinburgh and Heidelberg.

Reviews of the most recent educational books.
Educational notes and comments of significance.

January Issue

THE NEW CHILD STUDIES

A résumé of recent developments in psychology, mental hygiene, nutrition, growth and related fields of child research.

Published by

THE PROGRESSIVE EDUCATION ASSOCIATION

10 Jackson Place Washington, D. C.

Subscription, including membership in the association, $2.00
Single copies, 50 cents

NO MORE PARADES

By Ford Madox Ford

"IT dwarfs most current fiction to negligibility!" claimed The New York Evening Post last year upon the publication of Some Do Not, the predecessor of No More Parades. This new novel is written with the same pitiless realism, dramatic insight and frankness which have made Ford one of England's most distinguished men of letters. $2.50

THE NEW NEGRO

Edited by Alain Locke

THE Negro is today a new figure on the national canvas and a new force in the foreground of affairs. Some of the contributors in this volume, in which the Negro speaks for himself, are: Countee Cullen, James Weldon Johnson, Walter F. White, Albert C. Barnes, Paul Robeson, etc. With many illustrations in color by Winold Reiss. $5.00

COLLECTED STORIES

By Fitz-James O'Brien with an introduction
by Edward J. O'Brien

"THE short stories of Fitz-James O'Brien are the creative result of a very powerful intellect playing with considerable intensity upon an interior life of great depth and terror, and not only registering with precision its own reactions to the discoveries, but formulating a philosophy as daring as Poe's. The best of his short stories call for no apologies, except our own for neglecting them so long."—From the Introduction. $2.00

IN THE AMERICAN GRAIN

By William Carlos Williams

"IN these studies I have sought to rename the things seen, now lost in a chaos of borrowed titles, under which the true character lies hid. It has been my wish to draw from every source one thing, the strange phosphorus of the life, nameless under an old misappellation."—William Carlos Williams. $3.00

CLAIRE LENOIR

By Villiers de L'Isle-Adam
Translated by Arthur Symons

"HE is a writer who is at once a transcendentalist and a man of the world, a cynic and a believer in the things of the spirit. In reading him you pass from exaltation to buffoonery with the turn of a page, and are never quite sure whether he is speaking seriously or in jest.—Arthur Symons in the Preface. $2.00

THE JESUIT RELATIONS

Edited by Edna Kenton

TEN thousand Catholics went to the Mohawk valley in New York state last month to attend the ceremonies in connection with the recent beatification in Rome of a Jesuit martyr. This book, for the first time, makes available in a readable form the Relations or Narratives written by the Jesuit missionaries during the 17th century. They contain the only complete and thrilling accounts of the Red Indian at that time. $5.00

BAUDELAIRE

COMPLETE

Translated by Arthur Symons

(His Entire Works In Verse, Poems en Prose and Les Paradis Artificiels.)

MR. SYMONS is here on his own and best ground. No other complete or adequate translation of this, one of the very greatest of French poets, exists. $3.50

MICHAEL SCARLETT

By James Gould Cozzens

THE tremendous verve, smash and swing in the actions of the young Elizabethans are fully captured in this romantic novel. The author has aimed to present the young bloods of the fifteen nineties who behaved roughly like Sophomores, indecently hot after "the daily abominations of dicing, gaming, play performing, dancing, guzzling, quarreling and whoring." $2.00

THE BEGINNINGS OF HISTORY ACCORDING TO THE JEWS

By Charles Prospero Fagnani

MR. ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS, attorney of the Scopes trial defence, writes, "Considerable of the evidence about the Bible to which we referred on the trial was gleaned from this book." It is an entirely new translation of the first eleven chapters of Genesis, with a foreword and a conclusion. It probes the question—Are the fundamentalists ignorant of the Bible? $1.00

VIEW OF QUEBEC IN 1700
(FROM THE JESUIT RELATIONS)

ALBERT & CHARLES BONI Publishers 39 West 8th St. NEW YORK

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1925 No. 3146

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 449

EDITORIALS:

Mr. Coolidge's Wonderful Speech 452
Russia in Wall Street 453
On Defending Poetry 453
A Royal Gift 454

THE PICTURE PAPERS WIN. By Jo Swerling 455

NEGRO SEGREGATION COMES NORTH. By Walter F. White 458

A BACK-COUNTRY BOLSHEVIK. By Anna Louise Strong 460

IN THE DRIFTWAY 462

CORRESPONDENCE 463

BOOKS AND PLAYS:

If We Take All Gold. By Louise Bogan 464
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 464
Mr. Stefansson on Wrangel Island. By Frederick S. Dellenbaugh 464
A Dream of Venice. By Joseph Wood Krutch 465
The Modern Art of Paleography. By E. K. Rand 466
The Man with the Hoe. By Rexford Guy Tugwell 467
Elegant Propagandists. By Ludwig Lewisohn 468
Books in Brief 469
Drama: Bohemia's West End. By Joseph Wood Krutch 470

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Autocracy in the Virgin Islands 470

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

FUNDAMENTALISM WON a "disastrous victory" in the General Convention of the Protestant Episcopal Church when Bishop William Montgomery Brown was formally deposed, although a federal court order has been served upon the church to show cause why the proceed[illegible] against him should not be halted. Bishop Brown was charged with publishing views contrary to the doctrine of the church; and the pivotal question upon which his case hinged was whether a bishop in 1925 must accept all or any of the credal statements literally. Bishop Brown accepted them all "symbolically," but his break with supernaturalism was so complete that he seemed to his fellow-bishops to be an utter atheist. When the master minds of the church, however, set out to draw the line between permissible and unpermissible interpretations of the creeds, they gave up the riddle as quite beyond them and fell back on the sacred Fourth-Century words of the liturgies as "doctrine" to which a bishop must subscribe. This is rather more, apparently, than John Roach Straton ever demanded of the Southern Baptists, and Bishop Brown is making the most of it. In the meantime, as the case stands, the Protestant Episcopal Church has cleansed itself of heresy at [illegible] sacrifice of its traditions and its common sense. If the action of the bishops seems too raw even for a federal judge, the church may yet give Bishop Brown a real trial.

SOME PEOPLE STILL DOUBT the need of a federal anti-lynching law. "Let the States take care of their own," they say. We invite their attention to the State of Mississippi. On September 20 at New Albany a mob took a Negro, Jim Ivy, from a sheriff who made no fight to stop them, carried him to Rocky Ford, tied him to a stake, and burned him alive, after the traditional fashion of lynchings in the romantic Old South. Governor Whitfield had the decency to issue a statement on September 21, saying:

> The time has come when the law-abiding citizens of Mississippi should assert themselves in no uncertain terms against such mob action and should rally to the support of the peace officers in maintaining the integrity of the law.

On the same day the Memphis News Scimitar published photographs of lynching scenes. These photographs show members of the mob with drawn guns and Jim Ivy with a noose around his neck; the faces of scores of mob members are so plain that a police officer would not have the slightest difficulty in recognizing and arresting them.

DID THE MEMBERS OF THAT MOB fear Mississippi justice? Were they afraid that, recognized, they would be punished? Not at all. One of the mob members let himself be photographed standing on a platform with Jim Ivy. He was warned, the News Scimitar says, that the picture would be published. "All right; go ahead," he replied. One William N. Bradshaw boasted that he was a member of the mob. The Jackson Daily News quotes this Mississippian as follows:

> Not an officer in Union County or any of the neighbor counties will point out any member of the crowd. Why, if he did, the best thing for him to do would be to jump into an airplane headed for Germany—quick.
>
> Sure, the officers know who were there. Everybody down there knows everybody else. We're all neighbors and neighbors' neighbors.
>
> Saturday night there were at least 10,000 men with [illegible] on their edge of New Albany; the county seat, but it was a perfectly orderly crowd. Everybody was in their [illegible] and no one tried to conceal his identity. . . .
>
> A delegation of us went to Johnny [the sheriff] and told him that we were tired of fooling around and that he had to produce Ivy or take the consequences. He said "Well, boys, . . . I'll put him in the county jail here. If you let me get him in jail and locked up, and then overpower me and get him I can't help it." We agreed to that. . . .
>
> Investigation? Shucks, there won't be any—or if there is it won't amount to anything. No officer down there is going to dare try to identify anyone, because nobody's mad about it. Even one of the judges down there said he didn't believe in mob law except in a few cases, and this was one of those, and that [illegible] burning if it hadn't been bad policy. They'd be plenty mad, though, if anyone were arrested, and there'd be a million dollars ready in five minutes to go his bond.

WILLIAM BRADSHAW WAS RIGHT. The sheriff announced that he [illegible] no one in the mob. When reporters called the governor's attention to Bradshaw's defiance and showed him the photographs which revealed the faces of members of the mob, he replied, "I have no plans for an investigation." Mississippi is Mississippi. It is no crime to burn a man alive in that State, if his skin is black. Neither county nor State officials will punish a gang of murderers if their victim is a Negro. If the people of this country want lynching stopped they will have to do it by Federal action.

AN EMPEROR SITS AGAIN AT ROME. True, he still calls himself by the more equivocal title of Premier, but he might as well, imitating a famous predecessor, also Italian-born, take from the hands of the Pope the imperial crown and, as the only person in the world fit to do the service, place it upon his own head. The recent agreement between the organization of Fascist employers and the General Federation of Labor practically destroys the trade unions and eliminates the Socialists as a factor in politics. Under the new ruling, employers in labor disputes will deal only with members of Fascist unions; disputes will be solved only by a juridical body appointed by the state; after the state-appointed magistrate has been appealed to, all strikes and lock-outs or other appeals from his decisions will be forbidden and, one assumes, dealt with in true Fascist style. In addition, it is proposed that the powers of the Government—that is, of Mussolini—be strengthened and those of Parliament curtailed. Finally, local government has been taken out of the hands of local officers and will be controlled by government-appointed officials responsible to the central government. The communiqué in which these proposals is embodied contains certain noble thoughts on government well worth quoting:

> The administration of public affairs requires high-grade competence and specific culture, and is incompatible with a legislative system which, not taking into account local conditions, partakes of the erroneous presumption of the administrative capacity of citizens who scarcely know how to read and write.

IT IS GOOD TO KNOW that the Italian Government rests in the hands of these cultured and competent officials. As an example of the high character of the Fascist control the recent riots in Florence will serve. Fascist persecution of the Freemasons of that city, in the course of which shops were burnt and ransacked and members of the offending guild driven from town, resulted in the shooting of a member of the local Fascist Directory in the act of demanding a list of Florentine Freemasons from one of their number. The Freemason was killed by a Fascist mob as he was being taken to the police station; houses of other Freemasons were burnt to the ground, and several of the occupants were murdered. Armed Fascisti kept firemen from extinguishing these fires and the police were given orders not to interfere with the Fascists engaged in "reprisals," who, busy with the above-mentioned activities, yet found time to enter every theater in the city and drive the audiences into the streets at the point of their guns.

MURDER WILL OUT. When for six weeks after the murder of Matteotti the sidewalk in front of his house was heaped with flowers and crowded with sorrowing men and women praying for the repose of his soul Premier Mussolini must have had some anxious moments. His conscience was not of the best. The publication in the New York World of secret documents connecting Mussolini directly with Matteotti's murder and disclosing him as the head of an Italian Cheka bear out the documents printed in the International Relations Section of The Nation last April. These confessions, written by men who were trying to save their own skins when they feared that their chief was about to desert them, tell the same story: Matteotti was kidnapped and put to death by a group of Fascists, acting under orders of the Fascist leaders, including Mussolini himself. The existence of a secret society with the Premier at its head is repeatedly insisted upon, and this organization has apparently been responsible for other crimes of violence. The trial of those immediately responsible for Matteotti's abduction and assassination takes place shortly; an attempt will be made to whitewash the affair, to try the accused for "homicide without premeditation," and to keep out of the trial any testimony which might implicate those higher up. But meanwhile the confessions are in general circulation; the names of Fillipelli, Cesare Rossi, Marinelli, and one who may not be mentioned are on Italian tongues far oftener than those of the dupes who are standing trial.

THE GOVERNMENT SHIPPING SITUATION gets steadily worse. Following the removal of Rear Admiral Palmer from the headship of the Emergency Fleet Corporation came the resignation of Rear Admiral H. I. Cone as vice-president and general manager, and the discharge of Sidney Henry, vice-president in charge of finances. Then the President let it be known that his feelings were injured by the fact that Elmer E. Crowley was appointed to Rear Admiral Palmer's place without his, the President's, being consulted. Unfortunately for public understanding of the situation it is gravely involved. There is first the issue of the independence of the Shipping Board, which must be upheld against all comers, including the President. But there is also question as to the good faith and efficiency of the Shipping Board itself, and finally, the question of the relative merits of the Shipping Board and the Fleet Corporation. As to this our sympathies are with Admiral Palmer. He has sold ships while others talked about doing so. He has reduced the deficit of the corporation by 22 million dollars, placed the fleet on a business basis, and, most notable of all, refused to play politics. Sometimes the members of the Shipping Board have seemed too conscious of the fact that if all the ships were sold their jobs would be gone. At any rate, this unseemly squabbling calls for prompt action by Congress. Both boards should be abolished and control of the fleet be placed in the hands of one man.

CAILLAUX ARRIVES in France with his desk stacked high. Parliamentary opposition to his American agreement probably seems to him one of his lesser worries. He cannily took with him as members of his mission enough members of the opposition parties to commit their leadership to a friendly attitude. But his financial problem has not begun to be solved. He did not bring back with him any large American loans, or even any immediate hope of such substantial aid, and the problem of financing the ordinary expenses of his Government, plus the enormous cost of the war in Africa, and the added burden of the war against the Druse Nationalists in Syria, is almost superhuman. Domestic short-term indebtedness is coming due, and his first attempt at magic—an attempt to pay the old loans with new paper, with interest payments guaranteed in gold—has not achieved the expected results. Apparently only 5 billion francs have been "converted" in this fashion, where 25 billion were hoped for. The floating debt totals 60 billion francs, and the note circulation of the Bank of France has moved up to 47 billions. One short-term issue fell due on September 25; another matures December 8. Prices are rising, and with two wars on hand reduction of government expenditures is unlikely. What will the financial wizard try next?

WE HOPE that the English Speaking Union and other patriotic societies will take note of a scandalous bit of anti-British propaganda which appeared in the New York Times the other day. The publication of this vile attack upon one of our Allies would probably have been punished with imprisonment during the war. Should it be tolerated in peace time? We print in full this obvious piece of propaganda that all may see its falsity. The distinction of the original offender is no excuse for the needless republication of the following letter to Lord Cornwallis, written from Camp Middlebrook, June 2, 1777:

> My Lord:
>
> It is with infinite regret I am again compelled to remonstrate against that spirit of wanton cruelty that has in several instances influenced the conduct of your soldiery.
>
> A recent exercise of it toward an unhappy officer of ours, Lieut. Martin, convinces me that my former representations on that subject have been unavailing. That gentleman, by the fortune of war, on Saturday last was thrown into the hands of a party of your horse and unnecessarily murdered with the most aggravated circumstances of barbarity.
>
> I wish not to wound your Lordship's feelings by commenting on this event, but I think it my duty to send his mangled body to your lines, as an undeniable testimony of the fact, should it be doubted, and as the best appeal to your humanity for the justice of our complaint.
>
> I have the honor to be, with due respect,
>
> Your Lordship's Most Obedient Servant,
>
> G. WASHINGTON

PUNISHMENT AS A DETERRENT to crime still has many champions, and the killing of a murderer by the State is thought by thousands of persons to act as an effective warning to other prospective murderers. The total of 288 murders in 279 days in Cook County would seem to indicate that as a deterrent capital punishment was somewhat lacking. And it is good to record the words of Enrico Ferri, Italy's greatest criminologist, who roundly denounces capital punishment as a preventive of murder. In Italy, when this method of dealing with criminals was abolished in 1890, the same arguments were advanced as are advanced in the United States today, the same downfall of society was predicted, and what happened instead was a marked decrease in murders. Mr. Ferri declares the true remedy for crime to be social reform. He thus places the responsibility for the criminal on society, where it belongs. Decent living conditions, the opportunity to master a trade and to exercise it in order to obtain a proper living, education which will direct the abundant energies of young men and women into social and not anti-social channels—all these are infinitely better ways of dealing with an errant citizen than putting him into a jail where he consorts with habitual criminals and learns from them more ways of cheating society. At best, jails are miserable places; and they are seldom at their best. In them, more than in any other place, crime flourishes. The criminal's period of punishment is usually a period of education in criminality; and his incarceration, instead of protecting society, places it at the mercy of more adept plunderers.

IS THE NIGHT AIR MAIL a proved success? Or is the Chicago Tribune right in claiming that it averages slower than the old express-train service? We do not know. But we do know this, that the Post Office Department is 100 per cent wrong in attempting to convince the public by war-time propaganda methods instead of by a record of service. We have received a letter from E. C. Garrabrant, assistant traffic manager of the Air Mail Service, which asks us to help boost the night air mail by printing a "canned" editorial, thoughtfully provided for us ready written:

> To aid you in this objective of common interest [says Mr. Garrabrant] we attach a suggested editorial, which you may desire to revamp or can use as presented.
>
> This editorial was prepared by Mr. F. B. DeBerard, director of research of the Merchants Association of New York.
>
> This association and the Advertising Club are actively interested in cooperating with some of the details of our department. . . .

The "White House spokesman," through those trained seals, the Washington correspondents, fills the news columns of the papers with government propaganda day after day; and now the departments are trying to write the country's editorials for it. It is just a little too much.

EVEN IF MACMILLAN and his crew had to turn back without discovering the new polar land they hoped to claim for the State of Maine, they found uncharted mountain ranges and made fascinating observations of plants and birds and Norse ruins. Their three generations of exploring craft—schooner, steamer, and navy airplanes—had such rough going that they were forced to report against airplanes and in favor of Zeppelins for future exploration. MacMillan knows the natives better than most explorers. All along the coast of Greenland he stopped and entertained them with moving pictures of their villages taken last year. His party went to church and heard Eskimo hymns, presented the natives with radio sets, rescued a shipwrecked Danish crew, and saved an Eskimo boy washed out to sea when an iceberg exploded.

"CHRISTY" MATHEWSON has been dead nearly a fortnight—long enough for all ordinary persons and almost all baseball players to be forgotten. But Mathewson belongs to the heroic age of baseball, before the blight of commercialization was obvious. A generation of grown-up small boys and girls recall his legendary prowess and cherish the memory of a personal encounter on the diamond today. "Matty" shone in a group of brilliant stars; among his fellow-players were Big Chief Myers, Napoleon Lajoie, Hughie Jennings, Hooks Wiltse, Hans Wagner, Mike Donlin, Fred Merkle, Rube Marquard, Red Murray, Three-Fingered Brown, Iron Man McGinnity, and a host of others. Each great in his way, "Matty" outshone them all; he was a national hero. The wise historian will give him more space than many Presidential candidates.

Mr. Coolidge's Wonderful Speech

APPARENTLY we are suffering from that mental and moral astigmatism of which our enemies accuse us, for we find ourselves in extraordinary disagreement with most of our contemporaries as to President Coolidge's speech to the American Legion at Omaha on October 6. The New York Times exults over the liberalism of this oration as confuting those critics who "have been indulging in sneers at Calvin Coolidge as a hopeless conservative tied and bound. But his liberalism is of the old-fashioned American kind. . . . It is a liberalism good enough for this day and for the American people." The New York World is so astounded to hear Calvin Coolidge appealing for freedom of speech and for tolerance in America that it completely loses its editorial self in shrieks of joy:

> The Coolidge who delivered that speech is not the Coolidge of a year ago. Then he was an oracle of safe platitudes, a man who spoke truism rather than truth. Coming from the average public man at such a time the speech would have been extraordinary; coming from Mr. Coolidge it was well-nigh incredible.

The next day it returned to the charge and found in this speech insight, intelligence, and force. "There is wisdom and courage and that tolerance for which the President himself pleads." As for President MacCracken of Vassar, he believes, if the press reports can be trusted, that portion of the speech will live forever. All of which leaves us gasping. We do not deny that Mr. Coolidge took a new tack; that the author of the famous series upon the "Red" menace in our women's colleges, notably Vassar (which, incredible as it may seem, had on its faculty, according to Calvin Coolidge, a woman professor who heard the Soviet ambassador talk in Washington and liked him!) has used words quite unaccustomed to his mouth. But beyond that the speech strikes us as a successful combination of bunk, platitudes, and contradictions, a facing-both-ways with such dexterity that our friends the editors have fallen for it again as some of us did for the sentimental sententiousness and noble nothings of Woodrow Wilson, as many did for the pious frauds of Warren Harding and the robust rhodomantade of Theodore Roosevelt. How eager we all are to be fooled!

Now let Mr. Coolidge, the great new liberal, speak. He turns early in his address to the question of war and peace and military establishments:

> War has become less probable; peace has become more secure.

But

> Our country has a larger army and a more powerful navy costing annually almost twice as much as it ever before had in time of peace. I am a thorough believer in a policy of adequate military preparation.

Although

> It is our purpose in our intercourse with foreign Powers to rely not upon the strength of our fleets and our armies.

And

> In spite of all the arguments in favor of great military forces no nation that had an army large enough to guarantee it against attack in time of peace or to insure

And

> We know and every one knows that these old [military] systems, antagonisms, and reliance on force have failed.

Yet

> National defense should be at all times supported.

Turning to the war itself Mr. Coolidge declares:

> We feared no other country

But

> We believed, moreover, that those institutions which we cherish with supreme affection and which lie at the foundation of our whole scheme of human relationship—the right of freedom, of equality, of self-government—were all in jeopardy.

In winning the war "the country found its soul," and

> No man's patriotism was impugned or service questioned because of his racial origin, his political opinion, or his religious convictions.

But

> One of the most natural reactions during the war was intolerance. But the inevitable disregard for the opinions and feelings of minorities is none the less a disturbing product of war psychology. The slow and difficult advance which tolerance and liberalism have made through long periods of development are dissipated almost in a night.

We find our soul in war but

> It will always be impossible to harmonize justice and war.

As for Mr. Coolidge's views on Americanism:

> I realize the full and complete necessity of 100 per cent Americanism.

But

> Whatever tends to standardize the community, to establish fixed and rigid modes of thought, tends to fossilize society.

We must all realize that:

> It is the ferment of ideas, the clash of disagreeing judgments, the privilege of the individual to develop his own thoughts and shape his own character, that makes progress possible.

But

> The necessity for a common purpose and a united intellectual front becomes paramount to everything else.

After all, concludes cautious Mr. Coolidge:

> I make no plea for leniency toward those who . . . are not prepared to accept the true standards of our citizenship. By tolerance I do not mean indifference to evil; I mean respect for different kinds of good.

These are only a few of the characteristic gems. They take no note of the devastatingly original sparks of thought which pervade the address, such as "We must mobilize the conscience of mankind" (pace Woodrow Wilson); "We must reaffirm and reinforce our ancient faith in truth and justice, in charitableness and tolerance." Mr. Coolidge's final discovery is this: "The economic problems of society are important." There we agree with Mr. MacCracken. That sublime thought will, we are sure, reverberate down the ages.

Russia in Wall Street

RUSSIA not merely is coming back; she has come back. Americans, fatigued by years of theoretical discussions of soviet methods, have paid too little attention to the remarkable advances which Russia has been making. American business men, however, are not asleep. For poverty-stricken Russia is importing American goods, despite the difficulties caused by lack of governmental recognition, at an amazing rate. In 1924 she imported more American goods than pre-war Czarist Russia did. In August, 1925, she took more American goods than she had done in the entire year of 1923. And she did it with the aid of credits advanced by canny American bankers who saw in Russia perspectives of increasing American business.

There are still papers like the New York Times which editorially pooh-pooh the reports of their own correspondents in Soviet Russia. These editors have acquired a habit of which they cannot rid themselves, but the bankers who recently met to hear the reports of one of their number just returned from Russia are more interested in present-day facts than in their prejudices of yesteryear. And one may suspect that ex-Governor Goodrich, once of Mr. Hoover's American Relief Administration, has not been spending months in Russia solely in the interest of his Indiana farm. Governor Goodrich has been in the past one of Mr. Hoover's most faithful correspondents, and there is no reason to believe that their relation has changed. Correspondents in Russia report that he is struck by the agricultural revival in Russia, and believes that the Soviet crop estimates, however favorable, probably underestimate the success of the crop; he is also impressed by the "orderly and relatively efficient work in the factories."

In the first half of 1925 Russian trade with the United States amounted, according to the Department of Commerce, to nearly sixty million dollars. Only six millions of this were imports from Russia into the United States; the rest were goods exported from America to Russia. But this disproportion is hardly greater than in pre-war days, when Russia shipped us about eight million dollars' worth of goods each year, and imported more than forty million dollars' worth. The significant fact is that Russia is back in the market, despite all the handicaps which a hostile world has imposed upon her. Her cotton-goods industry operated last year at 92 per cent of the 1913 output; her metal industry at 90 per cent; coal at 79 per cent; oil at 85. The car loadings were four-fifths of the 1913 figure, despite the amputations of her territory on the Western front; and she actually produced four times as much electric power as in that pre-war year. Lenin's dream of an electrified Russia is becoming more than a dream.

Another aspect of Russian industry is also worth considering. The cotton-goods industry produced last year (1924-25) more than five times as much goods as in 1921-22, with less than twice the number of workers and less than three times the number of spindles; and the goods were marketed at prices 50 per cent lower. Russia's labor is not merely returning to work; it is working more efficiently.

Russia's foreign trade of course implies an increased confidence among non-Russian business men. While the business world as a whole has maintained its suspicions of the terrible Bolsheviki here and there experimenters have entered on the pioneer path of friendly and normal trade relations. Nor is it outside speculators and concession-hunters who are blazing the trail. The New York correspondents of the Soviet State Bank are today the Guaranty Trust Co., the Equitable Trust Co., the Irving Bank-Columbia Trust Co., and similar firms. The Chase National Bank and the Equitable have dealt in large figures with the Amtorg Trading Corporation and the All-Russian Textile Syndicate, through which the Soviet Government makes its largest purchases in the United States.

But after all, compared with the possibilities of Russian trade, this return to the level of 1913 is but a drop in the bucket. Large credits will be impossible until official recognition gives a new and evident stability to the situation. The Russian Government cannot yet maintain deposits in American banks, and has to form American corporations to do its business here. The largest American credits which Russia is receiving come indirectly, through British and German agents. As M. Gurievich, of the Supreme Council of National Economy, put it the other day:

> German firms, for instance the Krupps, have come here, received large orders on credit terms we can accept, and then, with the order in their pockets, borrowed money from American banks in order to swing the contracts. They pay American banks 4 or 5 per cent, and charge us 9 per cent. They use American money to get a firm foothold in the Russian field.

That, of course, cannot long persist. A business administration such as we have in Washington, will not eternally bury its head in the sands heaped up by Mr. Hughes's prejudices. The Government which excludes Saklatavala gladly grants visas today to Russian Communists who come with orders for cotton and machinery in their hands, and the time may come when Big Business will force the Government to recognize the Bolsheviks.

On Defending Poetry

IT is not many years since Matthew Arnold declared of the future of poetry that it was "immense." Just now, in the interesting series of prophecies ("Today and Tomorrow") which the house of Dutton is importing from England, appears a volume, "Thamyris," whose sub-title asks whether there is any such future at all. The author, Mr. R. C. Trevelyan, seems to take up the question where Arnold left off—namely, at the point where science presents itself as the enemy, or at least the rival, of the oldest literary art. Arnold, himself touched with the malady of melancholy which ravaged his century, clutched at poetry as the one possession of the race capable of "consoling" it while its dogmas dissolved and its science crystallized:

> Without poetry [he said] our science will appear incomplete; and most of existing [illegible] for religion and philosophy will be replaced by poetry. . . . The day will come when we shall wonder at ourselves for having trusted to them, for having taken them seriously; and the more we perceive their hollowness, the more we shall prize "the breath and finer spirit of knowledge" offered to us by poetry.

That day, according to Mr. Trevelyan, is by no means here:

> [illegible] view > of man's destinies. Poetry, they tell us, like mythology, religion, and metaphysics, is a primitive and puerile function of the human mind. It is already becoming superseded by less rudimentary, more rational means of self-expression. We are entering upon an era of science and prose, and may as well at once frankly put away poetry, along with other childish things.

And although Mr. Trevelyan proceeds to disagree with the gloomy ones whose convictions he paraphrases, he also proceeds, as Matthew Arnold had done, to take them very seriously. He respects them so much, indeed, that he is willing to predict a future only for some sort of poetry which is "more rational and responsible," more "intelligently aware" of our new civilization, and more conscious of the fact that "our habits of mind are growing continually more scientific." Macaulay's famous thesis that "as civilization advances poetry almost necessarily declines" is evidently yet laid in its grave.

If the existence of enemies to poetry is evidence that the future of the art is questionable, then it must be concluded that that future always has been questionable; for poetry never has been without its enemies. The line of attack for two thousand years in Europe was not scientific but moral. Plato turned the poets out of his republic because he thought they would serve no useful purpose there, and he started a controversy which ran at least as far as Shelley. The later classical critics and most of the medieval and Renaissance critics argued forever—and with how little effect!—over the purposes of poetry and over its philosophical or its ethical value. Sidney wrote an "Apology" and Shelley a "Defence." Always there was an effort to establish a laudable function for the poet. The emphasis and the terms have shifted now. Instead of asking whether poetry is good, men ask today whether poetry is at all—or whether, in that future which we so love to talk about, poetry will be. But the essential character of the dispute has nowise changed. The motive for the attack is perhaps no less moral than it ever was. The cardinal sin for most of us, after all, is idleness; and if the conviction ever becomes universal that poets are wasting their time then poets will have to go. At least they will be invited to leave the efficient society which we are promised.

The saving fact, of course, is the existence of poets. This may or may not be a scientific fact, but it ought to be sufficient comfort for those harassed persons who are at a loss to explain why poets should be. They are; they always have been; will they not always continue to be? One who predicts a future for them need by no means subscribe to the superstition which bestows immortal life upon all things that ever have been. Certain diseases that have been are now no more. The germ has been isolated. What of the germ of poetry? So far it has not been isolated, though more attention has been lavished on it than has been lavished on any victim of the microscope. And—sadly enough for science—this attention has been for the most part friendly. Most of the definitions of the poetic function have been arrived at in the hope that they would incidentally justify that function. Poetry has been called a comforter, a soother, an interpreter of life; and modern psychologists have endeavored to make a place for it in the necessary world of dreams. But poetry has never been defined, as laughter has never been defined. In that very fact, it may be, its future sleeps secure.

A Royal Gift

OF all the Coolidges commend us to Mrs. Frederic Shurtleff Coolidge. For years she has been one of the great benefactors of the musical world of America, especially in the field of chamber music. It is to her that we owe the annual Berkshire festival at Norfolk, Connecticut, at which a prize is awarded for the best new chamber-music composition. More than one artist or musical organization owes to her an unforgettable debt of financial and spiritual encouragement, and all of this she has done without any blowing of trumpets or self-advertisement, but in the modest way characteristic of most Americans whose situation enables them to be generous donors in the field of the fine arts. But all of these acts, valuable as they are, are overshadowed by her latest benefaction. She has provided a sum of nearly $100,000 for the building of an auditorium to be managed by the Library of Congress for chamber music and similar purposes.

This is certainly a most high-minded and far-sighted donation, but it is only part of the story, for Mrs. Coolidge has accompanied it by a much larger trust fund to produce an annual income of $28,200 a year to maintain the hall and to aid the music division of the Library of Congress to encourage the study and production of compositions. But let her speak in her own words:

> I have wished to make possible through the Library of Congress the composition and performance of music in ways which might otherwise be considered too unique or too expensive to be ordinarily undertaken. Not this alone, of course, nor with a view to extravagance for its own sake; but as an occasional possibility of giving precedence to considerations of quality over those of quantity; to artistic rather than to economic values, and to opportunity rather than to expediency.

We know of no gift that quite compares with this and we hail it all the more gladly because in this country the government does not encourage musical and artistic talent as is possible in other countries. As a stimulus to music writing this gift will be of enormous benefit and that benefit will increase as the years go on. Fortunately, Congress has already created a trust fund board in connection with the Library of Congress, so that there is an organization ready to administer the gift. Indeed, it has recently received an endowment fund of $100,000 from Dr. James B. Wilbur of Manchester, Vermont, for the acquisition of source material for the study of history.

These gifts are not only, as the New York Times points out, a recognition of what the Librarian of Congress, Mr. Herbert Putnam, has done to upbuild the institution of which he is the inspiring head; they also demonstrate the opportunity of a non-partisan organization under the federal government free from political taint which not only can be relied upon to act as a faithful custodian of its priceless historical collections but shall also become the creator and inspirer of original work. There is no reason whatever why Mrs. Coolidge's gift should not be followed by similar endowments to be used to aid talent in the fields of painting, sculpture, and poetry. As some of our universities have begun to realize, there is a crying need for the safeguarding of genius which can never be financially profitable, yet must be guided to create as the soul dictates.

The Picture Papers Win

By JO SWERLING

THERE is a furrow in the formerly smooth brow of Adolph S. Ochs, publisher of the New York Times. Mr. and Mrs. Ogden M. Reid of the Herald Tribune pretend to be unconcerned, but care sits upon their shoulders. Frank A. Munsey has paused in his career of journalicide. Cyrus H. K. Curtis of Philadelphia and New York is grateful that he has the Saturday Evening Post and the Ladies' Home Journal to fall back on in an emergency. Herbert Bayard Swope, the only newspaper editor in America who has a racehorse named after him, assumes these days a carefully schooled expression of indifference. William Randolph Hearst and Arthur Brisbane are heroically building theaters against the inevitable deluge.

The tabloid picture paper has attacked intrenched eight-column journalism and threatens to become a new, mongrel Fourth Estate.

And, in a short time, Joseph Medill Patterson of Chicago, who started it all, will come to New York to live. It's a promise. When the New York Daily News reaches a steady circulation of over a million copies per day—and that may be tomorrow or the day after—Mr. Patterson will pack up his belongings, say farewell to Colonel McCormick, his partner, take leave of the staff of the Chicago Tribune, and will come to New York to take active charge of the tail that is now so joyously wagging the dog. When the News reaches the million mark (its daily average for the last six months was 920,956) it will have the greatest circulation of any daily newspaper in the United States.

"And that," said Mr. Patterson when he made his vow five years ago, "covers a multitude of sins and a large assortment of defects."

Tabloid journalism in New York is only seven years old. The history of its growth makes a mushroom seem like a century plant. Tabloids have been appearing all over the country since Mr. Patterson started his. Young Cornelius Vanderbilt took the hint. Mr. Hearst read the handwriting on the Bulletin board. His friend "Fingy" Conners of Buffalo joined the parade. Less important newspaper publishers hopped on the band wagon, and Bernarr Macfadden, who whelps magazines in litters, decided to get in line. Mr. Macfadden knows the calisthenics of publishing. "Tabs" are good for the circulation. Today he has only one daily tabloid. In the near future he hopes to have his daily dozen.

It took two generations to plant the name of Patterson on the journalistic map of Chicago. Joseph Medill Patterson did it in New York in a hop, skip, and jump. In seven years the Daily News has obtained a greater circulation than its parent newspaper, the Chicago Tribune, self-styled "the World's Greatest Newspaper," has been able to get in seventy years.

It is said that the inception of the News was due to an earnest desire on the part of Mr. Patterson to lose money. The year 1918 saw the Chicago Tribune pile up more profits than ever before in its highly prosperous career. That was the year in which the government stretched forth an unusually greedy hand for excess profits. The Tribune that year gave every employee a 10 per cent bonus on his or her annual salary, a grandiose largesse unprecedented in the Tribune's history. But that was only loose change.

For a long time the owners of the Chicago Tribune had cherished the hope of buying the New York Tribune. They wanted the name. They wanted to plant Tribunes in every large city in America. In 1918, with a frightfully swollen cash surplus, the time seemed ripe. Mr. Patterson importuned Mr. Reid to sell the New York Tribune. But 1918 had not been unkind to Mr. Reid either. He wouldn't hear of the sale of the newspaper founded by Horace Greeley—not for any price.

"Why don't you start one of your own?" suggested Mr. Reid. "I understand Northcliffe's going to."

"What?" said Mr. Patterson.

"Yes. He's had agents here the past few months, looking the ground over. And haven't you heard that Munsey's going to start one? And Hearst, too. No, no, my boy, you can't have the New York Tribune. But perhaps if you start a paper, it'll beat the Tribune in circulation in five or ten years."

Mr. Reid laughed heartily at his whimsy, little dreaming that Mr. Patterson, within six weeks, would start a new paper which in one year would pass the Tribune in circulation, and in five years exceed the circulation of any other newspaper in New York.

There was a boatload of soldiers leaving for Europe in three days. Mr. Patterson—he was Captain Patterson during his service in France—was a passenger. In London Lord Northcliffe couldn't be approached. Mr. Patterson followed him to his country home, dogged his footsteps in each of the seven gardens of the Northcliffe estate, and finally got the English publisher to talk of something other than the war.

"New York's simply begging for a picture newspaper, like the Sketch and the Mirror here," Lord Northcliffe said. "It's amazing none of you chaps seem to realize it. I'm tired of waiting for you fellows to do it. New York's got to have a picture tabloid. I don't care who starts it. If the rest of you don't see the light soon, I'll start one myself."

Mr. Patterson instead took on the most available boat. Within a week he had made a deal to use the Evening Mail plant on City Hall Place. For his managing editor Mr. Patterson hired Arthur L. Clarke, former city editor of the Chicago Herald, then city editor of the New York Evening World. Within thirty days Vol. I, No. 1 of the New York Daily News was on the street. The folding had gone wrong on part of the edition. The large picture on the front page, purporting to be that of the Prince of Wales (a delicate compliment to Lord Northcliffe) was just a black smudge. But the paper was out. The panic was on.

The ink was hardly dry on the first edition of the new paper when a complete newspaper plant was installed by Mr. Hearst at 55 Frankfort Street. It was generally expected that the specially constructed tabloid presses in the Frankfort Street plant would begin vomiting Hearst tabloids within a fortnight.

But Mr. Hearst glanced at the sorry looking youngster which had dared to invade the field, smiled indulgently, and left for his beautiful ranch in California. Mr. Brisbane wrote a patronizing editorial in the New York Evening Journal. The presses in the Frankfort Street plant were destined to stand silent for six years, accumulating dust, depreciation, and overhead. The Hearst executive council met and looked over the new paper. It was a feeble thing. If Mr. Patterson had really started it to get rid of excess profits, his wish would be speedily gratified. They decided not to start a Hearst tabloid just then. They would wait until the News died.

In the circulation war which started then and there between the Daily News and the Hearst newspapers, brother was lined up against brother. Max Annenberg came on from Chicago to be field marshal of the News forces. His brother Moe became commander-in-chief of the Hearst battalions—Moe against Max, no quarter asked or given.

Presently the News came out with a public announcement that its circulation had reached 400,000. In less than three years it had passed the New York American. The American is Mr. Hearst's pride and joy. Mr. Hearst returned to New York rather unexpectedly. He looked over circulation statements.

"The tabloid starts at once," Mr. Hearst ordered.

Instead of issuing the tabloid as a separate paper, it was printed as part of the regular edition of the New York American. A genius of the executive council coined the phrase: "Two Papers for the Price of One."

The Daily News got up a full page "ad" and designed posters with the phrasing: "Don't Buy One Paper for the Price of Two." They were held for release. They never were released. It wasn't necessary. The tabloid section of the New York American, offered to readers without any extra charge, cost a great deal of money, but it drew no circulation. It was withdrawn. Mr. Hearst was no longer on the offensive. The problem was not how to get more circulation for the New York American; it was how to keep what the American had.

Mr. Hearst summoned Victor Watson, who was, in that ill-fated period of the American's existence, the pilot of the ship.

"Bring on the pulmotor," he said, or words to that effect.

In Chicago Mr. Hearst's Herald and Examiner was in the throes of a lottery contest which had brought about huge circulation increases and a renewal of the circulation war with the Chicago Tribune. The town was flooded with coupons bearing numbers. Each morning the Herald and Examiner printed a series of numbers. Those who held coupons bearing numbers corresponding to those printed in the Herald and Examiner collected cash prizes. Hundreds of dollars were given away and the circulation leaped upward.

This was the scheme that Mr. Watson suggested to Mr. Hearst, and in a fateful moment Mr. Hearst gave his consent. Mr. Watson called it "Lady Luck." The lottery stunt started in the American on a large scale. The first day $1,000 was given away as a grand prize, with several hundred dollars in minor prizes. Circulation jumped at once. Mr. Patterson rushed to New York.

The next day the News announced a lottery contest. A certain morning newspaper, the News stated, was offering the pitifully inadequate sum of $1,000 each day as a grand prize for the winning number. The News took pleasure in offering $2,500 as a grand prize, with several thousand dollars in smaller prizes. The News didn't approve of it, but if it had to be done, let it be done right. On the morrow the News would have a staff of girls with cornucopias loaded with millions of coupons bearing numbers. These coupons would be distributed at the Battery, in Central Park, near Grant's Tomb, and in Times Square. Come one, come all.

The American the next day announced that the $1,000 grand prize was only a teaser for "Lady Luck." She smiled at talk of measly $2,500 grand prizes. That was talk for the tin banks of the kiddies. "Lady Luck" was no bush-league goddess. From now on the big grand prize offered by "Lady Luck" daily would be $5,000. Full list of distributing stations printed in each edition. Get your coupons and become wealthy overnight.

Circulation bounded upward, leaping to new crags like a frightened gazelle.

The News the next day stated that it had seen enough of penny ante. "Lady Luck" might be a spender where she came from, but on the News she'd be regarded as stingier than Harry Lauder. From now on the daily grand prize in the News would be $10,000.

It was a cool spring, but the Hearst executive council suffered Niagaras of perspiration. By now they were in almost continual executive session. The circulation soared and soared, and Mr. Watson appeared complacently at the meetings, listening for his meed of approbation. Strangely, it failed to come. The problem of printing the millions of coupons each day kept a large staff of employees neglecting other work. Reporters, enraged at the cutting of expense accounts in the face of such prodigious profligacy, demanded raises and were sulky when they were denied "in order to keep expenses down." The paper was so full of "Lady Luck" that important news was left out.

The other papers began to feel the pressure. In the space of a week the American had climbed 200,000; the News had gone up 300,000. On the day the American announced the increase of the grand prize to $10,000 the Tribune, the Times, the World, and the Herald suffered, it was reported, enormous losses.

The News came out and said that it was high time this lottery business was conducted on a scale commensurate with the dignity of New York, the Empire City of the Empire State of the Empire Nation of the world. The ante was raised to $15,000 a day for the big prize. There were riots in the Battery the next day when the News coupons were distributed. The American saw the raise and met it with a further raise of $5,000, making its daily big prize $20,000.

That night Victor Watson is said to have fainted in his office when a boy brought him in a copy of the Daily News. It was announced in the News, blandly and as though it were of no particular moment, that the News would thereafter, and until further notice, give away a daily grand prize of $25,000, and that, in the event any other New York newspaper saw fit to increase that sum, the News would automatically double any further sum offered, no matter what that sum was.

By this time the American had gained 400,000 circulation. The News had leaped upward 500,000. But the poor Journal got caught in between. Advertisers got the benefit of the unprecedented circulation without paying for it. It was impossible to print new rate cards fast enough to keep pace with the vaulting circulation. The reportorial staffs of both papers were completely demoralized. On the American, Alan Dale complained bitterly that his drama reviews were being crowded out by the lists of distributing stations. The reserves were called out daily to pacify the mobs that stormed both the News and American buildings.

Patterson and Hearst realized, suddenly and clearly, that it was high time to throttle their Frankenstein.

"This is suicide," said Mr. Hearst.

"We'll both go broke in another month if it keeps up," admitted Captain Patterson.

"You'd better stop it," suggested Mr. Hearst.

"The day after you quit," retorted Mr. Patterson.

They compromised. Mr. Patterson's brilliant young cousin, the late Medill McCormick, was United States Senator from Illinois. Senator McCormick hurried to the office of Postmaster General Will Hays. A ruling was issued barring from the mails newspapers which ran lotteries.

When the smoke of battle cleared away it was found that both papers were, from a circulation point of view, exactly as they had been before they had run amuck with the lottery idea. The surplus circulation dropped away within a month.

The presses in Frankfort Street continued to accumulate dust, but Mr. Hearst finally made the tabloid experiment in Boston. There the old Boston Advertiser was purchased and launched in tabloid form. It failed to get, and to this day has never been able to get, as much circulation as the pesky News got in its first issue. In June, 1924, Mr. Hearst finally started his New York tabloid, the Daily Mirror. A brilliant managing editor was rushed by airplane from Boston to take charge.

The first issue of the Mirror came out, a slavish imitation of the Daily News in every respect, even to the typographical layout of the front page. Reproached with this, the formidable array of Hearst editorial talent blandly said: "An imitation of the Daily News? Of course. The Daily News is a success. Why not imitate it? Of course the front page of the Mirror looks like the front page of the News. That'll make a lot of people buy it under the impression they're getting the News."

Apparently a lot of people did buy the Mirror thinking it was the News. The first edition of 300,000 copies was a complete sell-out. Since then the Mirror has faithfully, at times pathetically, imitated the Daily News. Today, more than a year after its start, the Daily Mirror has reached approximately 250,000 circulation. A month after the Mirror started the News passed 800,000.

Possibly ashamed of the manner in which it had copied the general style and makeup of the News, the Mirror decided upon a change. The name of the paper was accordingly printed in red ink, an unmistakable mark of differentiation. It occurred to the Mirror that while a lot of people might be buying it under the impression that it was the News, perhaps there were some who were buying the News thinking it was the Mirror. It's a poor rule which doesn't work both ways, and they wanted to find out.

They did. Circulation fell. The red line came off. The Mirror began to look and smell and feel more like the News than ever.

The News started a Tongue Teasers' contest. The Mirror promptly started a Tongue Twisters' contest. The News took photographs of passersby in the street, and offered prizes to those who were photographed, upon satisfactory identification. The Mirror assigned a photographer to do the same thing. The News had a horoscope feature which had proved highly successful. The Mirror started one too. The News inaugurated an afternoon edition. Out came the Mirror with an afternoon edition. The News came out with a pink edition for the theater trade, desperately trying to get away from the ever-increasing similarity. The Mirror had no pink paper on hand. It made venomous references to the "Pink Punk" edition of the News. Then, sadly, a large supply of pink paper, of exactly the same shade as that used by the News, was purchased by the Mirror, and used in its bulldog edition.

The News passed the 900,000 mark. Apparently imitating the News wouldn't make the Mirror. There was only one thing to do. The News managing editor during all these bitter months was Philip Payne. Mr. Hearst hired Mr. Payne. The day Mr. Payne came back from Europe, after a vacation, to assume his new duties, the News passed the million mark.

In the meantime there had arisen a further complication in the person of the interesting Bernarr Macfadden. Scorning to imitate anybody, Mr. Macfadden, whose publications in the magazine field reached nine millions of people, started an afternoon daily, the Evening Graphic, a few months after the Mirror was born. The Graphic, excepting for its size, was unlike either the Mirror or the News.

A member of the Newspaper Club, reading the first issue, promptly dubbed the new paper the Porno Graphic. It seemed as if the old Police Gazette had better look at once to its barber-shop laurels. But if one went below the surface, read between the lines, it could be discerned that the rather frank photographs of large-busted young women, several of which managed to get into each edition, were printed in the interests of Better Womanhood. To prove it Mr. Macfadden printed photographs of his own daughters in one-piece bathing suits.

If the lurid fiction printed by the Graphic had to do with triangles and lures and seductions and intimate experiences, it was merely to warn the young shop girls who began at once to buy and read the Graphic, of the dangers that beset them. A large cash prize was offered for the most perfect man and woman. The ultimate idea was a hygienic, eugenic marriage of the perfect couple, under the auspices and with the blessing of the Graphic. Only absolutely perfect young men and women were eligible to enter. It is amazing to chronicle that New York City at the moment was full of perfection. Thousands of perfect young men and women entered the contest.

Mr. Hearst and Mr. Patterson smiled indulgently at this antic of their fellow publisher. They gave the Graphic a month.

Mr. Macfadden proceeded to make the most of that month. The other tabloids had more reporters than the Graphic. Very well, he would make the Graphic readers into reporters. Stories began to appear, signed by weird names which had never before known the thrill of authorship. If Giovanni Lucasto was run over by a taxi, the story of his thrilling experience appeared that afternoon in the Graphic over Giovanni's own signature. When Tillie Blotz took a shot at her spouse with her trusty .44, Mr. Blotz, from his cot at Bellevue Hospital next day, dictated the story for the Graphic, and it appeared with some such enticing headline as this:

TILLIE MISSED ME WITH HER FIRST TWO SHOTS, BUT—
By Leo Blotz

The other papers boasted drama critics. What of it? Mr. Macfadden invited his public to do its own first-nighting. Drama criticisms in the Graphic were then and are today written by butchers, bakers, and candlestick makers. At the end of three months the Graphic announced it would inaugurate a special Saturday rotogravure edition. This adjunct came into being and enjoyed a large sale. Delightful studies of young women in frank physical-culture poses appeared on the front page.

What need, with a front page like that, had Mr. Macfadden for Associated Press and International News Service, without which no daily newspaper is supposed to have a ghost of a chance to live?

Reluctantly Messrs. Hearst and Patterson, chums by then, conceded that perhaps Mr. Macfadden might be able to bluff his way through six months of life. The non-tabloids began to bestir themselves uneasily. The News by now had a regular daily circulation of more than 900,000, with an occasional break over the million mark on good days; its Sunday paper was more than a million. The Mirror reached about 250,000; the Graphic 97,000. A total of almost 1,300,000 tabloid readers every day. What was responsible for it?

Pictures, of course.

The conservative New York Evening Post started a midweek pictorial, printed in rotogravure. The Times announced an addition of four pages to its Sunday rotogravure. The Sunday World began to print rotogravure pictures in colors.

Each time a rumor was started to the effect that the Graphic was tottering, Mr. Macfadden, in large type, would announce a new contest, with large cash prizes. The Graphic offers a shopping service; it teaches you how to play the ukulele; it has a walking club, a physical-culture class, a dancing class, a dozen departments in which service of some sort is offered. Today nobody predicts its finish within the current year.

The tabloid fever is spreading. Young Vanderbilt, who started one in California, now has one in Florida. He is definitely committed to a program of expansion. Mr. Macfadden has confided to friends that he intends to start tabloids in Chicago, Boston, Los Angeles, and San Francisco. All over the country newspaper publishers are debating the matter of converting their eight-column papers into picture "tabs"—of making little ones out of big ones.

Negro Segregation Comes North

By WALTER WHITE

IN 1915 and 1916 various Southern and border cities, including Baltimore, Dallas, St. Louis, Louisville, and some eight or ten other municipalities enacted ordinances designed to confine colored people to certain restricted areas in these cities, creating Negro ghettos where the rights of these citizens were limited and the stamp of inferiority was put upon them. The National Association for the Advancement of Colored People took a case arising from the passage of the ordinance in Louisville, Kentucky, carried it to the United States Supreme Court, and secured a unanimous decision which declared such ordinances to be not only an illegitimate exercise of the police power of the State, but a direct violation of the Federal Constitution.

With the cessation of European migration and the speeding up of Northern industries during and after the war, the great migration of Negroes from the South took place. Defeated in one attempt to limit the districts in which Negroes might live, the segregationists devised a new scheme to accomplish the same purpose as that provided in the ordinances which the Supreme Court had declared unconstitutional. The new method was that of private agreements among property holders through the inclusion of covenants in deeds to property in which the purchaser agreed not to sell the property to any person of Negro race or blood upon pain of forfeiture, the agreement usually extending over a period of twenty-one years. A suit based upon this covenant is now pending in the United States Supreme Court.

Back of these two movements—the [illegible] on the part of certain groups backed by the Ku Klux Klan, directly or indirectly, to prevent Negroes through legal action or brute force from living anywhere save in restricted ghettos. Two recent outbursts of mob violence are the dramatic high points of this movement.

The most serious one occurred in Detroit, Michigan. In 1906 some 6,000 Negroes were living in that city. By 1911 the number had increased to 8,000. In that year began the steady movement toward Detroit of Negroes who sought and secured employment in the various industrial plants of that city, a movement which reached its highest point in 1916, 1917, and 1918. Today there are some 65,000 Negroes in Detroit.

Obviously, it is impossible to put sixty-five gallons of water in an eight-gallon can without an overflow. In the Ford plants alone in Detroit there are today employed between 11,000 and 14,000 Negroes making an average of [illegible]n dollars a day, the total earned in wages each day by Negroes in these two plants reaching between $75,000 and $100,000. A very considerable majority of these Negroes have saved money despite the high cost of living in Detroit. A number of them have bought or are buying [illegible]. They have purchased these houses in various sections of Detroit, in most instances without molestation, but during the last few years there have been numerous cases of mob violence in efforts to check this very natural expansion of the areas in which Negroes live.

These outbursts of violence have had various contribu[illegible]. As early as 1920, a number of Negroes were shot and killed by policemen, especially in the neighborhood bordering on St. Antoine Street. There were inevitable retaliations in the killing of a nuumber of policemen which led to very strained relations. A group of colored citizens in Detroit called upon the Commissioner of Police and pointed out that probably a number of the policemen who were giving the trouble were Southern whites. Commissioner Inches looked up the record of the policemen who were assigned to that precinct and found that a majority of them were from the South. He removed them to other districts, replacing these officers with Northern-born men. As a result the trouble ceased. But, with the growth of the Klan and a drive by that organization to recruit members among police and court employees, this trouble has broken out again, resulting in the shooting of fifty-five citizens by police officers from January 1 to September 1 of this year.

During the past year, there have been a number of instances where mobs have attacked the homes of Negroes who have purchased houses in what before were "white neighborhoods." Last spring a colored woman and her family were notified by certain white people to vacate the home which they had recently purchased. Upon their refusal to do so, whites stoned the house, breaking a number of windows and a door. The damage was repaired. When another attack was made, the colored woman fired at the mob. A neighbor, wife of a policeman, swore out a warrant against the colored woman. She was tried, but two colored attorneys successfully defended her and she was acquitted.

Later on a colored physician who had lived for eight years in a house on King Avenue, purchased the corner house which was next door to his own residence. When neighbors found that he planned moving into the corner house and renting his old home, neighborhood meetings were held and threats were made against him. The physician, however, moved into the new home and let it be known that he was going to protect his home and his family, if necessary. There was no further trouble. In June another colored man bought a home on Spokane Avenue in the northwestern section of the city. A mob broke into his home, smashed a great deal of the furniture, loaded the rest of it on a van and carried it back to this man's former home. Nothing was done by the police to prevent this attack.

Last spring Dr. O. H. Sweet, a colored physician who has been practicing in Detroit for four years—a graduate of Wilberforce and Howard universities, who with his wife recently returned from Vienna where they had been studying—bought a home at 2905 Garland Avenue at the corner of Charlevoix. When Dr. Sweet moved into his home on the afternoon of September 8, there was a crowd outside which hooted and jeered but offered no violence. From seven o'clock that evening until four the next morning there was a large crowd outside the house though no attack was made on the Sweet home. The following evening the crowd began gathering around seven o'clock. According to statements made by Dr. Sweet to me on September 18 in the Wayne County jail there were some six hundred people massed directly in front of his house, with many hundreds more nearby. Dr. Sweet declared that about seven o'clock the mob began bombarding the house with bricks, stones, and other missiles. A little after eight o'clock Dr. Sweet's brother, a dentist, and a friend drove up to the house in a taxicab. When the mob saw that they were colored, it pelted them with missiles as they ran into the house. Shortly afterward there was firing and two men outside were hit—one man was killed and the other wounded. Police officers, which included an inspector, a lieutenant, and eight policemen, became very active at this point, rushed into the house, and arrested the eleven occupants, including Mrs. Sweet who has a fourteen-months-old baby.

On September 16, 17, and 18, a preliminary hearing was held before Judge Faust in the Detroit Recorder's Court. The prosecution introduced its witnesses, including Inspector Morton M. Schuknecht who declared under oath that there were only fifteen or twenty persons outside the house, that there was no disorder, and that he had heard of no threats against Dr. Sweet though he had found it necessary to detail ten men to this neighborhood to protect the house and two additional traffic officers, each a block away from the house, to divert traffic from those streets. Other witnesses produced by the prosecution testified to the same effect. An interesting fact was brought out about one of the witnesses. He, a police officer, under cross examination by one of the defense attorneys, revealed that he had been in Detroit only twenty months, having gone there directly from his birthplace, Tullahoma, Tennessee. He obviously resented being cross-examined, by a Negro attorney particularly, when he was asked if it were not rather unusual for one so recently from the South to be sent to defend the home of a Northern Negro. Despite all the evidence, including the statements of the Detroit press that the mob numbered some five thousand, Judge Faust held all of the eleven defendants for trial, without bail, charged with murder in the first degree.

The Negroes of Detroit and a group of the better class of white citizens of that city have organized to defend Dr. Sweet and his ten codefendants. Mayor John W. Smith has appointed an interracial committee composed of Tracy W. McGregor, philanthropist and business man, Fred H. Gilbert, manufacturer and president of the Detroit Citizens' League, Jeffreson B. Webb, banker and former president of the Board of Commerce, Fred G. Dewey, president of the Wayne County Bar Association, these four being white; and four Negro members—W. Hayes McKinney, attorney and chairman of the Legal Redress Committee of the N. A. A. C. P., Dr. A. E. Carter, a physician, Walter Stowers, attorney, and [illegible] Marshall, supervisor of the fourteen thousand Negro employees of the Ford Motor Company. This commission is designed to go thoroughly into the causes of ill feeling between certain classes of white and colored citizens in Detroit and to make such recommendations as are deemed advisable to prevent further disorders.

Another case similar to Dr. Sweet's has arisen in Staten Island, New York. In February, 1924, Samuel A. Brown, a mail carrier whose wife is a school teacher, bought a home in Castleton Hill, Staten Island. On purchasing the home from the former owner, a white woman from Kentucky, Mr. Brown asked particularly if there would be any trouble through his moving into the neighborhood. Upon being assured that there would be no trouble, the deal was consummated. Mr. Browne later found that his next-door neighbor was from the South. Shortly after Mr. Browne and his wife and their four children moved into the house, trouble began.

Mr. Browne's neighbor made an indirect offer to purchase the house for five hundred dollars more than what Mr. Browne paid. This offer was refused as Mr. Browne had purchased the house as a home for his family. Then began a campaign of threats against Mr. Browne. A number of these threats were signed "K. K. K." Mass meetings were held in the neighborhood. Forty or more men marched up the street, halted before the house and faced it, this maneuver being repeated at frequent intervals. On several occasions, the house was bombarded with stones, windows and doors being broken, the shrubbery and lawn torn up. Seven times the fire insurance on the house was canceled by as many different companies. Mr. Browne was warned that his enemies had employed an ex-service man, an expert rifle shot; he was told that he would be shot as he carried mail on his route and that no one would ever know the killer. Similar threats were made against Mrs. Browne and the children, all of the four children being under ten years of age.

Mr. Browne secured a permit to keep firearms in his house and a long siege began. Night after night, week after week, month after month, the Brownes lived in a state of siege. Mrs. Browne taught school during the day and Mr. Browne carried mail on his route; they took turns sitting up at night to guard their home. Finally the authorities were stirred to action, a policeman was constantly on guard at the house, and finally the Richmond County Grand Jury indicted Musco M. Robinson, Mr. Browne's neighbor from the South, and five others for conspiracy.

As the Negro population grows it is inevitable that the districts in which the Negroes formerly lived cannot continue to house them. They will move into districts where they can find better conditions than exist in the restricted areas. American democracy would be a poor thing indeed if such a desire for better conditions did not develop.

Continued brutality in opposing these natural efforts toward better living conditions is creating a spirit of grim determination among colored people to fight fire with fire. In one case in Detroit where threats had been made against a colored man, he and a friend borrowed several rifles and spent an afternoon sitting on their front porch cleaning the guns in plain view of their white neighbors. There was no trouble and for six years this man has lived in his house free from molestation. The question which must be answered by the authorities and by decent citizens throughout America is this: Are Negroes to be forced to resort to threats and bloodshed in order to secure decent places in which to live and rear their children?

A Back-Country Bolshevik

By ANNA LOUISE STRONG

Moscow, July 15

"DON'T you find it very lonesome in Russia, comrade? We are so much less civilized than you Americans" . . . I turn with a gasp to look at the tall, handsome man in white trousers and white Russian blouse who is addressing me. We are seated on the great dining-veranda of the Sverdlova Sanitarium in the health resorts of the northern Caucasus. It is a sanitarium of the Social Insurance, so all my companions are workers.

The tall, handsome speaker comes from the Donetz coal region and has told me already that "his specialty is making window-glass." With equal pride of technique might a surgeon have announced his specialty as appendicitis. Russian factory workers today have this pride of calling.

"But what makes you think Americans more cultured than Russians?" I ask the glass-worker. Out from the social hall come the strains of a piano and a chorus of voices; the workers in the sanitarium have gathered informally after dinner to sing old folk songs. The night before we had had a symphony concert in our park, given by artists of the State Opera House down from Moscow. A lecture on Contemporary Literature by a famous speaker is announced for tomorrow. It is a bit startling to hear this white-clad gentleman revering my superior culture.

"We have only just learned to read and write in Russia," he explains to me. "All the things that come after, science and art and technique and how to behave courteously to one another, we have [illegible] things. But your American workers learned to read and write when they were children. They must be ever so much more civilized than we."

I try to reassure him. "It is true we have in America much better technique than you. Many more bath-tubs, more automobiles, a more comfortable life. Tremendous skyscrapers, and the most efficient industry in the world. Yet our factory workers do not know as much of world politics as yours do." I remind him of the "living newspaper," a feature in the amateur dramatics of every factory, in which the relations of France and Poland, or the latest scandal of the Balkans, are as intimately portrayed by Russian factory workers as the jests between freshman and sophomores in an American college farce.

"Politically it is true that we are awake," he admits, "because of our revolution. But in other things we are asleep and backward." I remind him of the symphony concert and ask if that is culture.

His view of America dies hard. After dinner we play as partners in a game of dominoes against two sailors from Odessa. The Russian dominoes is almost as scientific as whist. My partner is an excellent player, and I soon learn the meaning of his leads. Whenever we win, he shouts joyously to all who may listen: "Don Bas, organized—America, civilized! Together—unbeatable!"

The sanitarium in which we are staying, nestled in the foothills of the northern Caucasus, was once a private park, the resort of the wealthy and great of Russia. Imagine foothills like those of Southern California, with their mixture of great, bare, rolling height and pleasant, tree-filled valleys. Set in among these, sulphur springs, iron springs, soda springs, hot mud lakes, and around them a host of hotels with open verandas and vast stone bathing pavilions with many rooms and hundreds of skilled attendants.

Since the revolution all these sanitariums and hotels and villas are the property of the Health Department of Russia, to be used in building a health program for the people. Since that department cannot run them all on its meager budget, it rents many of them to other organizations. The Social Insurance of the Department of Labor is its chief customer, and picks out the largest and best sanitariums, attempting with inter-departmental competition to run them a trifle more lavishly than the sanitariums of the health department itself. Thus I have been furnished with free underwear and bath-cloak, as well as tooth-brush and tooth-powder in sealed packages. The white suits of the glass-worker also come from hospital stores. Sandals also, that no worker may avoid the health-giving walks on gravelly roadways for fear of wearing out his own hard-bought shoes.

This sanitarium is entirely filled with workers, sent for their health by the Social Insurance. Next to me sits a maker of felt boots from Siberia. He acquired rheumatism by standing long months in water through the civil war; it is aggravated by the wet conditions of his factory. I ask him why he can't wear rubber boots at work, and he laughs.

"The steam is so thick that you can't see the nearest worker. My boots would fill with water in no time. The only real cure is better technical methods and this our factory cannot afford. Russia hasn't money for proper technique yet." Thus he indicates the contrast in Russia's life today: technically very backward, so that her workers get rheumatism from preventable causes; socially advanced, so that the best sanitariums are placed freely at their disposal. The maker of felt boots tells me that he likes his job, even though it gives him rheumatism. "Once I got a job in a typographical place, but I didn't feel at home, I wanted to get back to making felt boots. Why? I don't know. Except, perhaps, that I'm skilled at it."

There is another man at our table who comes from Siberia. He often wears a flaming shirt of red flannel. I noticed him first when a waitress made a sudden movement, and he jumped as if he had been shot. "Don't do that," he said querulously. "I'm a very nervous person." I almost laughed, the cruel laughter of a healthy person who does not understand. But a woman from Leningrad, an old revolutionist, laid her hand on my arm. "Don't laugh," she said. "All of us old prisoners know him. He had a hard time. Forty or fifty prisons under the Czar—they seem to have given him all the worst ones. Most of his life he spent in jail. In the civil war, though barely out of prison, he did secret-service work along the Kolchak front. Once he was caught with five others and sentenced to death. He dug his grave with his own hands. But he had a bomb in his pocket that had been overlooked in the search, and when his captors drew away to shoot them, he flung the bomb into the midst of his captors.

"He escaped with the five others in the explosion that followed. They swam a wide river that was very cold, and the pursuers came after and shot at them from the banks. Three of his comrades never came out of the river; whether they were drowned or shot he does not know. . . . After that he did still more secret-service work. It is no wonder that he is here for his nerves." After that I ceased to laugh at the thin, trembling little man in the red flannel shirt.

In the evening after the domino game the glass-worker came to my room, to ask for some large sheets of typewriter paper. "We are writing out a complaint," he said, "about the sanitarium." To my inexperienced eyes the sanitarium had seemed nearly perfect. The food was a trifle monotonous, but what can one ask as a charity patient? It was wholesome. "What is the complaint?" I asked.

"It is a party matter," he told me, "but I will inform you afterwards." Next morning I learned that among the two hundred patients in Sverdlova were some twenty Communists. Though only here for six weeks' rest, they had none the less promptly formed their "Communist center" for the sanitarium. Several of them had been in other sanitariums of the Social Insurance which were better run than this one. "The food is not enjoyable; there are too many young, untrained doctors; too many folks have been employed because of relationship to the head doctor." So the Communist patients in the hospital held a meeting and after careful discussion drew up a complaint which all were willing to sign. This complaint would go straight through party channels to the Central Control Commission of the party, which is also the head of the government's inspection. There would be an investigating commission. "The chief doctor heard we were having a meeting and came to the door," said the glass-worker. "He was as white as a sheet. We let him in for ten minutes and then we sent him out again."

I had heard stories of how the medical staff was "terrorized" by the Communist patients. Now I was seeing it. I felt sorry for the doctor; he was a pleasant, inoffensive, easy-going Russian. But the glass-worker looked at me sternly. "You are sorry for that doctor," he accused me, severely. "But if we Communists stop to be sorry for every inefficient person, what would happen to our control and to our revolution? The sanitariums of the state must be looked after."

This introduced me to a new side of the glass-worker. In ordinary contacts he was cheerful, thoughtless, young. He flirted pleasantly with the girls; he sang songs or strolled in the moonlight; he laughed his triumph over dominoes. But he was, for all that, a sincere back-country Bolshevik; the moment a question of party arose, he became hard, ruthless, efficient.

He told me of his life in the Donetz Basin. "Beside my regular job as glass-worker," he said, "I am president of the Friends of Children for the district. We raise money for orphans. It is not so simple as it was three years ago. Then we just took the money from the bourgeois." He smiled happily at the recollection.

"I was president then of the extraordinary commission of our little town. The Cheka—you've heard of it. I would send for the bourgeois one after another. We had them all listed, how much money they had, and what they were doing with it. They would come in, looking a trifle worried, but trying to hide it. 'Comrade Petroff,' they would say—of course they all knew me—'what is it you want?' 'Well, citizen, the matter is this. We have several hundred in the children's home, besides children of soldiers that are away at the front. All of these must be fed. They have no shoes nor change of clothing. We have put you down for so many hundred rubles and so many suits of underwear.' Just like that. He would begin to protest that he couldn't, but I would nod to the soldier at the door. 'Take him to the cellar for a while. I have lots more of them to see.' For my time was worth much to the revolution just then and I could not stop to argue with these people. Well, after two or three hours, it would be cold and damp in that cellar and he would be afraid of getting rheumatism, and he would ask to see me. They had orders to bring him as soon as he asked, for I was on duty twenty hours a day. He would start to tell me that he was ready to contribute to the children but not so much as I asked. 'No,' I told him, 'we have counted carefully how much the children need to eat and we have to get every bit that we ask for.' So he would give it to us. Our children were all properly fed; they were all healthy. But then, of course, Denikin came and I was captured, for when Denikin came I was a spy on the front."

"Why didn't they shoot you?" I asked.

"But of course they did not know me. They were stupid; they never could imagine that workers had intelligence. I made myself dirty and ragged and destroyed all my papers except one that said I was unemployed and given permission to go to a certain town looking for work. They put me in the mine, and I escaped. Of course, if they had known me they would have shot me.

"We shot them too. When we took the Crimea there were four hundred officers of Wrangel taken at one time and they were all shot. They died shouting: 'God save Wrangel.' That was their idea, the monarchy, the Czar; they were brave men and died for it. Just as we died also for our idea. But it is our idea that is coming in the world and their idea that is going."

We walked out on the cliff in the moonlight and his mind turned to lighter subjects. A textile worker from near Moscow passed by with the sailor from Odessa; a charming girl in white. "I like that girl," said the glass-worker, with simple directness. "I want very much to embrace her. If she were a comrade, I should like to marry her." A moment later he was sighing for a cigarette to smoke, and afterwards for an apple.

"You seem to have many desires," I said, nettled at his casualness. Unintentionally I used a word which means in Russian a strong, permanent feeling. He corrected me quickly.

"No," he said. "I have only one desire. These are all just temporary wishes."

"Even the girl?" I asked. "Is she like the apple and cigarette?"

He laughed at my feminine pique. "But of course she is a more serious wish, since such a wish lies at the foundation of life. But even she is only temporary. For if I should marry the girl, a man does not wish always to be with his wife. There is only one desire that is permanent in me, and that is to work for the Soviet power with all my strength, so that the revolution may come throughout the world."

It was said strongly and sincerely, but in a moment we passed to other subjects. We observed the planet Mars, hanging low in the south, and he wondered what persons might live there, and if they had achieved any form of social revolution. From Mars he drifted easily back to the Wrangel troops.

"All those officers who were killed," he said musingly. "They were not any loss to the world at all. They did not know how to produce anything. Neither bread, nor window-glass, nor music, nor order. They knew only how to extend the empire of the Çzar. And that was something the world did not have use for." Thus simply he disposed of the problem of life and death and turned to a game dominoes on the veranda.

In the Driftway

CERTAIN Methodists, and various other persons from distant and little-heard-of places, have taken it upon themselves to traduce New York. A modern Sodom, they call it, a living Gomorrah; why not raze it to the ground and build in its place a nice little incinerating plant or an up-to-date factory? Why not send its inhabitants back to the decent, God-fearing places they came from, to lead again honorable lives free from the corruption of the fiend tobacco, the demon rum, the unclothed chorus-girl?

* * * * *

TO these strictures on one of his favorite cities the Drifter would hardly deign to make reply. New York as a whole, of course, seldom hears and certainly never heeds these criticisms. There is too much noise all day and all night as it is. And the Drifter, walking up one street and down another, as it his wont, is moved only to smile to himself when he thinks of them. He watches the ships loading at the river's edge; huge cranes lift their mysterious burdens, men run about on the ground or high up on the wharves; sparrows fly almost beneath his feet to pick up dropped kernels of grain. He hangs over the embankment at Thirty-third Street and watches the trains coming into a great terminal; hundreds of trains a day, from the West, the South, the North, bringing in goods.

* * * * *

IN the half-light of evening the spans of four bridges show delicately against the sky. Lights begin to bloom on them, hurrying motors, slow trucks, a policeman's motorcycle, trolley-cars, the long, winding elevated trains—all carry lights. They are reflected in the oily water below and in the shining pavement. There are boats in the river, with lights also, red and green; slow ferries and long, low freighters, schooners with their sails safely furled, impudent motor boats, the great bulk of liners gently riding at their docks. On the shore the sharp outlines of the buildings are picked out with lights; the Woolworth tower, the new telephone building with its curiously placed masses, the Whitehall Building, square and solid on the end of the island, all the jagged lines of buildings between, clear where they are near the eye, melting into mist farther away.

* * * * *

ON Forty-second Street at 8:30 the lights are at their brightest. People are hurrying to the theaters, to be corrupted, perhaps, by the wicked plays they will see. The sidewalks are filled with people, the streets with motors. The Drifter examines the faces that pass him; somehow they do not look corrupt; they look eager, expectant, alive. They are talking animatedly, gesticulating, urging each other on. Evidently New York's corruption does not weigh heavily on these people; possibly they are so accustomed to corruption, so hardened by the hideously wicked sights that surround them every day that they are quite lost to honor and decency. But they look happy. Occasionally one passes whose chin is sunk in his collar, whose eye gleams at the people hastening to damnation, at the pictures in front of the theaters, with a sour look. He is evidently in New York on a mission, perhaps to investigate possible factory sites after Gomorrah has been razed to the ground.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Private Money for State Universities

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The interest in the question Shall State universities accept gifts from "incorporated educational institutions"? is a wholesome indication that the public conscience is alive, if not always wisely or disinterestedly alive. In the first place, why assume or imply that the source of the funds of "incorporated educational institutions" is a polluted underground spring? Should not the charge be specific, and the discrimination likewise? To carry out such a policy would require a Board of Moral Censorship possessed of such rare wisdom as one would despair of finding even in the personnel of a university faculty, the president included. Secondly, what better taint-remover have we at our disposal than the purifying service of education and philanthropy? Here if anywhere the social alchemist of the twentieth century may seek the formula for transmuting the baser metals into gold. Thirdly, is there really any taint in money, or only in the manner and motive of its acquisition and employment?

The central argument is that of the covert or overt influence upon educational policies, a menace of contamination or embarrassment no less real for being subtle and indirect. The appeal is to a moral judgment: Is it right to accept such funds? This is the approved criterion of those who answer "Yes," and of those who answer "No." The effect of the consequences of secession upon the fortunes of a university withdrawing from the generally accepted benefits is not irrelevant, but for clarity of issue may be given a secondary place. Both parties are thus committed to the vital position that universities should be free to direct their policies and activities, untrammeled by alien pressure from whatever source.

The right conception of a State university makes it simply the State's contribution to the higher education. Every right-minded State university should be ready and eager to play its part in the educational life of the nation. It should be willing to compare its standards of aim and achievement with those of the foremost institutions of the land; it should form a cooperative part of the national educational assets. From that point forward, the crucial matter is not where the funds come from but the wisdom and spirit of their expenditure. A university that is not completely free to direct this phase of its functioning is unfortunately handicapped. There are times when it is fitting to remember and times when it is essential to forget that a university is dependent upon its funds. Neither dramatic nor educational nor journalistic enterprises are to be judged by the manner of their support; the desirable ideal in each case is to render them capable of their best service.

We are thus driven to consider—and with a frankness that runs the risk of offending—the relative menace of political influence which seems inseparable from publicly supported institutions and that subtly exercised by private or corporate benefactors. To their credit be it said that the more responsible of the corporations administering vast funds for public benefit have been keenly mindful of this danger and have avoided it, making foresight compatible with generosity. But it is not coarse strings, we are told, but invisible tiny threads that make the web of entanglement. Back of this view is the attitude that accepts the conflict of interests between social class as inevitable and irremediable. It does not stop at recounting the discreditable story of social intimidation and the tyranny of capital; it is keenly alive to the sinister direction of Wall Street, but not so mindful of the deadening responsibility of Main Street.

The capitalistic encroachment upon the educational establishment is real and a sinister tribute to the far-reaching powers of knowledge. It was made the melodramatic theme of Upton Sinclair's "The Goose-Step," where the evils of benevolent penetration may be read page upon page, reel upon reel, in high-colored denunciation. What is needed is a calm but frank exposition of the many-sided evils of political encroachment upon the same field. In view of the wily methods employed by politicians who are not statesmen, and by some who profess to be such, and their favorite technique of covering their tracks and throwing the public off the scent, the companion volume might bear the title of "The Fox-Trot." But the nefarious methods of political intrigue are too well known to need recital.

Next we are told that a dependence upon corporate (and why not also private?) benefaction is undemocratic. The test of democracy lies not in the form of an institution or of its support but in the spirit of its administration, of which the key-note is self-determination. When I survey with a fairly long perspective of educational experience the administrative temper of endowed and State universities, I cannot but conclude that there is far more democracy, far less distrust of self-determination, among those freely seeking aid from all properly disposed sources than among those with inevitably close political affiliations. Democracy, not as a copy-book maxim or as an oratorical political gesture but embodied in practice under the inspiration of a guiding principle, is the only sort that affects the morale of an individual or an institution. I have long but vainly been expecting that some prospective regent or trustee would decline the honor on the ground that the prevalent system of governing a university is not sufficiently democratic for his convictions; or if not that, would accept the post with the declaration of his endeavor to modify the form of control so as to give a larger and more responsible participation to the faculty; or if not that, would see to it that no decisions affecting educational policy would be reached without faculty consultation and approval—all in the interests of a true democratic government. Admittedly this is another problem, but pertinent in that it indicates the essential criterion of democracy in the educational realm.

While this discussion has been prompted by the recent action at the University of Wisconsin, it will not serve its purpose if limited to that incident. That decision may be, indeed seems likely to be, reversed (the vote was four in favor to six opposed) when it is realized that will few members of the faculty, editorial writers, alumni, citizens interested in the intellectual welfare of the State, in Wisconsin or elsewhere, are wholly out of sympathy with it and regard [illegible] upon a narrow and mistaken view of the situation. It seems reasonable to suppose that members of a governing board, who by the force of circumstances [illegible] policy unacceptable to those intimately concerned, will hesitate to enforce it, however truly it represents their convictions, in the spirit of an autocratic code of dictatorship. Such is the democratic temper.

October 3 Joseph Jastrow

Down with Editors!

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Today I bought and read, for the first time, a copy of The Nation. The most interesting part of it is the "Correspondence," which is usually the case with papers between editorials and articles. Outside of the news, the correspondence columns of such dailies as the Chicago Tribune, the New York World, and the New York Times are the most interesting parts of those great papers. I have to the editor, as the first thing to be read by the average reader. Why is this? Probably it is because people like common people best.

Charleston, W. Va., October 3 Ray A. Frame

Books and Plays

If We Take All Gold

By LOUISE BOGAN

If we take all gold
And put all gold by,
Lay by the treasure
In the shelved earth's crevice,
Under, under the deepest,
Store sorrow's gold—
That which we thought precious
And guarded even in sleep
Under the miserly pillow—
If it be laid away,
Crushed under dark heaped ground,
Then shall we have sleep,
Sorrow's gold being taken
From out the swept house,
From the rifled coffers put by.

First Glance

NEW ENGLAND has its Rip Van Winkle in Peter Rugg, the Missing Man; and like Rip Van Winkle Peter Rugg is the creation of a single mind. It was in 1824, five years after "The Sketch Book," that William Austin published his tale of the driver of the black horse who appeared on the roads from time to time and inquired the way to Boston. He sat uneasily in a weather-beaten chaise of antique make, and a curious child, who, according to some persons, looked more like an old woman than anything else, sat patiently by his side. The black horse that drew them was possessed of an unaccountable energy; furious and untiring, he waxed more powerful and handsome as Peter Rugg and his daughter, destined to go a journey that was to have no end, grew more anxious and shrunken in their seats. Peter Rugg, it seems, was never to reach his Boston; or, if he was, he was never to stop at the house where Dame Rugg waited for him. Always he lost his way, and often he was seen urging his horse to the west or the north or the south. His bewilderment, when he would be told the distance he had still to go, was as pathetic as it was strange. "Why, how can you deceive me so? It is cruel to mislead a traveler. It is all turn back! Boston shifts with the wind, and plays all around the compass. The rivers, too, have changed their courses. But see! The clouds are gathering in the south, and we shall have a rainy night." And always the rain came—from a cloud that followed like fate and poured its water and lightning on the pair. Through New Hampshire, Vermont, and Connecticut hurried Peter with his child. He was [illegible] coming to Hudson to New York; even Delaware, even Virginia saw him lashing the black flanks ahead of him in the conviction that only a few more miles would bring him home. They never did. For once, starting from Concord during a storm, he had sworn an oath that he would reach Boston that night or never reach it. That was in the eighteenth century, under [illegible] King George. And no one knows how long the elements he had defied would keep him going.

It is an excellent story, and one with all the qualities of a legend—which it has become. Amy Lowell, who worked it over for one of her best poems, testified to its having inspired an abiding fear of her childhood. "How often have I driven through the hush which precedes a thunderstorm, all of a tremble lest I should meet the old man and the child in the yellow-wheeled chaise. A true legend it was to me, long before I knew its origin." What better compliment to a legend than to say that people know it without knowing its origin? In "Peter Rugg, the Missing Man" William Austin made a singularly pure and important contribution to American literature.

Who, then, was Austin, and what else did he write? I opened "William Austin, the Creator of Peter Rugg," by Walter Austin (Marshall Jones: $5), in high hopes of finding answers to these questions; and I was disappointed. Apparently there is nothing of significance to know. Austin was a Massachusetts lawyer of commonplace if admirable qualities. He did a little writing, of which he was not particularly proud, and he made a few speeches; but not a single fact in these three hundred faithful pages throws any light upon the man who dreamed the anxious dream of Peter Rugg. Nor do three others tales, reprinted here, explain anything. They are devoid of interest; they are deservedly dead. Austin, it seems, must remain one of those curious cases of men who are struck once by the lightning of a beautiful idea and never afterward so much as stroll into a storm.

MARK VAN DOREN

Mr. Stefansson on Wrangel Island

The Adventure of Wrangel Island. Written by Vilhjalmur Stefansson with the Collaboration of John Irvine Knight. The Macmillan Company. $6.

THIS romantic and vastly interesting story—a real adventure—relates to one of those disastrous expeditions heretofore all too common in the annals of the Far North. That the Arctic is actually friendly and livable under correct conditions Mr. Stefansson has abundantly proved. No more than anywhere else—no more, say, than in Minnesota or Dakota—does disaster come there because of temperature or weather. If it comes it is because conditions have not been properly met, because the situation has not been mastered.

In the particular adventure here described four men die on a distant, desolate island in a frozen ocean; a small lone woman and a cat survive the fateful ordeal; another man falls under a cloud; a colony is captured, disrupted, and deported, and its property is confiscated by the Russian Soviet; another man dies in Vladivostok; and the chief sponsor of the enterprise finds himself repaid for his valiant endeavor by a burden of debt and disappointment—disappointment not only because his plan failed but because four gallant comrades were destroyed.

Between its discovery in 1849 by Captain Kellett, a British naval officer, and 1911 no Russian had ever seen Wrangel Island, but numerous Americans and British had landed upon it. Mr. Stefansson, therefore, absolutely rules out Russia's claim and awards the island first to the British and second to the Americans. Confident of this first right of the British by reason of their discovery and the later occupation for months by the Canadian crew of the wrecked Karluk, he devised the plan [illegible] of securing the island for the British as a way station from London, say, to the Orient by the air. As Peary believed, so Mr. Stefansson believes that air navigation is destined soon to become of first concern. The shortest route from London to Peking is by air, and from that point of view Wrangel as a British possession assumes a vast importance to British interests—an importance that will be appreciated better in years to come. Several other men shared Mr. Stefansson's enthusiasm on this subject and joined with him in promoting it. "So started our glorious adventure," remarks the explorer. He well knew that a colony could find support on the island, for there is game and much driftwood—the latter somewhat unusual in the Arctic. "We five," writes Mr. Stefansson, "were as sure of the value of the island as we were of the law and the rights in the case, and we thought all men would come to agree with us on every point when they learned the facts we knew."

Pooling their funds, the five proceeded in high spirits. Stefansson remained "on the outside," in order to obtain recognition from the government. Had he been able to go with the party the story would have been entirely different. Not only is he a wonderful hunter; he is endowed with caution and forethought. Three of the four men who went to the island were Americans: Knight, Maurer, and Galle. The fourth was a Canadian, Allan Crawford, who was commander by reason of his nationality. Crawford was inexperienced in Arctic living; the others were old hands at it. Indeed, it seemed to them so simple and easy that they were undone by their very contempt for the dangers. The fifth member of the party was a little Eskimo woman, Mrs. Ada Blackjack, brought up in a Mission school at Nome. She was not versed in Eskimo life, but was an expert in making fur clothing. It was absolutely necessary to have a seamstress of this kind, and others engaged backed out. She went, expecting other Eskimos to be picked up later. None could be induced to go.

In 1921 the Silver Wave landed these five and the cat on Wrangel. In 1922 the supply ship, Teddy Bear, found it impossible to reach the island on account of the heavy jam of ice. Food was low on the island. The little colony watched eagerly for the sight of the ship which did not come. A second winter congealed the sea and the land. In 1923 Mr. Stefansson, then abroad trying to convince the British of the high value of the island to them, sent Harold Noice, in the Donaldson, to try to get through. He succeeded after numerous difficulties. When he got his first view in the twilight of the desolate shores, "a vague portent," he says, "that all was not well assailed me." This passed. When day came they were in sight of "a broad expanse of moss-covered prairie which looked beautiful"; and accordingly the rescuers felt reassured. Only when they landed did the tragic reality break upon them. In all that vast area the only living beings discovered were the little Eskimo woman and the cat. Mr. Stefansson gives a full account of the tragedy, based on Knight's diary and on other notes found, as well as on Mrs. Blackjack's own statement.

Noice had not been well, and the shock appears temporarily to have put his nervous system to too great a strain. That [illegible] was not normal is clear from the fact that when he entered the hut where the remains of Knight reposed and found Knight's diary he sat down to read the diary with his back to the [illegible]. Believing that something he read was a reflection on the departed men, he removed several pages and blotted out some lines on other pages. This was a sorry lack of judgment, and Mr. Stefansson is rightly more than indignant at this assumption of censorship; and also at a newspaper interview which was obtained on the return of the party to Nome. For these transgressions Noice has expressed profound regret and sorrow, maintaining that they were due to his upset nervous condition; and that the newspapermen misunderstood him. He is a young man, and should not be condemned too severely. Nerves and poor judgment are a sufficient explanation. The pages were returned. They are published in this volume, and it is clear that there was no reason whatever for their extraction.

Meanwhile the colony which Noice left on the island by Mr. Stefansson's orders—thirteen Eskimos under command of Charles Wells, an American trapper—flourished. Then one day a Soviet gunboat, the Red October, appeared. Everything was confiscated, including furs worth $15,000 it is claimed. Wells and his Eskimos were hustled on board and unceremoniously dumped at Vladivostok, where Wells died of exposure. It is not necessary to remark the high-handed cruelty and injustice of this proceeding, which was characteristically Russian. Mr. Stefansson reproduces accounts from a number of newspapers, but no investigation by authority has been made, it seems.

In the earlier portion of the volume Stefansson reviews the history of Wrangel, recites the drift of the Karluk from Hadley's narrative, and gives in detail much of his discussion with officials on the Wrangel Island subject. The final part is occupied with eleven appendices. All the documents in the case are t be reproduced by photostat and made accessible at the American Geographical Society, Toronto University, and other places of learning.

FREDERICK S. DELLENBAUGH

A Dream of Venice

The Venetian Glass Nephew. By Elinor Wylie. George H. Doran Company. $2.

THE purpose of Mrs. Wylie's charming fantasy is to capture in a poet's mind a moment of beauty in the declining Renaissance. A previous novel has shown how skilfully she can catch the flavor, half absurd and wholly delightful, of a vanished society; and now her imagination, flitting from age to age in a search for delicate perfumes, has lit upon Venice at that moment in the eighteenth century when its twilight charm was fading before the garish beams of French enlightenment.

In her imagination the waters flow gently through the mysterious canals; the palaces rise, not stone by stone as the historical romancer might build them but as forms composed of trembling iridescent mist; and through the palaces move figures as insubstantial as their backgrounds, and yet, like them, luminous with a ghostly light. Casanova, grown old and boastful of his amorous exploits, affects his hearers with that faint boredom which was creeping over a city weary of too much brilliance; courtiers who must still pretend to like the faded tinsel of Sannazaro's "Arcadia" are beginning to be uncomfortably aware of the existence of M. Voltaire; and priests who have become by imperceptible gradations courtiers only are stifling with difficulty the yawns which came upon them in the midst of the mummeries which still must be kept up. The Renaissance, having lost faith in itself, is slowly dying; and yet there remains one man—a priest—able to summarize in himself all the beauty of which the moment is capable. Too [illegible] priests obtain the nephews whom he envies them or to understand [illegible] gives him; and he is constrained to seek from a magician the protege whom God has not seen fit to give him. Of this priest Mrs. Wylie [illegible] of his "nephew"—reputed to be made of spun glass but actually, [illegible] operations of [illegible].

No mind which thinks much about the art of life can fail to feel drawn toward a scrutiny of the Renaissance. One cannot but feel that some time during the course of that process by which the puritanical barbarism of the middle age was transformed into the cruel and empty sensuality of decadent Italy there must have been a moment when paganism and Christianity [illegible].

which the Renaissance was certainly striving—a moment, that is to say, when scruples and temperance did no more than make the full beauty of the world manifest and when that beauty was enjoyed just up to and not beyond the point where it dulls and corrupts. Yet look where one will one can never quite find it. One moment is still tinged, faintly at least, with the morose abstinence of St. Paul; the next is already touched with the hardness of pure paganism. And though one may prefer either to the other, it is not quite that moment of perfection for which one seeks. Perhaps it was, almost literally, only a moment; perhaps only one man or one woman enjoyed the perfect felicity of this perfect art during no more than a month or two and then, having all unawares stood upon the pinnacle, having without knowing it been at the exact center of a form that came to perfection, declined into death without leaving a trace by which the inquisitive scholar brooding over the past can identify either the man or the moment.

Mrs. Wylie, I like to imagine, was searching for that moment when she decided that it could never be found and that she would take instead her Cardinal Peter Innocent Bon as a man who could at least give some faint idea of what it was like. He is not, to be sure, quite perfect, for he leans ever so little toward the side which looks with disfavor upon the unmagical begetting of nephews, but in the midst of companions whose defects are not of that complexion the fault is not a serious one and so he will almost suffice. At any rate, Mrs. Wylie's book contains a fantasy of surprising delicacy and beauty, writing which is touched here and there by an irony so light as to be hardly distinguishable from tenderness; and if, perchance, she denies that any such fancy as this which I have attributed to her ever occupied her mind it may be sufficiently, I think, replied that her book will beget in the minds of her readers many fancies of which this is one and that she must, as their begetter, assume for them some responsibility.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

The Modern Art of Paleography

A Hand-list of Half-uncial Manuscripts. By E. A. Lowe. In Miscellanea Fr. Ehrle, IV, pp. 34-61. Rome: Tipografia del Senato.

Codices Lugdunenses Antiquissimi. Le Scriptorium de Lyon, La plus ancienne Ecole Calligraphique de France. Edited by E. A. Lowe. Bibliothèque de la Ville de Lyon.

The Palaeography of the Bobbio Missal. By E. A. Lowe. In The Bobbio Missal. Henry Bradshaw Society, LXI. London: Harrison and Sons.

THE art of paleography today means something more than the deciphering of curious and difficult modes of handwriting. The paleographer's task is not done when he has read a page of some ancient tome and assigned it to a century. With the start given by eminent scholars like Ludwig Traube, Léopold Delisle, and Cardinal Ehrle, paleography, especially [illegible] applied to the study of the early Middle Ages, has come to involve a searching examination of the different schools of writing both in themselves and in their relation to the culture of the times. It were hard to exaggerate the importance of such investigation for the sidelights which it throws on political history, letters, and art.

Among the workers in this field today few have made more substantial contributions than Dr. E. A. Lowe, a former pupil of Traube's and now for some years lecturer in paleography at the University of Oxford and Associate of the Carnegie Institution of Washington. The works before us are typical of his studies during the past year, though more than a year of careful work was needed to lay the foundation for [illegible] Dr. Lowe's investigations in the Lyons [illegible] dealt with the national minuscule scripts, particularly those of Italy and Spain, known respectively as the Beneventan and the Visigothic, which grew up at the beginning of the Middle Ages out of the ancient Roman cursive hands. In recent years he has turned his attention to the larger and more stately varieties, called uncial and half-uncial, that preceded the different sorts of minuscule.

The first of the works before us forms one of the varied array of contributions recently gathered in four portly volumes in honor of Cardinal Ehrle. With its one hundred and six entries Dr. Lowe's hand-list will prove an indispensable vade mecum for investigators of half-uncial script. In his study of the ancient scriptorium of Lyons he exhibits sound erudition, laborious research, and a wholesome reserve. There are thirty-seven excellent facsimiles in colliotype of the twenty-three manuscripts in uncial and half-uncial that either are now or were once a part of the Cathedral Library of Lyons. Thus the foundations are laid for a further work, which we hope will soon see the light, on the development of the minuscule style of Lyons in the eighth and ninth centuries. In the volume on the Bobbio Missal, which forms part of the monumental collection of liturgical texts published by the Henry Bradshaw Society, Dr. Lowe attacks the vexed problems raised by this curious little book. The volume opens with a reprint of Dom Wilmart's studies of this question, together with his later comments—a model of learning, acumen, and modesty. After due consideration of the many views expressed since the great Mabillon published his account of the Missal in 1687, and after a searching analysis of the paleographical features of the Missal, Dr. Lowe concludes that though found in Bobbio it was probably written at some French center in the eighth century. The peculiar orthography of the scribe points to the same place of origin. A mass of spellings is presented of great interest to students of the French language; forms like cociaens for quotiens and espes for spes are immediately illuminating. The Irish element in the mixed liturgy contained in the book might indicate one of the monasteries established by St. Columbanus before he journeyed southward and founded Bobbio in 614. The Missal, if not a codex Bobiensis, might be called a Columbanianus, a monument of the tradition started by the Irish saint a century before the writing was done.

Dr. Lowe might not care to follow hypothesis so far. His conclusions are sustained by facts, not probabilities. However, reserve does not clip the wings of his imagination. He has seen his scribe and shaken hands with him. The following extract, which is hedged about with proper cautions, will show [illegible] appre:

> [illegible] initial, with results pathetic in their crudity. The old [illegible] books, so he crowded into his Missal much more than [illegible] us.

E. K. RAND

The Man with the Hoe

Our Rural Heritage. By James Mickel Williams. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

OUR chance of making modern community life rational seems to depend so clearly upon the understanding of the background of our prejudices that the value of the type of effort represented by this book can hardly be overestimated. The altogether queer thing is that social psychologists have not attempted such analyses before. Beside such a book as this most preceding social psychologies seem to play across the surface of contemporary events without giving us any workable foothold in genuine causation. A theory of society that depends upon the classifying of human traits is about all we have had to go on heretofore.

The material here dealt with presented one of the most difficult pieces of research imaginable. The recreation of older community functions was necessary, along with a description of the institutions into which they crystallized. The recollections of the aged, court records, old diaries, and newspapers were the sources. But the judicious use of these is a matter with difficulties of its own. One limitation must be mentioned. Such studies are necessarily local. The foundations of American attitudes are not to be wholly understood from a study of early central New York.

Mr. Williams set himself the task of seeing what kind of life was lived in his early community. First of all there was the struggle with nature. Work was hard and long. Tools to do it with were primitive. There was necessary emphasis upon industriousness, thrift, repression of frivolity, and resignation to the whims of a wilful God who let young seedlings freeze and burned up corn with droughts. The father directed work and became something of a tyrant; but the young men submitted because he represented the only road to the successful coping with the conditions of life. The mother was the social leader, who gave color and form to the life of the community. She also was a tyrant to her daughters.

Such a life as this was bound to develop rigid codes of behavior and to foster lasting traditions. And these unquestionably survive in the present, though to be sure there is an ever-imminent clash between the rural and the urban traditions. The one tempers the other, but only after more or less serious struggle. How else account, for instance, for the continuous warfare in the New York Legislature between the city and country legislators? Yet worse even than this is the internal warfare which exists in all of us who came clearly out of the one or the other culture. The country lad who came to the city—and our farms still export about a third of their children—is a notorious example of this. How is he to curb the appetite for the heavy food that stayed his strength for the long dawn-to-dusk struggle with the weeds of his father's corn field? Yet if he doesn't he must die of digestive disorders. And how is he ever to feel quite easy in his mind at card-playing or at the cinematographs on Sunday? Nor, indeed, is he to escape the anguish of seeing his sons and daughters grow up free from the restraints and duties that [illegible] a successful preparation for manhood?

From the point of view, too, of a society which wants to go forward into the heritage prepared for it by industrial prosperity such studies as this of Mr. Williams, which make us shamefacedly aware of our lingering in the past, are important. Our emphasis upon thrift has led us to save (according to Mr. Friday) nearly a fifth of our annual national income. Such a procedure is indefensible in a world that still has widespread poverty. But thrift—laying by for a rainy day—is a rural inheritance. Other lessons to be learned from the study of early rural life are less negative. It was after all a full life, a life in which the diurnal rhythms were complete. They moved from morning tension and activity to evening relaxation, companionship, and rest. Can one say that of urban life?

REXFORD GUY TUGWELL

Elegant Propagandists

Next Year in Jerusalem. By Jerome and Jean Tharaud. Translated by Madeleine Boyd. Boni and Liveright. $2.

THE Frenchman travels, but his mind stays at home. Exotic subjects are useful for the production of feuilletons in light, sprightly, a trifle supercilious prose. These feuilletons are then gathered in bookform and can go through many editions. For upon the whole, however elegant in form, they are thoroughly philistine in character. For what is it that the MM. Tharaud succeed in telling the world in either "L'Ombre de la Croix" or "L'an prochain en Jérusalem"? Just this: that the Jews are a quaint, queer, rather dirty, rather subtly dangerous people, pig-headed and revolutionary at the same time, given in the East of Europe to repulsive customs and in Palestine to a vain, politically perhaps dangerous, but already half-abandoned experiment. Well, that is what the average Babbitt of all countries already more or less believes, what, at all events, he quite expects to hear. Since, however, he thinks himself a liberal, he wants just the touches of patronizing kindness for this queer, inferior folk with which the Tharaud brothers supply him.

What the MM. Tharaud forget in the first place is that no people is exotic to itself. But since exoticism is their stock in trade, their reports are vitiated from the start. In order to keep this exoticism which is profitable quite pure, they made no effort to prepare themselves for their task. They confess that they know no Hebrew, no Yiddish, and practically no German. If they are weak in English too, I am at a loss to know with whom or how they conversed in Palestine. A few of the older settlers in Rishon-le-Zion speak French too. But the only person in Palestine with whom I had to converse in French was the Arab mayor of Jerusalem. He happens to be thoroughly convinced of the success and beneficence of the Jewish settlement. But I can readily imagine the attitude of the few French-speaking emirs who were no doubt the counselors of the MM. Tharaud. I have no doubt that they found the people in the colonies uncommunicative. The chaluzim have antennae. They know a malicious eye. Also they speak, as a rule, almost everything except French.

The result is that practically all the definite statements of the MM. Tharaud are false, petulant, and childish. It is a demonstrable fact that most of the younger [illegible] in Eastern or Central Europe [illegible] is not a Jew from Germany and Austria." The whole [illegible] of Beth Alpha [illegible] is made up of young men and women from Germany. Jerusalem swarms with young Americans, college men and women, who are devoted to the life and work [illegible] about my friend Gershon Agronsky of Jerusalem? Did they [illegible] Did they [illegible] Did they [illegible] Gardens, or were they shocked with the [illegible] Republic, from which she was assuredly not excluded, the ground would not be burning under the feet of our wanderers and we could afford to pass over the feeble malice of the prosateurs of the boulevards.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN

Books in Brief

North America. By J. Russell Smith. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $6.

North America. By L. Rodwell Jones and P. W. Bryan. The Dial Press. $5.

These are geographies, octavo size, written by geographers. Mr. Smith has superbly materialized the modern pedagogic conception which holds that our fields of knowledge are inextricably interrelated. He has sublimated a traditionally dull and static subject. Geology and meteorology are woven into his giant tapestry; archeology, ethnology, economics, agriculture, forestry, transportation are threaded into its warp. Above all a warm and inquisitive subjectiveness permeates every one of the eight hundred pages of his impressive book. One is being personally conducted on a delightful journey. Messrs. Jones's and Bryan's "North America" is an adequate text book but suffers by comparison with that of Mr. Smith.

The Labor Movement in a Government Industry. By Sterling D. Spero. George H. Doran and Company. $2.

This book forms one of the Workers' Bookshelf series of the Workers' Education Bureau of America. It tells the story of the long struggle of the post-office employees for organized recognition. It starts with an inquiry into the status of a government employee as contrasted with the employee of a private concern. There is a good deal of hoakum abroad as to "soldier" status, and the hero of San Juan hill is responsible for no little of this gaudy claptrap as affecting post-office workers. Why a ditch digger for a municipal water company should have an entirely different industrial status from a ditch digger for a private water company is a metaphysical abstraction somewhat difficult to grasp. Certainly the psychological reactions of the two are identical, and that in the end must be the governing factor. This commonsense relationship has long been recognized abroad, and Mr. Spero shows how it is making its way here. In time of war, the federal employee may be on a somewhat different footing from that of the ordinary citizen; certain key positions—say in the confidential relations of the diplomatic service or the treasury department—may be on a somewhat different footing in times of peace. By and large, however, to deny government workers—particularly industrial workers—all rights of organization or affiliation with organized labor groups is the rankest tyranny. And what is worse, it throws all hope of advancement on the vicious process of pull and graft.

Drama

Bohemia's West End

IF one may judge from the two of his plays which New York has seen, Mr. Noel Coward has constituted himself the anatomist of Bohemia's West End. By birth and by bank account his people belong at least to the upper middle class, and they ought, so the comedies imply, to know better; but they have vague tendencies in the direction of the arts and they cultivate their personalities untrammeled by manners or morals. Vaguely suggestive of the characters of Oscar Wilde brought up to date, they spend their lives in matching insolent wits and they have played so long at various fashionable emotions that they are not sure themselves when they mean what they say. Whatever they do not find "adorable" is very likely to be "beastly," but they play their ridiculous parts with such grace and skill that no one, except possibly the playwright who seems now and then to be mildly shocked by the goings on of his personages, would wish them any different. It would, in fine, be hardly possible to do nothing more entertainingly than they do it.

A Study in Waste

THE OIL INDUSTRY and the COMPETITIVE SYSTEM

By GEORGE WARD STOCKING

This new volume in the Hart, Schaffner and Marx Prize Essays in Economics series deals with two major questions: first, Has our governmental effort to establish competition in the oil industry been successful? and second, Is competition in the oil industry an adequate insurance of an orderly and efficient development of our oil resources?

The volume represents a frank and illuminating analysis of the problems which have arisen from the private exploitation of a limited natural resource, and will be especially welcomed by all persons interested in the relation of government to industry.

The author, who has made a first-hand study of the oil fields, is now an assistant professor of economics at Dartmouth College.

$3.50. Order from your bookseller, or from the publishers

HOUGHTON MIFFLIN COMPANY
2 Park Street, Boston

CAN THE MAJORITY RULE? Read

Walter Lippmann's

THE PHANTOM PUBLIC

A restatement of the theory of popular government by the chief editorial writer of The World and the author of "Drift and Mastery," "Public Opinion," etc. An original and brilliant book.

Just ready. $2.00.

Rexford Guy Tugwell
Thomas Munro
Roy E. Stryker

American Economic Life

AND THE MEANS OF ITS IMPROVEMENT

A study of the natural, industrial, commercial, and agricultural life of the United States, with suggestions for its improvement. Illustrated, $4.50

Harcourt, Brace & Co., 383 Madison Ave. New York

Taking all in all, then, "Hay Fever" (Maxine Elliott's Theater) must be set down as the most amusing light comedy of the season. It deals with the highly disorganized country house of a popular actress past her prime, and it describes the week-end spent there by four guests invited by the four different members of the family each without the knowledge or the approval of the other. There are moments, it is true, when a theme threatens to intrude upon the fun, moments when it looks as though the play were about to deal with something—the folly, for example, of trying to prolong youth or the duty of mothers to look after their families—but the playwright manages somehow to resist the dangerous temptation and to keep the ball rolling merrily here and there without sending it definitely in any direction. The curtain first rises upon a random conversation; it falls for the last time upon a delicious picture of the four guests sneaking out on Sunday morning to their motors while the oblivious hosts are engaged in a passionate but inconsequential family dispute; and in between are a multitude of incidents which manage to combine the extravagance of farce with the lightness of comedy.

Mr. Coward's greatest gift is the remarkable dexterity which enables him to make a great deal out of nothing and to give an air of continuity and substantiality to a series of fragile incidents which are strung together by the slightest of threads; his most dangerous defect is that tendency to gentle reproof which took entire possession of the last half of "The Vortex" and which intrudes ever so slightly into "Hay Fever." Somehow it is as difficult for an Englishman to be comfortable without paying his respects to Good Form as it is for an American not to accord at least a conventional tribute to Virtue; and Mr. Coward cannot help reminding us that men and women do not behave as his characters do if they have been brought up among the real, right sort of people. Whether he regards these slightly intrusive comments as merely a highly marketable wholesomeness or whether he actually feels called upon to protest in the name of good form against the eccentricities of the society from which he draws his characters I do not know; but if he really means, what he certainly implies, that his highly piquant personages would do better to groom themselves into the likeness of the faultlessly suave foils who look at them with pained amazement, then he must be lacking in gratitude as a playwright to those who furnish him with his material and also, as a man, touched a little deeper than a comic writer should be with British solemnity. Laura Hope Crews, it must be said, deserves a very considerable share in the credit for making the evening at the Maxine Elliott delightful. There are few other comediennes indeed who could handle the extravagance of her role so surely and so lightly.

"The Buccaneer" (Plymouth Theater), which Messrs. Anderson and Stallings have fashioned about the personality of Morgan the pirate, is, surprisingly enough, a comedy more in the manner of "The Firebrand" than in that of "What Price Glory." One certainly expected a vigorous melodrama conceived in the spirit of that peculiar robust romanticism which its authors invented, but one gets instead a satiric comedy which treats piracy almost in the manner of the operetta. Partially, perhaps, because it requires some time for one to adjust oneself to the mood of the play, it seems to get away to a rather slow start; but the last act, in which Morgan is brought before Charles the Second to answer the charge of capturing without a commission the city which none of the regular admirals would dare to attack, is both brilliant and delightful. Though Morgan explains that the difference between piracy and war is legal not actual, and that a devastated city looks much the same whether an officer or a buccaneer has taken it, the admirals insist that merely for the honor of the navy he must be hanged; until Charles, who was always inclined to mercy provided the exercising of it did not cost him much effort, decides to give him a commission instead. Incidentally it may be remarked that the Merry Monarch himself would make a perfect subject for a modern comedy. The tender-minded Victorians always fumbled him because they could not stomach him without a coating of sugar, but he was the sort of realist whose languid disillusion the present day could not but find highly diverting.

In "American Born" (Hudson Theater) George M. Cohan remains true to the types of actor and playwright which long ago he created. His "serio-farcical" play is, as drama, quite as contemptible as anything he ever wrote; his acting, however, is as winning as it ever was. Seldom today is such talent lavished upon such sorry stuff. "Caught" (39th Street Theater) undertakes to discuss the case of the young man who chooses marriage to a wealthy woman instead of work. Unfortunately it degenerates rather rapidly into lurid melodrama. "Applesauce" (Ambassador) is a farce which revolves about the personality of a genial young man with the gift of gab. It is decidedly crude but often amusing.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

¶ Actors' Theatre presents "The Call of Life," by Arthur Schnitzler, English version by Dorothy Donnelly, with a distinguished cast; staged by Dudley Digges; settings by Jo Mielziner; at the Comedy Theatre. Phone Penn. 3558. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

¶ Subscription books open for the program season. Address David Wallace, Actors' Theatre, 48 W. 49th Street.

LAST WEEKS

Evenings (except Monday), 8:30 sharp.
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp.

THE PROVINCETOWN PLAYHOUSE 133 GRAND St.

The Grand Street Follies of 1925

All Performances—Orchestra, $2; Balcony, $1.50.

BAYES Theatre, 44th St., W. of Broadway. LACKAWANNA 6565
EVENINGS, 8:30. MATS. SAT. & SUN., 2:30

The Yiddish Art Theatre Players in Maurice Schwartz Production of A Biblical Drama by Paul Heyse
Complete Synopsis in English with Program

King Saul

LECTURES

RAND SCHOOL
7 E. 15th Street

Prof. Henry E. Crampton
"The Evolution of Life"
Saturdays, 3:00 P. M.

V. F. Calverton
"Social Interpretation of American Literature"
Fridays, 8:30 P. M.

David P. Berenberg
"Socialism"
Tuesdays, 8:30 P. M.

SOUTH AMERICA Their Need of One Another NORTH AMERICA
Lectures by AMY WOODS
recently returned from South America
AT CHAPIN & GORE HALL, 64 West 40th St., near Fifth Ave.
Tuesday, Oct. 27th, 8:30 P. M. "Buenos Aires, the Modern Paris"
Thursday, Oct. 29th, 8:30 P. M. "Rio de Janeiro, the Beautiful"
Tuesday, Nov. 3rd, 8:30 P. M. "Montevideo, the Pioneer"
Thursday, Nov. 5th, 8:30 P. M. "Santiago, the Switzerland of South America"
Tuesday, Nov. 10th, 8:30 P. M. "Lima, the City of Kings"
Thursday, Nov. 12th, 8:30 P. M. "Panama, the Canal Zone"
Single admission $1.50. Course ticket $7.50.
Auspices Pan American Women's Association

International Relations Section

Autocracy in the Virgin Islands

AT an address before the American Bar Association in Detroit on September 1, last, former Judge Lucius J. M. Malmin made the following address on the Virgin Islands under the rule of the United States. The story of the judge who was unable to sustain his position against the wishes of the governor is Judge Malmin's own experience in the islands as judge of the District Court.

Since the days of Lincoln and Seward, we have been looking acquisitively oceanward where lie a group of islands formerly known as the Danish West Indies, now beautifully named the Virgins. There are about forty islands in the Virgin group, of which only three, St. Thomas, St. Croix, and St. John are inhabited. The total area of these possessions is 132 square miles, and they lie at the southeast angle of a geographic triangle. From New York to the islands the distance is about 1,500 miles, from Key West about the same distance, with Cuba, Haiti, San Domingo, and Porto Rico between. Forty miles southeast of Porto Rico lies St. Thomas with St. John about six miles east thereof and St. Croix forty miles south. On a clear day, from a hill top on St. Thomas, one may see St. Croix or Porto Rico. The Panama Canal, for the protection of which these islands were purchased, is about 1,200 miles distant. From the islands to Liverpool is 3,600 miles, to Trinidad 518 miles.

The islands were first occupied about 1650 by the Dutch, who later migrated to New Amsterdam. The Danes arrived shortly after this abandonment and were in possession continuously about 250 years with the exception of two short intervals when England dominated the islands. After more than fifty years of negotiation, the United States Government purchased the Danish West Indies on March 31, 1917, paying Denmark $25,000,000, five times more than was originally contemplated by either of the contracting parties. But a psychological moment arrived; Denmark took advantage of it and benefitted; we secured the right to plant a flag pole and nothing more. A recent supposedly authoritative English writer with the West Indies for subject mentions that a plebiscite in the Virgin Islands at the time of the transfer showed 230,000 for annexation to the United States and about half that number against. As a matter of fact, there was at that time a total population of 25,000 which has dwindled to about 15,000.

[illegible] the Stars and Stripes wave over him, is not an American, not a citizen of the United States. He is a national, without flag or country. Such is the dictum of the Department of State, though the Department of Justice at times seems to differ, probably basing its opinion on the statement of a certain Con[illegible] the islands and the people with them," which certainly should make the people of the islands the recognized, legitimate children of Congress and entitled to its consideration. I quote the treaty:

> [illegible] until otherwise provided to enjoy all the private, municipal, and [illegible] favorable position in respect to the above mentioned rights and liberties that they now enjoy.

Which raised the question of the choice of legal proceedings, that is, the right as Danish citizens residing in the Virgin Islands to be tried under Danish or American law. Continuing, I quote:

> [illegible] citizenship in Denmark by making before a court of record, within one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications of this convention, a declaration of their decision to preserve such citizenship; in default of which declaration they shall be held to have renounced it, and to have accepted citizenship in the United States.

If, under the treaty, the islanders automatically accepted citizenship in the United States it must be construed that there was by and through the treaty an offer of citizenship. Again I quote:

> The civil rights and the political status of the inhabitants of the islands shall be determined by Congress.

[illegible] exception of one junketing expedition—made the slightest sign, individually or collectively, that it is aware of the existence of the islands, other than the Act of Congress providing a temporary form of government, perhaps the shortest act on record, from which I now quote:

> All military, civil, and judicial powers necessary to govern the West Indian Islands acquired from Denmark shall be vested in a governor and such person or persons as the President may appoint, and shall be exercised in such manner as the President shall direct until Congress shall provide for the government of said islands:
>
> Provided, that the President may assign an officer of the army or navy to serve as such governor and perform the duties appertaining to said office; and provided further that the governor of said islands shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and provided further that the compensation of all persons appointed under this act shall be fixed by the President.

President Wilson appointed Rear Admiral Oliver first naval governor of the islands, since which time we have had in succession and serving each a little more than one year, Oman, Kittelle, Hough, Williams, and Trench. These frequent changes of governor do not tend to stability. The governors, accustomed to navy rule and authority, have held themselves aloof, and though there may be a saving exception, have been ignorant of civic duties and lacking in experience. As a rule, they detail and delegate their gubernatorial authority to subordinates and, though presiding at official functions, are considered by their official circle and the public as mere lookers-on.

The misconception of governmental authority cannot be better exemplified than by the attempt of Governor Oman to dictate judicial decisions. In criminal cases of importance, the naval government habitually interferes, suggests, urges, directs, directly or indirectly. Notably, in a civil matter involving damages supposedly accruing to the government, the judge was reminded that he was a government official, and that judgment in the sum of $35,000 against the defendant, the Bethlehem Sugar Company, was expected. Astonishment was great when the court seemed to take offense. Did this matter end here? It did not. The judge stood pat, and was by governor's order deprived of his court officials, marshal, clerk, reporter, and governor's appointees, who with the judge were threatened with immediate arrest if they in any manner aided or abetted the judge in his official duties. In fact, governor's warrant was [illegible] for Washington where he desired to go, but he did depart, [illegible] on an English ship.

On his arrival in Washington he ascertained that a subordinate naval officer had been sent also for the purpose of amending the insular law appertaining to the judiciary; and this attempted amendment was successful. Josephus Daniels recommended it, Secretary Tumulty acted as intermediary, and President Wilson, acting under the executive authority conferred by the Act of Congress and the urgent demand of the navy, cut out the vital paragraphs in the Insular Judiciary Act, emasculating it so completely that in the event of the resignation or death of the then sitting judge, the office would be vacant. This the navy did without the approval, consent, or even knowledge of the insular council which had full power to act, in an effort to be relieved of a judge who was not sufficiently pliable.

The judge was appointed for life but the governor commanded the Marines, and the jail, though the coolest place on the islands, was not otherwise comfortable. Considering this the judge took counsel with himself and others, notably Judge Sutherland, the late Judge Mahlon Pitney, John Barton Payne, James Hamilton Lewis, Hampton Carson, and William Clarke Mason of Philadelphia.

A writ of prohibition against the governor was suggested, but out of what court? Not the Supreme, or the District of Columbia, or the judge's own court, or his Appellate, but a petition for a mandatory writ out of the Third United States Appellate. The significance of the matter, the seriousness of the situation when called to the attention of the Attorney General of the United States, caused that official immediately to file a petition asking a mandatory order compelling the judge to return to the islands, ascend his bench, and not delay the business of the Third United States Appellate Court, whose subordinate judge he was.

The writ was granted. Did this end it? It did not. The judge, knowing what he was up against, attempted confirmation of the mandate by securing the indorsement of the Secretary of the Navy. Denby refused. Upon the judge's return to the islands with the authoritative mandate, the then Governor, Kittelle, by the advice of one George Washington Williams, a recent arrivel in the islands, refused to recognize the mandate, emphatically stating that in those islands he was not only naval governor in full command, but also the high, the middle, and the low judiciary, and was not interested in the Third United States Appellate Court. The judge set sail for Philadelphia and arriving there told the Third United States Appellate that the governor refused to regard the court's mandate. The court set about making the mandate stronger.

Did this end it? It did not. The judge was experienced and he had high regard for his office which was being belittled by the governor. Rumors came that the federal court in Porto Rico was also being sneered at because of this governor's show of disrespect. It was, therefore, deemed expedient to have the highest authority confirm and indorse this second and more emphatic mandate of the court. The entire matter was accordingly presented to President Harding who, after due consideration, addressed the following letter to the judge, supplementing it with a letter to the governor:

The letter to the judge:

MY DEAR SIR:

I am writing to acknowledge yours of June 23 and to request you to return to the Virgin Islands at the earliest possible date and resume your duties as Judge of the District Court of the Islands.

I have notified the Governor of this official request and have invited the administrative branch of the government in the islands to give every consideration to the judicial branch of the government which is becoming.

Very truly yours,

(Signed) Warren G. Harding

The letter to the governor:

MY DEAR GOVERNOR KITTELLE:

I have officially ordered Judge Lorrin I. Mahlon to return to the Virgin Islands and resume his official duties as Judge of the District Court of the Islands. You are doubtless familiar with the question of authority which arose between the Governor of the islands and Judge Mahlon and the latter's appeal to the Supreme Court of the United

THE TRUTH SHALL MAKE YOU FREE

THE NEW AGE OF FAITH

BY JOHN LANGDON-DAVIES

SCIENTIST AND NEW REPUBLIC CONTRIBUTOR

At last the truth in popular science! Here is a book that violently attacks Wiggam, Stoddard, Grant, Bryan and the pseudo-scientists and clears up the mist of false facts around the theories of heredity, race, environment, evolution, etc.

JOHN HAYNES HOLMES says: "This is a book of popular science in the best sense of the word. It is written with a refreshing spirit of fearless attack upon the follies and fanaticisms that are flourishing these days under the name of science. This book does much to clear the atmosphere and I hope may be widely read."

$2.50 at all bookstores

GOOD BOOKS

THE VIKING PRESS

B. W. HUEBSCH, Inc.

30 IRVING PLACE NEW YORK

FACTS ARE SACRED BUT COMMENT FREE

Such, for more than a hundred years, has been the creed of The Manchester Guardian, often called the greatest daily newspaper in the world.

The Manchester Guardian

WEEKLY

contains the chief features of the daily Manchester Guardian, including, without suppression or distortion of facts, a true review, week by week, of the world's most important happenings.

In its seven columns, The Manchester Guardian Weekly supplies those with facts who, in Liberty's cause, in numerous communities rise, to look and to press, at the same time always believing that the voice of those with opposite views has a right to be heard.

To be sure that it is the country's wish, readers of quality [illegible] that The Manchester Guardian Weekly has [illegible] knowledge of the world's most important happenings in concise form and [illegible] them to maintain a [illegible] outlook on all questions.

— MAIL THIS COUPON —

To The Manchester Guardian Weekly
[illegible]
New York City.

I enclose [illegible] for a year's subscription to THE MANCHESTER GUARDIAN WEEKLY to be mailed to me from Manchester, England.

Name ....

Address ....

States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit. The decision of the court can only be complied with by the return of Judge Malmin to his official duties with proper consideration of his official functions by the administrative forces of the islands.

I trust you will join in making manifest the disposition of all agencies of government not only to conform to the demands of our laws but to most thoroughly respect the decision of our courts.

Very truly yours,
(Signed) WARREN G. HARDING

It was done; it was not possible for it to be undone; but it was. While the judge was on the ocean at the President's request, journeying to his court, the radio, that device for making the world smaller, worked overhead and overtime. The governor and Denby brought pressure and the judge upon his arrival in the islands was defiantly presented by the governor with a radiogram from the President, demanding that the judge ignore the letters quoted above. There was only one thing to do under such circumstances. The judge resigned. That ended it.

And now Williams, the advisor of the governor, is judge, he who on a certain occasion stated that his motto was: "What is the Constitution between friends?" Since his appointment, litigation in the islands has practically ceased, the people saying: "What's the use?"

Recently, an editor had the temerity to criticize the brutality of an unnamed, but governor-appointed, police officer. For this the editor was charged with "political libel," arrested, fined, and sentenced to thirty days in jail; appealing the case he commented editorially on his appeal and was promptly charged with contempt of court and again sent to jail on a thirty-day sentence.

But the navy occasionally passes over the head of its own judge. A young woman, a teacher, sent to the islands by the Government of the United States, a woman of refinement and education, a botanist and correspondent of the Smithsonian Institute, incurred the displeasure of the naval government. She had sent some caustic comment to Washington. Navy officials invaded her home, ransacked it, put her on a horse, misled her by saying she was to be brought before the governor, placed her under guard, and the next day under the same pretense of taking her before the governor, carried her aboard ship, and, under guard the entire voyage, landed her in Norfolk, whence she was taken to Washington and finally to her native State; there, on the testimony of a naval nurse who observed her only on shipboard, she was judged insane and sent to the State asylum. She was immediately pronounced sane and urged to leave the institution, which she did with the admonition of the superintendent not to divulge her experience on penalty of reincarceration. Shall I go on, or have I said enough? I purposely omit conditions in the islands, economic and otherwise, nor do I speak of the islanders and their ways. They are a gentle people, speaking soft English. The regime of the Danes was democratic. The Islanders were not ostracised; they were not over-policed or harshly treated. They grasped the hand of Uncle Sam with confidence only to find it cold, hard, and indifferent, and they now pray for the return of the Danes with their warm handclasp.

The experience of the Virgin Islanders is well known in the Caribbean. The press, that guardian of freedom, and particularly the [illegible] suggest that Barbadoes and Martinique be accepted in part liquidation of English and French war indebtedness, but who will persuade the people of these islands to exchange their [illegible] freedom—I have in mind the Volstead Act—for the doubtful protection and suppositious freedom of the States? The Island of St. John is [illegible] Thomas comatose; St. Croix gasping; Congressional neglect and indifference has been deadly.

CHALFONTE-HADDON HALL
ATLANTIC CITY

On the Beach and the Boardwalk. In the very center of things.
AMERICAN PLAN ONLY ALWAYS OPEN
Illustrated folder and rates on request.
LEEDS and LIPPINCOTT COMPANY

accept nothing but
Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store
Midol
for HEADACHE
GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

Exchange Sell
Buy

Something odd, rare; useful, ornamental. Try the classified section of The Nation. Your advertisement will be read by men and women of divers tastes, means and appreciation. For rates address Dept. E. S. B., The Nation.

MOTHER JONES' AUTOBIOGRAPHY is the thrilling story of a remarkable woman who has given her life to the struggle of the workers for a living wage and decent working conditions. [illegible] material here for the student. [illegible] writes the introduction. Cloth, illustrated. $2.50 postpaid.
Charles H. Kerr & Company, 341 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

Talk It Over With HARRY KELLY
Is it possible to live in the country, yet be near to the city?
Is the cost of living higher? Why? What owes Homes at Mt. Airy?
How much capital is needed to buy ½ or ¼ acre at Mt. Airy?
What about water and electricity?
Can you help me finance building my home?
These and many other questions will be answered for you when you drop in to talk it over with
HARRY KELLY, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York
Chelsea 6182

When writing to advertisers please mention The Nation.

The McLean Bill for civil government for the Virgin Islands is pending. It will probably continue to pend. I quote its foster father, Senator McLean: "There is opposition to it." The navy is the only opposition. Undoubtedly, there is much naval argument against the bill. It will deprive the navy of a sinecure, a snug harbor, an easy berth.

Sympathy is cold to distant misery—the people of the Virgin Islands despair and cry out in weariness; Congress is remote, unfriendly, disinterested, and has a remarkable paucity of knowledge of the islands and the needs of the inhabitants. President Coolidge has said "the chief ideal of the American people is idealism." Is this idealism evanescent; a phantom of the brain, or is it real, so real that among other realities, it can also be for the Virgin Islanders?

Contributors to This Issue

JO SWERLING, during the period of which he writes, was connected with the Chicago Herald and Examiner, the New York American, and the New York Mirror.

WALTER F. WHITE is assistant secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. He is the author of "The Fire in the Flint" and has written another novel, to appear shortly.

ANNA LOUISE STRONG is guardian of the John Reed Children's Colony on the Volga and of other farm schools in Russia, and author of "The First Time in History." She is now en route to America by way of China.

LOUISE BOGAN has published one volume of poems, "Body of This Death."

FREDERICK S. DELLENBAUGH is an artist, author, and topographer who has made explorations into many parts of the world.

LUDWIG LEWISOHN was formerly the dramatic critic of The Nation, and is now one of its contributing editors. He is the author of "Up Stream," "The Drama and the Stage," "The Creative Life," and other books. Mr. Lewisohn spent part of the past year in Palestine. His book "Israel" will appear this fall.

REXFORD GUY TUGWELL is assistant professor of economics at Columbia University and editor of several books on economic subjects.

advt.

HELP—WANTED

by an Advertiser

The above caption was suggested by the thought that not everybody reads the advertisements. Frequently, the small classified notices are as interesting as news.

An artist who wants someone to share her apartment and her interests over in Paris; an estate for sale of eighty-six acres—apples, cherries, pears; trout, salmon; bear, deer, geese, Chinese pheasants; more prosaic, a lawyer who wants a secretary—or a Radcliffe graduate who wants to tutor; or an instructor of English who is looking for a new connection; or an importer who wants a business assistant. . . .

Sometimes the results secured by just a few lines are amazing. To one such advertisement over one hundred replies were received. In partial explanation is the fact that readers of The Nation are uncommonly responsive to a message in The Nation—even to an advertising message.

Write the Classified Advertising Department of The Nation for information.

The Child, the Parent and the World They Live In

THE FIRST PARENTS' CONFERENCE on the study and bringing up of children will be held at the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, New York City, October 26-28.

Among the speakers are: Dr. Beatrice Hinkle, author of "The Re-creating of the Individual"; Dorothy Canfield Fisher, lecturer and novelist; Dr. Miriam Van Waters, whose "Youth in Conflict" has caused such a stir; William T. Russell, dean of Teachers' College, New York City; Mrs. Helen T. Woolley, assistant director of the Merrill-Palmer School, Detroit; and Dr. Frankwood E. Williams, Medical Director, National Committee for Mental Hygiene.

A Dinner on Oct. 28 will discuss "Freedom of the Child—What Does It Mean?" Speakers: Angelo Patri, Dorothy Canfield Fisher, Miriam Van Waters, Dr. C. W. Kimmins.

For details, write to the Child Study Association of America, Inc., 54 West 74th Street, New York City, under whose auspices it is being held.

THE NEGRO YEAR BOOK

1925-1926 EDITION ON SALE

[illegible] presents a succinct, comprehensive and impartial review of the [illegible] and indicate the progress of the Negro race. In addition to its interest to the general reader, the book is especially adapted for use in schools where historical and social courses on the Negro [illegible]

Price, paper cover, $1.00; board cover, $1.50.

NEGRO YEAR BOOK COMPANY

TUSKEGEE INSTITUTE, ALABAMA

HOFFMANN SCHOOL for Individual Development

Libby Castle

Fort Washington Ave at 193d Street New York City

DAY AND BOARDING SCHOOL

Children 4 to 17 Years

School Bus

New Home of Hoffmann School

This pretty little house stands at 2020 Chamberlain Avenue, Madison, Wisconsin, [illegible] prepared to the year's annual electric home.

The Wonder Home

Do you want ice? Electricity will make it. Are you hungry? Cook your eggs on the breakfast table. Do you want heat, light or power? They come in every room at the touch of your finger.

Wonderful as these things have been, and are, progress in electric development is continuous. Scientists never lose interest in improving their homes—and yours.

It is interesting to know that this demonstration of what electricity can do in the modern home was made by the General Electric Company—the same company that has made such immense contributions to the use of electricity by the railroads, by big steel mills, and by every other branch of modern industry.

GENERAL ELECTRIC

NO STOMACH REGRETS

Your Diet Problems Solved by Our Scientific and Delicious Preparations of Fresh Vegetables and Fruits.

Health-Food. Whole Wheat Products. Satisfying Diet for Diabetics.

Trufood VEGETARIAN RESTAURANT

153 West 44th Street East of Broadway

Open Daily Until 12 P. M.

Thousands at 1/2 Price and Less

ANY BOOK IN PRINT

Delivered at your door. We pay the postage. Send for our [illegible] sure to send postcard for [illegible]

FREE [illegible] catalogue is a short course in literature and is so used by scores of America's [illegible] Send us a postcard now.

DAVID B. CLARKSON THE BOOK BROKER

1811 CLARKSON BUILDING, CHICAGO, ILL.

BOOKSELLERS

German Books a Specialty

W. BEYER, Inc. Books and Art

Now at 258 5th Avenue

[illegible] New York

ANCIENT AND MODERN BOOKS

15th to 20th century

[illegible]

HOWES, Bookseller, St. Leonards-on-Sea, England

FOR RENT

MUST rent immediately, attractive six-room house at Rye, N. Y., near school and Sound, only 45 minutes from New York. Modern conveniences. Adjoins open fields but with easy access to stores, trolley, etc. Partly furnished, $75 a month. For appointment phone Whitehall 7730, or write Box No. 355, The Nation.

APARTMENT WANTED

WANTED—[illegible] for Sept. 1, unfurnished [illegible] conditions. The Nation, Box No. 362, care The Nation.

POSITION WANTED

YOUNG woman of college education and tastes aspires to establish connections with a firm where her experience in advertising, [illegible] can be utilized and developed. Will also consider any kind of congenial office work. Excellent references. Box No. 357, care of The Nation.

HELP WANTED

WANTED—Young man or woman, preferably student of psychology, [illegible] spare time [illegible] Address [illegible] Box No. 356, care The Nation.

JESUS' WAY OF LIVING

[illegible] Bible Study Course. Conducted with special relation to our modern life. Nine studies. Published [illegible] Annual subscription 75c. [illegible] 60c. [illegible]

The American Institute of Sacred Literature [illegible] Chicago, Ill.

LESSONS IN ENGLISH

Beginning, intermediate or advanced pupils. Correction of manuscript.

GRACE E. COATES. 240 Waverly Place, N. Y. (Formerly with Ford School)

TUTORING in ENGLISH, GERMAN and ELEMENTARY FRENCH by [illegible] teacher. Classes and private. Vicinity of New York. Box No. 361, care of The Nation.

EXCHANGE of GERMAN CONVERSATION for ENGLISH. Young German lady [illegible] wants to meet congenial American. Wilhelm Moll, [illegible]

The Russian Inn, 33 W. 37th St., New York

Luncheon - Tea - Dinner and After the Theatre Dancing

Phone [illegible] Open daily [illegible]

FOLDER PROPOSING COLONIZATION among [illegible] natural resources in British Columbia, along lines of Industrial Democracy, sent free by The Cooperative Club, P. O. Box 1248, San Francisco, Calif.

AMERICAN TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH COMPANY AND ASSOCIATED COMPANIES

BELL SYSTEM

One Policy, One System, Universal Service

When writing to advertisers, please mention The Nation

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 28, 1925 No. 3147

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 475

EDITORIALS:
- Novelty or Progress? 477
- The Great Advance Toward Peace 478
- French Debts and Liberian Rubber 479
- Capitalizing Calamity 479
- Our Literature and Ourselves 480

CANYONS AND CAMERONS. By Arthur Warner 481

EIGHT DAYS ON ELLIS ISLAND. By Rex Hunter 483

LAST DAYS OF THE LOVELY LADY. By Allen Tate 485

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 487

CORRESPONDENCE 487

BOOKS AND PLAYS:
- Fin de Siècle. By Eda Lou Walton 490
- First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 490
- The Superficial Grey. By Ernest P. Henderson 490
- Damp Powder. By Donald Douglas 491
- A Baffled Man. By Worthington C. Ford 492
- Tory History. By Lindsay Rogers 492
- Originality in Children. By Caroline Pratt 493
- Books in Brief 493
- Notable Fall Books 494
- Drama: Vita Brevis. By Joseph Wood Krutch 495

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
- The French Budget for 1926 496

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY
Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

ONE BY ONE the miserable slanders and lies of the World War are being exposed. Now it is Brigadier General James E. Charteris, said to have been Chief of Intelligence of the British Army during the war, who at a dinner at the National Arts Club in New York City let the cat out of the bag in regard to the abominable story that the Germans were utilizing the bodies of their dead in order to obtain fats and other things needed for fertilizing and for the making of ammunition. From a dead German soldier General Charteris obtained a picture of some German dead being sent home and one of the cadavers of dead horses being returned from the front for fertilizing purposes. Knowing the Chinese ancestor-worship, General Charteris changed the caption under these pictures and sent them to a Shanghai newspaper, England being then eager to rouse Chinese sentiment against the Germans. He then forgot all about it, until six weeks later a letter from a Chinese reader of the Field, a British hunting publication, told the story, current in China, of the "horrible boiling down of dead German soldiers."

THE STORY SPREAD all over England, and this high-minded and gentlemanly general even went so far as to have a diary forged purporting to tell the feelings of a German soldier employed in the boiling-down factory when suddenly he found that he had to boil the body of his brother. This was so raw that even this hero did not dare use it, but it is now in a British war museum, doubtless as an authenticated war document. Thus does war make blackguards, slanderers, forgers, liars—in brief, scoundrels—of officers and gentlemen. General Charteris told this pretty anecdote to his hearers as "an amusing sidelight on the work of his office," according to the New York Times. It seems even now that a man who would stoop to such statements ought to be expelled from the society of gentlemen and gentlewomen. Less disgusting but equally illuminating is the confession in a recent issue of the New Statesman, one of the foremost British weeklies, which reads thus: "It is seven years since the war ended and we are still pretending that the Germans are an inferior and predatory, if not actually criminal, nation. Such pretenses served our purpose legitimately enough during the war, when we wanted to get the Americans into it, but in 1925 they are merely ridiculous." This is the stuff that the great Ambassador Walter Hines Page and the American press fell for, by which the American people were fooled into entering the war.

ADMIRAL SIMS on the witness stand is a joy forever. He has never been known to adjust his utterances to spare official feelings, and when he appeared in Washington before the air inquiry he lived up to his reputation. What could be more delicious than this? Asked by Senator Bingham to comment on Secretary Wilbur's statement that "my idea is that there is no such thing as control of the air . . . long as the enemy has one plane," the Admiral replied: "I wonder who told him that. . . . The remark of the Secretary, although he does not suspect it, does not mean anything at all." The Admiral declared Colonel Mitchell a "bully good fellow" who "has done an inestimable service in bringing this thing to the attention of the people." His scoring of the moss-backs in the Navy Department was merciless; it demands a complete overhauling of the Department at the hands of Congress. As for the airplane, the admiral took the position that every battleship is at the mercy of fliers. Confirming our recent editorial, Twin Military Evils, he declared that all new weapons have been resisted by military and naval authorities throughout the ages, spoke of the opposition as [illegible] to taking the sails off battleships, to the torpedo and submarine and other new devices, and did not hesitate to refer to his own insubordination in Roosevelt's day when he attacked the Navy Department for its delinquencies in the matter of target practice. His testimony, however, was against such an independent air service as has been urged by Colonel Mitchell. Why Secretary Wilbur is allowed to stay in the Cabinet after these recent revelations is hard to understand.

JOHN W. WEEKS was the type of the dull and rich business man in a high administrative office, without vision of a new and better society, and completely contented with the world, as it is, in which his lines have been so happily cast. But he had the right to crow, as he did on retiring as Secretary of War, over what he had accomplished toward militarizing the United States. It is not his fault that we are not even further along the road to complete militarization and universal military service. From the war he learned only to go on with the system of force which his own chief, President Coolidge, has just declared a total failure. His own connections with big business were of the closest and would not have borne too eager inspection. Mr. Weeks is succeeded by a younger, abler, and more attractive figure, the Assistant Secretary of War, Colonel Dwight F. Davis, who is, however, as much in sympathy with the aggressive army propaganda and the introduction of military training in schools as his predecessor. The new Assistant Secretary, Colonel Hanford MacNider, is of the perfect militarist type. As the able, fire-and-hatred-breathing head of the American Legion he committed himself to the very opposite of those new policies of disarmament and liberalism to which Mr. Coolidge has suddenly announced his devotion. Both Davis and MacNider had admirable records on the front in France; the War Department is thus entirely in the hands of men who fought abroad.

THE CHINESE CUSTOMS CONFERENCE opens at Peking with the Western Powers apparently agreed rigidly to limit the scope of its discussions. In Shanghai the "judicial investigation" into the May murders has opened, with the British and Japanese "judges" playing, according to the correspondent of the New York Times, roles evidently dictated by diplomatic instructions. Will the Powers never learn? We hope that Washington will not let itself be drawn into playing the British game, but will instead cut loose and follow Senator Borah's stirring advice:

> China [he said] will assert her independence and right to administer her own laws within her dominion, to fix and collect her tariffs, and nothing less will satisfy and nothing less should satisfy her. If the other Powers in China do not wish to proceed along these lines, nevertheless the United States should. If the United States cannot have the company and cooperation of other Powers, which she certainly would desire, she should shape her own policy and pursue her own course.
>
> We must either treat these peoples justly, fairly, and as equals, or we shall have to fight them. I am in favor of trying the policy of justice for a time instead of force, of fair treatment instead of exploitation. I think it will work more to the cause of peace.

RENTS ROSE IN PANAMA. Protest meetings were held. The President of the republic, denounced by the rent strikers as "a tool of the wealthy landlords," forbade public meetings. Public meetings were none the less held, at which the renters demanded that a law similar to the New York State law be passed, barring increases in rents which would yield more than 12 per cent on the landlords' investments. The Panama police fired on the demonstrators, killing one and injuring eight. The chauffeurs and street-car conductors struck in sympathy with the League of Renters; the bakers also threatened to suspend work. At that point the President went into conference with three American officials, including the governor of the Canal Zone and the general commanding the local troops. (This essential point, omitted in most of the American newspapers, was carried in the excellent United Press accounts of the affair.) Thereupon the President "requested" American intervention, and 600 American troops landed from [illegible] possession of Panama at 1 p. m. on October 12. Before midnight they had killed one and wounded two and arrested forty Panamans, and had fired into the windows of the demonstrators' houses. All the strike leaders were jailed. Soon afterward a conference of landlords agreed to return to the rents of January, 1925, and the American troops were withdrawn. The strike leaders are still in jail. The troops may have done a good, quick job; but a few Americans may wonder if that is the kind of national defense which keeps the tax rate high.

EVERY AMERICAN EXPORT HOUSE will doubtless be doing an active business with Russia before the American Federation of Labor gets around to recognizing the first workers' republic in the world. Arthur A. Purcell, fraternal delegate from Great Britain and member of the recent British Labor mission to Russia, pleaded in vain at the federation's convention at Atlantic City for a renewed understanding with the Russian trade unions. President Green in reply uttered new vows against any traffic with communism, and the convention declared its hostility to the Soviets "not merely in defensive manner, but in a vital and aggressive manner," commending the United States Government for "its courage, its adherence to fundamental principles of democracy" in refusing to recognize Russia. And for the first time the expulsion of Communists from the trade unions was formally recommended. Characteristically the federation coupled friendly gestures to China—a demand that the unequal treaties be abolished and a hope that Chinese labor would develop its trade-union organizations—with a unanimous vote against any attempt to reopen the question of Oriental immigration.

APART FROM THESE EVIDENCES of insularity the tone of the convention was optimistic and aggressive. The A. F. of L. is growing, for the first time since the post-war slump. The paid-up membership is now 2,878,297, with half a million more members on strike or unemployed. Mr. Green opposed the policy—forced upon many of the British unions—of accepting wage cuts for the sake of restoring markets. He urged a strenuous campaign of organization of non-union trades and plants, and pressed the adoption of union insurance schemes, even of investment advice for workers. The worst danger to unionism he sees in company unions and employee representation, and he cannily suggested that the presence of union representatives in the management of such schemes would modify their evil effects—a page out of the book of William Z. Foster. Important plans were laid at the metal-trades meeting for organizing the great non-union automobile companies—including the Ford plants. The international officers of all the trades involved will work out the plans together to avoid the danger of jurisdictional friction in fighting this difficult battle. If the unions gain a toehold in this open-shop fortress perhaps they will dare to face in earnest their hardest and most important campaign—the organization of the steel industry.

SLOWLY, but with compelling momentum, the effort to bring the baffled, perplexed parent to the door of the psychiatrist and to the penny peep inside, is bearing fruit. "Spare the rod and spoil the child," wrote Solomon centuries ago, and the Oriental despot has helped to hold the thinking of fathers and mothers in bondage ever since. Little difference did it make to them that Solomon had so many wives that he probably did not know his own offspring by name, nor which were his and which the neighbors'; it is not surprising that he found the rod desirable, or at least easy, but it is a pity that his ignorant maxim is applied in the single small family today as if it were eternal wisdom. Physical chastisement is only one thing now under suspicion. It is a news event of major importance that the first conference for parents on Modern Parenthood is being held in New York City, October 26-28. The important years of childhood, the stress and marvels of adolescence, the approach to maturity—all these are going to be discussed; psychologists and educators will be there. This is a culmination of long effort, and the door of the modern child specialist may never be so tightly closed again, especially to fathers and mothers, as it has been in the past. The Child Study Association of America, Inc., which is holding this conference, invites everybody.

THE WRITER has been conducting a symposium on the question: "Is newspaper work good training for writing fiction?" The question comes up frequently in the United States, where the example of Mark Twain is supposed to argue powerfully for the affirmative. Very seldom, however, has it been given so complete or so amusing an answer as that which Sinclair Lewis gives it in the current issue of the Writer. Briefest paragraphs are quoted from Irvin S. Cobb, Floyd Dell, William Allen White, and Peter B. Kyne, but a veritable homily pours forth from the author of "Main Street"—who, also, was once a newspaper man. "Such training," he insists, "is (always with exceptions) either useless or positively injurious"; and his reasons are three—that it teaches nothing but haste, that it cultivates too much the habit of writing under orders, and that it exposes the reporter to certain "high-lights of existence" which "are far less important to a genuinely creative writer than the steady, unmelodramatic, daily life which may be uninteresting as immediate news but which forms the basis of all veritable poetry, fiction, or criticism." More interesting yet are Mr. Lewis's rosters of names for and against. These are for: Irvin Cobb, Dickens, Mencken, Dr. Johnson, Dreiser, Mark Twain, Cabell, Arnold Bennett. These are against: Homer, Dante, Shakespeare, Goethe, Cervantes, Tolstoi, Flaubert, Edith Wharton, Galsworthy, Hardy, Conrad, Michael Arlen, May Sinclair, Hugh Walpole, and Elinor Wylie.

TWO ROBUST AND OLD-FASHIONED AMERICANS were General Isaac R. Sherwood of Ohio and Senator Samuel M. Ralston of Indiana, who died on the same day, October 14. General Sherwood took part in forty-eight battles of the Civil War, rising from private to brigadier general, and he was a useful and able Congressman until he had passed his ninetieth year. The scars he won from 1861 to 1865 made it easy for him to oppose both our war with Spain and our entry into the World War, as he did with all the courage and intrepidity of his brave and honorable character. America to him did not mean overseas adventures and a course of imperialism and militarism. Knowing war as he did, he could truthfully say that we should as a nation be too proud—and too sensible—to fight. Senator Ralston had by his forthright virtues won the admiration and regard of his State. He took office not as a politician but as the servitor of his people. So he reformed governmental methods when he was governor, reduced taxes by instituting wise economies, and developed the schools and the other institutions of the State by giving them additional appropriations out of money saved in other directions. The very fact that he did not seek office made him immune to politicians and enabled him to convince the people of his State that he was of the high type of Grover Cleveland—an administrator who thought of duty first and his own prospects last.

Novelty or Progress?

WHAT is social progress? Is it synonymous with contemporary civilization? Is it the mere flight of time in the history of mankind? Or is it something rarer and more elusive; and, if so, how are we to identify it?

The individual has never before been so deluged with newness, with novelty, as today. Teeming factories surround him with new material possessions; roaring printing presses overwhelm him with new information and ideas. America is developing a philosophy which almost assumes that anything new is better than anything old. Probably no previous age or nation has shown such a general tendency to confound novelty with progress.

Social progress is certainly not merely new inventions and ideas. Only a small part of the novelty of any generation is carried over to another and only an infinitesimal fraction survives a hundred years. It is dangerous to assume that everything new is mischievous or inconsequential, but it is more so to accept it as good and desirable without a most searching examination. Are there any standards, any tests, to guide us in such inquiry?

The question presents itself afresh in looking through the pages of a volume that has just come from the press.* The first half is a record of recent happenings and present conditions which may be regarded as causes of discontent. The second half is a directory of organizations and movements which are working to correct or eliminate some of those causes. The causes of discontent are presented in a series of brief and largely disconnected paragraphs, which in their treatment as well as their content suggest that modern civilization is in no other way suffering so cruelly as through its failure to distinguish between novelty and progress.

The book in question does not pretend to answer the question How can we distinguish between novelty and progress? It is a volume of information, not theory. The only test which possesses any finality is that of time, and we can only speculate as to how often such judgment is as it should be. But the general belief that man has made true and substantial progress since the Garden of Eden—or the ape—suggests that time must usually be right. The trouble is that no individual or generation can wait for time to point the way. We must have a more immediate technique. Perhaps as good a one as can be found appears in the dedication of "Social Progress." It is "To those who form conclusions from known facts and who wish to outlaw war, abolish poverty, unveil superstition, and secure justice."

* Social Progress. A Yearbook of the Liberal Movement, published by the Institute, 311 East Forty-fourth Street, New York. $2.50.

The Great Advance Toward Peace

BEYOND all question what has happened at Locarno is the most hopeful event since that worst of days, August 1, 1914. For the first time since the era of Charlemagne France and Germany have pledged themselves not to attack one another, have outlawed war against each other. The German Government has forever renounced all claim to Alsace-Lorraine, and has accepted the existing French boundaries as the definite delimitation of Germany's westward expansion. For that the world may sing te deums. Locarno not only punctuates the bloodiest and most disgraceful chapter in human history, it opens up a whole realm of possible new developments. If Germany and France can outlaw war with the cooperation of England, Italy, and Belgium, why not the whole civilized world? Who now will dare say that France and all the other Allies cannot disarm and at last turn to the reconstruction of Europe? Who can say, with Aristide Briand himself pledging that the alliance of the Allies is finished and that the very name is to disappear from the language of diplomacy, that Europe cannot at last in dead earnest put an end to the hatreds and bitternesses of the war and begin its spiritual disarmament and reconciliation?

It is idle, of course, to deny that what happened at Locarno should have taken place at Versailles; that the seven long years since the armistice with their spirit of revenge, the desire to humiliate and abase the former enemy, the readiness to starve to death women and children and to inflict such immeasurable suffering as that in the Ruhr and the other occupied territories constitute a shameful and utterly unnecessary chapter in the history of every conniving nation. We are not of those who would close the book of memory upon those direful years for we believe that the events from 1914 onward must be kept before oncoming generations in order that the world may be warned against repeating such incredible folly and again intrusting its destinies to such faithless leaders as Sir Edward Grey, Asquith, Lloyd George, Poincaré, Viviani, Bethmann-Hollweg, the two Kaisers and their guilty crew. But while we cannot forget these years, we are of those who pray that the new chapter will genuinely mark a new era for all humanity. If the statesmanship is there, Locarno may be but a beginning and not an end, the beginning of an epoch.

Locarno's great achievement is an atmosphere rather than a text. There are always loopholes in any text. A Poincaré might interpret Article VI of the treaty of mutual guaranty, for instance, to suit his own purposes. "The provisions of the present treaty do not affect the rights and obligations of the high contracting parties under the Treaty of Versailles," it reads. Poincaré held that treaty to permit his invasion of the Ruhr; if that is not changed of what lasting values are then new pacts? There are suggestions that the new arrangement may be used to isolate Russia still further and to present a solid European front not only against the United States but against the rising demands of Africa, India, and Asia for deliverance from the yoke of white imperialism. That the reactionary and chauvinistic press of France, England, and Italy has been the first to acclaim these new treaties of peace is not encouraging. A recrudescence of Kaiserism in Berlin, of Poincaréism in France, and of the secret alliances and deceitful trickery of Greyism in England may, indeed, upset those alliances. But if our rejoicing is tempered by these considerations, we still cannot but give thanks for the immediate relief that the new concord has brought, its restoration of Germany to full fellowship among the nations, and, best of all, the triumph of generosity and good will and sanity in France.

What now will be the role of the League of Nations? There is a prospect that it may cease to be the creature of England and France, that with the entrance of Germany into the Council there will be vigorously presented to Council and Assembly a different viewpoint from that of the war victors. There is, therefore, a prospect of stirring exchanges of opinions, and even of facing issues, like disarmament, which the League has burked. The fact that Germany has received the promise of a seat in the Council and admission to the League itself, not by action by either Assembly or Council, but from the four leading members of the League, speaks volumes for the lack of democracy of that organization and reveals patently enough how certain the chief allies are that the League will do as it is told. Once in, Germany will, we take it for granted, raise the disarmament issue and compel a decision as to whether her fellow-members shall be allowed to keep up great standing armies or navies while she herself remains disarmed. In that she should have the moral support of President Coolidge and his Administration. Our own hope is that the new shift will compel the League to vigorous action along certain lines in which it has been content to let the years roll by without accomplishing anything.

Next to disarmament the most pressing need of Europe is for a tariff union. Nothing could accomplish so much for the spiritual disarmament for which we have just appealed and for the economic restoration of Europe than the establishment of a customs union. Here again is a great opportunity for Germany. Surrounded by high tariffs on all sides, she is yet expected to produce enough money to meet the demands of the Dawes Plan. It was the German customs union of 1834 that resulted in the tremendous development of the German states years before the Empire was reconstituted at Versailles in 1871. Who can doubt that the breaking down of tariff barriers now would mean the accomplishment of what still seem economic impossibilities? For the new and small states that have been created since the war the levelling of the tariff barriers with which they are surrounded could only mean their flourishing like the proverbial green bay tree. Austria, Hungary, Czecho-Slovakia, Lithuania, Latvia, Esthonia, Poland—there is not one of these but would benefit incalculably by a free exchange of goods. No other measure would do so much to break down the nationalistic obsession out of which grew the war; no other act could so effectively develop the interchange of thought and the friendly intercourse of the nations. Washington seems to take it for granted that there will be a general European economic conference before long. Here is the opportunity for the advocates of free trade.

Meanwhile the Locarno treaties stand, if for nothing else, as complete justification of those who, like The Nation, have preached, in season and out, the reunion of the enemies of the past upon the simple basis of mutual good will and the determination to build a new, a sane, and a just Europe.

French Debts and Liberian Rubber

HARVEY S. FIRESTONE announces that he plans to invest one hundred million dollars in rubber plantations in Liberia. This, he feels, marks an epoch in American history. Henceforth we shall be independent of the British rubber monopoly. Today the United States (by which he means American capitalists) control only 3 per cent of the world's rubber production; when he has remodeled Liberia it will produce 250,000 tons of rubber a year, which is half as much as the entire world at present produces.

One hundred million dollars is not a staggering figure in Wall Street these days. The federal reserve banks cleared checks worth more than a billion dollars in a single day last week. One day's transactions in the New York stock market recently involved a transfer of two and a half million shares, probably having a market value of nearly two hundred million dollars. Mr. Mellon has just informed Mr. Borah that corporate and government loans floated in the United States in the first nine months of this year totaled about $900,000,000. Mr. Firestone's project is quite in scale with every-day American finance.

To Liberia it marks revolution. Liberia is a strip of African jungle which was colonized by returned American ex-slaves a century ago. A vague American protectorate hitherto has kept it both from incorporation in French and British colonies, and from the intensive exploitation to which they have been subjected. It has a population of fewer than two millions. Of these "about 50,000 of the coast Negroes may be considered civilized," according to the "Statesman's Yearbook." The white colony numbers fewer than 200. There are no railroads and only twenty miles of motor roads. Liberia's exports have been averaging less than a million dollars a year. What an investment of a hundred million dollars, development of a million acres, employment of 300,000 workers—these are Mr. Firestone's terms—means to Liberia is incalculable.

Such investments as Mr. Firestone's do not come within Mr. Mellon's figures of billion-dollar foreign financing, but they may mean just as much to American citizens as any of the government or corporate loans. What attitude will the Government in Washington take in case Mr. Firestone gets into trouble, either with the French and British neighbors who have always watched their chance to nibble at Liberia, or with a native Liberian Government? Shall we send our marines to stop rent riots, if the cost of a thatched-roof house soars too high under the stimulus of Mr. Firestone's enterprise—as we have just done in Panama? Shall we continue to provide American officers for the native constabulary (we do so now) if it goes on to conscript unwilling labor for the rubber plantations that are to "make America independent of Britain"? Will our Government build light-draught gunboats to patrol the Liberian rivers as it has already done for the Chinese rivers? Unless American opinion awakens to energetic protest we most assuredly shall do these things.

Meanwhile the Washington Government is taking an energetic attitude toward export of American capital—to France. "America's purse is closed to delinquent European creditors," announces an inspired dispatch to one of the news agencies. "Blunt notice to that effect went out from the White House today to France and other debtor nations." The extraordinary part of this notice is not that Washington wants France to repay and wants France to know it. It is that Washington assumes a control over Wall Street activities. If a Socialist were to arise and demand that the Government be empowered to tell Wall Street bankers just what loans they might make and what they might not make he would be denounced as interfering with business.

It is possible, of course—and even probable—that when Calvin Coolidge tells Wall Street how to act he is merely doing its unpleasant chores for it. One may, knowing Mr. Coolidge's attitude toward business, suspect that the bankers do not like to tell France that they will not lend her money until she has settled her inter-government debts, and prefer to have the Wasington Government bear the burden of any ill-feeling which may result from such a message. But whether in this instance Washington is doing Wall Street's bidding or giving it orders it is getting into this foreign-loan business and deep into it. There are implications to this. Thus, if the Government censors loans beforehand it accepts an implied obligation to help carry out their terms. We do not believe the American people want that. As a matter of fact the Government is constantly being called on to clean up where investors and would-be investors have been caught in a jam—whether it be in China, Haiti, Liberia, or France. If the Government is to be the bankers' chore-boy it ought to be their boss as well. The bankers certainly do not want that. Why not let them "go it alone"—and suffer the consequences if their judgment is bad?

Capitalizing Calamity

LOUIS LOUCHEUR of France is asking the League of Nations to make a coördinated plan for economic use of the natural resources of the world; a plan to pool them and ration them under central control. Not much headway has been made with the proposal to date, and one suspects that, in so far as progress can be made today, it will be animated more by commercial envies and jealousies than by the economic welfare of the underlying population.

But what a vision of a world ruled by common sense instead of by bunkum and bluff this proposal calls up; what a challenge to those vestiges of intelligence which, like bubbles in water, are said to float in the human brain! A world deliberately ordering its precious and diminishing stores of coal, oil, lumber, minerals—without coupling and waste—for the benefit and comfort of its inhabitants. A world growing its corn and its cotton in those geographical areas best suited to their production, and shipping and exchanging them on the principle that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points! A wild, fantastic dream, so it seems today; yet the thing actually has been done. Under the pressure of war and the submarine menace, human intelligence, acting through the Supreme Economic Council of the Allied nations, actually rose to the challenge, and did coordinate and control the major resources and products of two-thirds of the world.

Under the rule of anarchy and an economic system based on the sturdy principles of self help and all the traffic will bear, these war days, with an economic control founded on necessity rather than on pecuniary gain, seem remote indeed—as remote almost as the empire of the Incas, where, for two thousand miles along the spine of the Andes, with the steam engine in the womb of time, a population of ten millions was fed and clothed and sheltered without poverty, without want, without waste; where a great system of reservoir store houses balanced the lean years with the fat. Let William Bolitho sketch the picture of the situation today:

> Our world system is so ordered that for a long [illegible] every hand of a new calamity, the spreading wave [illegible] prosperity and joy; an approaching war brings vast delight and jubilee to every general, to all officers, to all the thousands of investors in munition companies, and all [illegible] war industries rejoice. A famine [illegible] interests and classes in first effect. . . . Every farmer in three continents goes home to tell his wife that good times have come again. Speculators, traders, bakers, export houses, all share in the glad tidings.

Joy and riches wrung from death, degradation, and despair—this is the eternal and inevitable result of seeing our world as a series of competing geographical units.

When the International Institute of Agriculture announced last winter that the estimated bread-grain crop of the world was 574,000,000 bushels short of meeting the world's bread-grain requirements, and that the United States was the only nation with a substantial surplus, there was joy among American farmers. "Our own grain growers will largely monopolize what advantages there are for anybody in this situation. It means much for business prosperity here." But the New York World, from which this quotation is taken, went on to show the wider aspect: "However, if Europe's general buying power is reduced, the reduction must have its effect on foreign trade. It is easy to paint the advantages of a shortage in too brilliant colors." Calamity cannot be capitalized forever.

Mr. Benton MacKaye, late of the United States Forest Service, is engaged single-handed on the kind of initial survey which the League of Nations ought to make—if its proposal is more than a political gesture. He has divided a map of the world into some thirty districts, following natural geographic boundaries. For each district he is tabulating present statistics of agricultural production. Taking the present population, he determines how much of that production is needed in the home districts and how much is available for export. Each district finally shows certain quantitative surpluses and shortages. Then comes a very pretty computation in balancing the shortages against the surpluses on the principle of minimum transportation haul. When such a plan as this (and it is essentially the plan of the Supreme Economic Council during the war) is superimposed upon the chaos of the present traffic—with its gluts and its famines, its tariffs and trade barriers, its speculations and its higglers, and its transportation wriggling in loops and circles through the seven seas—the sheer loss in human labor at the failure to coordinate becomes manifest in all its immensity. And what Mr. MacKaye is doing for agriculture should be done for minerals, oil, lumber, and basic manufacturing such as textiles, steel production, boots and shoes.

Whether or no the present League of Nations is destined some day in fact to become a league of nations, the proposal to coordinate and control the use of the resources by which mankind is ultimately fed and clothed and housed remains a standing challenge to human intelligence.

Our Literature and Ourselves

IF the critic and the reviewer pass somewhat different judgments upon the value of contemporary American literature the fact is not to be wondered at, for they proceed, as they should, upon different asssumptions. The critic takes established masterpieces as his standard and he has to put himself out of time and place. The needs and interest of people long dead as well as those of generations yet to come are part of his concern, and his judgments attempt the absolute. The reviewer who sets out to deal only with a current literature is, on the other hand, concerned principally with the here and now. His business is with the meaning and significance of works to those who produce them and to those for whom they are produced; he sees them as expressions of the spirit of his times and he judges them as such.

It is for this reason that while the critic may grumble the reviewer is not dissatisfied with contemporary American literature. Whatever its other virtues or defects its immediate relevance to our thoughts and lives is obvious. It is not, as literature sometimes tends to be in less vigorous ages, a world apart. It is not, that is to say, occupied chiefly with fancy and day-dreams nor is its subject-matter limited by very stringent conventional or artistic restrictions. It takes all life as its province, it draws into itself whatever concerns us in our living, and it comes home to our hearts and bosoms. In our leading novelists, dramatists, and poets is visible no anxiety to escape and no hesitancy in setting down whatever seems to them most true and most vital. They are, as a class, passionately interested in the life of their times, they try to burrow into it as deeply as they can, and they know no relenting. Whatever we may say of their works we cannot possibly say, as Ibsen said of the literature of his age, that it is irrelevant. The concern of our writers with national life is direct and eager, their chief occupation is with experiment which we are at present making in the art of living, and though we may find in them varying degrees of skill and profundity we cannot, unless we happen ourselves to be outside the current of contemporary life, fail to feel that their writings are very close to us and very relevant. They will at least furnish the future historian with a marvelously complete record of our age and they serve to keep us immersed in it.

When the reviewer has shown this, when he has proved that our writing is not separate from our thoughts, that it is not paralyzed or impotent but a free and vigorous record of our thinking and feeling, he has proved all that he needs to prove; a national literature may be said to be functioning properly when it is affording, as ours is, a clear and adequate expression of national life. Whatever its defects, they are our defects, and American literature is as profound and as beautiful as American life. We are in it and if it does not always have the richness of English, the grace of French, or the brooding intensity of Russian [illegible] it is because we ourselves are not—not yet, at least—as rich as ancient or as reflective as they. We may be sure that when we have become so our literature—unless meanwhile it has turned from its present course, unless it has ceased to reflect us as well as it does now—will reveal the change. Considered as a channel of expression, there can be no question of its adequacy today.

Canyons and Camerons

A United States Senator Defies the Government

By ARTHUR WARNER

Chapter I. The Canyons

ONCE upon a time, long, long ago, before Columbus had discovered America or Zane Grey had invented the Open Spaces, before bandits ruled Broadway or Pirates reigned in Pittsburgh, the first of the canyons was born in what the movies have since made familiar as the Southwest. This canyon grew and prospered, and others came after. The canyon family became a mighty one, occupying much land and acquiring great fame. But the mightiest of all the family was the Grand Canyon, who made a home several miles wide and a mile deep in the rock along the Colorado River in northern Arizona.

For the preeminence of the Grand Canyon it is not necessary to take the word of a mere writer. The fact has been judicially decided by no less an authority than the Supreme Court, which said in the case of Cameron v. United States (252 U. S., p. 456): "It is the greatest eroded canyon in the United States, if not in the world . . . and annually draws to its borders thousands of visitors."

But a good while before the Grand Canyon became a natural wonder by decree of the Supreme Court it had sufficiently impressed the federal government so that it was made a forest reserve, an action that precluded private occupation except through a mining claim. That was in 1893. In 1908 President Roosevelt made the Grand Canyon a national monument. This is a kind of purgatory midway between a forest reserve and a national park; it bars even mining claims. In 1919 the Grand Canyon received the full status of a national park.

With these few words in regard to the canyons we will leave them for a short time in order to introduce a rival family for the possession of the land and the homage of the people of Arizona.

Chapter II. The Camerons

The first of the Camerons, so far as the Southwest is concerned, was born in the State of Maine, but he did not linger there beyond his boyhood days. Instead Ralph H. Cameron took the advice of Horace Greeley as to where to go and in 1883 settled at Phoenix, Arizona. The Arizona Camerons, like the Arizona canyons, grew and prospered; the family became a mighty one, so much so that in 1920 its head, by then a grisled frontiersman, was elected to the United States Senate.

And now the plot thickens.

Chapter III. The Conflict

For many years travelers approaching the Grand Canyon from the southern rim have been accustomed to descend into it, mule back, by the Bright Angel Trail. The trail was built before the Grand Canyon was even a forest reserve, and in everything that has happened to the big ditch since, the rights of Coconino County, Arizona, to the route have been expressly recognized by the federal government. Coconino County has collected $1 a head as toll from persons using the trail. It is the only toll route in the national parks and a number of years ago the federal government realized the desirability of getting control of it. There was a wish to free it for travel and still more to remove certain tentacles clinging to it. These tentacles were the Camerons.

Yes, there the Camerons were; this family which had been in Arizona only since 1883 had waxed so great in a few short years that it was exercising a lordship over the mightiest of the canyons. The Camerons were there by virtue of certain mining claims made while the Grand Canyon was still a forest reserve. The claims embraced land around the rim of the canyon at the head of the Bright Angel Trail, and farther down. Especially they covered Indian Gardens, an oasis of trees down on the bottom, to which travelers naturally turned for rest and water. The Cameron claims bore various picturesque names; one was fittingly entitled the Buttinski.

In order that a mining claim be recognized as such the claimants must prove the existence of minerals in paying quantities. This the Camerons failed to do to the satisfaction of the Department of the Interior, which declared the claims invalid. But the Camerons refused to budge. They took the controversy to the courts and fought it all the way up to the supreme bench. Thus far they were within their rights. But having appealed to Caesar they refused to accept his verdict. In the spring of 1920 the Supreme Court denied the claims of Ralph H. Cameron and his associates, declaring these persons to be trespassers in the Grand Canyon National Park. In the autumn of that year Ralph H. Cameron was elected to the Senate of the United States.

The elevation of Mr. Cameron to the Senate did not apparently increase his respect for the Supreme Court or his willingness to comply with its decrees. His unsightly shacks continued to stand on the rim of the canyon; his employees continued their obstructive tactics in the park. Their actions were especially obnoxious at Indian Gardens, the oasis on the bottom of the canyon by way of the Bright Angel Trail. They prevented the erection of a public-comfort station for travelers and eventually the water upon which visitors depended for drinking at Indian Gardens became polluted with typhoid-fever germs which came, so officials of the National Park Service stated, from unsanitary conditions permitted by the Cameron employees. When the park officials put up signs warning travelers against drinking the water the placards were torn down.

It was not an era when friends of the national parks or believers in enforcement of the law had much standing in Washington. Mr. Fall was Secretary of the Interior and Mr. Daugherty was at the head of the Department of Justice. The Camerons clung to the Grand Canyon, disobeying the Supreme Court and defying the National Park Service.

Chapter IV. Thumbs Down

Then a change came. Messrs. Fall and Daugherty had to walk the plank. Hubert Work became Secretary of the Interior and Harlan F. Stone took over the office of Attorney General. Meanwhile Representative Louis C. Cramton of Michigan had become interested in the matter through his chairmanship of the sub-committee on national parks of the House Committee on Appropriations. He and a number of other federal officials conferred in 1923 with authorities of Coconino County, Arizona, and reached an agreement for the purchase of the Bright Angel Trail for $100,000, subject—as the law required—to public auction and a referendum to the voters. Mr. Cramton found Dr. Work and Mr. Stone ready to assist in freeing the Grand Canyon from the clutches of the Camerons, and he himself brought the outrage to the attention of Congress in connection with the proposed appropriation of $100,000.

Congress has its book of etiquette as well as the rest of us. Mr. Cramton belonged to the same political party (the Republican) as Mr. Cameron and the latter was a Senator to boot. Mr. Cramton as a Representative did not denounce Mr. Cameron as a Senator. But in a carefully hedged speech early last year he referred to "one Ralph H. Cameron" and remarked upon certain "trespassers on the public domain, . . . veritable dogs in the manger, snapping and snarling at the national government and endangering every park visitor who goes over the Bright Angel Trail."

Meanwhile Attorney General Stone was pressing the United States Attorney in Arizona to get busy. But somehow the latter generally had something else to do and at least one federal judge was as obstructive as possible. Finally Mr. Stone appointed Harold Baxter as special assistant to the Attorney General, putting him in charge of the matter. Mr. Baxter took off his coat and by autumn he had a sentence for contempt of court hanging so close over the head of the Senator from Phoenix that one day the forest rangers found the Cameron employees decamped, their property left behind in great disorder. In one deserted shack the park superintendent reported that he found "a large vessel containing about six or eight gallons of mash, ready for the still. There was evidently a hooch factory in embryo."

That ended the attempt of the Camerons to squat on the Bright Angel Trail, but just before pulling up stakes they got in a last sidelong blow at the National Park Service. The referendum in Coconino County to sell the Bright Angel Trail to the federal government went against the proposal—by what influences may be imagined.

Not that it mattered. The chief object had already been accomplished—to get rid of the unsightly buildings, the unsanitary conditions, the obstructionist tactics that had existed under the clutch of the Camerons.

Chapter V. Falling Water

But the mining speculations of the Camerons have not been confined to the Grand Canyon National Park. Beyond the limits of that park the Colorado River rushes precipitately westward, forming the boundary between Arizona and Nevada. For some twenty-five miles it drops and boils and bubbles, it drops and bubbles and boils, with vast possibilities for irrigation and power. The Colorado River at this point is in a public reservation which, like the Grand Canyon from 1893 to 1908, is open to private claims only under the mining law. For some years the federal government has been planning to impound the rushing stream by the proposed Boulder Dam. As this project became more definite it was discovered that for twenty-five miles the river was plastered on both sides with mining claims. Whether because of their beauty, their instability, or what, these tracts were for the most part named after young ladies. There was the Hazel, the Goldie, the Irene, the Lulu. On one part of the river M's seemed to be in especial favor: Mabel, Mildred, Madge, Minnie, Myrtle, and Mary. (Perhaps in their hurry the claimants had merely had recourse to the roster of a young ladies' seminary.)

When federal officials investigated the records there was a familiar name among the group of claimants to these tracts. The name of Ralph H. Cameron (the Senator) was missing, but in its place were those of his son, Ralph H. Cameron, Jr., of his wife, I. M. Cameron, of various other relations, and of his private secretary. Most of the claims were recorded between 1920 and 1922, but the Department of the Interior has not yet granted patents to them—necessary for their validation. On the contrary the government characterizes them as made for "false and fraudulent purposes." The Cameron mining claims in the Grand Canyon National Park were once described by Secretary Fall not as genuine mineral deposits but as "strategically located with reference to proposed and probable development of the canyon as a tourist attraction." Similarly the government holds that the Cameron claims in the neighborhood of the Boulder Dam site do not cover bona fide mineral locations but are entered to gain control of water power. Suits to void the claims were begun last summer in the federal courts, and are now awaiting trial.

Perhaps it is worth recalling in this connection that when Mr. Cameron was campaigning for the Senate in 1920 he sent out a letter to voters in which he said:

> For more than sixteen years I have been exploring and working in the Grand Canyon of Arizona on power sites. I now have the financial backing to build two huge hydroelectric plants in the Grand Canyon which will develop 965,000 kilowatts of electric power—enough to electrify every railroad, mine, mill, city, town, and hamlet in Arizona at such a low cost that it will make it possible for the poorest to enjoy its advantages and comforts. . . . As a Senator I can more readily and quickly secure the concessions, rights of way, etc., so necessary for the perfect development of these great enterprises.

Chapter VI. Seething Politics

These new Cameron cases in the federal courts, instituted since the head of the family became a United States Senator, have had the effect of a high-explosive shell in Arizona, with an appreciable repercussion upon federal politics. While the national government is charging fraud, Senator Cameron is making retort that the proceeding is a conspiracy to drive him out of public life. Although the charges have hurt him in many quarters, it is also true that he has friends in Arizona and elsewhere in the West who look upon him as a bulwark and defender of the old order against what are regarded as the dangerous encroachments of the federal government.

Senator Cameron will be up for reelection to the Senate next autumn, and a pretty fight is already under way in Washington as well as in Arizona. Representative Hayden, a Democrat who has been on the side of the federal government in the claims fight, will probably be Mr. Cameron's opponent in the election for the seat in the Senate; party lines will be split right and left in the election.

Meanwhile Senator Cameron's friends in the West are attacking Secretary Work's reclamation policy and are accusing him of causing a schism in the Republican ranks in Washington when a united front is most needed. Senator Cameron himself has been touring the West as a member of a sub-committee of the Senate's Committee on Public Lands, and has been denouncing the management of the Grand Canyon National Park and attacking other policies of the federal government in the West.

The story of the canyons and the Camerons may have to be continued.

Eight Days on Ellis Island

By REX HUNTER

WE were three Britishers en route to Ellis Island, and despite the glowing sun and the blueness of the water through which the launch slipped we felt apprehensive. For had not "More Trouble on Ellis Island" become almost a standing headline in the English newspapers? We tried to reassure ourselves: After all, we were Anglo-Saxons and we had merely come for a sojourn in the States, not to settle down and hoard enormous sums of money for transfer to southern Europe. As to physical condition, my own doctor in London had certified that I suffered from none of the ailments listed on the official medical certificate.

The launch drew alongside a small stone pier and we clambered out. A man gave me three checks for my box of books and two trunks and said I must look after the smaller items of my luggage. I was carrying my typewriter, attaché case, and raincoat, and I tried to demonstrate that I could not possibly load myself in addition with two suitcases, a traveling bag, and a steamer rug. A youth finally took these items away on a truck, after carefully disclaiming any responsibility.

We were led down endless corridors to a bare room where two doctors waited. A hobbledehoy intoned dully: "Take off yer coats, vests, shoits, and undershoits." We obeyed and were stethescoped. One doctor handed me a card reading "Hospital lungs and heart." "You look kind of thin," he observed. "I'm about my normal weight," I replied. "Been seasick? Got a cough?" I returned truthful negatives to these questions. I did not understand the card which had been handed me. I thought I had been passed on heart and lungs by the hospital division.

I grew somewhat doubtful when led to a desk where a silent, khaki-clad clerk made out a card headed "Hospital," for my companions had been led elsewhere. I rejoined them presently, however, where they sat on a bench facing wary looking officials in blue who scribbled in enormous ledgers. My companions were called in turn before a desk; they answered innumerable questions and were allowed to depart. The official then called me over and seizing a pink card captioned "Detention Card" began to fill it out. My heart sank.

"Am I to be detained, then?" I asked. The man in blue mumbled an evasive answer, and handed me over to a silent youth who led me back to the stone pier and through the front entrance of the hospital. I was led into a bathroom and a tall orderly told me that I must take a bath. I must put on hospital clothes and my own clothes would be taken away.

I obeyed dully. I was handed a blue bag and told to put my own clothes in it. Wearing pajamas and gray coat and trousers too small for me, I asked the nurse on duty if I might send a telegram to friends. She called over an Irish immigrant, a tall, hollow-chested, shambling fellow and asked him to take me to the Social Hall. I found myself stumbling after my guide down a long tunnel with hot-water pipes overhead. We emerged and came to a short path leading to a door. The moment we set foot on the path a man suddenly appeared and howled: "This ain't no thoroughfare. What th' hell's the matter with you? Go round to the back."

We shuffled in by a rear entrance and a little dark-eyed lady, a veritable angel of light in that barren hall, undertook to send my telegram. I wandered back with my guide through the tunnel and the nurse observed: "The last meal is over but there might be some bread and milk." I was handed over—one was always being handed over like a package on Ellis Island—to a South American orderly with a vacant stare and a high crest of hair that made him look like a half-witted paroquet. He led the way into a very dirty kitchen presided over by a worried maid with bobbed yellow hair and wild eyes. I found later that this was Mary, the Polish "skivvy." The orderly muttered something about food, but I took another look at the kitchen and backed out, saying that I would hold out till the next meal. "Oh, all right," the orderly muttered indifferently.

The afternoon drags by. I enter the ward, where twenty beds are arranged on either side, and contemplate my curious companions. At four o'clock Mary appears in the doorway, claps her hands twice, shouts "Eats!", and jerks a thumb over her shoulder. We stumble to our feet and go through the dirty kitchen into an inner room. On the bare table stand tin plates, cups, and saucers. I am really hungry by this time, but all I can negotiate is a small piece of the tongue. A cockroach suddenly darts out from under my elbow and ants run across the tin plate. I try not to look at the bloody bandages and the diseased faces about me. I eat a slice of bread, gulp down some coffee, and leave the table.

A group of us wander up and down a cinder path which is the only place for us to walk. On one side is a madhouse. A woman with a fixed dejected stare sits on a sort of balcony. Another woman peers around with restless eyes. On a balcony above a dark young man grins foolishly to himself, while an elderly man runs to and fro like a caged wolf. On the other side of the cinder path is a body of stagnant water, the banks decorated with rusty tins and offal. Giant rats scurry about.

We go down to the strip of waterfront and sit on a plank. Stinging flies and mosquitoes are in force and we slap at them and scratch ourselves. Two of us drift on to a path of grass in front of a red brick cottage. Almost immediately an orderly emerges. "What the hell's the matter with you?" he calls. "Get back where you belong. You ain't got no right there." We return to the plank by the bobbing waves. "Aw, let's go back to the ward," says a Czecho-Slovakian. "These flies and mosquitoes are fierce." "Can't go there," says another. "They're swabbing it out." "Well, let's go to the Social Hall." "Can't. It's closed by this time."

At seven there is skim milk. I go to the kitchen to get a tin cup and find an army of cockroaches hurdling the utensils in the cupboard. At nine we drag off our outer clothes and crawl into bed. Half an hour later the lights go out. Long before daylight the night orderly comes in, switches on the lights, and calls "Come away!" It sounds like an invitation to go hunting or to come away to fairyland, but is only a demand that the unfortunate inmates of the ward arise. I look at my watch. It is only five o'clock. "Why do they wake us up at five?" I ask. Nobody knows; it is just a rule. We wash at two basins in a dirty lavatory and sit dully around till seven o'clock, when we are given a couple of boiled eggs apiece.

Breakfast over, we sit around the ward once more. A fat Syrian sits brooding in his chair, wearing a Red Cross robe because no coat big enough to fit him could be found. Across the way sits a German-American wearing smoked glasses. He has some eye trouble which prevents him from reading. There is absolutely nothing for him to do but sit in his chair or shuffle along the cinder path. "Every day is like a year," he often mutters. A Jewish rabbi, a little chubby restless man, chants from a Hebrew prayer book. Then he walks up and down the ward; halts suddenly before a Swede and begins chattering in Yiddish, serenely confident that the Swede can understand him.

Oscar Hill looms up suddenly beside me, looking straight before him with his almost sightless eyes, and seems to speak into the air. He is a huge Polish Jew who has spent most of his life in the States. He made money by manufacturing furs. Now he has land and a house at Rockaway Beach and employs fifty-odd hands in his factory. Some time ago he began to suffer from spinal trouble, he explains, which affected his eyes. So he decided to go to Vienna to see the great oculists there. Did he anticipate any trouble in getting back home? No, Hill replies. He had never become naturalized, but he had communicated with Washington and had been assured that reentry would be automatic if he returned within a year. He arrived in New York harbor well within the time limit and was promptly hauled over to Ellis Island on the technical grounds that he could not read. Why is he in the hospital then? Do they propose to teach him to read in the hospital? He doesn't know. Nobody tells him anything. The doctors look him over occasionally and seem to find him an interesting case. Friends have offered to put up bonds for him to the tune of $100,000, but he remains on the island.

Severino the young Italian utters his hoarse complaint: "Fifteen days I've been in here now. I'm supposed to be in for lungs. One examination and one X-ray picture and then—nothing. I felt all right when I came in but now I feel bad. I can't eat that food. My wife brought me some fruit and fresh eggs the other day but they wouldn't let me have them. Why don't they look me over again? If they deport me to Italy I don't know what I'll do. I left there when I was nine and I've spent the rest of my life in America. I took out my first papers but I couldn't get final papers because not enough time had passed. I'm only 22 now. I'll have to get out of here or I'll break down or go mad. I went on a visit to Italy on a twelve-months permit and came back inside eight months and they rushed me in here. I wish I knew what they are going to do with me. I'll have to get out of here or——"

Wong, a little Chinese seaman, sits reading Sherlock Holmes stories translated into Chinese. O. Horn, a cultured Esthonian speaking fluent Russian, German, and English in addition to his native tongue, comes over to borrow some toothpaste. Had he not been dazed by the bawled orders of officials and attendants, he tells me, he would have taken toilet articles from one of his bags. But when he realized that the bag was to be taken from him and moved toward it with the object of putting toothbrush, paste, razor, and shaving soap into his pockets, an attendant howled: "Hey, didn't I tell you to leave that bag alone? What the hell's the matter with you?" The latter question is a stock one on this island.

After eight days I was finally allowed to leave the hospital. The blue bag was thrown to me and I resumed my much-wrinkled clothes. With half a dozen others I started out at eight in the morning, but it was noon before we reached the other side of the island. We wound our way along innumerable corridors and every hundred feet or so we were told to sit on benches and wait for no one knew what. I was given a board hearing and told that I could enter the country.

On my way down the inevitable corridors to the launch I passed a kind of pen in which some of my erstwhile companions, released later than myself from the hospital, were awaiting further formalities. They shouted and waved to me, and I moved over towards the pen to shake hands with them and congratulate them on their release. I was suddenly astounded by a vast commotion. An official who stood at the gate of the pen waved his arms, turned black in the face, and shouted. Clerks and officials came running from all directions warning me off. I suddenly realized that in trying to exchange a few words of farewell with men who had suffered with me, for whom I had a kindly human feeling, I had committed a capital crime. I finally left the hospital covered with prickly heat, mosquito and fly bites, and weakened by loss of sleep and the vile food.

I cannot close this article without expressing appreciation of the kindness and courtesy of most of the doctors and nurses, of two of the orderlies (both Scotch), and of the Red Cross workers. But individual kindness is almost helpless in the face of the general stupidity and inhuman regimentation. Commissioner Curran, I have been assured, has tried to improve conditions but has been defeated by "politics."

Last Days of the Charming Lady

By ALLEN TATE

THE Charming Lady will most likely be where you would have her, under the lilacs, with magnolias, if it is spring (and it is sure to be), heavy on the air not far away. She will not fail, being what she is—the typical Charming Lady—to talk quietly about the age at once heroic and golden in the history of the States of the Secession. Her conversation will be deft and serious but not too serious, because it will be cast in a whimsicality of fortitude before the intimate rumor of raped magnificence: It is certain to be an elegy on the perished amenities of the Old South, done much after the manner in which Mr. T. S. Eliot a few years ago lamented the decay of all modern culture. It is a scattering tradition, and its last living authority will scarcely survive the present decade.

Yet now the Lady is not too hard to find. You may meet her, if you are eligible, in Nashville or Charleston or . . . But mostly her grandfather tested the qualities of inertia in Virginia "before the war" and was a part of the Tradition, and used words like tradition and aristocracy with a disarming contempt for accuracy. The Old South was never greatly distinguished for a culture of ideas.

The bookish culture of ante-bellum Southerners was the accident of a charmed idleness. The native literary product, whether it was Cable or Sims or Timrod, Lanier being not a very notable exception, came mostly after the war, but the substance of the old order was in it; it evinced charm without energy. And it came to a typical conclusion in the books of Thomas Nelson Page, shallow like him and diverting for those not disaffected by a sense of humor, fraught with no critical awareness of relative social values; it was formed out of a taste that required very little beyond the prettily decorative verse of, say, Edward Coate Pinkney. There remains not a trace of even an intimation that one function of literature is passage and bon voyage to intellectual and spiritual adventure.

For adventure by all accounts was romantically yet decently physical. The venturesome mind seldom observes the rules of any game but its own. It notoriously sets politics and economics to quaking, and doubtless in the South it was an embarrassing Gorgon to be throttled or at least hidden away. The South was proprietor of a particular mechanism of truth: it had to protect the mechanism against the removal of old parts and the fitting in of new. It was set upon being a One-hoss Shay forever. Mastered by its one idea and so master of none, it fought four years —in a fashion which a contemporaneous Cervantes, as well as a Thomas Nelson Page, might have owned to be his proper milieu—to preserve this single, all-embracing idea.

Southern culture consisted, in essence, in a reflowering of eighteenth-century English manners and in the backwash, sterilized, of liberal thought from that century; a delight in English landscape reveries stimulated by Collins and Cowper and a little of Gray, and reproduced, with a local trees and shrubs substituted for their British originals, in the verse of Henry Timrod; and eighteenth-century political and humanitarian catchwords bandied innocuously enough except by Thomas Jefferson, the urbane heretical democrat—undetected in that role—whose ideas ironically contributed to the economic and spiritual bankruptcy of the next generation in his own regime. Most literate persons did lip service to Shakespeare. All of them knew something of Pope, or should have—that whatever is is right, if it was what you approved of. And the novels and poems of Walter Scott were a complete repository of manners and of the spirit of manners which is morals.

The Old South was strictly a political and economic aristocracy. It would have shuddered could it have grasped the first implications of a French critic's assertion that only through the abolition of truths, through the dissociation and repudiation of outmoded general notions which have lost their roots in an existing reality, can a society create new forms for the perpetuation of its strength. The South was beautifully devoted unto the death to its one idea—the permanence of a special politico-economic order. An essential literature was impossible. The South could not afford to look at itself critically; and it is a commonplace in the history of intelligence that spontaneous self-examination—which the Charming Lady permits to neither herself nor her visitor—is the initial moral attitude which must preface the exacting business of beautiful letters. It implies the recognition of a relation extra-social: the relation of man to a god. The South, before the Civil War, probably had little more than incidental commerce with the name of Deity. Its aristocracy needed but few of the privileges of which the sole storehouse, according to the best imaginative opinion, stands in some empyrean; it was an aristocracy of social privilege founded in a rigid social order. Deprived of that order, the Old South has degenerated into and survives only as a sentiment susceptible of no precise definition.

For the privilege is long over and done with. While New England has preserved to some extent a culture of ideas in spite of its thorough absorption of industrialism—it articulated in the beginning a system of ideas of which the apical notion was a God—it is significant that after the Civil War the South became, equally with the Middle West, rich soil for the growth of the secular and vulgar and moralistic churches. The hope of the South lay always in a secular order and made few requisitions of literature and religion —of [illegible] spicuously exceed the supply of sentimental chivalry. And lest the supply find nowadays no market Mr. James Branch Cabell has sophisticated it with deathbed agonies, the corpse dressed out in the glittering jerkin, or, for that matter, the weeds of a pretentious erudition. Mr. Cabell's comedies, Koschkei the Deathless notwithstanding, contain not so many universal ideas as Southern elegiacs conducted in the name of destiny. They are commentaries on the decadence of an emotion. Their escape from realism—this is not a judgment on their aesthetic value, or lack of it—is identical in origin with the historical Southern escape from ideas.

And so it is not surprising that the second generation after the Civil War is whooping it up in boosters' clubs along with the veritablest descendant of carpet-bagger and poor white. For this second generation, like its forebears, has no tradition of ideas, no consciousness of moral and spiritual values, as an inheritance; it has simply lost a prerogative based on property. As a result it is now almost indistinguishable from the classes it would have held in nice contempt before 1865. Thus, the grandfather of our Charming Lady was a civilized person chiefly, but not entirely in certain ante-bellum towns, because he and the other grandfathers happened to be the gentlemen who got together in the matter and agreed that it was so.

Yet it is doubtful whether there have been other societies in the United States so distinguished for the graces of living as the two flourishing simultaneously in Charleston and in the counties of Virginia between Charlottesville and Washington from about 1800 to 1850. These societies were already in disintegration before the Civil War; for the invention of the cotton gin had put their commercially more zealous cousins west of the mountains on a very nearly equal economic footing with them; and the amenities were gradually released for the more pressing activities of economy.

It is a loss to American letters that these sections in the Old South were not so intelligent as they were gracious, that they never saw their cultural limitations critically enough to be creatively aware of their perfections and to produce their Henry James. This failure is precisely the failure to produce a "historian of fine consciences" that had almost realized their maturity. Now, in our own time, Miss Frances Newman, a Southerner at last who discovers "sophistication" to be the essence of literature—whatever she means by that: it is hardly preciosity, as she would imply—knows her Meredith, has read immoderately in Henry James, is superior to the tribal morality, and attributes to the present social life of Atlanta a casuistry so sensitized and complex that the Atlanteans, reading it, will find in themselves not so much cultivation as bewilderment. Miss Newman might more profitably look elsewhere. For the tribal sentiment, though discharged of late from economic captivity by a goodly Mammon, has not yet devoted enough leisure to the dissociation of its insularity.

It was out of this sentiment that the so-called literature of the South was written. Its criticism has not felt dissimilar promptings. Criticism in the South was concerned with expository encomium of almost any writing which satisfied the complacent criterion of exhibiting an indispensable subject matter: the properties inherent in the defeatist attitude created by the eventuality of 1865. There was no suspicion of the necessity for a revaluation of those properties as a maieutic to the dormant or undirected creative mind until The Double Dealer and the Reviewer were established about five years ago. That the stimulation has not been extended into a usable convention, into a current of ideas in which an intelligence could find immediate and positive direction. The South has not yet performed the first function of literary criticism, which is to discriminate. Mr. Allen Tate, in The Garland of Vilification, [illegible] to begin it with much [illegible] and little justice. But Mr. Mencken has missed a purpose. Gerald W. Johnson, and that is an important business of salve.

The South of the first generation after the Civil War has had at least one social critic not wholly ancillary to the idols of the tribe. Yet the vigor of his attack, in the South Atlantic Quarterly and elsewhere, was not commensurate to the purpose. Mr. Edwin Mims's writings betray an inadequate sense of the ante-bellum Southern consciousness, and a sensitiveness to that temperament is the critical requisite prior to all scholarship. His criteria are obscured by a cultural deficiency due, probably, to the influence of the secular and vulgar and moralistic churches. So when he came to summarize Southern poetry, in "The South in the Building of the Nation," this cultural astigmatism, in a specific form of unrealized moral and social values, permitted the tribal sentiment to emerge in him almost pure; he succumbed to the sentimental local-color fallacy—the ingenuous opinion that a particular setting is intrinsically more "poetic" than another. And this is the best in criticism the South of the old school can offer.

The sensitive person from the South in this age approaches literature with few or none of the prepossessions, or benefits, derived from the interdependency of a religion and a society. His mind is open for experiment in form, for curiosity about world literature. In 1919 a Southern mind, of those now writing in verse the most important for the national literature, put itself on record:

> Cursed the paternity that planted me
> One green leaf in a wilderness of autumn;
> And wept, as befitting such a fruitful spirit
> Sealed in a yellow tomb.

The modern Southerner does not inherit, nor is he likely to have, a native culture compounded of the strength and subtlety of his New England contemporary's. But he may be capable, through an empiricism which is his only alternative to intellectual suicide, of a cosmopolitan culture to which his contemporary in the East is emotionally barred. . . . T. S. Eliot is not living in St. Louis. For reasons only slightly different, Conrad Aiken and John Gould Fletcher are living permanently abroad.

In 1828 Goethe wrote: "Left to itself every literature will exhaust its vitality if it is not refreshed by . . . the contributions of a foreign one." In 1925 the American man of letters, according to Mr. Van Wyck Brooks, is still in search of a tradition. His proper tradition, which is somewhere in the United States, may yet be discovered in an instrumental experience elsewhere. It is pretty certain that the Southern variety of American writer must first see himself, if at all, through other eyes. For he of all Americans is privy to the emotions founded in the state of knowing oneself to be a foreigner at home.

Contributors to This Issue

ARTHUR WARNER [illegible] of the editors of The Nation. He spent some time in Washington investigating the situation [illegible] its attitude.

REX HUNTER is an Englishman, a former contributor to The Nation.

ALLEN TATE was formerly editor of the [illegible].

EDA LOU WALTON is a California poet living in New York.

[illegible] is the author of a book on Emily Dickinson.

DONALD DOUGLAS [illegible] a novel, "The Green Journey."

LINDSAY ROGERS is associate professor of government at Columbia University.

CAROLINE PRATT is director of the City and Country School in New York City.

WORTHINGTON C. FORD has long been officially connected with the Massachusetts Historical Society.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter is no fan. For one thing he has been too busy drifting to keep up with the game. The plays are much the same and the crowds are eternally alike, but on the rare occasions when the Drifter returns to the diamond he finds the names new and strange, and no one interested in his reminiscences. Only the delinquencies of Babe Ruth and the sublime failures, the eternal sunsets, of Walter Johnson's life seem to survive.

* * * * *

THIS year the Drifter discovered something new in baseball if old in Connecticut. When he opened the door of the Cream Hill grocery and general store he was immediately greeted by the strange phenomenon of a whispering and tiptoeing Mr. Arlington. The proprietor was not wont to be so prompt nor so silent. The reason was apparent. The back of the store was filled; the cracker-boxes were all occupied. Mr. Arlington had tuned in on WEAF, and Cream Hill was hearing the world's series through Graham McNamee. Oh, it was more than hearing; it was seeing the game. The knotholes of the old-fashioned fence had become great holes in the air, and Cream Hill was a gang of small boys seeing the game, over the air. This was no street crowd dully watching puppet figures on an automatic scoreboard. One saw Roger Peckinpaugh march out to the plate, feeling his bat. With the crowd in Washington one eyed the "most valuable man in the League," who had twice dropped the ball and was set to prove himself afresh. One watched each ball and strike, saw the ball rise soaring from Peck's bat, saw Max Carey plant himself ready for it in center field, knew that Peck was out, saw Carey reach out his arms, saw him drop it and fumble for it, heard the sudden mad roar of the crowd while Peck raced round to second base. It was all happening there, in the queer little machine on the back counter, outside the store window, or somewhere behind the eyes of each of the silent villagers on the cracker-boxes. Baseball was truly a national sport that day: thirty-six thousand shivering fans watched the game in Washington, but a million saw every play through that aerial knothole provided by Graham McNamee and WEAF.

* * * * *

GEMS worth $683,000, so the papers said, were stolen from a Mrs. Donahue the other day. Neither that nor jewels interested the Drifter much, not even when the thieves contrived to return the jewels without being discovered by the worthy detectives who keep New York safe. But a headline on the next morning was more suggestive. "Fear Returned Donahue Gems Made of Paste," screamed one of Mr. Hearst's dailies. Experts had been called in to determine whether the returned jewels were [illegible] or were mere imitations made of paste. Mrs. Donahue could not tell; the detectives did not know. For a week the city's newspapers had given their front pages to the theft of a few stones; the news interest was obviously due to the fabulous money value of trinkets which their owner could not distinguish from other trinkets worth half a million dollars less. What a commentary on money values, and social values, and newspaper values in 1925!

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Ca Marche

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Something is happening in France. It may be truer to say that something is happening to France. That thing can perhaps be best illustrated by the chance word of an intelligent French woman, recently overheard in a public gathering:

"She is defending Poincaré! Tiens! It takes some courage to do that today."

Indeed, the past eighteen months have seen more than the defeat of Poincaré in France; they have seen an almost general repudiation of his policies. Sanity is returning to France, and there are more and more numerous indications of the reassertion of the old chivalrous spirit which has gained for France the reputation of one of the most magnanimous of nations.

The recent Peace Congress held during the early days of September at the Sorbonne plainly showed the new trend of events. It showed it far more clearly than the Government which had subsidized it to the amount of 40,000 francs had intended. There had apparently been a fairly definite understanding as to the policy to be followed by the congress, and every speaker at the great formal opening had to submit his speech to government censors. A number of prominent officials, including Herriot, accepted the invitations sent them, promising appropriate addresses.

But Loebe, the president of the German Reichstag, was also invited, and, with a large delegation of Germans, made his appearance in Paris. This produced a very embarrassing situation in a congress heavily subsidized by the Government. Only two weeks before, in a public meeting held in Vienna, Loebe had called for the union of Austria with Germany, a political possibility deeply offensive to the French, truly fearful of future German aggression. Word went forth that Loebe should not be permitted to speak at the congress, and to give the matter the appearance of decorum Herriot suddenly found himself unable to attend. At the formal opening session the waiting public heard that as a result of Herriot's enforced absence Loebe par délicatesse had decided also to refrain from speech. The lovely rendering by the orchestra of the overture to "Lohengrin" failed to cover the wave of emotion that the announcement brought to the audience.

But the Government had reckoned without the new France. News of the situation ran like lightning over Paris. That night there was a meeting at the Quaker headquarters in the Avenue Victoria, attended by many delegates to the congress and the representatives of various groups, including the Catholic Senator Marc Sangnier, founder and leader of the large and growing international movement known as La Jeune République. Next day, in the afternoon, Loebe spoke.

Later I heard [illegible] given to the first public address made by a German in Paris since 1914.

"I would not have believed it possible," one said to the other, "that such a thing could happen within [illegible] of the war."

[illegible] Again and again the audience broke into waves of applause. The walls of the Sorbonne [illegible]

"Indeed, the French are able," the [illegible] "they are capable of a genuine chivalry."

[illegible] The conscientious objector is a phenomenon incomprehensible to the average French intelligence. If France has known a few conscientious objectors and has regarded them with almost complete cynicism, their sincerity has been almost generally denied. When it was learned that the cause of the conscientious objector was being pushed forward for discussion, found to be too crowded to allow time for it.

Again the Government calculated without the new France. There was a stormy session during which the poet Pioch demanded the discussion, amid tumultuous excitement. A young soldier in uniform gave peculiar significance to the scene. Sitting on the rail that divided the auditorium from the floor he hung on the speaker's words, bursting again and again into applause. Everyone in the room was watching him in his complete absorption and generous enthusiasm. His sympathy for the men that had refused to wear the uniform that he wore was obvious. The motion, granting amnesty, was not carried, but the fact that it was discussed with immense interest on the floor of the Sorbonne was one of great significance.

One gathers that much is happening in the active minds of the rising generation in France. There is a growing belief, becoming daily more articulate, that the sacrifices of the war were too largely imposed by one generation upon another. That the death of [illegible] was regarded as a glorious sacrifice to be proudly borne, while there was a widespread evasion of taxation, has provoked much bitter criticism; and the army of mutilés watches the development of national policies with eyes that can never again be clouded with illusion. There is a distant rumor that the great French institution of compulsory military service will have shortly to fight for its life.

Straws also show which way the wind blows. In the train that carried me—along with M. Caillaux—to the waiting boat at Havre I found myself in a compartment with five other women. Three were naturalized German-Americans, one a young German girl on her first transatlantic journey, embarking without misgiving on a French boat, and the fifth, a young and charming [illegible], I found to be an ardent disciple of Marc Sangnier and of the Jeune République movement. She was also deeply interested and thoroughly in sympathy with the conscientious objector.

Finally an item in the daily ship-paper, l'Atlantique, attracted my attention, seeming to confirm my gathering impression of the growing liberalism of the French spirit. I was quite familiar with the policy of l'Atlantique, as I had crossed many times on the French Line and always read the paper with attention. Its policy might be defined as identical with that of the New York Herald Tribune. This is the item, printed without comment, on which my astonished eyes fell, under the date of September 20, 1925:

"Authoritative sources state that Germany and France are in a peaceful agreement for the first time in many generations. Germany is faithfully fulfilling the Versailles Treaty disarmament clauses, and the major points of the [illegible] security-pact conference are already agreed upon by both sides."

S. S. Paris, September 22 MARY KELSEY

The Nordics Find a Defender

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It was a pleasure and a welcome relief to read A Latin Looks North, by Señor Ugarte. After such of the writers on the Nordic question as preceded Señor Ugarte, it was refreshing to find a writer who used mere common sense and facts as they plainly exist, rather than basing a comparison of the races upon the fact that the grapes hung heavier along the Mediterranean.

Just across the Calle Rubio from where I am writing, after a group of natives (who I presume from appearances are mostly Indian) are singing. They have been [illegible] cheap grape juice and the concoction is a wild affair that ranges from a wail to the high-pitched shriek of drunken women. They are undoubtedly quite happy, but if, as one of your writers claimed, the happiness of the Southern people is a proof of a superior civilization, then I fail to see or perhaps to appreciate it. Distance, of course, lends enchantment to all things, and perhaps from your little office this singing may inspire you to write of romance beneath the Southern Cross and olive-skinned señoritas, but to me it is just a drunken brawl.

Señor Ugarte also points out the tolerance of the Latin in his treatment of the conquered Indian, by saying that there are millions of them existing in South America today, whereas they have practically disappeared in the United States.

This is quite true; there are millions of them here, but as a prominent writer recently wrote: "The Indian is the greatest problem of Latin America."

We pause to wonder if the treatment accorded the Indian in the United States is less humane than that of the Latin who left the Indian to his own resources, which meant starvation or taking part in a civilization for which he was absolutely unfitted. It sems to be just a step this side of slavery.

It is quite true that in the United States the Indian has been cheated out of valuable oil lands, but not by the American people; rather by a small group of capitalists who are just as eager now to rob the American people of their natural resources. They know no color line, nor are they a product of any race.

So, when striking a comparison between the treatment of the Indian by the Latin and Nordic people, we should rather make a study of the lives and conditions under which the millions of Indians are living in South America and not jump at conclusions because of their mere existence. We hope to read more from the pen of Señor Ugarte, rather than the mush of preceding sentimentalists.

And while the policy of The Nation seems to be anti-Nordic, right or wrong, we should not forget as liberals or radicals that the very nations whose people you attack so relentlessly are those whose governments have the only possible claim upon the word liberal. If the world ever becomes a better place, if in time mankind be lifted to something higher than a state of industrial peonage, we shall be obliged to [illegible].

The consistent attack of The Nation upon the Nordics does not accord with its program of a united liberal front.

Rancagua, Chile, July 30 LEWIS J. CULLEN

He Knew the Newspapers

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article entitled Slush, published in The Nation of August 19, pertinently draws attention to a recent development in newspaper diction. While I am in hearty accord with the author's scorn for the "sob stuff," yet I cannot altogether agree that the new spicy feature style is a mark of decadence in news writing. Be that as it may, since special tendencies in the public press are usually an indication of popular demand, I do not see how the critics can hope to accomplish any speedy reform unless they happen to comprise a majority of the readers.

It is a bit refreshing, after reading the plaint of the "good old times," to come upon a letter written in July, 1770, by John Dickinson, then a newspaper contributor and familiar with the ways of his contemporaries of the craft. A copy of the following was sent, on the eve of his marriage, to every publisher in Philadelphia:

[illegible]

Berkeley, California, August 28 RUTH BARTLETT

Hobo, Tramp, Bum

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: At a regular meeting of the New York local of the International Brotherhood Welfare Association, held at 6 p. m. at the Tub, your editorial paragraph was read to that body and commented upon, resulting in a motion being made praising you in fairness to the cause for which Mr. Zero and the I. B. W. A. are valiantly striving.

It is consoling to this body to find an able periodical such as The Nation agreeing with our efforts to differentiate, so that the stigma of ridicule might to some extent be lifted from an already abused group of Americans, who, it is stated, number about five million men and women, who are trying to better their lot in this day and age.

The motion as voted upon and sent to The Nation is as follows:

> That the secretary be instructed to commend the editor for his proper classifications of the hobo, tramp, and bum.

Livingston Pratt, Secretary,
Daniel O'Brien, Chairman,
International Brotherhood Welfare Association

New York, October 5

A Suspicious Silence

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: You would have thought that the Riff people would occupy the front page every day with the acclaim and admiration of every liberty- and courage-loving American. It is only seven years since we spent so many billions and so many lives for the ideal of liberty. The armistice saved me by only two days from the experience of having to go to camp to be trained for the slaughter on the other side. Why so much enthusiasm for liberty then and so much silence now? Can it be that the same hidden forces which set in motion the enormous propaganda machinery then are the same forces which are now putting on the Maxim silencer? Is it possible that Otto H. Kahn, who had so much to say for liberty then when we saved Wall Street's investment in Allied victory, feels differently since he was feted in Morocco by French officials? Is there any significance in the rumored acquisition by French-American financiers of the Mannesmann mining interests in Morocco? Does it prove, what was suspected by many, that all our superpatriotic societies during the war were merely tools in the hands of our big war profiteers and are now doing the same valiant work toward reduction of the Allied war debts, enhancing the value of Allied securities held by our big financial interests? At the same time these same groups are mostly in favor of the reduction of surtaxes, further benefiting our deserving rich.

New York, August 30 Bruno Pinkney

The Americanization of Europe

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: I miss The Nation very much, but it is prohibited in Hungary, one of the countries made safe by the war. It is well to note that the war is resulting in the complete Americanization of Europe, which process is well under way.

The wonderful gipsy and Hungarian music has completely given way before rag-time and jazz in Hungary, the same being true of Rumania and the Balkans, where American tooth paste, chewing gum, and toilet articles have won out.

Germany has taken on the Taylor system in many large factories, and the complete mechanization of Europe is well under way.

Siofok, Hungary, September 1 Nicholas Klein

More Nation Dinners

Nation subscribers and their friends are invited to a series of five dinners to be given this winter on the dates printed below:

1. Thursday, November 12
CHINA: THE ACID TEST OF 1925

Speakers: Dr. HARRY F. WARD, of the Union Theological Seminary; Mr. PAUL BLANSHARD, of the League for Industrial Democracy; Mr. P. W. KUO.

Chairman, OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor, The Nation.

2. Thursday, December 10
IS MAN A MACHINE?

Speakers: Mr. CLARENCE DARROW, counsel in the Scopes trial at Dayton; Dr. HENRY SLOANE COFFIN, Pastor, Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York City.

Chairman, JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH, Associate Editor, The Nation.

*3. Thursday, January 7
Subject and speakers to be announced

4. Thursday, February 4
WAGES FOR WIVES

Speakers: Miss DORIS STEVENS, author of "Jailed for Freedom"; Mr. ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS, lawyer.

Chairman, FREDA KIRCHWEY, Managing Editor, The Nation.

*5. Thursday, March 18
IS LITERARY CRITICISM IMPORTANT?

Speakers: A critic, a Publisher, an Author, names to be announced.

Chairman, MARK VAN DOREN, Literary Editor, The Nation.

Time: 7 P. M. sharp.

Price: $2.50 per plate, or $10.00 for the series of five.

Tickets may be bought only by Nation subscribers, although subscribers may buy as many tickets as they wish. If you already are a subscriber, you may have your friend be a subscriber, pay $5.00, and so have both dinners on $5.00. Please state below

Send me The Nation for one year and
I enclose $5.00 for the two dinners at $2.50
I enclose $10.00 for the series of five dinners at $10.00

Name

Address

Books and Plays

Fin de Siècle

By EDA LOU WALTON

Looking on death with a sardonic smile,
You take each night a new love to your bed,
And each day check the failure of a trial
To find an hour's forgetfulness. Instead
New anguish meets you in the fairest face,
New pity in slim fingers, knowing how
Each of these girls will ripen in her grace
When mould is green upon your youthful brow.

Why should they live in beauty with you dead?
They have no value save your kiss or song.
They have no value, yet these lips are red;
Beneath a blue-veined breast the pulse is strong.
Choiceless, you turn against yourself this knife,
The cruel, impersonal loveliness of life.

First Glance

"IF our days in the garden of the earth are in reality so uncertain, so brief, if there is indeed so little time for any of us to play under the blackthorn, if indeed, as was made clear to me then, death cannot be gainsaid, then surely the secret of so sorry and insecure an existence must lie in detachment, for he who would lose his heart t a life so beset with tragedy had best have a care for his wits." Such was the moral of one of the best sketches in Llewelyn Powys's "Ebony and Ivory" two years ago; and such is the moral now of "Skin for Skin" (Harcourt, Brace: $2). The new book is the most interesting of Mr. Powys's five only in part because it is the most richly written. Its chief importance derives for the moment from the fact that it seems to give a full, explicit motivation of the mood which distinguished its predecessors. It casts a white, hard light upon the pessimism which once insisted that "at the bottom of the well of life there is no hope." It shows how in Mr. Powys's mind the combination came to be formed of grim despair and cold, unregenerate laughter.

"Skin for Skin" is the story of Mr. Powys's life in so far as that life was affected during a brief period by the circumstance of consumption. The disease announced itself in England, when Mr. Powys was twenty-five years old. It sent him to a sanatorium on a cold slope in Switzerland. He returned to his native West; walked and talked with his brothers and with certain old Cambridge friends; and then found himself in Switzerland once more, where he leaves us looking at the pale green sky that speaks "in so deceptive, in so deceitful, a manner of the immortality of the soul." This final word is a significant one, for Mr. Powys is not to be deceived. He is not to argue that because life is short it is sweet. It may be a thing of great price—and I know of few books in which the mere desirability of existence above ground is more clearly and firmly established. But for Mr. Powys it will not be something to hug, not some homely, familiar toy to fondle. It has shown a face to him which is at once beautiful and terrible, and he will return a gaze both disillusioned and fascinated. Hence the suspended loveliness of these pages, and hence the cold laughter which plays across them. Hence, in a word, t "detachment" which was the promise of "Ebony and Ivory" —the freedom from sentiment which makes it possible, as Mr. Powys's father kneels at his bedside to pray, to that the bent head is "white as the silver belly of a minnow, white as a dove's wing against a thunder-cloud."

On other occasions, too, the elder Powys sits to his son for what turns out to be a striking portrait; and I have no doubt that the author of this remarkable family—concerning the eleven members of which a good deal of curiosity is pardonabl —is in a peculiar sense the author of its genius. Himself both lion and lamb, he let his sons be lions.

there is John Cowper, the rather windy oracle whom yet one achievement of "Skin for Skin" is its picture of brothers who are so devoted and yet so frank, so close and yet so lonely—epitomizing for Llewelyn, perhaps, the larger world in which "each tremulous, intellectual soul is set shockingly apart, to endure as best it may its own destruction."

MARK VAN DOREN

The Superficial Grey

Twenty Five Years (1892-1916). By Viscount Grey of Fallodon. Frederick A. Stokes Company. 2 vols. $10.

THE parliamentary correspondent of the Daily News, reporting Grey's great speech of August 3, 1914, says: "Sir Edward Grey, now among the few men of history forever to be mentioned, rises." Benckendorff, the Russian ambassador, more intimately associated with Grey's policies than any other man save possibly Paul Cambon, telegraphs to Sazonov on April 6, 1915: "I should like to be able to help modify [your severe judgment of Grey] in view of the services he has rendered us since the beginning of the crisis. Let me add for your most personal information that there is a feeling that almost never quits Grey and that to some extent is justified—namely, that, in the moment of the indecision of the English public and of all the ministers, it was Grey above all who dragged England into the war and that for this reason he always has a sense of the most profound personal responsibility, quite apart from that of the Cabinet." In the debate on August 3rd a member made this terrible reproach to Grey: "I regret very much that at the end of eight years the best you can say of the policy that has been pursued—of the Triple Entente—is that it should have landed us in a war like this!"

Grey tries to stem a current like this by writing memoirs. His strength, as a panegyrist declared already in 1915, consists in a power of exposition "so luminous, moderate, and judicial that soon it appears almost impossible to dissent from the speaker's conclusions." In his memoirs Grey lives up to his reputation. The work may become an English classic; it may be read and admired a thousand years hence. It will crystallize the English legend.

Those who go deeply into the subject will realize, indeed, that Grey skims over difficulties just as a flat stone, if skilfully projected, skips over the surface of a pond. There is that promise, for instance, given to France on August 2nd. Grey says: "The promise to defend those coasts was given to France. The German Government were informed. They promised not to attack those coasts (of course on the understanding that we remained neutral), and this naval point ceased to have any much less lightly. The promise was given and the German Government notified on the afternoon of August 2nd, before the ultimatum had been despatched to Belgium and while Lichnowsky was waiting for an answer to his question: Would England remain neutral if Belgian territory were not violated? That question was not even submitted to the Cabinet or to Parliament, because Grey was not sure that the ambassador had the authority of his Government behind him. He was reproached later for making the least rather than the most of the German offers, and the reproach was surely a just one. The consequence of his irrevocable commitment was that Germany considered herself at war with England: "That is the help of an ally," wrote the Kaiser; "for England cuts off my fleet from assisting my army against an enemy with whom I am already at war." And Paul Cambon wrote later: "I was convinced (on August 2nd) that the game was won. A great Power does not wage war half and half. From the moment it decides to carry it on water it has no choice but to wage it on land." Some one, if not Grey himself, felt uneasy about that commitment to France of August 2nd. On August 3rd Grey announced in Parliament that it had taken place "yesterday." In the propaganda-work "Great Speeches of the War: Revised and corrected for this volume by their authors, with a few exceptions" the date of his speech is given as August 4th.

The German and the French Governments took the matter

Another instance of skimming over difficulties is seen in connection with the Russian mobilization. Grey admits it—does not even dispute the priority. But it does not interest him; it was merely "a wise precautionary measure." Why should mobilization mean war? Yet in the conversations between the French and Russian General Staffs, of which we have the protocols, the point is insisted on with the utmost emphasis.

We see by these memoirs that the distrust of Germany began as far back as 1893, when, according to Grey, Lord Rosebery was forced by "a sort of ultimatum" to "withdraw competition for the railway concessions in Turkey" because German support was needed in Egypt; the incident "left a sense of discomfort and a bad taste behind. . . . It was open to Germany to repeat the squeeze. . . . The noose had been roughly jerked by Germany." He remembered the incident twelve years later when he took office. Yet the German account is very different. The support in Egypt had been granted very graciously when Hatzfeld was ordered by telegraph to hold it back, if no promise had been given in binding form, "since the offensively hostile attitude of the English Embassy in Constantinople, which in all Asia Minor railway questions defends even French interests to the disadvantage of the German, stands in no relation to the regard paid for years on the part of Germany to English interests." Lord Cromer has been told of the grievances and "sincerely regrets" the facts brought to his notice. Sir Edward himself admits that the Germans are right in principle.

Throughout the memoirs Germany is invariably in the wrong. Why not? Her iniquities are Grey's only possible excuse for his policies. The Krüger telegram is exploited at length, the subsequent refusal to receive Krüger minimized. The Tangiers visit and Agadir are merely brutal attempts to intimidate France. Possibly the worst case of blind partisanship and ignorance of history appears where Grey describes his own final attempts at mediation: "The precedent of 1870 was ominous; we all knew how Prussian militarism had availed itself of this time and season of the year at which to strike. The same time and season of the year we were now approaching." Even Clemenceau on August 4th declared that France had "paid for the unpardonable folly of an irresponsible Government with a piece of her living flesh cut off by the sword of the conqueror," and wrote in October: "no true Frenchman hesitates to admit that the wrongs of that day were on our side."

Many more instances of Grey's tendency to skim, many too of the dangers of the whole entente policy might be given—the power, for instance, that it gave Poincaré to frustrate the Haldane Mission. But enough has been said to characterize the memoirs in bold outline at least. They are a triumph of insularity, of blindness to everything outside of one narrow circle. They do not directly falsify, but they come as near it as possible—as when Grey declares that he is not quite sure what "balance of power" means—has never knowingly used the term. But he once expressly approved the formula stabilité de l'équilibre.

E. F. Henderson

Damp Powder

Firecrackers. By Carl Van Vechten. Alfred A Knopf. $2.50

Whenever Carl Van Vechten brings out a new novel I read "Alice in Wonderland." Mr. Van Vechten called "The Tattooed Countess" a romantic novel and now he calls "Firecrackers" a realistic novel, and by those legends he sends me to "Alice in Wonderland." It isn't at all that his definitions are lacking in absolute truth. It is only that "The Tattooed Countess" is less romantic than "Alice in Wonderland" and "Firecrackers" is less realistic than "Through the Looking-Glass." Of course if you look carefully you will find something of George Moore and something of Oscar Wilde in the works of Carl Van Vechten, but most of all you will find the deliberate method and procedure of "Alice." What else can you say when you find Mr. Van Vechten collecting fantastics and bringing them together for the purpose of wit and verbal escapades? They have nothing in common with one another except that they live in the same book. They do not develop the plot by the slow groundswell of a complicated harmony. They meet in scenes and lives disjoined and they perform an antic of words and a fantasy of lives. If only Mr. Van Vechten were as inspired in his creative capacity as he is correct in his method of "realism" he might some day invent a character as witty as the Mad Hatter or as charming as Alice or as implacable as the Red Queen. He never quite gets there. His firecrackers sizzle and flare but they do not burst into red and blue and green, and as often as not something seems to have poured cold water upon their fuses. "Firecrackers" is one of those obscure performances which leave the beholder puzzled to explain exactly the presence of so many damp squibs.

It is first of all necessary to insist that Mr. Van Vechten is quite right in calling "Firecrackers" a realistic novel. The thing is realistic to its own purpose, which is to present the idle rich seeking for more lotuses to devour in the ordered dulness of their routine boredom. Bright figures come trooping in from "Peter Whiffle" and "The Tattoed Countess" and go on talking to one another in the now unmistakable Van Vechten manner. Paul Moody and Campaspe and the others do not quite know what to do with the thing they call life. At this tragic instant Mr. Van Vechten tries to introduce a fourth dimension in the person of Gunnar O'Grady, who mends furnaces and sells orchids and second-hand clothes and performs complicated acrobatics and yet has read the Persian poets and found a way of living. He does not interfere and preach, but somehow he casts an acrobatic spell upon the lives of Campaspe and Paul and Consuelo—an amazing child who is up on all the utmost decadence in the new art. They all go about on a crusade which would capture the holy influence stored by the redoubtable Gunnar. Paul gets himself a job on Wall Street. Consuelo leaves art for a long practice in handsprings. Campaspe falls in love with Gunnar, but discovers that once long ago he had a desperate love affair and thereby learned to abjure the lusts of the flesh. Yes Campaspe offer of herself (with the provision that she still feels herself free) throws him back into the pit. The scene ends on the spectacle of the immaculate Gunnar making up to a tedious young girl with a silly, pretty face.

Mr. Van Vechten has not forgotten the poor old Countess Nattatorrini. Gareth Johns has left her and become a cynical novelist. She is still driven by the devils of lust into the arms of any young man who will accept her aged favors. At last she even hopes for confession from a sweet young priest. He turns out to be an old one. One wonders why Mr. Van Vechten is so hard on the poor old thing. It is not as if he were W. S. Gilbert, with a rage at the very thought of an old woman taken by passion in the presence of young men. Has Mr. Van Vechten repented for the hard words he once used about Iowa? The deathbed scene tries very hard to be cruel and sardonic and succeeds only in being pallid. All the way through Mr. Van Vechten is most happy in the scenes of fantastic dialogue and most ineffective in the scenes of passion, which are as unmoving and pale as the graveyard grief of Gareth Johns in "The Tattooed Countess." Herein Mr. Van Vechten is too much like George Moore and also like the sentimental Lewis Carroll of "Sylvie and Bruno." He may not believe in scenes of passion or take them seriously into his own philosophy; but when he puts scenes of passion into a book one may rightfully ask that they do what they must do from their very nature.

It may be that the characters in Mr. Van Vechten's books spring too rapidly full-blown from the head of their creator. None of them except Campaspe seem to have had time for birth and growing pains and substance and nourishment from the blood of their own life. Even as fantastics they lack the completion of such individual portraits as the Red Queen, the White Knight, and the Duchess. They do not so much explode like firecrackers as shine like pale, pleasant ghosts in fashionable drawing-rooms of the intellectually unemployed.

DONALD DOUGLAS

A Baffled Man

Edward Everett, Orator and Statesman. By Paul Revere Frothingham. Houghton Mifflin Company. $6.

MR. FROTHINGHAM gives the key to Everett's career: "He was a clergyman in politics. He endeavored from first to last to employ the principles of the pulpit and to practice the gentle virtues of the Ministry of Religion amid all the heat and dust of the political arena." Motives alone, however, will not explain his want of success. He was ever of a restless temperament, eager for new experience and a change of occupation, fearing most monotony. His early success in the ministry and the reputation as an orator gained by a florid and too rhetorical style must in part be held responsible. The applause and sincere admiration of the public encouraged him in his faults and tended to cultivate this restlessness. Emerson, who admired the speaker, became critical of manner and matter: "He is all art, and I find in him nowadays, maugre all his gifts and great merits, more to blame than praise. He is not content to be Edward Everett, but would be Daniel Webster. This is his mortal distemper."

His experience in different positions, so varied and unusual, indicated the position he held in his community and in a degree measured his abilities. It did not broaden him on lines increasing his public usefulness. A conservative by nature and training, he failed to recognize the limits which such a policy imposed. When all round him a mighty contest raged, involving great moral principles, he urged silence, inaction, and at most compromise. Emerson truly described Webster as Everett's evil genius, and, more severely, wrote of Everett as "a mere dangler and ornamental person" in all his public appointments. In the one overwhelming issue that shook the country for forty years he saw nothing of the great principles involved, on the solution of which depended the existence of the Union. That was the tragedy of his life. He atoned in good part by a late, too late, repentance and earnest support of the government in the war. His influence, however, left no permanent mark. Even his speeches do not carry the weight his contemporaries gave to them.

Mr. Frothingham has written on this career with rare freedom and balanced judgment. He has not sought to gloss over the errors and hide the evident weakness of his subject, but tells the story in a masterly manner. Evidently in sympathy with the man Everett, he is none the less outspokenly critical of Everett as a political factor. His analysis of Everett's oratory is admirable in its application of rules, justly indicating the mixture of good and bad qualities. Altogether a book carrying a lesson worthy to be studied as displaying an example of the scholar in politics.

WORTHINGTON C. FORD

Tory History

A History of the Tory Party. By Keith Feiling. Oxford University Press. $6.

[illegible]illiam J. Winkinson. Longmans, Green [illegible]

MACAULAY dated the corporate existence of the two English parties from the Parliament of 1641. A division into two groups, he thought, rose naturally from "diversities of temper, of understanding, and of interest" which are inevitable until "the human mind ceases to be drawn in opposite directions by the charm of habit and the charm of novelty." There is always one "class of men who cling with fondness to whatever is ancient" and another class "sanguine in hope, bold in speculation, always pressing forward."

Mr. Feiling's book—the first really satisfactory history of the Tory Party—dates the germs of Whig and Tory from the wedding of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. Religious truth and political power, he says, are the causes which most divide mankind and which in particular are responsible for the development of political groups in England. Mr. Feiling is sympathetic with his subject; he is a thorough master of its sources; his style is clear, and at times brilliant. Of course his judgments frequently contradict those of Macaulay, but his complicated story inserts the historical details in the interstices of Macaulay's generalizations. These details (which might have been fuller on the economic background and interests of the leaders) must deal with the groupings of men rather than with the persistence of an idea, and it is doubtful whether these groupings were always those of "party" in any real sense of the word. There was truth in William III's remark that if the King of England had enough well-paying offices to bestow on those who demanded them the names Whig and Tory would soon disappear.

In spite of his sympathy with his subject, Mr. Feiling is forced to admit that in several great constitutional issues the Tories were on the wrong side. This was the case, for example, in [illegible]. Their attitude toward the Royal prerogative was such that if it had triumphed it would have greatly delayed the development of real constitutional government; and on occasion the Tories were opportunists—that is to say, their view of the national interest was clearly colored by personal and party interest. The Tory leaders of the period with which Mr. Feiling deals, furthermore, all had some unpleasant sides to their natures. Even if one does not insist on a high degree of consistency one must nevertheless say that both Danby and Bolingbroke veered from one side to the other.

Mr. Feiling has done a notable piece of work. His book has the merit all too rare, in historical research, of making scholarship compatible with interest. He has a sense of the dramatic both in events and in the development of character, yet he never sacrifices his historical accuracy for a fine phrase or a picturesque touch. He shows an extensive acquaintance with continental political theory, and makes full use of thousands of sources, printed and unprinted. He slowly unravels the tangled skein, but his great learning never lessens the interest of the reader who is not a specialist. His only fault in this respect is that he occasionally overestimates the knowledge of his readers. Thus he describes the Whig Junto of 1694 without fully identifying its members, and occasionally his proper names are ambiguous. Only a partially initiated reader will realize that there are two Halifaxes—one Charles Montague and the other Sir George Saville. But these are trivial blemishes which only serve to emphasize the general excellence of the work.

Mr. Wilkinson's book is of a different kind. It is an anthology of opinions on the changed orientation of the Conservative program which was brought about largely by the influence of Disraeli. British newspapers, periodicals, parliamentary debates, party literature, biographies—all the available sources are used to determine the nature of a political theory which to its exponents seemed "democracy because the welfare of the people is its supreme end" and "Tory because the institutions of the country are the means by which the end is to be obtained."

The monograph is a compendium of parliamentary history for the last sixty years, and its vagueness on the achievements of Tory democracy results from the vagueness of the program; for Tory democracy despite Mr. Wilkinson's sympathetic analysis still seems sophistical. As Lord Rosebery described it in his "Life of Lord Randolph Churchill," it was an "honest and unconscious imposture, but none the less an imposture."

One curious feature of party alignments in Great Britain is the rather extraordinary hold which conservatism has had on certain groups of workers. It has frequently been pointed out that the Labor Party has had scant success with the agricultural laborer. Even though in the future it may approach a majority of the total vote for the country it will fail except by accident in having a majority of the House of Commons unless it can make inroads on the two hundred rural constituencies which are the "solid South" of conservatism. It would be interesting to know something about the rationale of this alignment and the less spectacular but still important allegiance of certain groups of industrial workers to modern Toryism. In the latter case the explanation is probably not unconnected with the public house, taxes on beer, and temperance reform. This is a reality far removed from "Young England" or from Lord Balfour's occasional genuflections to democracy, but it might have been considered in Mr. Wilkinson's admirable monograph.

LINDSAY ROGERS

Originality in Children

The Psychology of the Preschool Child. By Bird T. Baldwin and Lorle I. Stecher. D. Appleton and Company. $2.75.

THE authors say in their preface (italics mine): "This gives an account of the results achieved in the Preschool Laboratories of the Iowa Child Welfare Research Station, where young children have been scientifically observed in their physical, mental, and social growth and systematically trained. It is believed that the methods and materials described will be helpful and usable for others interested in child training."

Those of us who are working upon problems of curriculum are fairly suspicious of methods of training children as set over against methods of obtaining for them a setting in which they can both develop their personalities and secure the training which will lift them to a higher level of social efficiency. In so far as the authors have set up a curriculum it is important that it be questioned from this point of view.

It is difficult to judge the curriculum by the data presented, but two quotations from the text would suggest that some conclusions have been drawn for which little proof is offered. I refer to the following: "Contrary to the popular belief, small children show very little imagination in the creative sense." And later: "This does not mean that the children are unresponsive, but simply not creative or original." It is upon this point that those of us who are working upon a new type of school—a type which depends upon the children themselves and not wholly upon the teachers to originate or create—would disagree with the authors. Children are not uncreative. One almost suspects the existence of a "wish fulfilment" here—in persons primarily interested in training.

CAROLINE PRATT

Books in Brief

The Economy of Human Energy. By Thomas Nixon Carver. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

Mr. Carver is a moral economist who believes that "nothing is righteousness except that which economizes and makes productive the energy of the people, and that nothing is sin except that which wastes or dissipates that energy." He has written this book to show the tests of righteousness and wickedness in economic life, to show, that is, how we may so arrange our economic institutions and guide our economic conduct as to grow into "a Kingdom of God in which many can live and live abundantly." It is a typical exhibit of the Carver mind, curiously compounded of solid sense and equally solid nonsense. Nothing but praise can be given for certain aspects of Mr. Carver's thinking, such as his long insistence upon the praiseworthiness of production and his scorn of luxury and idleness as the weak vices of an emasculated society. But when one gets down to actualities it becomes clear why the Lusk Committee concluded that Mr. Carver was one of the very few "safe" economists in the country. His great concern for the old virtues leads him to feel apparently that any means of securing them is justified. Mr. Carver might with profit allow a good-tempered reexamination of his fundamentals—if he has not long since passed the possibility of their modification.

[illegible] By Henry C. Wallace. The Century Company. $1.75.

Henry C. Wallace was a good Secretary of Agriculture and the recurring theme of his posthumous book is plainly stated: "With an investment of over one-fourth of the total capital of the nation and a labor force equal to almost one-third of all people gainfully employed, agriculture . . . in 1909 received only 18 per cent of the national income." That is the problem of agriculture and it is [illegible] of agriculture worth public discussion until something has been done about it. What must happen, Mr. Wallace felt, is a diversion of enough of our economic resources to rural institutions so that they may assume [illegible] some of the difficulties which [illegible] our modern cities. But where are the [illegible] that [illegible]?

Modern Turkey: A Political, Economic and Social Interpretation, Inclusive, with Selected Chapters by Representative Authorities. By Eliot Grinnell Mears. The Macmillan Company. $6.

Bulky and unorganized, this is yet a fascinating volume. Some of the essays which were contributed by Mr. Mears himself, as well as those by American and Turkish authorities and several representatives of the nationalities living in Turkey, will be found of considerable service for purposes of reference, [illegible] as [illegible] the [illegible] of Ana-comprehensive way the mental and spiritual picture of that Turkey which is typified by Angora, the dirty little capital of the Turkish Republic, as contrasted with that Imperial Turkey which was represented by decadent Constantinople, now crumbling down.

The River of Life. By John St. Loe Strachey. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $5.

Mr. Strachey's latest book is not a continuation of the attractive autobiography he published in 1922 under the title "The Adventure of Living." It is, to use his own words, "a desultory and digressive diary," embodying reflections that have occurred to him at different times during the last two years. We find its author philosophizing pleasantly on a great variety of topics. Within the compass of a few pages his punt drifts, to use another of his own phrases, from the relations between parents and children to the practice of scribbling comments on the margins of books, Roman aqueducts, a bullfight in Southern France, and the most depressing lines in English poetry. And the mind through which these reflections have passed seems more than ever before to be a highly cultivated one; it is well nurtured on the best literature of many periods and though it is mild it is not commonplace.

What I Believe. By Bertrand Russell. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.

The beliefs of a competent and brilliant modern mind on the most important subjects in the world, nakedly clear and disconcertingly convincing.

Notable Fall Books

Through a most regrettable error the following items from the Fall announcement of Boni and Liveright were omitted from "The Nation's" booklist of October 14th:

BIOGRAPHY

Hedin, Sven. My Life as an Explorer. Boni & Liveright. $5.
Herriot, Edouard. Madame Récamier. Boni & Liveright. 2 vols. $7.50.
Ricci, Corrado. Beatrice Cenci. Boni & Liveright. 2 vols. $10.

FICTION

Anderson, Sherwood. Dark Laughter. Boni & Liveright. $2.50.
Atherton, Gertrude. The Crystal Cup. Boni & Liveright. $2.
Bercovici, Konrad. The Marriage Guest. Boni & Liveright. $2.
Broun, Heywood. Gandle Follows His Nose. Boni & Liveright. $2.
Dreiser, Theodore. An American Tragedy. Boni & Liveright. 2 vols. $4.
Du Gard, Roger Martin. The Thibaults. Boni & Liveright. 2 vols. $5.
Hemingway, Ernest. In Our Time. Boni & Liveright. $2.
Hummel, George F. A Good Man. Boni & Liveright. $2.
Komroff, Manuel. The Grace of Lambs. Boni & Liveright. $2.
Loeb, Harold. Doodab. Boni & Liveright. $2.
Morand, Paul. Lewis and Irene. Boni & Liveright. $2.
Rascoe, Burton. Gustibus. Boni & Liveright. $2.50.

HISTORY, CRITICISM, SCIENCE

Fishbein, Morris. The Medical Follies. Boni & Liveright. $2.
Hamilton, A. E. The Real [illegible] and the New Science. Boni & Liveright. $2.50.
[illegible] Israel. Boni & Liveright. $3.
Lindsey, Ben B. The Revolt of Modern Youth. Boni & Liveright. $3.
Macy, John. The Story of the World's Literature. Boni & Liveright. $5.
Stekel, Wilhelm. Frigidity in Woman in Relation to Her Love Life. Boni & Liveright. 2 vols. $9.
Van Loon, Hendrik Willem. Tolerance. Boni & Liveright. $3.

POETRY

Aiken, Conrad. Priapus and the Pool and Other Poems. Boni & Liveright. $2.
Jeffers, Robinson. Roan Stallion, Tamar and Other Poems. Boni & Liveright. $3.
Taggard, Genevieve, Ed. May Days: An Anthology of Masses and Liberator Verse. Boni & Liveright. $3.

Drama

Vita Brevis

THAT Schnitzler's highly interesting play, "The Call of Life" (Comedy Theater), is one of its author's earlier efforts is revealed by something more than that unnatural heightening of its colors which betrays the exurberance of an undisciplined imagination. Its very theme—the brevity of life and the sin of wasting one of its fleeting moments—is a theme which youth would choose, for it is not toward the end, when ardor has cooled and experience has taught how many promises go unfulfilled, that life seems most precious but rather at the beginning when every knock at the door seems to herald some unknown and delightful visitor. Thus it is that death seems closest to those from whom it is in reality farthest away, and thus that old men with only a year or two to live contentedly doze the months away while youths agonize over a summer lost as though there were not countless summers yet to come. The Schnitzler who wrote "The Call of Life" had not yet arrived at the conviction, so plainly expressed in later plays, that existence is a game played against an antagonist who always wins and whose name is Boredom; rather was he one who did not as yet know life well enough to picture it in a manner wholly convincing but who, perhaps because of that imperfect knowledge, was able to express his passionate conviction that the bitterest of all thoughts is the thought that one may be deprived of the opportunity of knowing it. The sentence, uttered by one in the grip of such a fear, which gives the key to the emotion of the piece is this: "Only those who have much to remember lie quietly in their graves"; and it is plainly the utterance of a man who possessed the two qualities which make life seem most precious. He was young and he was an artist.

The first act of the play is by far the best because it is the simplest and the most clear cut. With a sense of reality never recaptured during the succeeding two acts it presents the picture of a young girl chained to the bedside of a slowly dying father and struggling between the artificial sense of duty to her parent and the natural sense of her right to life. Without, the noise of the passing throng summons her to a participation in the experiences which seem in imagination so unutterably important; within, the old man, intuitively conscious of her struggle, suggests with the logic of age that many years will remain after he is dead; but to her it seems that if this one night and and the lover who awaits her is missed all life will be missed, and the author who understands the father with his head but understands her with his heart sends her to her adventure and her lover. From then on, it must be confessed, the play grows steadily less convincing as a picture of real life; the theme pursued through various intricacies and reintroduced in new surroundings becomes less and less sharply defined, and the incidents grow more and more theatrical. Yet, withal, the theatricalism is of a not wholly unpleasant kind, for it is not the result of insincerity and trickery but of a genuine feeling which cannot quite adequately express itself; and thus, though verisimilitude sometimes fails, the genuineness of the emotion is always clearly and [illegible] evident.

The author has nowhere actually thought his way through, and his sincerity is not of a predominantly intellectual sort. Because his conviction that the call of life is higher than the call of duty is not the reasoned conclusion of a Nietzschian philosopher but the instinctive protest of ardent youth against all that stands between him and his imperious need for experience, he is capable even of a relenting conclusion which pays the tribute of a perfunctory bow to conventional ideals of remorse and atonement; but for the same reason even its theatricalities are touched with poetic passion. Dudley Digges, who directed the production for the Actors Theater, has, so it seems to me, caught perfectly the spirit of the piece and wisely refrained from any attempt to pitch it in too realistic a key. He has permitted the actors, among whom Eva Le Gallienne, Egon Brecher, and Rosalind Fuller deserve especial praise, the slightly romantic and the slightly theatrical gestures with which the eager imagination of the author certainly endowed them, and he has correctly assumed that in the play so presented the sincerity of feeling would be evident behind the artificialities of expression. "The Call of Life" remains one of those works, rarer in the drama than in any other literary genre, whose very imperfections constitute an interesting revelation of the mind of the author. Certainly it is one of the plays of the season most worth seeing.

The enterprising group at the Cherry Lane Theater has undertaken a revival of the ballad-opera "Polly" which John Gay wrote as a sequel to his "Beggar's Opera." Rowdy and inconsequential like its predecessor, it has no song quite so fa[r] as "I could be happy with either were t'other dear cha[r] away" and no divertissement so excruciating as "The Happy Hen," but it is made of the same stuff and inspired with the same resistless flow of animal spirits. Its old tunes, now vehement with the boisterous merriment of the tavern and now wistful with the far-away pathos of the folk ballad, recall in its full vigor the life of a vanished age, and the rank flavor of its cynical humor is as pungent as ever it was.

At the Schildkraut Theater in the Bronx Rudolph Schildkraut is acting in the original Yiddish the fantastic comedy, "The Bronx Express," which once appeared briefly on Broadway. Its racily local humor can often be appreciated even by those who, like myself, do not understand the language; the dream scenes which require that the suggestion of a subway car shall be always present are set with great ingenuity. Mr. Schildkraut, as always, gives an excellent performance.

"Stolen Fruit" (Eltinge Theater) is a highly emotional play taken from the Italian and acted by Ann Harding and Rollo Peters. In spite of an excellent performance it seems to me curiously unreal. "The Crooked Friday" (Bijou Thea[ter]) offered as a vehicle for the English actor Dennis Nielson-Terry, put a yet severer and, indeed, [illegible]

Joseph Wood Krutch

THEATER

Actors' Theatre presents "The Call of Life" by Arthur Schnitzler, English version by Dorothy Donnelly, with a distinguished cast; staged by Dudley Digges; settings by Jo Mielziner; at the Comedy Theatre, 41st West. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

Subscription books open for the season now. Address David Wallace, Actors' Theatre, 39 W. 49th street.

LAST WEEKS

THE GRAND ST. FOLLIES

The Grand Street Follies of 1925

All Performances—Orchestra, $2; Balcony, $1.50.

LECTURES

RAND SCHOOL

7 E. 15th Street

Prof. Henry E. Crampton
"[illegible]"
[illegible] Oct. 25, 1:30 P. M.

V. F. Calverton
"[illegible]"
[illegible], Oct. 27, 8:30 P. M.

Vernon Loggins
"[illegible]"
Thursday, Oct. 29, 8:30 P. M.

Farewell Dinner to

ARTHUR HENDERSON, M. P.

Monday, November 9, 6:30 P.M.

Park Palace, 110th St. and Fifth Ave., New York City

Subject: "Two Arms of British Labor"

Tickets at $2.50 should be secured at once from
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
70 Fifth Ave., New York City

ARTHUR HENDERSON

Member of the MacDonald Labor Government will speak on

"THE BRITISH LABOR MOVEMENT, INDUSTRIAL AND POLITICAL"

At Cooper Union, 4th Ave. and Cooper Sq.

On Friday Evening, Oct. 23, 8:30 P. M.

Tickets 50c. [illegible] reserved section $1.00

ON SALE

Socialist Party 7 East 15th Street New York

[illegible] IS A LIFE LONG [illegible]

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE

[illegible] this

AT COOPER UNION

In the Great Hall.

[illegible]

FRIDAYS: [illegible]

[illegible] Speak-

[illegible]

Cracken, President [illegible]

No-

12.

SATURDAYS: History — "Th[illegible]

[illegible] and Political Conditions, by [illegible] lecture, November 14th.

Cents

Free

THE PEOPLE'S INSTITUTE, 70 Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

[illegible] [illegible] The Nation

International Relations Section

The French Budget for 1926

THE following analysis of the French budget for 1926 with supplementary facts on previous budgets was received recently from the Reference Service on International Affairs of the American Library in Paris, Inc.:

I. General Summary

It will be recalled that the 1925 budget was not adopted by the Senate and Chamber of Deputies until July 14 of this year. Before the overthrow of the Herriot Ministry in April numerous budget projects had been presented but the Senate and Chamber of Deputies could not agree on any one project. No radical change in the previously submitted proposals was possible under the present ministry, for the budget had to be assed before the adjournment of the Senate and Chamber of Deputies in July. Thus, the new finance minister, M. Caillaux, has in his 1926 budget proposal been able for the first time to present completely his own financial program and "a truthful budget comprising all the state expenses."

The 1926 proposal is in great part modeled on the current budget. It is stated that no marked revision of departmental estimates has proved possible. Rather than a few minor reductions in the expenditures of departments an attempt has been made to produce a balanced budget by means of heavier and new taxes.

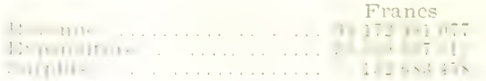
To the expenditure side, under M. Caillaux's project for 1926, are added 1,600 million francs for the incorporation of the war pensions and 360 million francs to cover the expenses arising from the administration of the post, telegraph, and telephone services. While these expenditures are added, important items are withdrawn from the revenue column. The 1,100 million francs forecast in the 1925 budget as the amount to be received from Germany under the Dawes plan is now dropped. Further, the estimated revenue to be derived from the arrears of the special tax on war profits totals 375 million francs less in the 1926 proposal than in the 1925 budget. The revenue to be derived from the liquidation of stocks is similarly estimated at 436 million francs less than forecast for the current year.

This diminution of revenue and increase of expenditure makes at the start a deficit of 3,870 million francs. With all changes in the revenue, including the new taxes, taken into consideration, the 1926 budget shows the following results:

This deficit is to be met by new taxes which are to be secured from "all owners, from all those equally to whom work secures a large income, from those only." Thus the tax on salaries and wages is to be 10 per cent; on salaries and wages combined with invested capital 15 per cent; and on return from movable and immovable capital 20 per cent. These progressive increases, in the words of M. Caillaux, "will maintain between the three sources of revenue that inequality of regime which is the essential condition of fiscal justice." It is widely commented that the burden of the new taxes falls in great part upon the small well-to-do class. On the other hand, the poorer taxpayers unable to work because of age or infirmity are to be exempt from taxation on one-half of their income.

Besides a uniform and marked increase of the income tax schedules the new budget proposes a progressive tax on wealth to an average of 40 per cent in the case of large incomes. This tax is imposed in the form of an increase in the rates of the general income tax, to which it is supplementary.

Finally, heavy taxes are proposed for unproductive capital such as works of art, libraries of rare books, and jewels. When all these new taxes are applied, the budget forecasts a result of:



Expenditures on account of the devastated regions and the interallied debts are to be met by an amortization fund which will be made up of the total of receipts derived from the payments from Germany and, moreover, of recoveries that will be imposed on those who reaped "sudden and unjust profits in the devastated regions." Then, states M. Caillaux, "if the Dawes plan receives, as we should not doubt, its complete application, the annuities which will be received from it, and which from 1930 onward will exceed 1,500 million gold francs, will enable France to meet her engagements."

A direct relation is thus established in the budget between the sum that France will receive from Germany and the payments that may be made on account of the debt owed to the United States and Great Britain. In various quarters this relation of the amortization fund to the negotiations in Washington for a settlement of the debt owed to the United States is freely commented upon.

II. Review of French Budgets

The observation has often been made that even before the dislocation of finances caused by the World War the French Government did not produce a balanced budget. An analysis of all the budgets passed from 1880 to 1913, however, shows that for this period of thirty-two years there was a total deficit of 10,529,000 francs, or, at the 1913 rate of conversion, $2,032,097. During the period 1914-1920 there was naturally a heavy deficit. Since 1922 progress has been made toward a balanced budget, but even for the year 1924 the reporter for the Senate Finance Committee announced June last a deficit of 3,446,-622,014 francs.

For the last few years the balances that are shown are not final and may not in fact be approximate. This results both from supplementary appropriations made after the end of a given fiscal year and from financing which does not appear in the general budget. In particular, mention must be made of the separate budgets for (1) the railways and (2) the post, telegraph, and telephone services. The latter, as already mentioned, is for the first time incorporated in the 1926 budget proposal, where it is placed under the Ministry of Commerce. Finally, recent budgets cannot be estimated with a close degree of proximity because of items such as the results of the Ruhr occupation.

Both before and since the war the state-operated railways have shown a steady deficit. In 1913, for example, the deficit was 79 million francs; in 1923, 1,114 million francs; and in 1924, 458 million francs. For the entire period 1913-1924 the deficit totals 10,395 million francs, or an average of 866,250,000 francs deficit yearly. Thus this item alone would increase appreciably the deficit of the general budget for any given year.

Unlike the railroads the post, telegraph, and telephone services showed a surplus before the war. In 1913 this surplus totaled 132,851,085 francs. Then followed heavy war-time deficits, which continued until 1923, when the adverse balance was only a little over 3 million francs. For the current year, 1925, a surplus of 59 million francs is estimated. The recent material increase in post and telegraph rates in France will account for this surplus.

Finally, in the category of expenses not included in the deficit of the general budget must be mentioned the sums spent in restoring the so-called devastated regions. Up to the first of

The Child, the Parent and the World They Live In

THE FIRST PARENTS' CONFERENCE on the study and bringing up of children will be held at the Hotel Waldorf-Astoria, New York City, October 26-28.

Among the speakers are: Dr. Beatrice Hinkle, author of "The Re-creating of the Individual"; Dorothy Canfield Fisher, lecturer and novelist; Dr. Miriam Van Waters, whose "Youth in Conflict" has caused such a stir; William T. Russell, dean of Teachers' College, New York City; Mrs. Helen T. Woolley, assistant director of the Merrill-Palmer School, Detroit; and Dr. Frankwood E. Williams, Medical Director, National Committee for Mental Hygiene.

A Dinner on Oct. 28 will discuss "Freedom of the Child—What Does It Mean?" Speakers: Angelo Patri, Dorothy Canfield Fisher, Miriam Van Waters, Dr. C. W. Kimmins.

For details, write to the Child Study Association of America, Inc., 54 West 74th Street, New York City, under whose auspices it is being held.

To know the theatre is to know all the Arts better

FIND, if you can, another Art than the Theatre which includes painting, sculpture, design, costume, music, the dance, poetry, pathos, humor, tragedy—the summing up of life and the history of life.

Theatre Arts Monthly is the standard authority and guide on the arts, the technique, the personalities and the practical work of the theatre in every civilized country. To read it is to know all the arts better.

In This Issue

The life work of Robert Edmond Jones —"The Theatre of War"—and more than thirty features and fine illustrations. Subscription only $4 a year. Single copies Fifty Cents. Send us this advertisement and you will receive the current number free.

THEATRE ARTS MONTHLY

7 EAST 42ND STREET NEW YORK

SEX AND CIVILIZATION

By PAUL BOUSFIELD $3.00

"The book has won half a dozen rereadings from me in the last few months . . . is of interest to the layman, and it is indispensable both to the analyst of human behavior and to the feminist."—Alice Beal Parsons in The Nation.

LYSISTRATA. By ANTHONY M. LUDOVICI $1.00

A man's view of the dangerous trend of modern feminism.

HYPATIA. By MRS. BERTRAND RUSSELL $1.00

A spirited answer to the above from an extreme feminist.

Send for a full list of the books in the TODAY AND TOMORROW SERIES to

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Avenue, New York

THE NEGRO YEAR BOOK

1925-1926 EDITION ON SALE

The standard work of reference on all matters relating to the Negro. General and special bibliographies. Presents a succinct, comprehensive and impartial review of the events of each year as they affect the interests and indicate the progress of the Negro race. In addition to its interest to the general reader, the book is especially adapted for use in schools where historical and sociological courses on the Negro are given.

Price, paper cover, $1.00; board cover, $1.50

NEGRO YEAR BOOK COMPANY

TUSKEGEE INSTITUTE, ALABAMA

Religion, Commerce, Liberty, 1685-1793:
A Record of a Time of Storm and Change

This is a comprehensive survey of the 18th Century up to the year 1793, largely using contemporary sources. To the general index is added an [illegible] and an index to the four maps.

$5.00

Superstition or Rationality in the Action for Peace, Etc.: A Criticism of Jurisprudence

By VILHELM LUNDSTEDT.

The [illegible] are mingled with the grossest superstition. These false [illegible]

$4.50

The Ascent of Man by Means of Natural Selection

By [illegible]

The [illegible] tural Selection. [illegible]

$3.75

LONGMANS, GREEN & CO.

55 FIFTH AVENUE NEW YORK CITY

January last some 60 billion francs had been paid in indemnities to those who lost their property in the war; 13 billion francs had been spent on reconstruction, restoration of public property, and railways; 36 billion francs for injuries suffered by individuals; and 19 billion francs for accumulated interest. These expenditures, totaling 129 billion francs, are considered as "recoverable," that is, they are to be defrayed by Germany in accordance with the Treaty of Versailles. The French Finance Minister now estimates that the sums yet to be paid in indemnities in the devastated regions do not exceed 20 billion paper francs. The new budget proposal incorporates this expenditure in the general budget as well as in a special budget.

III. French Taxes

The principal source of revenue from taxation in France arises from direct and revenue taxes. Next in importance comes the revenue derived from registration and from a special tax collected upon payment of all accounts. The following table shows in full the different sources of revenue derived from taxation and the importance of each source:

Kind of revenue	1913	1920	1921	1922	1923	1924	1925	1926
		(in millions of francs)						proposed estimate
Direct contributions, accumulated taxes, income tax	634	1,929	3,495	3,977	4,736	4,897	6,171	8,494
Registration tax	884	2,718	2,765	2,880	3,172	3,661	5,[illegible]	5,678
Stamp tax	241	517	565	617	698	595	976	1,324
Tax on income transmissions	10	25	14	[illegible]	[illegible]	98	187	248
Tax on income derived from movable property	138	568	926	1,018	1,166	1,683	1,849	3,171
Luxury tax, tax on business turnover*	...	942	1,911	2,301	3,041	4,110	4,460	4,950
Customs tax	756	1,596	1,197	1,615	1,610	1,604	2,305	2,221
Revenue from indirect contributions (includes revenue from duties levied on colonial products, automobiles, petroleum, wines, coffee, etc.)	720	2,612	2,[illegible]	3,[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	3,[illegible]	6,811
Sugar and stockpiling	60	444	567	764	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	345
Revenue from fiscal monopolies	611	1,582	1,711	1,803	2,035	2,252	2,639	2,756
Total	4,135	12,933	15,813	17,479	20,591	25,210	28,017	32,998

A comparison of the total estimates of the 1925 budget with the 1926 proposal [illegible] in the latter of 5,181 million francs.

* [illegible]

On the basis of taxes now in existence the tax per capita in France was 524 francs in 1923, and in 1924 around 637 francs. The new taxes proposed by M. Caillaux in the 1926 budget will, it is estimated in certain quarters, raise the taxation to 1,000 francs per capita. These figures do not, of course, take into consideration indirect taxes. Nor do they include local taxes, which, as the French contend, materially add to their taxation. It is generally pointed out in the press outside of France, however, that despite the increase in taxation, direct and indirect, no drag on industrial or agricultural development has resulted. The lack of unemployment, the surplus of exports over imports, and other factors are often commented upon as being signs of a general prosperity.

IV. The 1926 Budget Proposal

The new taxes and other features of the 1926 budget proposal have been explained in some detail. The proposal itself is now outlined. As is evident from the table given below, no marked decreases in expenditure have been made in the case of departmental estimates.

[illegible] Estimated Expenditure of the [illegible] Budget for 1925 and the Caillaux Proposal for 1926

Ministries and Services	Credits granted for 1925	Credits proposed for 1926	Differences in 1926 proposal
Ministry of [illegible] { Finances / Liberated Regions	22,230,547,105	[illegible]	+1,339,535,795
	533,187,645	[illegible]	[illegible]817,145
Ministry of Justice { Judicial Services / Penitentiary Service	90,259,882	90,702,400	+442,518
	[illegible]	57,175,700	—128,600
Ministry of Foreign Affairs	[illegible]	142,363,200	+10,623,453
Ministry of [illegible]	341,962,789	334,750,400	—7,212,389
Ministry of War	[illegible]	3,967,113,719	+500,164,140
Ministry of Marine	[illegible]	1,496,507,400	+244,533,935
Ministry of Public Instruction and Arts... { Public Instruction / Arts / Technical Instruction	[illegible]	1,586,7[illegible]	+2,674,607
	[illegible]	70,561,200	—4,306,500
	[illegible]	97,289,100	—20,278,017
Ministry of Commerce, Industry and Posts, Telegraphs and Telephones Services	28,839,938	387,353,100	+358,513,162
Ministry of Labor, Health, Social Work	[illegible]	[illegible]	—12,978,880
Ministry of Colonies	[illegible]	270,266,009	+16,152,916
Ministry of Agriculture	227,682,420	217,923,000	—9,759,420
Ministry of Public Works..... { Ports, Fisheries, Merchant Marine,	1,469,463,125	[illegible]	+87,926,575
	281,245,743	288,174,100	+6,928,357
Ministry of Pensions	152,581,700	152,575,000	—6,700
	241,940,240	646,603,400	+404,663,160
Total	[illegible]	36,039,407,619	+2,901,370,284

V. The French Public Debt

For the last three years the sums devoted in the French budgets to the public debt have increased. Further the fundamental principles of a balanced budget are now in part determined by the maturity of internal and external obligations. In July, September, and December of this year, for example, 3,290 million francs, 8 billion francs, and 10 billion francs respectively fall due on the internal debt. It is estimated, however, that not over one-third of these obligations due will be called for by the present holders.

The Internal Debt

The French internal debt is divided into three classes, the annual sums required to meet which are as follows:

	Annuities due [illegible]	Annuities due April 30, 1925	Difference
Perpetual [illegible]	[illegible]	7,141,232,802	+169,874,046
Short term debt	2,139,230,140	2,692,869,140	+553,639,000
[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Total	[illegible]	12,306,685,942	+474,808,046

Announcement

Chairmen of Entertainment Committees:

BEFORE MAKING FINAL ARRANGEMENTS FOR YOUR SOCIAL AFFAIR, DINNER, DANCE, SMOKER, OR SUPPER DANCE, SEE OUR BANQUET AND BALL ROOMS. CHARGES NOT HIGHER THAN ELSEWHERE.

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

THEODORE KEMM, Managing Owner

GRAMERCY 4900 TO 4907

accept nothing but

Non Depressant
non Habit Forming
In Convenient
Aluminum Boxes
At every drug store

3 Tablets 15c
10 Tablets 40c

Midol for HEADACHE

GENERAL DRUG CO., - 94 N. Moore Street, New York

MOTHER JONES' AUTOBIOGRAPHY is the thrilling story of a remarkable woman who has given her life to the struggle of the workers for a living wage and decent working conditions. First-hand material here for the student. CLARENCE DARROW writes the introduction. Cloth, illustrated, $1.50 postpaid.
Charles H. Kerr & Company, 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

Talk It Over With HARRY KELLY

Is it possible to live in the country, yet be near to the city?
Is the cost of living lower? Why? Who own homes at Mt. Airy?
How much capital is needed to buy ¼ or ½ acre at Mt. Airy?
What about water and electricity?
Can you help me finance building my home?
These and many other questions will be answered for you when you drop in to talk it over with

HARRY KELLY, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York
Chelsea 0432

SOCIAL PROGRESS

A Hand-Book of the Liberal Movement

So many things of interest and importance are brought up in SOCIAL PROGRESS that it is impossible to even outline them all. The book is divided into two parts; the first part, "Causes of Discontent," takes up the Profit System, Oppression by Government, Attempted Reforms, Class Distinctions, The Industrial Struggle, and a noteworthy chapter, "War Breeds Injustice."

The second part of the book is called "The Liberal Movement" and in it is defined and discussed every phase and manifestation of the liberal movement from the American Peace Award, Birth Control, Child Labor and Danbury Hatters case, to the Ku Klux Klan, Psycho-Analysis, Syndicalism, The Youth Movement, and Woman Suffrage.

Also under the Liberal Movement is a detailed description of organizations devoted to Reforming the Social Order. Also the history and interpretation of Political Parties—Prohibition, Greenback, Socialist, Socialist Labor, Progressive, Communist, Farmer-Labor, Proletarian, etc.

Lastly the Library for Liberals contains what the title implies—affording a bibliography of books that promote an understanding of the present social system and of the theories that aim to establish a new and better order.

There is nothing of significance and interest in the progress of the Social Order that is omitted from "SOCIAL PROGRESS" whether it is the trial of Scott Nearing, Victor Berger, Carlo Tresca, etc., or Strikes, Pullman, Mother Rocks, Homestead, Calumet, Ludlow, or the Anti-Trust Laws, to the long list of cases in the courts that evidence Class Distinction.

There are but an approximation to the vast amount of subject matter that has been assembled and clarified.

Bound in cloth, 6 x 9, 342 pages. $2.50

Advisory Board

[illegible] NEARING [illegible]

[illegible] Editor

THE ARBITRATOR

114 East 31st Street New York City

The External Debt

The external debt is divided into two classes: political and commercial. The political debt includes those sums owed to the American and British governments, an accord for the settlement of which is now being negotiated.

The principal of the debt owed by France to the American Government as of April 30, 1925, amounted to 2,933 million dollars. If an interest of 3½ per cent, together with ½ per cent for amortization purposes, is paid on this debt, as in the case of the Belgian debt, with and after the eleventh year a sum of 128 million dollars would have to be paid annually. For the first year a sum of some 38 million dollars would fall due, and this would be augmented until it reached the sum of 128 million dollars.

The principal of the debt owed to Great Britain as of April 30, 1925, amounted to 637,828,000 pounds sterling. At the recent conference in London a plan was agreed upon whereby France may pay 12,500,000 pounds sterling annually to Great Britain for 62 years irrespective of the annuities she may receive under the Dawes plan. A partial moratorium may apply until 1930. The British Government, however, has reserved the right to receive payments which are proportional and pari passu with those that France may agree to make to the American Government. Thus it is not possible in either case to estimate the exact amount that future French budgets must provide for the payment of the so-called political debt.

The present situation of the commercial debt is illustrated in tabular form as follows:

Commercial Debt

	Nature of Debt	Kind of currency	Amount of Principal in currency		Yearly annuities estimated in
United States	Loan 1916	Dollars	8,477,[illegible]	[illegible]	114,927	[illegible]
	Loan 1918	Dollars	75,896,000	70,25[illegible]	[illegible]	94,003,000
	Loans 1919	Dollars	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
	Loans for purchase of Marseille-Bordeaux	Dollars	40,586,000	40,5[illegible]	43,887,672	[illegible]
	Bonds in remittance for stu[illegible]	Dollars	407,341,145	407,341,145	[illegible]	[illegible]
	Balance of the Anglo-French...	Dollars	13,850	13,850	11,232	[illegible]
	[illegible]	Dollars	2,110,000	2,110,000	[illegible]	2,291,000
England	Bonds issued in England	Pounds	[illegible]	4,400,000	[illegible]	28,431,000
	Treasury Loans [illegible]
	England	Pounds	52,500,000	47,00[illegible]	212,11[illegible]	1[illegible]17,000
	Cession of English stocks	Pounds	7,47[illegible]	6,726,069	3,277,200	[illegible]
Bank Credits	Spain	Pesetas	339,500	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
	Netherlands	Florins	54,300,000	54,300,000	23,100,000	[illegible]
	Argentine	Gold Pesos	19,425,795	19,425,795	13,598,060	17,182,000
	Uruguay	Urug. Piastre	15,000,000	10,50[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
	Canada	Canadian $	5,730,[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	124,000
	Egypt	Egyptian £	2,000,000	1,000,000	7,072,500	[illegible]
Japan	Loans floated in Japan	Yen	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
	Treasury Bonds issued in Japan	Yen	20,000,000	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
	Total		[illegible]	[illegible]	$83,73[illegible]	[illegible]

VI. Credits of the French Government

Finally, in giving a general view of the problems facing French finance the sums owed to France must be taken into consideration. The greatest of her foreign debtors is the former Russian Government and certain intermediary governments succeeding it. Altogether France is owed 16,313,251,000 francs, of which no great part will be realized at least in the near future.

Table of Credits of France with Foreign Governments as of April 30, 1925

	Credits in French currency Francs	Credits in Foreign currency	Against credits in French currency Francs	Against credits in foreign currency
Russia (old regime)	6,411,000,000*	[illegible]	141,453,031	[illegible]
Russia (different governments)	[illegible]	10,553,145 Roubles	[illegible]	[illegible]
Belgium	3,061,000,000	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Serb-Croat-Slovene Kingdom	1,940,000,000†	[illegible]	[illegible]81,357	17,226,719 Dinars
Rumania	1,055,400,000	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Greece	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]92,937 Drachmas
Poland	960,000,000	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Czecho-slovakia	490,900,000	$1,149,212	[illegible]	[illegible]
Italy	1,148,000,000	[illegible] £18,8[illegible]	81,614,137	Lire [illegible]
Portugal	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Esthonia	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Latvia	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Lithuania	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Hungary	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Austria	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Georgia	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Albania	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]
Total	16,313,251[illegible]	[illegible]	[illegible]48,525	[illegible]

[illegible]

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1925 No. 3148

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 501
EDITORIALS:
Bread and Water 504
Guilt by Association 505
Grammar vs. Idiom 506
The Nation's Poetry Prize 506
"FLAMING COFFINS." By Basil N. Bass 507
THE WATER-POWER FIGHT IN CALIFORNIA. By Harry W. Laidler 508
LIFE OR DEATH FOR THE LEAGUE. By Brent Dow Allinson 511
WALTER HINES PAGE—PATRIOT OR TRAITOR? By C. Hartley Grattan 512
FASCISM AT WORK. By Thorsten Sellin 513
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By The Drifter 514
CORRESPONDENCE 514
BOOKS, MUSIC, PLAYS:
I Mourn the Dead. By Leon Serabian Herald 517
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 517
Lodge on Wilson. By William Hard 517
Young Poe. By Joseph Wood Krutch 518
David Garnett's Third. By Laura Benét 519
Criticism by Sociology. By V. F. Calverton 520
Books in Brief 520
Music: Bayreuth Today: An Impression. By Pitts Sanborn 520
Drama: Unspacious Days. By Joseph Wood Krutch 521
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Press Comments in Bulgaria 523
Censorship in Bulgaria 524
A Bulgarian Execution 524

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors
LEWIS S. GANNETT
ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor
FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor
MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors
JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN
NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS, mediating between Greece and Bulgaria, is in a fair way to stop a promising young war. Border raids have occurred before; sometimes they have led to wars and sometimes not. In this instance Bulgaria appealed to the League, and Greece reluctantly accepted its intervention. The League will have difficulty in determining who fired the first gun; we may, in fact, never know what truth lies in the mess of contradictory assertions made by the spokesmen of the two governments. But the League will, we do not doubt, force these two unruly little peoples to keep the peace, and in so far as it brings the weight of European authority to bear upon their dispute it fulfils its destiny and justifies its existence.

GREECE IS LITTLE, but France is big. Furthermore, France is not fighting a member of the League like Bulgaria, but a ward of the League, Syria. "The well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization," says the Covenant of the League. And it continues:

> Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a Mandatory.

All Syria, apparently, is aflame against the French methods of rendering "administrative advice and assistance." A rigid censorship has suppressed the details. We know that France has lost 6,626 men (mostly colonial troops) killed, wounded, and missing in suppressing the revolt of the Jebel Druses. Now the further news leaks out that the uprising has spread to Damascus. Neighboring villages had harbored Druse rebels; the French, in retaliation, gave their Circassian troops permission to plunder these places. They plundered—and killed as they went. And the villages rose, and the Moslem quarters of Damascus rose with them. Of the uprising we have no direct news, but of the suppression we learn more. Artillery and airplanes bombarded the rebellious districts; fires raged unchecked; 4,000 Moslems were killed—and on top of that the French demanded of the natives a fine of 100,000 gold pounds and 3,000 rifles, under penalty of renewal of the bombardment. Thus they execute, as agents of the League, the "sacred trust of civilization."

IF THE LEAGUE MEASURED UP to its job it would order France out of Syria at once. This is not rendering advice and assistance; it is expressing the brute force of modern imperialism and using the humanitarian cloak of the League to disguise the rottenness. France should never have been allowed in Syria; when the League gave her the mandate, against the Syrian will, it made itself a tool for fulfilment of the sordid bargaining of the war-time secret treaties. Let the men who see in the League the panacea for the world's ills have the courage of their convictions; let them turn from Bulgaria and Greece to demand that the League act to stop this murderous war carried on by its agents in its name. That would, of course, hurt the prestige of France; but it would not hurt France. The French Cabinet might not have been forced to resign if it had saved the billions of francs a year which keep Syria crushed.

MR. MELLON and his well-to-do friends, aided and abetted by practically the entire metropolitan press of the country, are engaged in their annual effort to reduce the taxes of the rich under guise of lessening those of the poor. What Mr. Mellon and his coterie are after, of course, is to reduce the surtaxes and get rid of the federal inheritance levies. In order to obtain these concessions for the rich, the bait of general reductions is dangled before the public and played up in the newspapers. When Mr. Mellon's recent proposals to the Ways and Means Committee of the House were made public, for instance, the New York Times boldly presented them under a flaring head: "Treasury Asks Income-Tax Cuts for All." Obviously money is being spent like water in this effort to make rich men's exemptions seem like poor men's benefits. The average man is not readily interested in taxes, and when a petition is obtained for the abolition of federal inheritance taxes, bearing the signatures of the Governors of thirty-two States, it is evident that somebody has put up the money for an energetic and concerted campaign. Likewise with surtaxes. Big business is acutely interested in lower surtaxes; [illegible] spending thousands of dollars to prove how advantageous they would be to the poor man. But the poor man, who is not directly concerned at all, has no one to argue his indirect but vital interest in a taxation policy based on common sense and social justice.

BEHIND MR. MELLON'S PLAN for lowering slightly the rate on small incomes is the naked and all-important proposal to slash the surtaxes by about one-half. He would have them vary from 1 per cent on $12,000 up to 20 per cent on $150,000 or more, instead of at the present rate of 1 per cent on $10,000 up to 40 per cent on $500,000 or more. In spite of all the newspaper palaver, a reduction in the lower classifications of the income tax is of almost no consequence, while a cut in the surtaxes (which is being kept well in the background) is of vast fiscal and social import. The fact is that the poor man doesn't pay income taxes at all. The number of persons who make returns is about 7,000,000, or only a sixth of the total wage-earners. To those who pay small income taxes the exact amount is of trifling importance, although the newspapers would represent it as the all-absorbing question of the year. In 1922, to give exact figures, 6,787,481 persons made income-tax returns. Of this number 4,601,079 paid on net incomes of $3,000 or less, and they paid only $47,810,826 out of a total of $861,057,308. In other words, neither the poor nor those of medium income have any personal interest in income taxes. They pay their taxes in another way—in the prices of the necessaries of life. And Mr. Mellon and his well-to-do friends are not proposing to lessen these a jot or a tittle by lowering the tariff or curbing our outrageous industrial profiteering. Instead they are engaged in deceiving the public into believing that lower taxes for the rich will be the salvation of persons of small means.

SPEAKING OF SECRETARY MELLON reminds us that the Attorney General, Mr. Sargent, has declined to take any action in response to the unanimous demand of the Federal Trade Commission that the government proceed legally against the Aluminum Trust, of which Mr. Mellon is the chief owner. What would you? Could one member of the Cabinet be so discourteous and ungentlemanly as to set the machinery of justice at work against another? Perish the thought. Cabinets are not built that way, nor family loyalties. Furthermore, Mr. Coolidge's administration is committed to the principle that government shall not interfere with business. For that reason he has made over various commissions, supposedly including the Federal Trade Commission. Its outbreak was not at all according to Hoyle, and we have no doubt that, like his Attorney General, Mr. Coolidge will treat this recommendation with contemptuous silence. Nor do we believe that there is any truth in the Washington report that the President may order his Attorney General to run for Senator in Vermont in opposition to Senator Dale, with whom the Administration is at odds, thus removing Mr. Sargent from the field of criticism and bringing in a new Attorney General who could lay the blame on his predecessor. Mr. Coolidge is out to make his government the tool of big business, and we do not believe he cares who knows it or what anybody says.

AN ALMOST INCREDIBLY BAD APPOINTMENT to the United States Senate has been made by Governor Jackson of Indiana. He has paid some old political debts by sending to Washington Arthur R. Robinson, whose devotion to the Ku Klux Klan is his chief recommendation. Mr. Robinson is not a lawyer of high standing, nor has he to his credit any accomplishments in civil life that would warrant this great distinction being conferred upon him. He was, however, the right-hand man of Governor Jackson when the latter ran for the governorship last year. Both men are capitalizing their Klan alliance and their war records for political purposes. Not unnatural is the report that the Republican dovecotes in Indiana are tremendously fluttered. It was supposed that ex-Senator Beveridge would be Governor Jackson's choice; indeed, it is widely stated that Governor Jackson had given his word to this effect to a prominent Indiana newspaper-owner. The Robinson appointment may well spell turmoil in Indiana politics. It is inconceivable that the anti-Klan Republicans will permit his election next fall for the remainder of the late Senator Ralston's unexpired term. If, as is reported, the Democrats are planning to put into the field so high-grade a man as Evans Woollen of the Fletcher Savings and Trust Company of Indianapolis, they should have an excellent chance of purging the State of its present disgraceful Klan control.

THE NEW YORK MUNICIPAL CAMPAIGN is dragging to its tedious conclusion without a ray of light save that afforded by Norman Thomas, the Socialist candidate, the only one who is saying anything worth while, the man who would be elected if candidates were chosen for their individual worth instead of party labels. Mr. Thomas has courage, vision, and understanding of principles; he has talked facts and issues. Mr. Waterman, manufacturer of excellent pens, has revealed abysmal ignorance of the real situation. He has even made the mistake of not giving to his campaign a flavor of the fusion which was successful in the past. As a campaigner he has, moreover, been able to thrill nobody. Doubtless he would make a conscientious mayor if elected, but he will be buried by his Tammany Hall rival, Senator Walker. The best that can be said of Mr. Walker is that he is better than Mayor Hylan, but being shrewder and abler he is the more dangerous. When he is elected the question of interest will be how much this ex-piano player in vaudeville will be the creature of "Al" Smith, and how much he will stand on his own feet. That the metropolis with its six millions of people should be reduced to the choice of Waterman or Walker—that is what it comes down to—demonstrates the abasement of civic government in America and should increase the demand for commission government in New York. Meanwhile it is a melancholy spectacle to see the New York World and many old-time reformers repeating the old appeal that Tammany is no longer what it used to be, but really a very nice organization.

GENERAL J. V. CHARTERIS, the former head of the British Intelligence Service who regaled the National Arts Club by telling how he invented the story that the Germans were boiling their dead for fats and fertilization, celebrated his departure from New York by adding what appears to be peace-time welshing to his war-time sins. At least his statement that his confidence was violated is contradicted by the reporter of the New York Times who wrote the story; in part by his own lecture manager; and by the president of the club. The general insisted, on leaving, that he had merely told the story to illustrate the point that only truth pays in propaganda! The excuse does not ring true. What propaganda was put forth by either side that was true? It certainly was not those horrible tales circulated by the Germans that the British and French were gouging out the eyes of German wounded or pouring molten lead into them. There was, of course, no scintilla of truth in the Allied allegations that the Germans cut off women's breasts and children's hands in Belgium. Even the lie that the Germans crucified a Canadian soldier was officially denied in the Canadian Parliament, after the war. No, the whole business of propaganda in war time is as foul and as dirty as any ever invented by man. And it is disgusting that a British general, caught in a bad fix because of his own foul acts and loose tongue, dares not face the music.

BRITISH TORYDOM is out to make a name for the British Communists: it has begun raiding them. There is nothing like a raid, a deportation, or a meeting broken up by the police to advertise little extremist groups, as American experience abundantly proves. One seldom hears of Communists in this country except when they are being jailed, excluded, or otherwise suppressed. Then they win sympathy. Mr. Joynson Hicks, the British Home Secretary, has been having "red scares" in all his recent public speeches, but no one paid much attention to them until he admitted a group of Liverpool gangsters to his special constabulary in order to protect the country against Reds. Now he has arrested eight Communist leaders and confiscated an edition of the Workers' Weekly. As a result Arthur Henderson, Jr., has volunteered to act as counsel for the Communists and some millions of stolid Britishers are curious to know what the Communists really wrote or said.

SO THE NOBLE Mr. Coolidge has refused to consider Ralph B. Strassburger's request that the Countess Karolyi be permitted to reenter this country to visit his family. What a chivalrous and manly government we have! It trembles before one brave, honest, and lovely woman. Were we the Countess we should feel flattered by the thought that our presence here might set the American Republic rocking on its foundations. Being Americans, we feel humiliation and disgust at this fresh stupidity of "Nervous Nellie," as our Secretary of State is correctly dubbed. It is another case in which men who by the accident of public life have been put into offices far beyond their abilities and deserts reveal their failure to understand the principles which lie at the bottom of the great American experiment.

"PROBABLY THE QUICKEST WAY to appreciate the power which the presence of (poison) gas has . . . is to picture the fear which a human being has of having his breathing interfered with by smothering or choking and the instinctive dread . . . of losing his vision." This quotation is taken not from an editorial denouncing the use of poison gas but from the instruction book of the Chemical Warfare Service of the United States Army. The little book is explicit on the kinds of gases, from the comparatively harmless tear-gas to "white phosphorus," the "burns" from which "are extremely severe on the body" and "exceedingly painful." Nor does the Chemical Warfare Service lose sight of the fact that poison gas is useful not only in war time but in time of peace, for the prompt dispersal of mobs and for rendering uninhabitable any given locality for the space of a week or so. A most versatile and obliging weapon, in short, and one adapted to all kinds and conditions of men—and even women and children, for they are included in this invaluable little book. Major General Fries, head of the Chemical Warfare Service, when taken to task for the document by Collier's and the New York World, replied with righteous indignation and an evident inability to see what all the fuss was about. Poison gas? said he. Why not? A humane and sensible method of getting rid of an inconvenience; far neater than drawing and quartering, the thumbscrew, the rack, the water-cure, and skinning alive. War is war, and peace, occasionally, is war also. "Any man, if he be honest," said the general, "cannot but decide with us that the world needs gas more than any other one thing to preserve law and order."

THE ORGANIZATION of a national committee of 100 to induce Congress to prohibit the inter-State traffic in revolvers, especially to bar them from the mails, is a step forward. There is no reason why the purchase of such deadly weapons should be so easy. Crime statistics show that 90 per cent of the murders that take place are committed by the use of the pistol, and every year there are hundreds of cases of accidental homicide because somebody did not know that his revolver was loaded. The existing situation is particularly hard upon those States like New York in which there is a law to prohibit the sale of pistols except upon the presentation of a license. The police chiefs of this State declare that the law, enforced here, is nullified by the ease with which people cross over into New Jersey or Connecticut and purchase weapons, or simply remit to any one of a large number of firms which advertise the sale of their weapons by mail. It will not be easy to draw a law that will permit exceptions for public officers and bank guards, but soon even these officials may get on without revolvers as do the London police.

GENERAL RAJA SIR HARI SINGH has been confirmed by the Government of India in the succession to the throne of the Jammu and Kashmir State. Thus the old gives way to the new. The late Maharaja, a Hindu of the old style, to whom religion was the chief goal of life, regarded Kashmir, "the home of the gods," as a trust for Hindus and Hinduism. He was hospitable to European visitors but hostile to their capital. He suffered none but Indians to own real property in his state; he allowed no foreign money to develop the resources of Kashmir; he prevented the building of a railroad there. His nephew, the new ruler, is his antithesis. Hari Singh, as English in his ways as his environment and meager education will permit, has always been expected to grant the British the concessions which his uncle denied. He owed to the Government of India his original nomination as heir, and the recent scandal in which he figured as "Mr. A." put him still more in the power of the British. His opponents petitioned the Government to withdraw the succession from this irreligious caste-violator and to bestow it upon the late Maharaja's adopted son and "spiritual heir." By treating this petition, supported as it was by certain Hindu princes, with more outward honor than it inwardly inspired, the British have made Hari Singh more conscious than ever of his dependence. It would not be in keeping with their past policy to neglect such an opportunity to exact special privileges from the new ruler. So Kashmir, important politically as a bulwark of India against Russia, valuable economically as the home of water-power and mineral wealth, will be "civilized" into the British Empire.

Bread and Water

DESPITE all the agonizings of the trust-busters—all the Sherman laws and Clayton acts, all the snooperies of the Federal Trade Commission, and all the solemn moralizings of Mr. Hoover, Mr. Coolidge, and the massed cohorts of Rotary in favor of stalwart individualism—the control of American industry through the medium of corporate monopoly moves majestically onward. Athwart these laws and eternal principles it rides like a bull through a china shop. In the past few months we have noted the Nickel Plate railroad merger, the new billion-dollar consolidation in bituminous coal, and now Mr. Ward's four-hundred-million dollar bread combination, which in 157 factories from coast to coast will produce 5,500,000 loaves of bread a day.

Mr. Ward's coup is but the keystone in an arch which has been building steadily for a generation. It is a consolidation of three major consolidations—the Ward Baking Company, the Continental Baking Corporation, and the General Baking Company. Each of the three has snowballed up from combinations of small local bakeries. Mr. W. B. Ward has been the prime mover in the development of the first two, and now he has taken into camp his chief competitor—the General Baking Company—in the giant parent company recently incorporated in Baltimore to be known as the General Baking Corporation. The first member of the trinity operates 18 bakeries in 14 cities. Its profits were $2,800,000 in 1923, $4,300,000 in 1924, and are expected to reach $5,500,000 in 1925. The second member—the Continental—operates 104 bakeries in 82 cities in the United States and Canada. It earned $4,000,000 last year, and is expected to salt away $7,000,000 this year. But to the General Baking Company goes the prize. In 1916 its stock sold for $2 a share. Then came the war, which, with the limitation on wheat prices combined with no limitation on bread prices, proved a bonanza to the bakers. Their war profits were enormous. Returns of 200, 300, even 400 per cent were officially reported in Senate Document 259. The deflation of 1921 carried wheat down to pre-war levels, but the price of bread remained virtually unchanged. As a result of these happy circumstances the General Baking Company earned in 1922 117 per cent net on each share of its original common stock, and declared a 100 per cent stock dividend in January of that year, followed by a 200 per cent stock dividend in December. Thus Christmas found the stockholder who held one share at New Year's with six shares tucked away in his safe-deposit box. These shares were recently selling at close to $200 on the New York Stock Exchange, and in the Baltimore merger they are being turned in at the rate of $225 per share. Six times $225 is $1,350—so what was worth $2 in 1916 is worth $1,350 today!

In the first ten years of its existence the General Baking Company paid out $6,500,000 in interest and dividends on a property valued at a little above $3,000,000 at the time of its consolidation. It is the old and familiar story of capitalizing excess earning power. Preferred stock and bonds are issued to cover the valuation of the physical and tangible property. Common stock without a cent of real value behind it is broadcast on the speculative hope of extra profits by virtue of the consolidation. The hope is realized (the war being a leading factor in the current case), bond interest and preferred stock are paid, a nice slice is larded back into the business, and still some remains for dividends on the common stock. When the rate becomes fantastic, a stock dividend is declared. In order further to confuse the issue of the rate of return on the tangible property, some bright man invented no-par-value stock, which measures dividends in dollars per share, not in percentum rates at all. The General Baking Company has thus followed the usual method of corporate growth, with perhaps rather more than the usual length of snout in the trough.

So these three thriving youngsters are to combine into one happy family. According to the computations of Basil Manly of the People's Legislative Service, the consolidated balance sheet—with common stocks priced at marked quotations—will start its career with some $200,000,000 of water. That is, the net tangible assets are $200,000,000 less than the market values of the issued securities, which means that those logical forces which find expression on the stock exchange are firmly of the opinion that the price of bread in the immediate future, as measured against modern machine methods applied to the cost of producing the same, will result in a margin which will not only pay handsome returns on the tangible investment but handsome returns on a $200,000,000 section of water as well.

The spokesmen of the new combination allege with a fine flow of logic that there is and can be no question of monopoly. Hosts of small independent bakeries remain outside the combination, and if worst comes to worst the thrifty housewife can always bake at home. It is true that bread prices charged by the trust are roughly checked by the prices charged by independent bakeries, but costs of production in small inefficient local shops are always higher than those accumulated under machine quantity production. The trust has thus a bigger margin to play with, has immense reserves of capital behind it to throw from one local battlefront to another, and can readily eliminate and control the market. In modern apartment cliff dwellings, furthermore, home baking tends increasingly to become a lost art, and it would take incredibly high bread prices before uncounted matrons would consent to resume it—granting they had facilities for its resumption. In other words, while the monopoly is far from complete in theory, it should operate effectively for all practical purposes.

The final result is that the American consumer will pay about as much for his loaf of bread relative to the cost of living as he has paid in the past, while the trust absorbs every crumb of profit which modern machinery and scientific invention have made possible. Technical progress thus ceases to become a common human inheritance, but is astutely drained off into the pockets of those who, it is to be feared, do not know a British thermal unit from a monkey wrench.

In England they do it better. That is, the consumer does. There great cooperative bakeries have arisen, taking full advantage of technical invention and quantity production. Such turn out a sound loaf at manufacturing cost plus not above 6 per cent on tangible investment. The average price for a larger and more wholesome loaf than the ruling American one is now about five cents. Against the sea wall of such unsportsmanlike competition a bread trust can but dash its head in vain.

Guilt by Association

FROM the time of her graduation from Wellesley Charlotte Anita Whitney has been one of those troublesome people who not only deny that we live in the best of all possible worlds but want to do something about it. As a social worker in California she helped abate gambling, bawdy-houses, and other evils. In the course of time she began to wonder whether the spoiling of people's lives was due altogether to their own private waywardness and perversity—to question the predominance of the profit motive in our law and living. She joined the Socialist Party.

The Russian Revolution inflamed the imaginations of the more vigorous members of the Socialist Party. Its Left Wing engaged enthusiastically in formulating new principles, but the center remained static and the party split into three pieces: a remnant still calling itself the Socialist Party, the Communist Party, and the Communist Labor Party.

Left Wing doctrines had made headway in Local Oakland, to which Anita Whitney belonged. Its delegates (she was not one) were among those who, ejected from a national convention of the Socialist Party, went to another hall and formed the Communist Labor Party. Cast out of the Socialist Party, Local Oakland sent delegates to a State convention at Oakland to decide upon a new State organization. At this convention Miss Whitney was a delegate. She offered and read a resolution in favor of "political action" (participation in elections) as a means of effecting radical social changes. Her resolution was voted down by a hot-head majority, which adopted instead the more Moscovian "industrial mass action" doctrine.

Earlier in 1919 the California Legislature had undertaken to mobilize for peace the minds of California by passing a criminal-syndicalism act. On the heels of the Oakland convention Miss Whitney was indicted for most of the kinds of criminal syndicalism therein specified.

For all but one of the counts in the indictment not even a California court could find support in the evidence. Miss Whitney clearly had not advocated criminal syndicalism, defined as any doctrine favorable to "the commission of crime, sabotage, or unlawful acts of force and violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing a change in industrial ownership or control, or effecting any political change," "by spoken or written words," "by publications," or "by personal acts and conduct." She had, however, attended the Oakland convention and she was a member of Local Oakland. And she was found guilty on a count charging that she did, feloniously, etc., "organize and assist in organizing, and was and is and knowingly became a member of an organization, society, group, and assemblage of persons organized and assembled to advocate, teach, aid, and abet criminal syndicalism." The California Court of Appeal sustained this conviction, certifying that it had considered and passed upon the contention that the section of the Criminal Syndicalism Act on which the conviction was based was repugnant to the Fourteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution.

This federal constitutional question is interesting and important. Briefly, it is this: does a statute which undertakes to establish "guilt by association" arbitrarily, and therefore "without due process of law," abridge personal liberty? Such a statute goes further than those which make it criminal to advocate a doctrine. Association with a group from which proscribed notions emanate does not necessarily involve participation in them. Such organizations may not, and usually do not, exist solely for the propagation of proscribed notions. Association with them may result from a general sympathy as to ultimate aspirations not within the statutory ban. One object of it may be to persuade the organization to promote those aspirations only by means which are not objectionable. The deprivation of personal liberty involved in a prohibition of association is greater even than that involved in a prohibition of free speech, and many whose last hope of liberal constitutional interpretation in favor of free speech had long since gone a-glimmering looked forward with an approach to confidence to an adjudication of the unconstitutionality of the guilt-by-association statutes.

Perhaps they may still look forward to such an adjudication in some other case. But on October 19 the Supreme Court of the United States disposed of the case of Anita Whitney with the curt memorandum: "Dismissed for want of jurisdiction upon the authority of Section 237 of the Judicial Code as amended by the Act of Sept. 6, 1916, ch. 448, sec. 2." The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of the United States is a fairly technical matter. But the Whitney case appeared clearly to present a question "of the validity of a statute of any State" under the federal Constitution—over which the Supreme Court's jurisdiction is by Section 237 expressly declared. Lawyers who are neither inexperienced nor naive with respect to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court find the Whitney dismissal puzzling.*

After all, decisions, as Judge Hough has said, respond "to the demands of the times as understood by the judges at the time being." The learned judges did not find in their own desires or in the demands of the times a pressure to upset a statute establishing guilt by association.

To jail Miss Whitney must now go, unless the Governor of California should issue the pardon for which she declines to ask. Whatever her views, she is a woman of a high life and a noble spirit. The same may well be true, even though they are I. W. W.'s, of the seventy or more other present victims of the same California tyranny. But Miss Whitney's known character—and perhaps also the fact that she comes from a distinguished family—excites for her a special sympathy and commiseration. That, perhaps, is well. It may awaken people undisturbed by the imprisonment of I. W. W.'s to the fact that laws establishing guilt by mere association, constitutional or not, are more injurious in tendency than the doctrines they aim to suppress.

* The reference in the court's memorandum to the amendment of September 6, 1916, [illegible] The amendment provides that a claim of infringement of constitutional rights [illegible] may be [illegible] only by permission of the court and not as a matter of right. The distinction is [illegible] In Ryan v. Carson, 237 U. S. 378, [illegible] the Arizona anti-picketing law, [illegible] The Whitney case was [illegible] Both of the [illegible] the Chief Justice [illegible] the constitutionality of the statute. The other two [illegible] of constitutional rights irrespective of the validity of the statute, were perhaps not [illegible] upon writ of error. It seems [illegible], however, that the court should have [illegible]

Grammar vs. Idiom

ONE obvious purpose of the new-born magazine, American Speech, which begins this month to study in detail what Mr. Mencken has rather optimistically named "the American language," is to popularize the conviction that our language (be it English or American) is suffering from the attentions of its grammarians. The ordinary notion undoubtedly is that the grammarian is one who stands guard over his precious native tongue and periodically saves it from destruction by issuing new editions of a book of rules. The contrary notion, that he periodically deals it a kind of death, seems to be nearer the truth.

Long ago Noah Webster, who, as it happens, figures in two of the articles which make up the first number of the magazine, stoutly prophesied as follows:

> The time cannot be distant when the population of this vast country will throw off their leading-strings and walk in their own strength. . . . Numerous local causes, such as a new country, new associations of people, new combinations of ideas in arts and sciences, and some intercourse with tribes wholly unknown in Europe, will introduce new words into the American tongue. These causes will produce, in a short time, a language in North America as different from the future language of England as the modern Dutch, Danish, and Swedish are from the German, or from one another.

Opinions might vary concerning the extent to which this prophesy has already been borne out—Mr. Mencken's conviction is that there actually exists an "American language." It cannot be denied that there are differences today between American speech and English speech. And not a few would be surprised to hear one of the reasons for this—namely, that American speech, far from running ahead of its parent, has lagged behind it. We frequently boast of our inventiveness in phrasing, and we have a right to do so. We cannot boast, however, of boldness toward our school teachers—of freedom in the manipulation of those idioms which are more fundamental in the language than slang can ever be. We still are more "correct" than Englishmen; which means that Englishmen have got further away than Americans from the language which both of us spoke in the seventeenth century.

George H. McKnight, writing in the new journal on Conservatism in American Speech, questions "whether in America there has been a development of idiomatic speech as free as in conservative England." And he seems to settle the question not merely by pointing to the fact that transplanted languages—Irish English, Canadian French—are usually conservative but by a reference to the best current practice in the two countries. Competent English writers today are saying "Everybody has to take their chance," "those sort of things," "Who are you living with?," "It is me," and "It is him." And George Moore has actually written of "a man laying there with foam upon his lips," while Joseph Conrad introduced into his first novel a "corpse that laid right under the white cloth." Probably we are horrified—as we were a few years ago when Mr. Wells began to make his people say "Aren't I?" Probably, also, we are wrong. We do not know what we are talking about when we speak of "correctness." No one does, and certainly not the average well-intentioned teacher, who, to quote one of the book reviews in American Speech, is possessed at best of "a mass of ill-digested rules gathered from dictionaries, grammars, textbooks in composition, manuals of usage, and lists of 'words often mispronounced.'" A first-rate philologist, when confronted with a brand new idiom, might hazard a guess as to whether it consorted with the genius of his language as he knew it; but he would hardly attempt to kill it as incorrect, and he would not be too sure that he knew that genius well.

American Speech will endeavor, it would appear, to disseminate this sense of uncertainty before the mysteries of language and hence to encourage tolerance in the regulation of it. Emphasis has been placed upon the popular aspect of the magazine. Doubtless to enough readers it would seem extremely learned, and it is indeed for the most part sound. But very few statements made in this first issue are strictly new, and some of the contributed papers are dangerously slight. A paper on the suffixes -eteria (as in cleaneteria), -orium (as in pantatorium, where pants are pressed), and -ery (as in car-washery), one on the now famous cryptogram which begins with "ABCD Goldfish," and one on The Kraze for "K" (as in Kars Kleaned Klean) are both amusing and important. And a word should be said for the fact that the three editors will operate respectively from Nebraska, Maryland, and California. From Louise Pound as chief much may be expected. From all of the editors—unless a monthly publication turns out to be too much for them to undertake at a time when experts in language are so few—much is bound to come.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1925 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Tuesday, December 1, and not later than Thursday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 10, 1926.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

"Flaming Coffins"

By BASIL N. BASS

OUR militarists repeatedly avow that, lacking sufficient funds to maintain permanently a large army and navy, the nation must pin its hopes in case of an emergency on well organized and trained reserves. Noisiest among these are the commissioned personnel of the regular army. Furthermore, the army staff has at last learned, and now admits, that the air service is one of its important arms. So one might reasonably expect to find the army giving considerable attention to the training of its air service reserves. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Take flying and the equipment available for that purpose. I am a reserve pilot and, for the first time since the late war, I reported to the training camp at Mitchell Field last August for two weeks active duty. I found that the ships now being used for preliminary training are the same types that were in vogue in this country at that time. I was somewhat nonplussed at the discovery, thinking that there had been ample time, and certainly plenty of room, for improvement. Imagine my consternation upon learning that the airplanes were not only the same types that were used in 1917 and 1918, but the very ships themselves. When I pondered the fact that the average life of an airplane is normally about half that of an automobile the age of the planes became a fact of startling significance.

However, flying proceeded without mishap while the entire reserve class paid unstinted tribute to the mechanical genius that could keep such ancient ships in the air. Then one afternoon I reported on the line for a cross-country flight and was given a supposedly better plane, one equipped with the fabulous Liberty motor. The motor sounded all right as it was warmed up on the ground (a common habit of airplane motors), so another pilot and I took off and started circling the field for altitude, just to make sure that the machine was up to no tricks. It was just as well; suddenly several cylinders cut out, making a noise like the smashing of many empty bottles, and we were forced to land, glad to be within gliding distance of the field.

We "taxied" up to the line and reported to the operations officer, who turned to the sergeant in charge of the ship and asked how many hours the motor had had in the air. The sergeant said: "One hundred and forty hours."

I gasped, for we had been told in class that morning that Liberty motors should be overhauled after eighty hours in the air, and in no case should they be flown more than one hundred. Then this terse observation from the operations officer: "I guess she is ready for the boneyard."

This situation as regards flying equipment takes on an aspect approaching wanton negligence when one knows that the army has quantities of planes of the [illegible] for preliminary training that have never been uncrated; and that it has hundreds of Liberty motors that have never been used. Why is this material in storage?

In one of the hangars there reposes heavily a ship of titanic proportions, possessing motors, rudders, and fuselages galore. Another pilot and I came across it in looking over the equipment on the field.

"What is this?" my friend asked a passing mechanic.

"That!" contemptuously, "Oh, that is the 'Owl'."

"What do you do with it?"

"Nothing at all."

"Doesn't anyone ever fly it?"

"I should say not. The Post Office Department had it built to carry mail. Couldn't use it, so sold it to the Air Service. It has been here three years now."

"What are you going to do with it?"

"Burn it up, we hope," was the mechanic's answer.

The best information obtainable was that it cost the Government close to a quarter of a million dollars. Yet one hears growls from army officers about the lack of appropriations.

One of the instructors said that he would like to show us the plane that has been adopted for pursuit work, the plane that clears the sky of enemy aircraft in time of war, but there were none on the field.

"What field are they on?" some one asked.

"There has been no delivery yet, but the builder has one nearly completed," the instructor said.

"How many have been ordered?"

"Well," replied the instructor, "the army gets a few and the navy a few more, altogether enough to equip a squadron."

Imagine the entire military establishment of the United States possessing one pursuit squadron—twenty-four pursuit airplanes!

There is one pursuit ship on the field. It is a wartime model and entirely obsolete; but it is guarded with the utmost zeal. I heard a reserve pilot naively inquire if he might take it up.

"Try and get it," was the response. It is the only halfway decent ship on the field so the regulars can hardly be blamed for refusing to allow the reserves to fly it.

There are no attack planes on the field because the type has not been finally selected. There are perhaps six bombing planes that could take the air in a pinch, of a design, however, which experts declare antiquated. They might stay up as many minutes.[1] Observation planes? Possibly six (divided between two squadrons) of the wartime vintage familiarly referred to by their pilots as "flaming coffins."

There may be no appropriations for training or actual service airplanes but for the Pulitzer Race it is different. One ship for the army, one for the navy, and one to be held in reserve in case it was needed. Their cost was almost incredible, their speed supposed to be 302 miles an hour.[2] I had not seen these planes so asked, "What will be done with them after the races?"

"Nothing."

"Are they fit for actual service?"

[illegible]

[2] Only the test ship made this speed. The faster of the other two was [illegible] worthy; but authoritative voices are still heard solemnly pronouncing that [illegible] to do so would be [illegible].

"No; they travel nearly two miles while the pilot turns them around; they land at such terrific speed that no one could land them on a wartime airdrome, and besides, they are blind" (constructed so that the aviator cannot see below him ahead).

But to get back to the matter of training. Flying is only part of an aviator's job. He must also be proficient as a fighter, which means that he must master a broad curriculum. Second only to flying is marksmanship with a machine gun. We received some perfunctory pistol instruction and actually shot this weapon on the range. We had no practice in firing machine guns.

We had instruction in operating a wireless set but when I went up and started sending down the position of shell bursts I found that the instrument was dead. I landed to receive the blame for this from an irate officer in charge whose nerves were frayed from too long attempting impossible tasks. I later learned that the ship was sent up all afternoon with the same dead instrument aboard. The result was that no one, and this includes the instructors, knew whether we could spot shots or not. But we received a rating on our efficiency records.

Parachutes are useful in an emergency if one knows how they operate, but the officer scheduled for this instruction had been sent on sick leave by the flight surgeon to prevent a nervous breakdown from too many continuous hours in the air. There was no one to replace him unless other instruction was omitted. The parachute instructor was also listed for bomb sight instruction. A pinch hitter was found who demonstrated an enormous, complicated machine (which was supposed to be a bomb sight) for twenty minutes or so, then suddenly avowed that it was no good because it was always out of commission.

The instructor in aerial photography told the class in his first lecture that it would be given some work in the air with the camera. Before this stage was reached the officer commanding the section was sent on an airways mission, so all instruction was confined to the classroom.

An efficient staff officer, who is an accomplished flyer as well, had been detailed to the field to lecture on the types and uses of military aircraft. However, an assistant-secretary of war decided that he would like to fly up New England way, not in any training ship nor in any so-called fighting craft, but in a specially built passenger plane. The result was that the reserve class lost its instructor for half the training period, apparently for the reason that he was the only pilot in the air service to whom the assistant secretary cared to entrust his precious person.

The responsibility for this state of affairs certainly does not rest with the commanding officer of the field nor with the officers and men under his command. They were impotent to remedy matters and had nothing but apologies to offer for the lack of equipment and the disrupted staff of instructors. I was informed by one of the permanent officers of the field that, according to War Department orders, their first business was to carry out certain extensive anti-aircraft experiments at night. After these experiments came other duties. If any time, equipment, and personnel were available afterwards, the reserves were to receive some training.

Small wonder that a regular officer of some rank was heard to growl: "If this training business isn't given some attention and straightened out, the War Department will find that when the present reserve commissions expire there will be no renewals."

But this reserve training affair is only a line of the story. The whole story before, during, and after the war is the same. In short, the army has completely demonstrated by ten years of bungling that it is absolutely incapable of either training or equipping an efficient air service. Congress and the public must eventually learn that we will never have an air service until it is cut loose from the army and its "official channels," and administered by those who know the air game.

The Water-Power Fight in California

By HARRY W. LAIDLER

TO an Easterner on vacation, California, with its brilliant blue skies, its rugged mountain ranges, its giant redwoods and countless waterfalls, is likely to take on the appearance of a great play-land, undisturbed by the social struggles of the day. And yet in this Pacific Coast State there is now being waged one of the most stirring social dramas in the country, a conflict between the powerful private electrical interests and the people of the commonwealth for the control of the water-power resources of the State.

The fight of most immediate interest is that centering around the Hetch Hetchy power contract. In 1913 Representative John E. Baker secured the passage of a bill popularly known as the Hetch Hetchy grant, giving to San Francisco water and power rights in the Yosemite National Park, about a hundred miles from the city. The bill provided for the development and use of hydro-electric power by and for the people of the municipality and forbade the sale of these rights to private corporations for private gain. Following the grant, the city constructed dams, tunnels, and hydro-electric plants, at a cost of about $50,000,000. While these works were pushed with vigor, the supervisors, for some strange reason known best to themselves, failed to develop a city distribution system. They appointed a committee to estimate the value of San Francisco's privately owned plant —the Pacific Gas and Electric Company—with a view to purchase, but that was all.

The first municipal hydro-electric plant at Moccasin Creek on the Hetch Hetchy grant was completed this year. On its completion the officials of the Pacific Gas and Electric expressed an interest in purchasing all power which the plant might generate.

"We, of course, don't need the power," they protested, "but we hate to see the city plant idle. So out of the goodness of our hearts we are willing to buy from you all of the electrical energy generated at your Moccasin plant."

The supervisors were receptive. Some of them, however, feared that a sale to a private company with power of resale to the ultimate consumer was a violation of the federal grant. So they did two things: (1) They sent a delegation to confer with Secretary Work of the Interior Department; (2) They asked that a contract be drawn making the electric company a mere agent of the city in power distribution. A camouflage contract of agency was thereupon presented to them. In reality the contract was one for outright sale of power. The contract was rushed through the Board of Supervisors before Secretary Work was heard from, by a vote of 11 to 7, and signed by Mayor Rolf.

The action of the officials aroused widespread indignation. The seven supervisors who had refused to approve the contract wrote a vigorous letter of protest to Secretary Work:

> We respectfully submit to your honorable department [they declared] that it is a wrongful and shameful policy for a grant of water and power privileges in the Yosemite National Park area to be developed at an expenditure of $50,000,000 by the taxpayers of San Francisco, only to have its greatest financial and economic asset, the hydro-electric power, diverted into private corporation hands at the instant of completion to the great benefit of said corporation and at the actual deficit of the people of San Francisco.

They maintained that, by the terms of the contract, the company would receive power at an average rate of five mills per kilowatt hour, nearly three mills less than the cost of power from other sources. While the city, the supervisors urged, was selling the power far below cost and would lose by the deal $165,000 a year, if one considered capital charges, the company would gain a profit of $1,700,000! Mayor Rolf, who signed the contract, maintains that he is still for municipal distribution. In telegraphing from Washington Secretary Work's decision to keep hands off for the time being, he urged the supervisors to "hasten all proceedings to the ultimate acquisition of our distributing system for both water and power." The report of the committee to evaluate the Pacific company's plant is expected soon. That will precipitate a fight.

In that fight as in past contests the advocates of municipal distribution have at least one powerful argument in their favor—the outstanding success of municipal ownership and operation of electricity in Los Angeles.

"We are constantly losing industries to Los Angeles," declared a grieved citizen of San Francisco to me a short time ago, "because the city plant there supplies electrical power more cheaply than do our private companies. The Goodyear Rubber Company is a case in point. It was undecided whether to locate in our section or in Los Angeles. The low rates in the southern city were the deciding factor. The company's Pacific Coast plant is now in Los Angeles."

Shortly after 1900 Los Angeles found itself without a sufficient supply of water. After an exhaustive investigation it decided to construct the now famous Owens River Aqueduct and bring the water from the Owens River in the high Sierras, 250 miles from the city. It obtained from the federal government a right to the water and power needed by the proposed aqueduct. Construction began in 1907. By 1913, in less than estimated time and $10,000 below estimated cost, the great project was completed.

The aqueduct proved more than a carrier of water to the drought-threatened city. From the intake of the aqueduct to Los Angeles, in its path through three mountain ranges and over desert plains, it had a total fall of some 3,000 feet. This made possible a significant municipal experiment in the development of hydro-electric power. William Mulholland, the able chief engineer of the project, was not slow in realizing these power possibilities. The city fathers realized them too, and in 1909, against the bitter opposition of the power interests, the citizens of Los Angeles voted bonds looking toward the preliminary construction of hydro-electric plants and the utilization of the 100,000-odd horsepower available along the line of the aqueduct. This work was pushed under the direction of E. F. Scattergood, and, despite the obstacles, legal and otherwise, placed in the city's path by the electrical interests, the first "hydro" plant finally reached completion and a skeleton distribution system was constructed.

As at present in San Francisco, so a few years ago in Los Angles the power interests spent all the eloquence at their command in an effort to confine municipal activities to the generation of electrical power. The city, however, determined to try its hand at distribution and in 1917 actually sold light and power to the ultimate consumer, and at a price lower than that charged by the Southern California Edison Company. The latter company, faced with its municipal competitor, agreed to sell out its plant within the city. In 1919, the citizens voted a bond issue for its purchase. For three years this issue was held up in court proceedings by the enemies of public ownership.

The city, however, ultimately triumphed. It bought the company's Los Angeles plant and since May, 1922, has operated it. Now the municipality supplies between 65 and 70 per cent of the electricity purchased by city consumers and over 90 per cent of the power used in the industries of the city. It is at present engaged in evaluating the Los Angeles Gas and Electric Company, the remaining power company, with an eye to its purchase.

The last big fight of the power interests against the city plant took place in 1924 against the proposed bond issue for needed improvements and extensions. The power interests defeated the city in the first referendum vote, but were snowed under a few months later. In the spring of this year the power companies suffered another defeat at the primaries when Mayor George E. Cryer was chosen by a majority vote over Judge Bledso. At the ensuing elections the citizens defeated all supervisors suspected of opposition to municipal ownership.

The reasons for the recent indorsement of the municipal plant are not far to seek. They include the following:

1. Municipal ownership in Los Angeles has led to greatly reduced rates. In 1902 the power companies' rates were nine cents per kilowatt hour. The city voted bonds for preliminary construction of a power plant. Presto! The rates dropped to seven cents! As the construction proceeded the drop continued. When the city took over the Edison company's plant in 1922 it reduced the rate charged by the company by 12½ per cent and was the chief cause for a similar reduction in the rate of the Los Angeles Gas and Electric Company. Los Angeles rates are now among the lowest in the country. A compilation of the lighting costs in twenty-five cities of the country with a population of over 100,000, made late in 1923, placed Los Angeles at the bottom of the list, with a monthly rate for twenty-five kilowatt hours of $1.40, as compared with $1.50 in Seattle (also a municipal plant and next lowest on the list), $1.75 in New York, $1.80 in San Francisco, $1.85 in Chicago, $1.96 at Buffalo (right near Niagara Falls), and $2.63 in Boston. The power rates early in 1925 for 75 horsepower a month were 54 per cent lower in Los Angeles than in New York, 45 per cent lower than in Chicago, and 59 per cent lower than in Boston.

2. Despite these low rates the city plant has consistently earned a surplus. This surplus for the year ending June 30, 1924, according to the audit made by Price, Waterhouse and Company, was $3,051,306.45. Before estimating this surplus deductions had been made for depreciation, interest on bonds, and expenses of operation and maintenance. Since 1922 taxpayers have not been asked to pay one cent for matured bonds out of taxation.

3. Municipal ownership in Los Angeles has still a number of other points in its favor. Its construction costs have been about 34 per cent less than that of private companies in that vicinity. Its force of over 3,000 employees under civil service is devoted, efficient, and courteous. Its technical equipment is of a high order. It has succeeded in securing and retaining men at its head of extraordinary ability, industry, and social vision—men of the type of the chief engineer, William Mulholland, and of E. F. Scattergood, in charge of the city's electrical developments.

Best of all, the backers of the Los Angeles municipal plant are spending little time boasting of past achievements. Their greatest developments, they believe, are yet to come. The growth of the city is driving them on. The power from the aqueduct is not equal to the city's needs. Los Angeles is now compelled to purchase one-half of its power wholesale from the Southern California Edison Company at rates more than double the cost of power generated in its own plants. This means a very considerable loss to the people.

The citizens of Los Angeles have become convinced that an adequate supply of power can come only from one source—the Colorado River. That is why they are enthusiasts for the Swing-Johnson bill for the construction of the 600-foot dam in Boulder Canyon. This dam, they maintain, would accomplish three things for the Southwest: it would act as a protector against floods, now threatening the Imperial Valley; it would make possible the irrigation of a million-odd acres of land along the lower Colorado; it would render 600,000 horsepower constantly available for development. By an overwhelming majority Los Angeles in 1924 voted that its officials should contract for the purchase of its share of power as soon as the government project warranted.

As might be expected, the Swing-Johnson bill is being opposed by the power interests. The All-American Canal feature of the bill is likewise being attacked by Harry Chandler of the Los Angeles Times and others who fear the effects of this canal on the irrigation of their Mexican lands. Certain of these groups have aimed to divide and conquer. They have conducted a "whispering campaign" in the cities and States interested; have tried to impress each district with the feeling that the other city or State was planning to "hog" the chief advantages.

But Los Angeles feels with William Mulholland that Boulder Dam is "an absolute and desperate necessity," and tens of thousands of citizens there and in other parts of the Southwest are looking upon this development on the Colorado River, with its untold possibilities, as a sort of religious adventure. It will be heard about in Washington this year.

The advocates of public ownership in California are not confining their efforts to municipal electrical development. They are also conducting a campaign for State acquisition and development of the water power resources of California. They have focused their efforts on the Water and Power act submitted in 1922 and 1924 to the people of the State in referendum vote. The act in brief proposes to make the credit of the State to a maximum of $500,000,000 available for the development of water and power, to be furnished to the people at cost, without local bond issues or taxation.

Despite the efforts of its advocates the proposed Water and Power act was twice defeated in referendum vote, in 1922, by a vote of 597,453 to 243,604; in 1904, by a vote of 751,985 to 320,383. One reason was the tremendous fund poured into the campaign by the power companies in opposition to the act. Following the first campaign in 1922 corporation executives and agents admitted before the Jones legislative investigating committee the expenditure of amounts totaling $501,605.68 to defeat the measure. Eustace Cullinan, head of the so-called Greater California League, told the committee, in the course of a searching examination, that his organization alone had expended $244,941.04 in opposition to public development. He received the money, he declared, from some six power companies, the largest subscription, $133,971.80, coming from the "publicly owned" Pacific Gas and Electric Company. His league, he stated, "never had a meeting. . . . I appointed myself president [at a salary of $25,000]. I was employed by the power companies, through Mr. John S. Drum [director of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company and the California Gas and Electric Corporation and formerly president of the American Bankers' Association], and met with myself, after the employment, and organized the Greater California League. . . . No one had access to the account except myself."

The disposal of funds during the campaign was of interest. A few weeks prior to election P. H. McCarthy, for years State president of the Building Trades Council, came out with a vigorous statement against the Water and Power act. During the investigation, it was later discovered, Mr. McCarthy had received $10,000 from the manager of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company "to educate the labor movement that he represented against the act." George Skaller, secretary of the Civic League of Improvement Organizations, was paid by the same manager $4,000 for similar services. Social leaders were not neglected. The same witness stated that he had paid one woman prominent in social and club circles $1,000 for "her extended acquaintance." "It occurred to me," he said, "it would be a very good opportunity to get an entree into these clubs through her to educate the women particularly in the viciousness of that act—and she did her duty well too. I'll tell you she did her duty very well, as the vote shows there." Nor were the newspapers neglected.

The advocates of the act—Rudolph Spreckels, William Kent, James D. Phelan, John R. Haynes, Franklin Hichborn, and a host of others—are not daunted by its temporary failure. They are determined to continue until California has broken the grip of private monopoly and the electrical industry exists for community service rather than for private gain.

Life or Death for the League

By BRENT DOW ALLINSON

Geneva, October 15

THE Sixth Assembly of the League of Nations has adjourned until next year. The 200 official delegates from 54 nations have scattered to the ends of the earth in various degrees of satisfaction or disappointment, according to their conceptions of the true purpose of the gathering to which they come each September. The interest of the world has shifted to Locarno. There all the real decisions that affect the political and economic life of Europe have been made.

The League, however, has already granted indulgence to the conclusions at Locarno, by accepting a resolution submitted by its First Committee, indorsing in general terms the drafting of particular, regional pacts of security and treaties of arbitration "conceived in the spirit of the Covenant" and executed according to the immortal principles of the protocol, i. e., security, arbitration, disarmament. Whether the agreements that have just been concluded are, in truth, peace pacts that will pave the way to disarmament or whether they are, in fact, only new orientations of Realpolitik remains to be seen. The point we must regretfully make here is that, whichever they prove to be, the League will bestow upon them its apostolic blessing, for the League—to use the language of a faithful English supporter seeking to explain the sabotaging of all the constructive initiatives of the Sixth Assembly by the British delegation—"the League is nothing in itself, you must remember; it but reflects the governments that are behind it. . . . We must change the governments first before we can have the kind of league we want."

That is a large order; and it admits the whole case of the radical argument against the League. For, if we insist upon a change of government in Italy, in Bulgaria, in Rumania and Spain, to say nothing of India, Hungary, Serbia, and Poland, we must wait for a revolution, and probably a violent one, before we can hope to have a league of nations capable of giving expression to the will to peace through justice and the operation of democratic principles and purposes. But after visiting the League and watching it for a fortnight, I do not think the task is as hopeless as that which is indicated by the defenders of things as they are, the spineless futilitarians who affirm, with a show of authority, that we must take the League as it is, poor as it is, feeble as it is, disappointing as it is, because the alternative is chaos. The fact is, of course, that we have international political chaos now. The League does nothing, and says nothing, because its organization will not permit it to do anything to modify the chaos, except perhaps to conceal it a little by sanctifying it.

It is becoming clear to everybody now, as it was to only a few in 1919, that the League cannot even perform the one purpose that might reasonably be expected of it—to draw the attention of the world to the major injustices and obstacles that exist, even if it cannot hope to cure them—for the reason that, composed chiefly of representatives of the governments, constitutional and otherwise, that are responsible for the maintenance of those wrongs and obstacles, the League is obliged to ignore the existence of most of them.

What is the moral? Close observation of the Sixth Assembly leads to a new conviction that the radical solution is the only solution, and that the League must be freed from the creeping paralysis of governmental control and the rule of unanimity in its procedure. Its forum must be opened and made accessible to the cries of the oppressed, without depriving it of its official character. This can be done quite easily, by an amendment for which, even in the League as it now exists, it would be possible to find much support.

Either the representation in the League should be made like that in the other functioning and coordinate international institution established by the Treaty of Versailles—the International Labor Conference, which is composed of two representatives appointed by the government of each participating nation, and one nominated by the employers' and one by the labor organizations—or, like the principle underlying the organization of the Interparliamentary Union, it should be composed of at least one representative designated by the opposition party or parties holding seats in the national parliament of each member state; and these representatives should vote, in the Assembly, as individuals representing opinion, and not as the envoys of states. The lines of division would then be along those of the real divisions of opinion in the world, and not along the artificial and dangerous clefts of nationality which disintegrate all the efforts at international organization wherever they prevail.

We are informed that M. Jouhaux, the eloquent and vigorous labor leader who for two years has been one of the official representatives of France at the League, intends, at the next meeting of the Assembly, to offer an amendment providing that representation shall be modeled, henceforth, upon the principle prevailing in the International Labor Conference. If he does this, every internationalist who believes in the League, or hopes for the League, ought to support him and his effort. His method offers this advantage: in a time when parliamentarism has been dangerously attacked and, in certain countries, undermined by the most primitive cabals, it would strengthen the principle and practice of constitutional government, for in order to obtain a voice in the forum of the League at Geneva the offended minorities would be impelled to participate in the parliamentary life of their own countries rather than to disrupt it by abstention or violent revolt.

In the twilight of the League's melancholy achievement, it is plain for all to see that until the representation in the League is democratized and freed from the monopolistic control of bedeviling governments, in some such way as suggested, it will remain a windy disappointment for everyone who looks to it as an instrument of promoting peace and progress in Europe or beyond.

Walter Hines Page—Patriot or Traitor?

By C. HARTLEY GRATTAN

THE balloon of Walter Hines Page's reputation has carried him high, but a significant squall is looming. Viscount Grey recites in his memoirs:

> Page came to see me at the Foreign Office one day and produced a long dispatch from Washington contesting our claim to act as we were doing in stopping contraband going to neutral ports. "I am instructed," he said, "to read this dispatch to you." He read and I listened. He then said: "I have now read the dispatch, but I do not agree with it; let us consider how it should be answered."

Commenting on this the staid New York Times remarked:

> For a parallel to this action the records of diplomacy would probably be searched in vain. An ambassador is right in doing all he can to help maintain friendly relations between his own Government and the one to which he is accredited. . . . But an ambassador's first duty is, after all, to the government which he represents. If he disagrees with its policy, he must keep still about it while in office abroad. Should his dissent be too strong for him to endure, he can always resign. But to act as Ambassador Page did was to follow a course for which it would be difficult to find a precedent and which could not be made common in diplomatic practice without demoralizing and disastrous consequences.

Page had a tremendous admiration for Grey, and he constantly returns to it in his letters. He considered it in December, 1915, "a God's mercy for us that we have so far had a man like Sir Edward Grey at his post." His open-mouthed admiration increased as the years went on. Now, Sir Edward is very frank in his memoirs upon his methods with Page and the United States, however much he may have befuddled issues elsewhere. He says:

> The object of diplomacy . . . was to secure the maximum of blockade that could be enforced without a rupture with the United States. . . . A belligerent with superior sea-power always contended for an interpretation of international law that would justify the maximum of interference with goods that might conceivably reach the enemy. . . . The British contention had not always been the same. . . . ed the maximum right of interference claimed by belligerents. (The italics are mine.)

Sir Edward, then, clearly understood what his line would have been had he represented the United States, and he presumably expected the United States to pursue such a course at this time. In addition he makes clear that he was to a certain extent subservient to the naval authorities:

> The navy acted and the Foreign Office had to find the argument to support the action; it was anxious work. British action provoked American argument; that was met by British counter argument. British action preceded British argument; the risk was that action might follow American argument. (Vol. II, p. 110.)

Grey, then, was frankly busy finding arguments to justify British action. It makes Page's descriptions of Grey (e. g., "a lonely idealist"), to put it mildly, ridiculous. And very funny too is Burton J. Hendrick's comment that "these topics [maritime rights in times of war] engrossed him [Lansing] as completely as the extension of democracy and the significance of British-American cooperation engrossed all the thoughts of Page and Grey."

Britain would have been forced to submit if the United States had been firm, because it was indispensable to her cause that the friendship of the United States be held. Grey admits that:

> The Allies soon became dependent for an adequate supply on the United States. If we quarreled with the United States we could not get that supply. It was better, therefore, to carry on the war without blockade, if need be, than to incur a break with the United States about contraband and thereby deprive the Allies of the resources necessary to carry on the war at all or with any chance of success. (Vol. II, p. 107.)

The State Department seems to have been firm in its contentions, but the counter-activities of Page negatived every bit of firmness which it put forth. From the beginning of the war Page adopted the position of the British. He was a thoroughgoing Anglomaniac who according to the editor of his letters would do "anything" to further an Anglo-American accord. Grey states Page's position well:

> From the first he considered that the United States could be brought into the war early on the side of the Allies if the issue were rightly presented to it and a great appeal made by the President.

Page's method of forwarding the cause was to act as unofficial adviser to the British Foreign Office and to Grey:

> Page's advice and suggestion were of the greatest value in warning us when to be careful or encouraging us when we could safely be firm. (Vol. II, p. 110.)

Page systematically frustrated the State Department of his own country and played the British game. He was pro-British and unneutral to such an extent that he advised England how she could best avoid the consequences of her acts, when Grey himself realized that these acts could legitimately be the cause of grave dispute. It is unparalleled in history to have a man with a record like Page's sold to the American people as an example of the highest patriotism and as "the incarnation of those qualities we love to call American."

Not the least interesting of the various campaigns to immortalize Page is the campaign to establish the Walter Hines Page School of International Relations, at the Johns Hopkins University, a school which is to be "a monument to the work and service of Walter Hines Page." This school is to discover and present for use in practical politics > a systematic body of things known about the complex causes of good will and ill will between the nations of the world. . . . These men will gather facts about international trade, racial psychology, commercial and military geography, diplomatic usage and experience, effects of artificial economic barriers upon international amity, effects of new inventions to expedite communication, and all the hundreds of things that enter into the contacts of nation with nation.

Mr. Page's career illustrates perfectly the need of such training as this new school proposes to give.

Fascism at Work

By THORSTEN SELLIN

Florence, Octol[illegible]

The National Fascist Party
The Fascio of Florence

The Executive Committee of the Fascio of Florence, which represents, to the city and to all of Italy, a youthful company, dynamic, industrious, heroic, and, above all, operating in the light of day, in assuming all responsibility for the holy yet mild acts of reprisal committed by honest and valorous Fascisti, from the beginning to the present hour, against the disgusting bacillus of that moral pestilence called the Italian Freemasonry, which, not satisfied with having betrayed Italy in the interest of their French brothers during the Versailles conference, where the fruits of the blood and heroism of the Italian people were thrown away, thanks to a blind sectarian discipline, has today, in an appeal worthy of the most monstrous traitors to their country, tried to ruin the finances and the prestige of Italy in the interest of foreigners and as a base vendetta against those who are safeguarding the honor of the Italian race, COMMANDS all Fascisti to refrain from acts of violence and instead try to identify those affiliated with the Masonic order in order better to realize the useful objectives of a radical, decisive, and necessary punitive action.

Florence, Sept. 28, 1925 EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE

During the last few days this poster, prominently displayed, had struck me by its intolerant and revengeful attitude. I had been told that the feud between the Fascisti and the Masons was of long standing and that it had lately been aggravated by the publication of some letters purporting to show the international and anti-national spirit of the Italian Masons. Here in Florence, the stronghold of Fascism in Italy, the feeling between the two bodies was particularly intense. That the "radical, decisive, and necessary punitive action" should come so soon was probably not in the plans of the Executive Committee, but on Saturday evening, October 3, something occurred that brought matters to a climax.

A Masonic circular, addressed to a certain Bandinelli, a sixty-year-old bookkeeper, had in some manner been intercepted. When it came into the hands of the executive committee of the Fascio, one of its members was instructed to go to the home of Bandinelli and bring him to the headquarters of the organization "in order to give the necessary explanations." Last Saturday evening, Signor Luporini, the vice-president of the Fascio, a man of sympathetic personality and known as a member of the moderate element of the party, decided to execute the orders he had received. While he and a companion were trying to persuade Bandinelli to accompany them, a young railway employee, Becciolini, who with his wife and little daughter occupied the flat above, entered into the discussion. There are conflicting stories as to what followed, but in the end Becciolini shot and killed Luporini and wounded his companion.

The news of the happening spread with astonishing rapidity. Becciolini, who had taken refuge on the roof of a neighboring house, was soon discovered. While he was being brought to the police station, he was lynched by a mob, while other Fascisti were wreaking their vengeance on the home of Bandinelli, its furnishings being thrown into the street and burned. During the excitement, old Bandinelli succeeded in escaping; he has not yet been found.

Luporini's murder seemed to provide the occasion desired. Soon black-shirted groups were forming, some of them hurrying into the city from the surrounding countryside, all armed with horse whips and stout sticks. The striking feature about these groups was the youth of their members, who seemed to range between sixteen and twenty-five. About 10 o'clock, they went into action, seemingly under orders and according to some plan. "In reprisal, numerous offices of professionals or merchants notoriously affiliated with the Masonic order or with opposition parties, were damaged" (La Nazione della Sera, October 5). Doors and iron shutters were smashed, the contents of the stores or offices piled into the street and burned. At least eight lawyers were among the losers, the damage in most cases including both office equipment, library, files of documents, etc. More than half a dozen merchants, including the Underwood agency and the finest tailoring establishment in town, had their stocks partially or totally destroyed.

But the reprisals were not limited to this. About midnight "unknown assailants" entered the home of Signor Gaetano Pilati, a socialist ex-deputy, and wounded him so seriously that his life is still in danger. An hour later others succeeded in gaining entrance to the house of Signor Gostavo Consolo, lawyer and formerly local correspondent of the Socialist organ Avanti. In the presence of his wife and children he was murdered "by unknown persons." Although the militia had been called out, no attempt was made to arrest the raiders. It would probably have been futile and perhaps even dangerous to interfere. Certain it is that whatever went on in the minds of the silent and cowed masses that watched the demonstrations, nothing was said and no motion made to stop them.

On a smaller scale, the reprisals continued on Sunday. In the afternoon, when the energies of the raiders seemed about spent, a telegram arrived from the secretary-general of the party, Farinacci, who in the name of Mussolini ordered the cessation of hostilities.

This afternoon, at sunset, Luporini's funeral was held with a pomp that is rarely equaled. About six or seven thousand marched in the solemn procession and many times that number lined the streets and the bridges. But I could not drive from my mind the thought of old Bandinelli, whose life may be in danger so long as he stays on Italian soil, although he has committed no crime. Nor could I help wondering how many dared march behind the coffin of Consolo.

This evening I heard some one say, "Well, tomorrow the Fascio will have a thousand more members, too scared to stay out."

The First Nation Dinner
Thursday, November 12, 7 P. M.
CHINA
The Next Step in 1925
Speakers: Dr. Harry F. Ward
Paul Blanshard
P. W. Kuo
Chairman: Oswald Garrison Villard,
Editor, The Nation
Fifth Avenue Restaurant, 27th St. and 5th Ave. Tickets $2.50
(Announcement of the series of dinners will be sent on request)

In the Driftway

HOW his friends, the editors of The Nation, manage to produce a paper which is not a tissue of violent contradictions is beyond the understanding of the Drifter. When he strays into the office he always finds them wrangling. They don't like the same plays; they don't like the same books; they have differing degrees of like and dislike for the British and the bankers and the babies, and different ideas upon the way to make clam chowder and apple pie. They are always expressing disapproval of each other's clothes and suggesting improvements in the management of each other's homes and the education of each other's children. When, after these bitter debates, they go off to write editorials in the lonely splendor of their own-populated offices, something of the fervor of these internecine debates must communicate itself to their typewriters. But—except on politics, on which he has no opinions—the Drifter nearly always feels that they are all wrong.

* * * * *

ONE of these editors recently wrote an editorial upon "Native" Literature. "Spiritually, we have little more relation with the Indian," he said, "than we have with the Hottentot." Until the Drifter learned of the indubitable middle-American upbringing and ancestry of the author of those impious words he wondered what shallow-rooted alien immigrant could have been guilty of such nonsense. The American boy dwells for the most important decade of his life in a wilderness populated by Indians. He stalks his neighbors; he engages in scalping-parties; he utters war-whoops; he makes war-bonnets of stray chicken feathers; he paints his face; he camps out in his back yard, deliriously imagining the shadows behind the cherry tree to be populated by hostile red-skins and strange, wild beasts. When the Drifter was ten, or thereabouts, he persuaded a barber to shave his head, except for a scalplock on top. His family sent the young Drifter back to have the hair-cut completed. They were as unappreciative of the poetry and indigenous American tradition symbolized in that tonsure as the author of the editorial in The Nation.

* * * * *

NO, the attempt to establish American literature upon a basis of American culture may be hopeless; but the counter-reformation which would altogether deny our Indian traditions is equal nonsense. Our lives, even in the cities, are still molded by the old frontier. As small boys we play frontier games; we ambush the whites and attack blockhouses; our bows and arrows trace their ancestry to Hiawatha, not to Robin Hood; we earnestly try all the Indian tricks which Cooper described and which Mark Twain says good Indians never even tried. Americans sleep out under the stars as the people of no other nation do—the Germans have scarred their mountains with paths, but they never cut away from the trails as our youths do. We paddle our own canoes; we smoke the pipe of peace; and each year at Thanksgiving-time a vague recollection slips through our heads of the Indians who taught the Pilgrims to plant corn and introduced them to that heroic bird, the turkey. So long as there is wood left for campfires—and the automobile has enormously increased the available camping-ground—we shall retain a spiritual kinship with the aborigine which Thompson cannot share. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Jewish Relief Abroad

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Will you permit me to reply to Mr. Ludwig Lewisohn's letter in The Nation of October 7 in which, commenting on the effort now being made in this country to raise $15,000,000 for Jewish agricultural settlement in Russia and reconstructive relief in other lands, he makes the sweeping assertion that there is no hope for Jews in Europe. Planting himself squarely on this assertion which he makes on the basis of what he describes as "a fairly long and fairly thorough study" of the Jewish situation in Europe and in Palestine, he protests "with all possible vigor, with all possible urgency against the investment of one penny of Jewish money anywhere except in Palestine."

Now I wish to make it very clear that I am not an opponent of the plan to settle as many Jews in Palestine in as short a time as is humanly possible. In my humble way I have been doing what I can to aid in the industrial and economic development of the land, so that the lot of those Jews already settled there can be bettered, and opportunities created for thousands of other Jews to enter the land and build up therein a future for themselves. With hardly an exception, the same is true of the attitude toward Palestine Jewish colonization of the hundreds of men in the United States and Canada with whom I am participating in the United Jewish Campaign which is an effort to raise $15,000,000 for Jewish colonization in Russia and reconstructive relief in other foreign lands.

Mr. Lewisohn demands that these $15,000,000 should be devoted to the transportation and settlement of Jews in Palestine and that not one penny of the fund should go toward the amelioration of Jewish conditions in various European countries. That is Utopia. That is something that would not be urged by a single responsible Zionist who is familiar with all of the facts, who is aware of all the difficulties involved in such a mass-migration as Mr. Lewisohn proposes. He fails to take into account the human factors. He fails to take into account the smallness of Palestine. He fails to take account of the laws regulating immigration to Palestine—and especially the very latest ordinances which are greatly disturbing the minds of leading Zionists.

But assuming that Mr. Lewisohn's Utopia were speedily realize—that the $15,000,000 plus the millions raised by the financial agencies of the Zionist Organization were available immediately for the settlement of Jews in Palestine, what then? If Mr. Lewisohn will be good enough to do a sum in simple division, if he will divide the total available for Palestine development and settlement by $5,000, the cost as estimated by the Zionist Organization of settling a family in that country, he will find that a very large part of the 12,000,000 Jews now living in Europe will have to remain there.

Not one penny, says Mr. Lewisohn, should be spent on them, because, if you please, they are victims of various kinds and types of antisemitism, popular or official or clerical or all of them combined!

This is true of the Jews of Poland, of Czecho-Slovakia, of Rumania; this is true of most of the millions of Jews in every European country. In all of these lands the Jews are making a valiant struggle to solve their problems right at home. And that is where they must be helped. They must be helped in Poland, they must be helped in Rumania, they must be helped in Lithuania, they must be helped in Latvia, in Czecho-Slovakia. They must be helped in Russia.

In that country the Jews seem to have found a way out of their tragic dilemma by turning to the soil. Twenty-five thousand of them are already successfully settled on lands assigned by the Russian government for that purpose. Thousands more are eager to go, and it is estimated that if sufficient funds can be raised through the campaign Mr. Lewisohn so vehemently opposes, 100,000 can be settled on the Russian prairie by the end of 1927. Though this back-to-the-land movement has been proceeding apace for the past four years there have been no pogroms, no assassinations, no lootings, no violence of any sort perpetrated against them.

The point about this colonization movement is that all classes of Jews in Russia, from the most extremely radical to the ultra-orthodox and the Zionists, enthusiastically favor it. The only opponents, besides the Russian emigrés living in Paris and hoping that their forfeited estates may some day revert to them, are certain categories of Jews outside of Russia, for one of which, at least, Mr. Lewisohn essays to be the spokesman.

It is this Russian Jewish back-to-the-soil movement that the United Jewish Campaign for $15,000,000, of which I have the honor to be the national chairman, aims to help. Not by carrying on a propaganda for it in the Russian towns and villages, but by supplying to the colonists, once they get on the land, instruction in agriculture, the use of tractors, seed, live-stock, implements, loans for the building of homes and credits so that they may live until they have raised a crop and disposed of it. No money is spent now or will be spent out of the fund for transportation or for the purchase of land, or upon efforts to persuade them to go to the Russian prairie. But all of the money that will be appropriated out of the $15,000,000 fund for the colonization movement will be spent to help these pioneers make a success of their venture.

But the fund is not intended for the colonization plan alone. It was specifically declared by the Joint Distribution Committee in a formal statement published in the American press last May that the funds raised for the proposed "Overseas Chest" will be used also for reconstructive relief in all other foreign lands where Jews have not yet succeeded in re-establishing themselves economically.

DAVID A. BROWN,
National Chairman, United Jewish Campaign

New York, October 8

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: To hamper in the slightest degree a campaign for the relief of millions of suffering fellow beings involves such an appalling responsibility that I am sure you will not refuse me some space to point out the ruthless cruelty involved in Mr. Lewisohn's statement that "it is useless to give bread" to the Jews of Russia. No one disputes that "man does not live by bread alone." But if Mr. Lewisohn had enough imagination to visualize the actual conditions of the Russian Jews who have no bread, for instance that of my own cousin who actually starved to death before help from this country could reach him, or of thousands of others who are now near that condition, he would not indulge in the light-hearted, irresponsible rhetoric of such statements as "the bread will wither in the mouths of them that eat it." For the plan attacked is not to dole out charity in the form of soup kitchens but to help a whole people to return to the normal economic independence without which life has been a gruesome struggle.

The indisputable facts which Mr. Lewisohn totally ignores, despite his claims to "a fairly long and fairly thorough study," are as follows: For generations the Jews of Russia have by law been pent up in the cities and towns of a relatively narrow strip called the "Pale of Settlement," thus being compelled to eke out their subsistence for the most part by petty trading. Now that the government is bent, by direct prohibition or excessive taxation, to abolish all private business enterprise, the Jews of Russia are in a worse plight than they were even during the war. Russian factories and industries are not yet sufficiently developed to find places for the great mass of the Jews, and the consequent amount of unemployment is terrific. As this congestion of unemployment in the towns has caused difficulties for the Russian Government, it is planning to relieve the congestion by offering some land in south Russia immediately available for agricultural purposes.

At best Mr. Lewisohn's plan or absence of plan means that we should let the great mass of Russian Jews be crushed in order to save a few for "Nahalal in the valley of Jezreel."

This comfortable but astounding position Mr. Lewisohn justifies with the sweeping dogma that all the Jews of eastern or central Europe are sure to be killed sooner or later, so that to help to keep them alive is to "subsidize murder." I feel too strongly about this to trust myself to characterize such an irresponsible argument. I can only say that it has not the least support in the history of previous agricultural settlements in Russia. Besides, what guaranty has Mr. Lewisohn that the native Arabs who outnumber the Jews of Palestine more than six to one, and who feel the possession of their homes menaced by the Jewish invasion, will never indulge in riots against the newcomers? The actual riots which occurred near Jaffa some time ago make such assurance very risky, to say the least.

New York, October 11 MORRIS R. COHEN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Mr. Ludwig Lewisohn's letter "Palestine or Russia?" stirs my interest deeply. It is a great many years since I have heard, in Zionist circles or out, any plea for Zion against the world, against the immediate needs of the Jewry of the world, so eloquent, so passionate, so special, and so typical. The Zionist organization is to be congratulated.

I am a Zionist. I have been a Zionist for nearly a quarter of a century. I have been an assiduous student of the problems of the Jewish position in the Christian world even longer. I am more than ever convinced that the rehabilitation of the Jewish nationality in Palestine is basic to the solution of these problems. Some years ago I wrote a book "Zionism and World Politics," about which The Nation said very kind things, wherein I show why such rehabilitation is basic. I have stated my views on this matter in The Nation and elsewhere time and again. None can doubt my stand on Zionism as they might Mr. Louis Marshall's. Nevertheless I do not agree with Mr. Ludwig Lewisohn. I do agree with Mr. Louis Marshall.

Whether or not there is any hope for the Jews in Europe, the great majority of the Jews of the world live in Europe. They have lived in Europe for a very long time. They have lived in Europe through very much worse experiences and crises than the present and it looks as if they must continue to live in Europe. Emigration from Europe has not solved their problem. Emigration from Europe has only extended their problem. On the record it has extended their problem also to Palestine. Even if emigrant Jews were liberated by their migration from their problem, for those that remain the problem remains and a majority seems always to remain. Hence, even with the most unrestricted settlement of the Jews in Palestine, with unlimited resources, with a policy on the part of the mandatory completely favorable and cooperative, there would still remain a moiety of Jews in Russia and Central Europe where sufferings and dangers and needs would be at least just as real and just as urgent as those of Palestinians.

New York, October 10 H. M. KALLEN

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It was with extreme pleasure that I read Mr. Ludwig Lewisohn's fiery appeal for a preference for Palestine over Russian colonization. I was one of those who attended the Philadelphia conference, called by the Joint Distribution Committee, and offered vigorous opposition to the proposal to have American Jews commit themselves to a policy of investing nine or more million dollars in colonization in the Ukraine and Crimea.

I was appointed one of the committee that framed the peace pact at the end of the session, but in committee and subsequently on the floor of the conference I refused to give my assent to what seemed to be a somewhat meaningless jumble of words. As a matter of truth the conference at Philadelphia was not intended to be a conference but merely a staging for the beginning of the collection of the $15,000,000. The organizers were probably rather surprised that opposition was offered to their pet project, and they sought to overwhelm it by the announcement of princely gifts in favor of their plans.

Personally I believe that $15,000,000 could do more permanent good for the Jews in Palestine than the spending of it [illegible] in the world. I was, however, opposed, and I am still opposed, to this project for colonization in Russia, because I think it is inimical to the interests of the Jews throughout the world and offers more than the normal amount of risk and hazard to the Jews to be colonized, either in the Ukraine or the Crimea.

The men who have made themselves responsible for this policy have never made it clear why they are so certain of the stability of the Soviet Government, and their spokesman, Dr. Joseph Rosen, predicated the whole plan upon his belief in the stability of the Soviet Government, there being fair agreement among Jews everywhere that the fall of the Soviet Government will be followed by the wholesale massacre of Jews. In the second place, the men who assumed the responsibility for this Russian policy, and who are at the same time men who have assumed a certain measure of responsibility toward the development of Palestine, have not made it clear why at this time they prefer to trust the Soviet Government, under which the Zionists are being persecuted, rather than place confidence in the mandatory power which is controlling the destinies of Palestine. They are undertaking to raise $15,000,000, most of which is to be spent in Russia. At the very utmost, they have promised to raise about a million and a half for Palestine, the balance of the funds of the projected $3,000,000 corporation being provided by a merger of existing funds. Apparently, in their minds, Russia stands as ten to one against Palestine.

Mr. Lewisohn has so admirably covered a good deal of the ground as to the position of the Jews in Europe that I do not think that it is necessary to elaborate on the fact that were this Russian colonization policy not viewed as a crushing alternative to Palestinian colonization it would still have to be justified on its own merits.

There is, in the first place, against it a 300 years' experience of the Jews in Eastern Europe, and there is, in the second place, the immediate risk, admitted by Dr. Rosen, that the peasants are seeking to come back to the expropriated lands of Soviet Russia, and, third, that the Jews who are settling are not guided by a love for agriculture but entirely moved by consideration of getting from the soil the food they need to fill their empty stomachs. This last fact implies that at the very first break in the present economic condition in the cities in Russia these farms will be speedily deserted by the colonists.

Among all races and at all times it takes more than need to make a farmer out of a city dweller. As to the attitude of the Jews in Russia, it is becoming more and more evident that they are not exercising a free judgment in this matter. The pressure that compels them to acquiesce in this policy is too obvious to need elaboration in print.

New York, October 16 JACOB DE HAAS

Miracles

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In America, a Catholic review of the week, there appears a challenge extended to you. The reason for this act is set forth in the current number, which also contains the challenge itself. The editors of the Catholic periodical quote The Nation as "pontifically disposing" of the miracles attributed to the intercession of the newly canonized saint, Sister Thérèse de l'Enfant Jésus, by the remark that "there are many willing to testify that they have been cured of various diseases through her aid," though you go on to add (and to this is exception taken) that "similar miracles, quite as well authenticated, are attributed to Mrs. Eddy, M. Coué, and many others."

The present writer regrets very much that such a statement has come from the pen of the learned editors of The Nation. It is much to be desired, in the interest of truth, that the challenge be accepted, for only by a frank and truly sincere discussion regarding the fact of miracles can any light come to the mind that holds dogmatically every claim of the kind to be hopelessly "medieval," "superstitious," etc. The argument, of course, will turn upon the fact of miracles, not upon their possibility, though it is a necessary postulate if the discussion is to bear fruit.

Your kindness, I hope, will permit me to stray a little and to recommend for your perusal as an example of the critical methods employed by Catholic writers in authenticating alleged miracles the work of M. L'abbé Georges Bertrin, entitled "Histoire Critique des Événements de Lourdes-Apparitions et Guérisons," published in Paris by J. Gabalda and in New York by Benziger Brothers. The author of this book is a doctor of letters and professor at the Catholic Institute of Paris.

The Catholic doctrine on miracles is admirably summed up in the following drawn from the Roman Missal for July 1: "Si testimonium hominum accipimus, testimonium Dei majus est."

Glens Falls, N. Y., July 5 JOHN L. BAZINET

Psychological Tests for Judges

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: I note your comment about an alleged proposal to select judges by means of psychological tests. [The Nation, September 23.] That proposal is credited to me. As a matter of fact I said nothing at all about the selection of judges by any method. I do not believe that it would be feasible to select judges by any psychological tests now known, and I never made the proposal.

This is another instance of the distortion of newspaper reporters for the sake of getting a story.

Chicago, October 5 L. L. THURSTONE

Contributors to This Issue

BASIL N. BASS is a New York lawyer and a captain in the air service reserves. He served for two years as an aviator in France.

HARRY W. LAIDLER is secretary of the League for Industrial Democracy, and author of "Boycotts and the Labor Struggle," and "Socialism in Thought and Action."

BRENT DOW ALLINSON was in prison for two years as a conscientious objector. He is now in Switzerland.

C. HARTLEY GRATTAN wrote The Walter Hines Page Legend in the American Mercury for September.

THORSTEN SELLIN, of the sociology department of the University of Pennsylvania, was in Florence during the recent disturbances.

WILLIAM HARD was The Nation's Washington correspondent from January, 1923, through April, 1925. For some months he has been making a special study of the failure of the League of Nations campaign in the United States.

LAURA BENET has published a book of poems, "Fairy Bread."

V. F. CALVERTON is editor of the Modern Quarterly and author of "The Newer Spirit."

PITTS SANBORN is the music critic of the New York Telegram.

Books, Music, Plays

I Mourn the Dead

By LEON SERABIAN HERALD

I mourn the dead.
The tears of the living
Are not half as mournful
As the laughter of the dead.
The lightning is the overflow
Of the hot grief of the dead,
The quake of the earth
Is the overflow of their sigh.

I mourn the dead.
They weep even with their body.
They perspire even with their souls.
O the dead, the dead, the dead!
They see, but there is no way.

I was with the dead one moment,
But the living say to me—
The living that have ways to see—
They know nothing of the dead,
And the living die.
O the living, the living
March on to die
With Passion their loud drum,
With Greed their shrill fife!

First Glance

THERE are two things that a historian of the world's literature might do if he wanted to seem adequate. He might purvey every known fact about all the books and all the authors, and this would require many thousands of pages; or he might assume these facts and present a body of generalization which would be convincing and attractive, and this could be done in as few pages as he liked. He certainly could not do both things, and it happens to be doubtful whether anyone could do either. John Macy, setting out to write his "Story of the World's Literature" (Boni and Liveright: $5), saw, of course, that it was not for him to drag a net which should catch every author—even every famous author; and so, if one is to believe his charming preface, he cast about for a point of view from which to examine only such volumes and men as he felt it important and interesting to examine. He decided that it was well to "cultivate a kind of impudent curiosity about literature," to scrap the "solemn notion . . . that there is some kind of moral obligation to spend one's days and nights with only the good and the great," and to have the courage of one's conviction that certain "intimate companions" among the minor things may be quite as valuable as the classics. "To save 'Alice in Wonderland' and 'The Bab Ballads' I would gladly throw overboard a good deal of very important literature," says Mr. Macy. And it is an admissible point of view. Moreover, it is a point of view which, if Mr. Macy had continued to hold it, would have made for a volume not only lucid and unaffected—as his is—but literally unassailable.

But Mr. Macy did not hold it. Far from celebrating Lewis Carroll and W. S. Gilbert when their time came, he never so much as mentioned them. And far from confining himself to those books of the world which had aroused his loyalty and affection, he departed into half-hearted disquisitions upon all manner of works suspected by him to be so important—to others—that they could not be left out. He attempted to proceed upon the larger plan after all, which means that he laid himself open to criticism of the sort that he was least prepared to survive. Thus, since he strove for a properly proportioned history, it becomes fair to object—even in the face of his candid confession—that seventeen pages are not enough for the gigantic literatures of China, Japan, India, Arabia, and Persia; that Elizabethan literature outside of Shakespeare does not deserve more space than all of French prose before 1800; that European literature since 1800 is a great deal less than half of all the literature of the world. Since he did endeavor to treat Thucydides, Aristotle, Langland, Ariosto, Milton, Pascal, and Darwin it becomes permissible to observe that he treats them feebly. And since he did aim, however shyly, at an account of the great books which should satisfy several sorts of reader it becomes necessary to say that for many readers his preoccupation with "style" will make him an inadequate historian. He might very well have called his book a story of styles—in which case he would have been free to praise the "readable" authors and those alone. But he calls it a story of literature, and so is reduced, in the seventeen dutiful lines which he devotes to Darwin and Spencer, to saying that the first is greater than the second because he is a better writer!

"The lyric poet is a man of short breath, though he may express the universe in four lines." In such a sentence Mr. Macy is at his best, and it is a pity that he could not have left himself free to write more like it. He obviously is at home among the poets. He is quite innocent of moral obsessions. He prefers honesty, transparency, and charm above all other literary virtues—incidentally possessing them himself in a high degree. He considers the greatest of all literary sins to be dulness—and almost never commits it. May his next book, then, be altogether his own.

MARK VAN DOREN

Lodge on Wilson

The Senate and the League of Nations. By Henry Cabot Lodge. Charles Scribner's Sons.

THIS book might have been called "Henry Cabot Lodge on Woodrow Wilson." Almost half of the text of it is [illegible] which occurred before the Treaty of Versailles came to the Senate. The five appendices consist of a speech by Mr. Wilson, three speeches by Mr. Lodge in criticism of Mr. Wilson's ideas, and a verbatim reproduction of the long colloquy between Mr. Wilson and the Senate Foreign Relations Committee on August 19, 1919.

The one thread of new information and of new interest that runs through the book is the historic development of Mr. Lodge's attitude toward Mr. Wilson's personality and behavior. Out of personal conferences with Mr. Wilson he describes the alarm—the trepidation—which came upon Mr. Wilson when he discovered that the Mexicans at Vera Cruz, in 1914, instead of welcoming our marines as helpers and deliverers were determined to fight them. He describes Mr. Wilson's renewed panic when in 1916 at Carrizal the Mexicans attacked the merely protective!—or, at most, the merely punitive!—troopers of General Pershing.

Mr. Lodge says regarding Mr. Wilson on this latter occasion:

> He wanted evidently to do just enough to allay public feeling and avoid war. He was willing to commit one or two acts of war but not declare war. He was torn between fear of losing votes and fear of war. He was in a nervous condition, as when I saw him after Vera Cruz, although not so collapsed as he was then.

Mr. Lodge at that time thought—and in this book maintains—that Mr. Wilson sent marines to Vera Cruz to gratify a personal grudge and to wreak a personal vengeance against Huerta, who had defied him. In this book he further maintains that Mr. Wilson went to war against Germany because of personal resentment against the German Government and against the German Emperor for having seemed to be willing to welcome him as a mediator in the Great War and for then having suddenly rejected him in that role.

With this interpretation of Mr. Wilson's motives and methods, Mr. Lodge, as would seem natural, conceived a dislike for him. Out of a memorandum made by him on May 18, 1917, Mr. Lodge says regarding Mr. Wilson's appearance:

> I watched and studied his face tonight as I have often done before—a curious mixture of acuteness, intelligence, and extreme underlying timidity—a shifty, furtive, sinister expression!

Mr. Lodge denies, however, that he opposed Mr. Wilson's League of Nations because of believing that Mr. Wilson was acute, intelligent, timid, shifty, furtive, and sinister. On this point Mr. Lodge in the shadow of death exhibits unabated the same icy insolence that was his in full life. He remarks:

> Mr. Wilson to me was simply an element to be calmly and coolly considered in a great problem of international politics.

He further remarks that up to the time of the Great War "Mr. Wilson had never crossed my path in any way and never had inflicted any personal injury upon me; in fact, it was impossible for him to do so."

Mr. Wilson overthrew Huerta. He overthrew William the Second. He did not—this book might seem to be written to say—overthrow Henry Cabot Lodge of Massachusetts. Henry Cabot Lodge overthrew him.

Mr. Lodge nevertheless repeatedly maintains that he opposed the Treaty—that is, that he sought to amend and "reserve" it—because of the Treaty's demerits and not because of Mr. Wilson's hateful characteristics (hateful to Mr. Lodge). He points to the fact that he had supported Mr. Wilson in the matter of repealing the "free tolls" for our coast-wise ships in the Panama Canal. He points to the fact that he had supported Mr. Wilson in the matter of arming our merchant ships in the spring of 1917. He could have pointed to a much stronger fact.

In 1911, when Mr. Taft, then President, sent to the Senate an arbitration treaty with Great Britain, Mr. Lodge in the Senate took a highly influential part in so amending that treaty that Mr. Taft, outraged, refused to send it to Great Britain for ratification. The fatal senatorial medicine which Mr. Lodge commended to the lips of his enemy Woodrow Wilson he had already proffered—with equal success—to his friend William Howard Taft.

Mr. Lodge further maintains in this book that he genuinely desired the ratification of the Treaty of Versailles and of the Covenant of the League of Nations, as senatorially "reserved" and "safeguarded."

There is not one surviving genuine "Irreconcilable" in the United States Senate who will not heartily corroborate Mr. Lodge on this point. Mr. Lodge indeed, in his declining days, sometimes loved, I think, to let it be thought that he actually had been the diabolically subtle creature imagined by the Democrats and that, knowing that Mr. Wilson would never accept certain reservations, he deliberately and for that very reason nailed them to the Treaty.

In this book he puts aside such bed-time playfulness and tells the truth. He could not possibly foresee that Mr. Wilson would really finally refuse to accept reservations which were pronounced acceptable by that wary Englishman Lord Grey and by that exigent Frenchman André Tardieu. He voted for the Treaty twice; and on both occasions it was open to the Wilsonian Democrats to vote with him and with his reservationist Republican colleagues and so carry the Treaty into ratification; and he could not possibly have been sure that the Wilsonian Democrats would not do so.

Mr. Lodge could have strengthened this particular contention of his if he had been willing to recount the painful details of numerous conferences in which the "Irreconcilables" stormed at him and ranted at him and threatened him with the total disruption of the Republican Party in order to prevent him from making his reservations weaker and weaker for the purpose of pleasing the "mild" and "tame" reservationists like McCumber of North Dakota and Kellogg of Minnesota.

Mr. Lodge does not give us those details. If he had chosen to do so, he would have proved beyond denial and beyond doubt that he was never a surreptitious "Irreconcilable" or any other sort of "Irreconcilable" but always faithfully and steadily a reservationist and always willing to send the "reserved" Treaty to Mr. Wilson for Mr. Wilson's possible rejection—or possible acceptance.

Mr. Lodge ends his book with certain further unfavorable observations on Mr. Wilson. On reading them, one is again impressed with the undaunted loneliness of much of Mr. Lodge's life.

One of Boston's best, he early and without compunction incurred the contempt of Boston's best for being a "practical politician." A son of Harvard and at one time an officer of Harvard, he at times unflinchingly pursued policies which exposed him to slights from Harvard. He antagonized the Southerners with his "Force Bill." He antagonized both the Wilsonian Democrats and the "Irreconcilables" by his course on the League of Nations. He antagonized the idolators of Coolidge by voting for the bonus; and he went home to Boston to be sick and to die, loftily snubbed by almost all of the petty successors of the great Massachusetts poets and philosophers and statesmen to whose circle he had cozily belonged in his boyhood.

Such loneliness does not conduce to any exuberant cheeriness of views. Mr. Lodge ends his book with a masterpiece of acidity. He says that Mr. Wilson had "the greatest opportunity ever given to any public man in modern times." He says that Mr. Wilson destroyed this opportunity "unaided and alone." He concludes:

> Difficult as such an achievement in the face of such an opportunity was, it does not warrant describing the man who wrought the destruction as a great man.

This is surely excessive; but it came from a man who had suffered much from the excesses of others.

WILLIAM HARD

Young Poe

Edgar Allan Poe Letters, till now unpublished, in the Valentine Museum, Richmond, Virginia. Introductory Essay and Commentary by Mary Newton Stanard. With Facsimiles of All Letters and 15 Illustrations. J. B. Lippincott Company. $15.

WITH the exception of Whitman, no American author has been so assiduously studied as Poe, and yet even today, three-quarters of a century after his death, there still remain unpublished documents which are absolutely essential to the full understanding of his career. Since Griswold's famous death-notice in the New York Tribune, a flood of writings, including four major biographies, has necessitated a constant revision of the story of Poe's life, but even now the bare facts are nowhere completely assembled, and at every turn biographers are balked by misrepresentation and concealment of important facts.

For the initial confusions Poe's own mendacity was responsible. Not only did he lie about the date of his birth and, after the fairly well-established custom of authors, about the date at which he composed his earlier poems, but he dealt in wholesale invention as well; for in the course of the process by which he carefully cultivated his own legend of himself he concocted that romantic story of his expedition to Europe in the interests of Greek freedom which, though by that time regarded with suspicion, found a place in Ingram's "Life" (1880), and was not wholly discredited until Mr. Woodberry's discovery that Poe had enlisted in the United States Army, coupled with Mr. Campbell's investigation of the Allan Papers, proved that he could not possibly have been out of this country at the time when his Byronic exploit was supposed to have taken place.

But Poe's own efforts to obscure his career have since been ably seconded by others. That sentimental view of his character which has gradually prevailed over the acrimonious one supplied by Griswold has not encouraged the relation of unvarnished facts, and, more important yet, the owners of essential documents have stubbornly withheld them, partly, perhaps, from a disinclination to jeopardize an agreeable legend by the revelation of facts, but chiefly from a desire to leave the affairs of the Allan family in safe obscurity. Hence it is that some remain unpublished and others are now for the first time given to the world.

Not since Mr. Woodberry made his discoveries have any facts in the life of Poe been made public which were of comparable importance to those contained in the present volume. The long-continued quarrel between Allan and Poe, which resulted in the latter's being finally cast entirely upon his own resources, has always been as obscure as it was obviously crucial, and though these new letters do not, it is true, throw any light upon the origins of that quarrel, they do enable us to follow as never before its course, and they furnish new material of extraordinary value for a study of the character of the two men. Twenty-seven letters from Poe to Allan and two letters from Allan to Poe cover the period between 1826, when the latter had just entered the University of Virginia, and 1833, when Allan wrote "finis" to the story by indorsing upon the back of a previous communication his opinion of Poe in the following terms: "It is now upwards of 2 years since I received the above precious relict of the Blackest Heart and deepest ingratitude alike destitute of honor and principle. Every day of his life has only served to confirm his debased nature—Suffice it to say my only regret is in Pity for his failings—his Talents are of an order that can never prove a comfort to their possessor." The story which they tell is far from a pleasant one, and one not wholly creditable to either of the parties concerned, for while Poe alternates between the most contemptuous defiance and the most abject supplication, Allan reluctantly doles money, which he accompanies with the most stinging insults; but every page is highly illuminating for both.

No future judgment of Poe's character will be worth considering if it does not take these letters into account, but there will, it appears, remain some difference of opinion. To their editor they seem only to confirm that view of Poe which regards him as the blameless victim of misfortune and cruelty. To me the case seems not so simple. Even if we take Poe's own statements at their face value and take them alone, it is impossible to say whether John Allan treated him fairly or no; for Poe's statements in his angry letters contradict flatly those which he wrote in conciliatory mood. On one occasion he declares that he has no excuse to offer for his "infamous conduct" at the university, on another he charges all his difficulties there to the niggardliness of his foster father. In 1830 he roundly charges Allan with complete neglect of all the duties undertaken when he received an infant into his household, but the following year he writes: "When I look back upon the past and think of everything—of how much you tried to do for me—of your forbearance and your generosity, in spite of the most flagrant ingratitude on my part, I can not help thinking myself the greatest fool in existence"; and so the swift changes go.

That Allan was a coarse-grained and violent-tempered man is undoubtedly true, but that Poe had become utterly unmanageable long before he was completely cast off is equally plain, for the letters which bear ample testimony to his suffering reveal with equal clearness the instability of his temper. There are secrets of his childhood which must probably always remain secrets, but by the time he had become a man even a wiser and more temperate patron than his foster father happened to be could hardly have saved him.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

David Garnett's Third

The Sailor's Return. By David Garnett. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.

THE characters that compose this fantastic story are as hot-blooded, highly colored, and tragic as a group of tropical birds, wounded and left to die against the dull shaven green and white of an English landscape. Mr. Garnett has conceived a most incongruous group of people—a retired sailor who keeps a public house, an African girl, and their black baby. Against their genuine love and confidence in each other and defiance of the world he has set the gaping brutality of the village mind which in the end overpowers with its stupid cruelty both Targett's physical strength and fortune and Tulip's innocent candor. The ironic death of the baby, Sheba, after their forced wedding ceremony, is a symbol of this strange fact.

The book is well done. From an aesthetic point of view, perhaps, no figures could better represent creatures of nature going down in the struggle with convention than those of Targett and Tulip. For Targett has many of the simple qualities of his African bride. He has dealt with primeval things, seas and wind, ignorance and superstition, where a blow of the fist or a sum of money would insure him the mastery. Not unlike one of Eugene O'Neill's seamen, he cannot compete with the narrow customs of his family and his land, and his death, caused by a foul blow in a quarrel, is as fitting a climax to his character as Tulip's drab course in an alien country after he is gone is to hers.

Flashes of humor and beauty illuminate the story—Tulip's wild dance in the inn before the heavy figure of Harry, Targett's brother, Tulip's sly bestowal of a purse of money upon her husband's narrow-minded and acid sister in order to keep her evil spells from them, and—most of all—Tulip's recital in the wood of the beauties and terrors of her father's court before she comes home like a happy child to be confronted with her husband's body.

"The Sailor's Return" is a tragical rolling ballad, not a delicate prose poem like "Lady into Fox." It has more meat than "The Man in the Zoo," in which, however, there was the same acute portrayal of the Negro—the average commercialized Negro, not the savage princess that Tulip represents. Tulip is the artistic center of the book, a strange tropical flower that soon withers. Mr. Garnett has the poetic sense of irony and pity. Some day, perhaps, instead of these small, compressed prints he will give us a powerful and heroic canvas.

LAURA BENET

Criticism by Sociology

Historical Materialism: A System of Sociology. By Nicolai Bukharin. International Publishers. $3.25.

IN these parlous days of economic change and political upheaval Bukharin's book comes as a clarifying analysis of the chaos in which we are enmeshed. "Historical Materialism" is monistic in its interpretation of life, Marxian in its exposition of society. It is lucid and argumentative, brilliant and dogmatic. As a contribution to sociology it is striking and significant.

Proclaimed for the first time in "The Communist Manifesto" of 1848, restated with more philosophic inclusiveness by Marx in "The Critique of Political Economy" of 1859, the theory of historical materialism has attained a singular growth in the generations that have followed its birth. In every country in which there has been a labor movement it has been instrumental in the organization of proletarian parties, determined their economic programs and political tactics, inspired their leaders with philosophic vision. In Russia a whole revolution was effected in its name. The theory declares:

> In the social production which men carry on they enter into definite relations that are indispensable and independent of their will; the sum total of these relations of production constitutes the economic structure of society—the real foundation, on which rise legal and political superstructures and to which correspond definite forms of social consciousness. The mode of production in material life determines the general character of the social, political, and spiritual processes of life. It is not the consciousness of men that determines their existence, but, on the contrary, their social existence determines their consciousness.

It gained little acceptance in America in circles other than the proletariat until the last decade or two. In Europe, Marxism since its origin has had a deep-lying, permanent influence on philosophic and historical theory. Categorized and defended as "economic determinism," in recent years it has experienced an almost miraculously accelerated growth. While men like Enrico Ferri declare that Marx complements Spencer and Darwin and that "sociology must be Socialist or cease," while William A. Bonger, in the most remarkable contribution to criminology in many years—"Criminality and Economic Conditions"—maintains that the "theory of Marx [has] resisted, like a wall of bronze, all attacks . . . and constitutes a great step in advance in criminology," and while Hausenstein in "Vom Geist des Barock" proves the Marxian origin of the Baroque, it is in the developments in American thought in relation to the philosophy of Marxism that the most outstanding and revealing change in attitude is to be observed. The new historical school is devoted largely to the study of history from the point of view of a social or economic determinism. Charles A. Beard is the best exemplar of this school. In "The Economic Basis of Politics" he makes unconscious acknowledgment of his debt to the doctrine of historical materialism. Schlesinger in "New Viewpoints in American History" admits the superiority of the economic interpretation of history. In the works of Veblen, Farrand, Smith, Barnes, and a score of others, the influence of the philosophic concept of historical materialism can be discovered and traced. None of these men, however, have called themselves Marxians, nor have they in any instance accepted the implications of the Marxian ideology; their work, nevertheless, is indebted to historical materialism, with its stressing of the economic factor in history, for its fundamental inspiration. James Oneal, Nearing, and Simons are our leading writers of pure Marxian type. And the influence of this doctrine does not cease with them.

In these circumstances, the publication in America of Nicolai Bukharin's "Historical Materialism" occurs at a very propitious period. Bukharin defines and develops the doctrine in astute and comprehensive style. Marx and Engels, after all, announced but did not develop their theory in philosophic detail or with scientific exactitude. It was Plechanov who was the first philosopher of Marxism. In this book Bukharin is continuing Plechanov's work. His approach is calm and considerate, deliberate and circumspect, without the soap-box zealotry and raging mania of the propagandist. He devotes the first part of his book to a discussion of the nature of social science, the problems of teleology and determinism, the basis of dialectical materialism. While the arguments against teleology and voluntarism and the defence of dialectical materialism are neither fresh nor new, the form in which they are presented is unusually cogent and impressive. In the latter half of the book the substance is more original. Here the concept of social aggregates, the nature of equilibrium between society and nature, between the elements of society, the character of classes and the class-struggle are treated in illuminating and opulent detail. The social basis of language and religion, of science and philosophy, even of literature and music, is traced in broad but vivid outline. The discussion of the economic basis of religion, a development of the theory of Bogdanov, is exceptionally ingenious if not finally convincing.

It is important to remember, however, that in the age of science in which we live the acceptance or rejection of a theory must be determined ultimately by the criteria of observation and experiment. It is the one weakness of this book that it fails to realize that, despite the value and brilliance of its theory, a multitude of material still remains to be analyzed before the entire historical process can be unraveled. No other theory has explained so much or neglected so little, yet the very fact of its excellence does not entirely excuse a tendency to oversimplification and dogmatism. V. F. CALVERTON

Books in Brief

The Works of Robert Louis Stevenson. South Seas Edition. Charles Scribner's Sons. 32 vols. 90 cents each.

"Sets" as cheap as this one are rarely so complete or so well edited. Here at last is a nearly definitive Stevenson well within the reach of the average buyer of books. The volumes are small and light, the paper is plain, the printing is good; and the contents are as adequate as could be wished. Much of the material has never before appeared in a popular edition of the author, and some of the letters have never before appeared in book form.

Music

Bayreuth Today: An Impression

IT was rather the fashion for a good many years before the World War to find fault with the festival performances at Bayreuth. This practice was not limited to English, French, and American critics. Bitter words were spoken by Germans themselves. Inevitably the notion got around that Bayreuth, which once proudly laid "Der Ring des Nibelungen" before humanity, and later "Parsifal," had served its purpose. This view of the case gained plausibility from the frequency and the excellence of the Wagnerian performances offered in various cities on either side of the Atlantic. Take New York in the middle and later nineties and the early years of the present century.

Meanwhile Vienna, Berlin, Dresden, and other Continental capitals were reveling in the music drama of Wagner, and the annual summer Wagner festival at Munich dared to be, save for the reserved "Parsifal," an open competitor of Bayreuth.

When on January 1, 1914, "Parsifal" became legally free to the whole world and leading opera houses of France and Italy, as well as of the German-speaking countries, instantly availed themselves of that freedom, it did seem as though the last excuse for going on with Bayreuth had vanished. And when war actually put a stop to the festival of 1914, few can have supposed that it would ever be revived.

Nevertheless it has been. Herr Siegfried Wagner (his mother, the venerable Frau Cosima, because of her great age, no longer shares in the direction) carried out the first post-war festival in the summer of 1924 and the second this summer. Each was rewarded with a generous attendance, and Herr Wagner announces a third for 1927.

It was with knowledge of the various charges formerly brought against Bayreuth performances—exaggeration of this or that, stereotyped histrionics, worship of a false traditionalism, general inflexibility—that I went to Bayreuth this August for the concluding representations of the festival of 1925. But I was not burdened with personal prejudice pro or con for the very good reason that this was my first visit to the Wagner shrine. In the course of the three performances which I witnessed at the Festspielhaus the annoying elements that I was prepared to endure stayed in hiding, and certain important qualities which in my experience are peculiar to Bayreuth stood out in bold relief. First of all, there was the orchestra.

I have listened elsewhere to "Götterdämmerung," "Die Meistersinger," and "Parsifal" conducted by leaders as famous as Dr. Muck and more so than Michael Balling. And yet, remembering these performances at the Festspielhaus, I am tempted to declare that never before had I really heard the Wagner orchestra! One reason is the acoustics of the auditorium, which combine mellowness with brilliance in a way that I suspect is unique. The Prinz-Regenten Theater at Munich, an "improvement" on the Festspielhaus, is in comparison acoustically hard. Then the placing of the orchestra, in relation to the mellow resonance of the house and to the singers' voices on the stage, is such that its most overpowering fortissimo never obscures the word or the tone (be it good or be it bad!) of the vocalist. Of course the fact that the Bayreuth orchestra is composed of picked men must not be underestimated in appraising its achievement. But the playing of these men could not produce the superb effect it does in a house acoustically less fortunate.

For conductors Herr Wagner made a wise choice in Herr Balling and Dr. Muck. The former, though he practically grew up at Bayreuth, never indeed became a world celebrity. But a better "Götterdämmerung" than his one would hardly ask for. The breadth of his tempi (unhurried but never lagging), his fine and vital sense of rhythm, and his evident feeling for the sheer beauty of the music all contributed to a dignified and impressive exposition of the colossal score. Doubtless some other conductor might have carried the funeral music and the final scene of immolation to a more breathless pitch of epic tragedy. But, taken by and large, this was a noble, a beautiful, a satisfying "Götterdämmerung."

Busch of Dresden was to have been the conductor for "Die Meistersinger." When he "disappointed," Dr. Muck "obliged." Temperamentally the sardonic doctor is not according to German standards the ideal leader for Wagner's comedy. One immediately gathered why from the unprecedented speed with which he took the prelude. But as a purely musical expositor only Toscanini in my experience has rivaled him. And if something of the "heavy" German humor is neglected by Dr. Muck, the gaiety of this "Meistersinger" was to a rank outsider like myself absolutely delightful, and the touches of impishness in which he indulged were as authentically medieval as the naughty little demons whose quaint pranks enliven the awful ways of Judgment above the portal of many a Gothic church. As for "Parsifal," there Dr. Muck is rightly supposed to conduct from the tripod. It is enough for me to add that the third act as he led it was from beginning to end one of those rare revelations of what our erring flesh can do which make of praise a futile and impertinent intrusion.

The singing of the chorus (a picked body) I have not heard equaled by any other opera chorus anywhere. In Götterdämmerung" and in "Die Meistersinger" it was nothing short of astounding. Again, the demeanor and acting of the choristers, singly or in groups, suggested not opera as we are accustomed to envisage it but a particularly valuable phase of the Moscow Art Theater's manifestations. The departure of the congregation from St. Catherine's Church in the first act of "Die Meistersinger" and the behavior of the grail knights in the final scene of "Parsifal" illustrated what some folk can do in conquering the visual hopelessness of an operatic chorus.

PITTS SANBORN

Drama

Unspacious Days

CLOSE upon the heels of Walter Hampden's highly intelligent production of "Hamlet" (Hampden's Theater) came two excellent modern plays which serve, among other things, to remind us how far are our days from deserving that adjective "spacious" so fittingly bestowed upon the days of the great Elizabeth. "Craig's Wife" (Morosco Theater), by George Kelly, and "A Man's Man" (52nd Street Theater), by Patrick Kearney, are both essentially tragic in their feeling; but tragedy, which once "in scepter'd robes came sweeping by," has lost her royal robes and with them the grandeur which served to dignify her sorrows and make them tolerable. It is a long way from the palace at Elsinore to the Harlem flat

CAN THE MAJORITY RULE?

Walter Lippmann

(Chief editorial writer of the N. Y. World and the author of "Public Opinion," etc.)

answers this question in his new book

THE PHANTOM PUBLIC

LAURENCE STALLINGS says: "Brief, compact, hard-hitting. [illegible] is an intelligent conception."

Chapters

The Unmanageable Many; The Unattainable Ideal; Theory and Testimony; What the Public Does; The Negation of Arbitrary Force; The Question Aristotle Asked; The Nature of a Problem; Social Contracts; The Two [illegible]

$2.00

AMERICAN ECONOMIC LIFE

and the Means of its Improvement

By

R. G. TUGWELL
THOMAS MUNRO
ROY E. STRYKER

A discussion from the sociological as well as from the economic viewpoint.

Illustrated. $4.50

Harcourt, Brace & Co., 383 Madison Ave. New York

beside the "L" which furnishes the scene of "A Man's Man," and a long way from the imperious lust of the most seeming-virtuous queen to the petty schemes of the selfish wife whom Mr. Kelly has so bitterly delineated; but it is the way which the modern mind has come, gradually losing its grandiose visions and becoming more and more absorbed in the trivialities among which it has its being. We can, when Mr. Hampden and Miss Barrymore conspire to make us, recapture for an hour the heroic mood in which the fall of princes seems to epitomize the tragedy of existence, but we can no longer create it for ourselves because it no longer has for us a real emotional validity. We have our tragic sense of life, bitterer, perhaps, than that of any other age, but it is less a sense that man fails greatly, like Hamlet, than that, without grandeur or greatness, he fails in meanness of spirit and triviality of circumstance.

Of these two plays, the most telling which the season has produced, "A Man's Man" is the less finished, but it happens also to be the one which typifies most perfectly the bedraggled muse of modern tragedy. Its hero is a poor clerk, struggling like thousands of his kind to hide from himself his knowledge of his own inferiority by an ardent faith in all the schemes for developing his personality and unlocking those hidden powers which the advertising pages of the popular magazines announce. From a school of success he has received a diploma and he is conscientiously devoting fifteen minutes a day by the clock to the reading of the Harvard Classics in the hope that a bewildered misunderstanding of "Urn Burial" will somehow raise his salary; but all his ambitions are mean, and even they are beyond his reach, for he was born to be a fool and a dupe. He allows a slightly cleverer acquaintance, who promises to "get him into the Elks," to take from him all the money which he can borrow; his wife is seduced by the same man with a promise of an introduction into the movies; and when, his house about his ears, he leaves with the determination to perform one heroic act by performing an assault upon the person of the false friend, he is compelled to crawl back, beaten and battered, to the wife whom he has cast off. For a few agonizing moments he tries to pretend that in this one battle at least he was victorious, but he knows it is no use; and so, collapsing at her feet, he confesses his ultimate failure: "It is not true," he sobs, "I didn't lick him, he licked hell out of me." "Craig's Wife" is less violent than this and in ways much better written; it does not assault so brutally our emotions, for it merely dissects with a cruelly delicate scalpel the soul of a supremely cold and selfish woman; but like "A Man's Man" it carries with it no sense of human dignity which might serve, as that sense always does serve in the great tragedies of the past, to exalt the spirit even at the moment when it is most harrowed. In it dissonances remain dissonances instead of being drowned, as Shakespearean tragedy drowns them, in mightier harmonies.

It is, perhaps, worth noting that some of the tragedies of O'Neill, as well as such a play as "What Price Glory," owe something of the lift which they undoubtedly possess to the fact that their authors have managed to recapture something of the spaciousness which distinguishes the exultant tragedies of the Elizabethan times from those belonging to the strictly realistic genre which the modern consciousness has created; but "Craig's Wife" and "A Man's Man" remain more characteristic examples of the mood and manner of modern tragedy. Each attempts, it is true, to avoid the utter depression of spirits which such works produce, the former by allowing the audience to take in the person of the husband a vicarious revenge upon the wife whom it has been led to hate, the second by a silly and irrelevant tag in which something is said of the promise of the next generation. But there is no concealing the dominant effect of both, for both are, in essence, tragedies which spring, not, as Shakespeare's did, from a sense of the greatness of life, but rather from that sense, which Shakespeare could never have understood, of its essential meanness. Most old tragedies are at bottom confessions of a faith in life; most modern ones a confession of an utter disillusionment. It remains but to say that both are marked by excellent acting, Chrystal Herne distinguishing herself in "Craig's Wife" and Dwight Frye giving a telling performance in "A Man's Man."

"The Grand Duchess and the Waiter" (Lyceum Theater), an absurd but entertaining comedy by Alfred Savoir, affords Elsie Ferguson the best vehicle which she has had for several seasons. She is both beautiful and amusing.

Orville Harrold and his daughter Patti are given an admirable vehicle for their singing and dancing at the Lyric Theater in "Holka Polka." Here again is delightful musical comedy with both conservative and original music by Will Ortman. A musical comedy with jazz ignored! The scene, laid in Czecho-Slovakia, affords the opportunity for striking costumes and stage effects, and the singing of the chorus is relatively as good as that of the principals. Altogether it is a play which ought to run indefinitely. Miss Harrold has not only beauty and charm and a lovely singing voice (in contrast to an unlovely speaking one) but talent as well. Miss May Vokes gives her usual humorous contribution to the ensemble. There are few character actors as amusing on the stage.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

MOROSCO THEATER, West 45th Street. Evenings, 8:30. Matinees Wednesdays and Saturdays, 2:30.
THE DRAMATIC SENSATION
CRAIG'S WIFE
By GEORGE KELLY
with CHRYSTAL HERNE

LAST WEEKS
Evenings (except Monday), 8:30 sharp.
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp.
The Grand Street Follies of 1925
All Performances—Orchestra, $2; Balcony, $1.50.

LECTURES

Farewell Dinner to
ARTHUR HENDERSON, M. P.
Monday, November 9, 6:30 P.M.
Park Palace, 110th St. and Fifth Ave., New York City
Subject: "Two Arms of British Labor"
Tickets at $2.50 should be secured at once from
LEAGUE FOR INDUSTRIAL DEMOCRACY
70 Fifth Ave., New York City

RAND SCHOOL
7 E. 15th Street

Prof. Henry E. Crampton
"Evolution and Human Problems."
Saturday, Oct. 31, 1:30 P. M.

Vernon Loggins
"Anatole France and Romain Rolland."
Thursday, Nov. 5, 8:30 P. M.

Nathan Fine
"Labor's Struggle in Europe Today."
Thursdays, 7 P. M., Nov. 5, 12 and 19.

International Relations Section

Press Comment in Bulgaria

TRANSLATIONS of the following extracts from various Bulgarian newspapers concerning the recent visit of Miss Ellen Wilkinson, British Labor M. P., to that country were received from a reliable source within the country itself. From the Bulgarian daily The Slovo, September 22, 1925, one of the three dailies unreservedly loyal to the government:

Missions from communistic circles in Czecho-Slovakia and England have recently come to Bulgaria to study Bulgaria's "white terror" and to distribute among the victims money which they claim to have collected by public and private subscription. Not long ago we called the attention of our readers to the mission of Miss Ellen Wilkinson, the colleague and intimate collaborator of MacKinder, Wedgewood, and Malone, who precisely on April 16,[1] by a coincidence which has not yet been explained, started for Sofia in order to see personally the victims of the terror. Miss Ellen Wilkinson, like Wedgewood before her, announces that her mission was given the warmest support by the president and secretary of the Socialist Party in Bulgaria, namely, by K. Pastouhoff and D. Neikoff.

What these people told Miss Ellen Wilkinson is evident from the communication which she herself gave out, namely, that 20,000 people in Bulgaria had been killed or had "disappeared," and that from among the Agrarians only. She says that she also received information to the effect that the Bulgarian Government had ordered the dismissal of all state officials who were members of the Agrarian League or of the Communist Party, for the purpose of increasing the misery of the widows and orphans left by the victims of the "white terror."

We understand this new course of action adopted by our Socialist Party; they are trying to improve their conduct so as to gain favor with the International and to let themselves be taken from within by the Communists. That is their own affair. But when our leading Socialists give out such information merely to cater to Communists from foreign countries, that does not speak well for them.

Worst of all, this is not their first offense. The report of Wedgewood and Company which was full of lies and libels against Bulgaria after the outrage of April 16 drew water from the same spring.

From The Nation, the organ of the Bulgarian Social Democratic Party, September 24:

HOW THEY DISGRACE BULGARIA!

The Slovo, the paper of the bankers who are in control of the present government, has again seen fit to direct its slanders and lies against us. In its issue of the 22d it asserts that comrades K. Pastouhoff and D. Neikoff gave false information to Miss Wilkinson and it charges our party with trying to cater to the Communists and with letting itself be captured from within by the Communists.

These libels and lies concerning the first people in our party and this maligning of our whole party will not help the blind champions of the government to present the bloody cabinet of Alexander Tsankoff in any better light than that in which our own people and foreigners see it. On the contrary, these outbursts show that the advocates of the administration have lost all poise.

And let it be borne in mind that this is not a question which concerns the Bulgarian nation as a whole, but merely one of Bulgaria's many governments, Bulgaria's most tyrannical and bloody government. The state of Bulgaria and the Bulgarian people are one thing but Alexander Tsankoff's cabinet is an altogether different thing; it is not Bulgaria but a temporary and shameful regime in this unfortunate country which had gained the good-will of Europe before Alexander Tsankoff came into power. Foreigners know well enough what the Bulgarians are and what the Government of Tsankoff is.

It is a lie that comrades K. Pastouhoff and D. Neikoff have given false information to the representatives of the British Labor Party. They not only did not tell them the number of people killed in our country but called to their attention the inaccuracies in the reports which Wedgewood gave out in England. As far as the visit of the representatives of the British Labor Party is concerned, it would be more becoming for the government press to keep still about it.

We ought to keep in mind that no one can close the boundaries of Bulgaria, especially to the representatives of the great political parties in foreign countries. And when such representatives come to Bulgaria it is best to meet them in a humane way becoming to a government which has any respect for itself and not in a savage manner.

Miss Wilkinson is a representative of the British Labor Party in the Parliament of England. Her companion, Miss Phillips, is the secretary of the women's section of the Labor Party. Instead of our representatives cooperating with these visitors and helping them to see what they were interested in here, they kept a gang of detectives literally at their heels.

These representatives of the British Labor Party who had diplomatic passports properly vised, and who went to see Minister Kalfoff as soon as they arrived in Bulgaria, were arrested by detectives in their hotel. No one could come to see them without being shadowed and searched by detectives.

One day a sheriff and two police agents ordered them to leave the country at once. The British Consul and our secretary Neikoff intervened to prevent their brutal expulsion from Bulgaria. They tried to find the persons responsible for our police department and the ministers but no one was available. At last the Minister of War was found in time to save the country from one more disgrace.

Hampered to the limit of endurance by the attitude of the authorities and by the detectives, two of the representatives of the British Labor Party hastened to leave. Doctor Phillips alone remained; she was given an audience by the Prime Minister, to whom she told her unpleasant impressions of the Bulgarian authorities. After that and after she had arranged, with the consent of the Prime Minister, to distribute a certain amount of aid through the Red Cross, she left.

With what impressions did these people go back home, these people who without question are among the most prominent women in England? What will they have to say about Bulgaria, so badly represented by the present Government? What will they say who, although far from our cruelty and wretchedness, came to us with the noble purpose of helping the families which have suffered in the uprisings and in the cathedral outrage?

The Prime Minister at last gave the representatives of the British Labor Party what they sought, but why could not that have been done in the beginning so as not to increase the number of foreigners who cherish a feeling of revulsion toward the present administration? This is important, for the hatred which the Government stirs up against itself will later be attached to Bulgaria.

This is what always happens when a government and its bloody champions lose their poise and sense. But why should poor Bulgaria have to suffer for the folly of its temporary rulers? Is it not high time for these people who continually disgrace the country to resign? And that from purely patriotic motives so as not to have this shame continued?

From The Radical, the organ of the Radical Party, September 23:

[1] The date of the bombing of the Sofia Cathedral.

WE MUST BE FAIR

The Government papers are especially displeased at the conduct of our Socialist Party and at that of the Second International. Last night The Slovo contained an altogether improper article addressed to them.

When we deal with parties in foreign countries and with international organizations we must be extremely careful. We must not suppose that they are all obliged to make their decisions conform to our desires and even to cover up our mistakes. No, that will not happen and cannot happen. But by the irritation which we cause them we estrange from us the organizations which otherwise might prove useful.

And that is exactly what the Government newspapers are doing today. In their blind efforts to defend the cabinet of Tsankoff, they go so far as to stir up important social and political factors in foreign countries against Bulgaria. And we see before our eyes the consequences of such conduct: complete lack of success in every phase of our foreign politics and the utter isolation of Bulgaria.

This policy is dangerous for Bulgaria. And that is easy to understand. As long as personal and party interests are placed above the welfare of the nation nothing else is to be expected. Last night The Slovo did not confine itself to general attacks on the Socialists. It criticized K. Pastouhoff and D. Neikoff personally and accused them of giving false information to Miss Ellen Wilkinson. Pastouhoff and Neikoff will themselves answer this charge, but it appears that the Government papers expected the opposition to join the administration chorus and to deny all that has taken place here, although if they did that they would only compromise themselves, for the people in foreign countries know well enough what has been going on in Bulgaria. This policy on the part of the Government papers to deny everything, even what is most evident, brought Bulgaria into her present situation, from which there is no way out. Mistakes ought not to be denied but corrected. If there are "lies and libels" in certain communications given to the foreign press, as The Slovo asserts, they ought to be refuted in a conscientious way, but things that are plain to the whole world ought not to be denied outright.

It must not be forgotten that the Second International is playing and will continue to play an important role in European affairs. The conquered peoples must rely on it to help them escape from the slavery imposed upon them by the peace treaties. Nothing but the democracy of Europe, of which the Second International is a part, will be able to relieve us from our intolerable situation. This is as clear as day, but the administration papers cannot see it, for they do not put the interests of Bulgaria first, but the advantages of their party, the Democratic Concord, and its Government.

From Svobodna Rech, one of the three Government papers, the organ of the Finance Minister, September 28:

Our Socialists understand nothing at all about foreign affairs and make a break every time they mention foreign politics. Not long ago they conducted three English women Communists about Sofia in order to distribute money to the Communists, until it was understood, if not by our Socialists, at least by the English women that in a state help cannot be given out by unknown foreigners but by that international institution, the Red Cross.

From the Democraticheski Sgovor, the official Government organ, September 25:

HOW THEY DISGRACE BULGARIA

This heading is taken from the Socialist daily, The Nation, and exactly fits the Socialists. According to them the Government disgraced Bulgaria by preventing two Bolshevik agents, who had come to Bulgaria to distribute money, from carrying on Bolshevik propaganda, but instead required them to turn their money over to the Red Cross, which was perfectly proper, since they claimed that they had come to do charitable work. What should the Government have done other than that? It acted exactly as every other well-ordered state acts when dealing with the agents of Zinoviev. These agents find freedom of action only in certain countries in Asia and Africa. The Socialists were the ones who disgraced Bulgaria by taking the side of the Bolshevik agents.

Censorship in Bulgaria

FOLLOWING is an account of the sort of censorship of the press exercised in Bulgaria by the Tsankoff Government. The dispatch was sent to The Nation from a Bulgarian correspondent also contributing to the London Daily Herald:

There are certain things that all the Sofia papers except the Agrarian Banner can write about, and other things about which no paper is permitted to write. One of the absolutely forbidden subjects is the matter of the disappearance of persons from the Sofia jails. A glaring example of the way this prohibition works appeared in a recent issue of a publication prepared recently by all the editors in Sofia when no other newspaper was printed. The front page of this common paper carries the picture of George Kostoff, who is described as "a member of the Society of Sofia Journalists." Under this heading there is a two-column description of Kostoff's newspaper activity, in the next to the last paragraph of which we read that "during the whole period of his newspaper work the deceased was on good terms with his colleagues." In other words it is stated in a sort of casual way that Kostoff is dead. That is all that the Society of Sofia Journalists in a common paper of all the editors in Sofia cared or dared to say about the demise of their colleague, although every one in Sofia knows that Kostoff was arrested after the cathedral outrage and that he disappeared from a Government institution while in the hands of the agents of the state. At about the same time in about the same way seven other writers and editors "disappeared," the best known of whom was Joseph Herbst, the cleverest and most prolific newspaper man in Bulgaria.

A Bulgarian Execution

THE diary printed below was published in the popular literary Bulgarian magazine Hiperion soon after the Peasant Government had been overthrown by a military coup on June 9, 1925, and after the murder of the Premier, Alexander Stambuliisky and a series of bloody acts of repression. Its author, Ludmill Stoyanoff, one of the ablest of the young Bulgarian novelists, was imprisoned by the military after the appearance of the diary and compelled to issue a statement denying that the story was true.

It is said that in America convicts are killed by electrocution. It would be a pleasant and amazing death.

We are killing men simply—with an ax, like our ancestors. A blow at the back, bones cracked, and the man falls down like a tree cut off. Sometimes the victims are not one but ten, twenty, thirty, fifty. In such a case the task is more difficult, but not impossible: the victims are chained together, and treated as one human mass. It is a bloody bath, a fascinating fight of beasts, a rare spectacle. Thereafter the victims are thrown into some hole for the dogs.

But why this way of killing men; strange, is it not? It is because shooting is forbidden.

Otherwise we should shoot them. We are in a conquered country and keep within the rules of the king's peace. No gun shot. We do not wish to disturb the peaceful population. Yet

A Short Cut to Accurate Information

—a companion for your hours of reading and study that will quickly make itself indispensable for its wealth of ready information on just the questions which most often puzzle you. You will save time and insure accuracy when you have at hand

WEBSTER'S COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY

The Best Abridged Dictionary

It is Based upon Webster's New International

106,000 entries from which to get exact definitions, spellings, pronunciation, and use of words; a dictionary of biography to identify characters of history or literature; a Gazetteer department to give salient facts about points of geography; a guide to rules of punctuation, use of capitals, abbreviations, etc.; a dictionary of foreign phrases with pronunciation and translations; and many other features of practical value. It is a splendid book of 1256 pages with 1700 illustrations.

New Words—including the latest accepted vocabulary terms and important additions to the biographical and Gazetteer departments—such entries as camouflage, kinetophone, Latvia, Vimy, Hughes, Lenin.

The thin-paper edition is especially handsome and convenient to handle. Art Canvas binding, $5.00; Fabrikoid, $6.00; Leather, $7.50.

Purchase of your bookseller; or send order and remittance direct to us; or write for information. Free specimen pages if you mention this periodical.

G. & C. Merriam Co.

Springfield Mass.

THE NEGRO YEAR BOOK

1925-1926 EDITION ON SALE

The standard work of reference on all matters relating to the Negro. General and special bibliographies. Presents a succinct, comprehensive and impartial review of the events of each year as they affect the interests and indicate the progress of the Negro race. In addition to its interest to the general reader, the book is especially adapted for use in schools where historical and sociological courses on the Negro are given.

Price, paper cover, $1.00; board cover, $1.50.

NEGRO YEAR BOOK COMPANY

TUSKEGEE INSTITUTE, ALABAMA

SEX AND CIVILIZATION

By PAUL BOUSFIELD $3.00

"The book has won half a dozen rereadings from me in the last few months . . . is of interest to the layman, and it is indispensable both to the analyst of human behavior and to the feminist."—Alice Beal Parsons in The Nation.

LYSISTRATA. By ANTHONY M. LUDOVICI $1.00

A man's view of the dangerous trend of modern feminism.

HYPATIA. By MRS. BERTRAND RUSSELL $1.00

A spirited answer to the above from an extreme feminist.

Send for a full list of the books in the TODAY AND TOMORROW SERIES to

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Avenue, New York

BOBBS-MERRILL BOOKS—BOBBS-MERRILL BOOKS

Everyman's Genius
By MARY AUSTIN

How the intelligent reader can recognize his own genius and make the most of it. A book that is incalculably stimulating, concrete, understandable, and that gives to every reader the hope of realizing his great desire. $2.50

Paris on Parade
By ROBERT FORREST WILSON

This is Paris, the gay, the sophisticated, the inimitable. Illustrations from paintings by A. G. Warshawsky. $5.00

Socialism
Critical and Constructive
By J. RAMSAY MACDONALD

The standard work on Socialism.—New York Times. $3.50

Race or Nation
By GINO SPERANZA

Conflict of Divided Loyalties and its effect on our national institutions. Arresting and provocative. $3.00

American Husbands
And Other Alternatives
By ALEXANDER BLACK

Discerning, ironic, delightful comment on modern life of a literary pioneer and veteran editor. $3.00

Autobiography of Herbert Quick
ONE MAN'S LIFE

is more interesting than his famous Vandemark novels. From the fullness of a varied career as editor, politician, novelist, poet, he has made a very fine book. Leisurely, balanced, filled with entertaining incident. Will be one of the books most read.—The Bookman. Profusely illustrated. $5.00

Correspondence of
John Adams and Thomas Jefferson
Edited by Paul Wilstach

The intimate private exchange of ideas on various aspects of life and affairs between two of the greatest founders of the Republic. Wise, witty, and thoroughly delightful. $2.75

The Royal Road to Romance
By Richard Halliburton

A gay young romantic's vagabondage into glamorous corners of the world. Illustrated. $5.00

Wanderings And Excursions
By J. Ramsay MacDonald

Delightful reminiscences and essays on travel and men by the first Labor Prime Minister. $3.00

Evolution for John Doe
By Bernard Wolfe

The most readable book on evolution for the layman.—New York Herald Tribune. Illustrated. $3.50

Uncommon Americans
By Lewis Copeland

Crisp biographies of warriors, guerrillas, statesmen, evangelists, philosophers, [illegible] $3.00

The Smiths
By Arthur Train

Comedy of manners. $2.

The Private Life of Helen of Troy
By John Erskine

[illegible] a scintillating commentary on modern American follies and [illegible] our own time. $2.50

Publishers THE BOBBS-MERRILL COMPANY Indianapolis

there is no peaceful population. They have fled or have been exterminated. Towns have been destroyed and burned, their inhabitants are wandering in the mountains, dying of hunger.

Both the captain and I have drunk. He drinks, however, as an old habit. He is a small man with full, round face, swarthy and hardened, with shaved mustaches and large ears. His god is his military uniform, and his church the military barracks. And he is executing the orders of his superiors with a superstitious veneration. Even dogs possess no faithfulness like his. He looks like one of the numberless heads of the monster which, according to the story, devoured the handsomest children of the city. He has jurisdiction over a number of villages, which he is bound to depopulate. That human mission he is performing with dignity and firmness. Even he has never held a cup of whiskey with such firmness.

People come and make divers requests. An old man begs the return of three stolen goats of his. A little girl asks what has happened to her father. An old woman asks permission to take and bury in the common cemetery the heads of her two sons that have been rolled—she says—down behind the mount.

Setting my teeth I get up and go out; though dulled by the whiskey, I am vaguely conscious of the presence of an unspoken horror. This is neither war nor revolution, I think. Some kind of cruel and nonsensical bloodthirstiness, a rare feast of Mars.

Outside our headquarters soldiers are approaching. They are escorting six peasants among whom is the schoolmaster of the neighboring village in whose house I recently spent a night as a guest. My duty is to examine them. The forms of law must be preserved.

I take the prisoners into a separate room and start the examination. They are innocent men as always. One of them was arrested on his return from the funeral of his child. The other was irrigating his garden. The third, fertilizing his field. The schoolmaster does not know why he is imprisoned. I myself know not why I am here, how I have fallen into this veritable hell, and whether or not this is a mere dream. I report to the captain the result of the examination.

"Innocent men," I say, "entirely innocent. Free them, sir, to go about their business."

The captain drinks one more cup of whiskey and bursts into laughter.

"Ha! Ha! Innocent men; that means—guilty. In the decree it is said: no innocent men—do you understand?"

I hand the officer the papers in which is described how the arrests have been made. The man in military uniform goes over the papers with irritation, takes a pen with his hand trembling from drinking whiskey, and writes: "According to decree No. 17, as spies."

"No!" I cry in horror.

"Adjutant!" cries the captain.

A young officer just graduated from the military school comes in. He salutes the captain, takes the papers in silence, says the customary words "I will do it," and goes out. Then the captain drinks a few more cups of whiskey, and in his eyes is reflected cruelty and national dignity.

It is my duty to hear the last words of the victims. A company of soldiers escorts them along the road and stops at the right side in a narrow valley. It is autumn. The grass has turned yellow.

Here has been dug a long, deep hole. The six victims are chained to one another—a live wall, a fence of souls. Their faces are lean and weak. They are bloodless. They know what is going to happen, they know that their doom will not be prevented. They stand upright near the hole, near their very grave, and once more I have to tell them with trembling voice:

"If any of you confess the truth, he will be pardoned."

As I speak this lie I don't dare face them, and I look at the ground. Then the schoolmaster answers me in a low voice:

"Sir, why do you joke now!"

I look at him attentively. His eyebrows are trembling, his lips are cracked. In his eyes a look appears, as if he wishes to tell me: Sir, do you remember that evening you spent a night in my home? Do you remember the dinner served you and me by my modest and hospitable wife in my garden that evening? Do you remember my child with blond hair and bright face who called you "uncle"?

"Come, there is no time to lose," hoarsely cries the captain.

A sergeant binds the eyes of the victims. Their teeth chatter, and their bodies tremble. After a while all are turned with their faces toward the hole.

One hears the command.

I cover my eyes with my hands and turn aside. I hear a common, choking cry, afterward dull noises of stabbed flesh and broken cartilage, ringing of iron into bone, a little fight, and—calm. . . . What happened so quickly?

I turn and open my eyes. The faces of the soldiers and captain are alarmed. Still alive, the victims have jumped into the hole with the hope, perhaps, that the torturers will not shoot them, or simply by instinct. Yet the hole is deep, and at its bottom is lying that human mass sunk in blood and roaring. It is impossible to look at that scene again. On the faces of the soldiers dissatisfaction is obvious. They are disgusted with the unhuman business they are transacting. But Mars is a sly dog; he stakes their own lives upon their obedience.

A short conference starts. It could be so easy: a few bullets and the problem would be solved. But . . . Shooting is forbidden, that's all.

Then one of the soldiers is ordered to jump into the hole. One hears dull blows—one, two, three; the bayonet rings on a stone; at last the soldier, filled with a superstitious fear, climbs out. His bayonet is broken, in his eyes is a wild fire, from his face water showers. The hard job in the narrow hole has weakened him, and he is trembling like a leaf. But from the bottom of the hole new sounds are heard—hoarse, dull, human voices which sound like voices coming from hell.

A second soldier enters the hole. The others stand as if hypnotized, shuddering at the unusual duty demanded of them. The captain himself has lost patience by the prolonged execution. He walks forward and back; at last he bends over the hole and asks:

"Do you finish?"

At this question the soldier gets out, stained with blood, from which he makes an effort to clean himself with convulsive and painful motions. His bayonet is also bent; human life proves to be stronger than iron. The convulsive cries of the victims becomes fainter, only agonizing groans are heard, that little by little disappear. Nevertheless time is rapidly passing; there must be an end of this unpleasant business; the soldiers also have nerves.

"There is no time to lose," cries out the captain. "Throw the dirt into the hole! . . ."

Yet after the throwing of the first shovelful something terrible occurs. I shudder. From the bottom of that hell, we hear a desperate, hoarse, and ugly sound, the voice of the schoolmaster.

"For God's sake! I am still alive!"

I lean over the edge of the pit. Half-standing, with terrible eyes and hands stained with blood, he makes an effort to get out. In his eyes are suffering and both a desire for and a fear of death. I remember him a good gentleman in his house. His wife pours a cup of coffee, and his child stretches out his hands and calls me "uncle." What fate! I unconsciously draw out my gun and point it at him—the only help I can render him.

A strong hand detains me, and I drop the weapon. The captain, wrathful and drunken, stands behind me and cries with trembling voice:

"No more torture! Fill up the hole quickly!"

Afterward all is calm. The hole is filled, the soldiers are ready to march, and soon the night swallows the murderers and their victims.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 11, 1925 No. 3149

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 527

EDITORIALS:

Mr. Gary Prophesies Prosperity 530

Trouble in France 531

An American Paradox 531

A Clipper Ship's End 532

AT A PEASANT SOVIET. By Maurice G. Hindus 533

AN EXPERIMENT IN FREEDOM. By William Reswick 535

THEATER AND REVOLUTION. By Michael Gold 536

POEMS OF REVOLUTION. By Vladimir Mayakovsky. Translated by Joseph Freeman and Leon Talmy 537

WHAT THEY READ IN SOVIET RUSSIA. By Louis Fischer 538

THE MOVIES IN RUSSIA. By Paxton Hibben 539

BOOKS. By Maxim Gorki. Translated by Alexander Kaun 541

LLOYD GEORGE'S LAND CAMPAIGN. By John A. Hobson 542

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 544

CORRESPONDENCE 544

BOOKS AND PLAYS:

Composed While Under Arrest. Translated from the Russian of Lhermontov by Max Eastman 546

First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 546

Two War Books. By Oswald Garrison Villard 546

Merezhkovsky. By Joshua Kunitz 547

An Epic of Culture. By L. Talmy 548

The Nation's Poetry Prize 549

Books in Brief 549

CHAPLIN AND SOME OTHERS. By Gilbert Seldes 549

DRAMA:

Made in Czecho-Slovakia. By Joseph Wood Krutch 550

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

A Soviet Budget for 1926 552

The Revival of Russian Industry 554

Science and the Workers' Revolution 556

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

NOW THAT THE RUSSIAN Soviet Government is celebrating its eighth birthday, it is certainly time to stop regarding it as a temporary affair. In 1917 and the years immediately following, the fall of the Soviets was predicted hourly; making the wish father to the thought, our best minds pictured Russia about to be freed from the blood-thirsty Communists and delivered into the hands of its friends, the Grand Duke Alexandrovitch or Admiral Kolchak or General Denikin, or any number of valiant royalists. Nothing of the sort has happened, and the White opposition has become only a memory. By whatever methods, the revolutionary government has not only made itself an undeniable fact but has quieted, even among its most ardent ill-wishers, the prophecy of its imminent demise. The articles in the pages that follow show that this government, which was to last, at most, six weeks, is now turning its thoughts to matters which require a considerable amount of leisure, confidence, and stability.

EXPERIMENTS in prison reform, astonishing figures in book publishing, a peasant Soviet carrying on its double task of governing and educating, a flourishing motion-picture industry, a new theater—all these are reassuring and of the utmost interest. The recent two-hundredth-anniversary celebration of the Russian Academy of Science is equally so; and the figures given by the Institute of Planned Economics of the Soviet Union, which compare this year's industrial conditions both with estimates for 1926 and with figures for 1913, the last pre-war year, indicate that Russian industry, also, is being rapidly rehabilitated. Agriculture and industry have each risen to 71 per cent of pre-war figures; next year they are estimated at 89 and 91 per cent, respectively. Russia is no longer on the edge of a precipice; in another five years, with the present rapid rate of advance, the pre-war prosperity, such as it was, will have been passed, and without any outside help, without a Dawes plan, with the aid only of an utterly impossible idea of government—so it has been called times without number—Russia will have pulled itself up by its bootstraps.

WHAT'S THIS, WHAT'S THIS? Here is the Coolidge administration bringing about the indictment of the Alien Property Custodian, Thomas W. Miller, and other men, German, Swiss, and American, on the testimony of Roxie Stinson, Jess Smith's former wife; Gaston B. Means, the jail-bird and crook; one Elmer Jarnecke, also a convict; and "Mal" Daugherty, brother of the famous Harry Daugherty, lately Mr. Harding's and Mr. Coolidge's Attorney General. It was for calling these very persons as witnesses that Senator Brookhart and Senator Wheeler, in probing the affairs of the Department of Justice, were denounced by the leading Republican dailies. As for the Republican National Committee, it foamed at the mouth and issued statement after statement demanding to know if all the jails were to be emptied and the sewers to be dragged in order to besmirch dead men who could not rise from their graves and honorable and respected Republican office-holders like Albert Fall and Harry Daugherty. Well, what will the big-business press say now? We do not question that it will applaud this series of indictments as warmly as it opposed Mr. Wheeler's merciless flaying of evil-doers. Mr. Miller is accused of taking a $100,000 bribe to turn back $7,000,000 of German property to its former owners, while $331,000 more is said to have been divided between John T. King (yes, the same John T. King), formerly Republican committeeman from Connecticut, and Jess Smith (the same Jess Smith who killed himself in Harry Daugherty's apartment after having had a desk next to the Attorney General in the Department of Justice).

IT WAS SENATOR WHEELER who uncovered the first traces of these irregularities. The metropolitan dailies that abused him so then will be sure to forget to give him the slightest credit for it now. Which reminds us that the same administration of the Department of Justice which considers the punishment of this corruption "the most important case it has had since Mr. Daugherty got out," and intends to prosecute it to the limit with all possible speed and determination, cannot find the time to bring to trial its second indictment of Senator Wheeler, the case in the District of Columbia. That, too, was to be pushed with all vigor, but the months roll by and nothing whatever happens. Is the Department afraid to try the Senator again after his triumphant acquittal, or is it deliberately and maliciously seeking to keep this indictment hanging over Senator Wheeler—merely to annoy him, and, if possible, to keep him quiet? Now that it has officially approved of some of his witnesses and testified to the worth of his services, it ought in common decency to act or to have the indictment quashed.

HOLDING A BEAR BY THE TAIL is a pleasant pastime compared with trying Colonel William Mitchell by army court-martial. That energetic officer and his able counsel carried off all the honors in the first week of the trial. They challenged three generals who were conspicuously disqualified because of one reason or another. General Albert J. Bowley, for instance, had publicly attacked and abused Colonel Mitchell in a speech in North Carolina and then proposed to sit as a judge over him—a pleasant way to pack a court! Next the defense compelled the court to admit that War Department officials had been so eager to try Colonel Mitchell that they had breached their own regulations by the lawless manner of doing it—they who are accusing Colonel Mitchell of violating regulations! To protect themselves they declared that the court was ordered by Mr. Coolidge and that the President was in this matter a law unto himself. Whereupon Colonel Mitchell's counsel chilled the hearts of the court by hinting that they might call the President to face Colonel Mitchell as his accuser—how "Cal" must have wriggled at the prospect! It is now plain that the familiar and inevitable army stupidity has placed the prosecution in a bad hole. If the court convicts Colonel Mitchell, it will make a martyr of him. When dismissed he will stump the country and be more aggressive than ever. If it acquits the Colonel, he will continue to talk. How the powers that be in the War Department must be kicking themselves that they did not ask Mr. Coolidge to issue a sharp presidential reprimand and station the Colonel in the remotest parts of Moro-land!

IT IS SIGNIFICANT of the realignment of world politics since the Treaty of Versailles that the important happenings of 1925 have taken place in the Near and Far East, mostly manifestations of the rising spirit of independence and resentment against exploitation by Western imperialism. Growing difficulties in India, violent disturbances in China, the fighting in Morocco (westernmost frontier of the Orient), the clash between Greece and Bulgaria, the deposing of the Shah of Persia, and the warfare in Syria, culminating in the bombardment of Damascus by the French—these are not the minor events which complacent Occidentals largely assume them to be; they are the harbingers of vast world changes which may even destroy or cast into the background the whole fabric of Western civilization. The campaign of the French in Syria has already achieved the proportions of an international tragedy. The French, it must be recalled, have no territorial rights in Syria whatever. They are there as trustees of the League of Nations and have outrageously violated their trust, having shown none of the tact in dealing with non-European races that they have often manifested elsewhere. It is not enough to recall General Sarrail. The mandate ought to be taken away unless France voluntarily surrenders it. There seems to be considerable sentiment in France for such a step, but as usual the bogy of "national prestige" raises itself. The League of Nations could in no way so justify and magnify itself as by exerting compelling influence or taking summary action in this regard.

THE LIBERAL DEFEAT in Canada will surprise no one who has followed the Mackenzie King government, with its compromises, its shifts, and its lack of clear-cut definite policies on the migration and immigration problems, the tariff, the railroads, and taxation. Canada has been prosperous of late—at least the Liberals pointed to the development of its basic industries, its fine wheat crop, and its favorable trade balances as proof that they were conducting the country well. But the half-hearted liberalism of their government has had the inevitable result—many Liberals have preferred undiluted Conservatism. As a result, Mackenzie King and seven of his ministers are defeated, one-fifth of his strength is lost, and the Parliament-to-be is a chaotic one, comprising (as present returns indicate) 116 Conservatives, 100 Liberals, 23 Progressives, and 3 Independents, with 3 seats undecided. No party has a majority. It is, the dispatches report, a situation which has never before arisen in Canadian politics. Beyond doubt an effort will be made to govern for some time without again going to the country, but just how or by whom is not clear at this writing. The regrettable thing is that Mackenzie King has been destitute both of courage and true liberalism, or he would have challenged his adversaries on the nationalization of railroads and would have laid ruthless hands on the tariff.

PREMIER MUSSOLINI is no despot hiding his light under a bushel. Instead he stands up before an audience of thousands, he writes in cold print where it can forever be quoted against him, and what he says is true despot language: "I have always maintained that violence should be timely and chivalrous . . . violence should be exclusively in behalf of the state. Private, individual, and sporadic violence is harmful to Fascism." "Discipline must . . . be substantial and absolute, almost religious. The workers must be taught that their duties are more important than their rights." "The last century was the century of our dependence; this century must be that of our power. . . . Every one of you must consider himself a soldier, a molecule, feeling and pulsating with the entire organism." This is at least refreshing. Despot Mussolini knows what he wants and how he means to get it. And so far he has been eminently successful. From the day, three years ago, when ten thousand men marched unchallenged through the gates of Rome and were met by the King on the steps of the Palace to now, when political opposition is practically crushed, the press is silenced, the labor unions are bound hand and foot, and even local government is in the hands of the central power, resistance to Fascismo has been getting feebler and feebler. If a country has the kind of government it deserves, Italy's crimes must be heavy; if it has the kind it wants or understands, as some of Italy's best friends maintain, then time will remedy matters. Mussolini is a fine maker of phrases but occasionally his reasoning is unsound. "Ministries pass," he says, "but a regime born of revolution realizes all its conquests." He forgot to add that it is built on the flimsiest and least enduring of foundations.

SO JUDSON C. WELLIVER, veteran journalist, has resigned and the position of chief clerk of the White House is again vacant. Now, let no man shy at this title. Here is no ushership of the Black Rod and no Beef-Eater sinecure, but one of the mightiest positions, we surmise, in the gift of the President. No regulations define the duties of the position; its functions are recorded neither in Bryce nor in De Tocqueville nor in any other commentator upon our government. But rumor and gossip have had much to say about it and the years have crystallized some of the guesses that from this official's desk come, for the President to sign, something more than graceful and well-drafted replies to myriads of letters which no President could find time to read. There are those wiseacres who actually believe that in the style of certain Harding and Coolidge speeches that thrilled the country by their erudition, their eloquence, and their godliness were traces of a once well-known newspaper manner. As to that we are in no position to judge, save only that the stylists on our staff have noted in the outpourings of both the last administrations certain variations of the presidential style and certain resemblances of text. Doubtless something in the spell of office, in tradition and precedent, in procedure and atmosphere, makes for weasel words and for the phraseology of uplift and service, not to say bunkum. Perhaps one cannot sleep in the bed wherein reposed Roosevelt and Wilson and Harding without unconsciously absorbing some of their pet words. For even a President the English language is circumscribed; and as for a chief clerk of the White House—but we forbear to speculate. We are merely betting dollars to dimes that Judson C. Welliver's successor will be a journalist who knows how to write.

WHATEVER ELSE CONGRESS does this year it should reduce the number of army officers. Never outside of Mexico was there such an over-officered army as ours. With only 132,000 authorized enlisted men we have 12,000 officers, no less than 470 of whom are colonels. There are so many to be placed in worth-while jobs that the War Department is able to waste 745 on teaching the rudiments of military drill to high-school and college boys—a bit of militaristic folly of which the Germans were never guilty in peace time. Hundreds of others are on detached or militia duty and still others are assigned to battalions and companies that muster only a corporal's guard. Unquestionably Congress will be told that the disproportion in officers is due in considerable part to the number of flyers and the necessity of training military reserves, civilians taking courses at the summer camps, etc. It should not be misled. A surplus of officers makes for inefficiency, not efficiency; barring a certain reasonable percentage, all officers should be serving in necessary staff positions or with troops. If there are not troops enough to go around there should be fewer officers. Millions can still be cut out of the army budget without real injury to efficiency. As for the argument that we must have many reserve officers for the event of war, that could be held as well to justify not 12,000 but 20,000 commissions.

OUR COMPLIMENTS to the Springfield Republican. Living up to its fine journalistic traditions it has declined to take part in the conspiracy of silence entered into by the Boston daily newspapers in regard to some strange happenings in Keith's Theater in that city—Keith's Theater, for years Boston's leading vaudeville house, which advertises so regularly in the dailies. But the Republican's Boston correspondent shall tell the tale himself:

> One of the most amazing instances of news suppression that has ever occurred in Boston came to light this week, with the detention of the man who for more than ten weeks has been throwing missiles in a crowded (Keith's) Boston theater, and at practically every performance. For more than a month the facts have been common knowledge in every Boston newspaper office, yet not a single paper had the courage to print the facts. Instead, innocent persons were permitted to attend every performance, with the practical certainty that a deadly missile would be thrown and the probability that some one would be hit. Many, in fact, have been hit, but happily none of the missiles has reached a vital spot, although several women have suffered painful injuries to their limbs.

Yet there are still journalists to declare that Upton Sinclair's strictures on the press were exaggerated and there are still innocent souls who believe that the Boston dailies are faithfully serving the city that supports them.

JOHN W. UNDERWOOD lived until his death in a two-room shack at May's Landing, New Jersey. In it he sold candy to the school children who passed his door. Saving his penny profits he invested in real estate, and when he died he left $100,000 to the school board with the injunction to "spend it so that the school children may enjoy the fruits of my labor." Now, the interesting thing is that Mr. Underwood was a colored man. Yet he left his money to white and colored alike, in marked contrast to a certain white millionaire who recently gave a great sum to found orphanages and said that no colored children should be admitted. There are colored people who will feel outraged that Mr. Underwood did not leave all his money to his own people; that is a reaction from the pressure of prejudice to which they are so wrongly subjected. The effect of our treatment of the colored race is to make them eager to advance themselves at the expense of any other group. We prefer the attitude of Mr. Underwood, candy-seller to school children. He knew whom he wished to help and he gave in complete forgetfulness that the great majority of them had a different color from his own.

TO BE A LANDLORD in these days of few houses and many tenants has great joys. Not only is there the financial harvest to reap; there is the pleasure of condescending toward the universe and of appealing a little more openly to the snobbish instincts of mankind than the vendors of almost any other kind of merchandise. In glancing at advertisements of apartments this autumn we realize as never before what a favor landlords are doing us in exchanging a year's use of three or four cramped, stuffy rooms for the price of a palace on the Grand Canal or a chateau in Touraine. We understand, too, that more than cash is necessary to deal with these modern landlords; we must go hat in hand prepared to justify all our past and present life in an inquiry more searching than that of Saint Peter. We note, for instance, that one apartment house calling itself the "de luxe city home" is the "utmost in exclusiveness," while another announces: "Permanent guests discreetly selected." But we are chiefly awed by "a distinguished residential apartment hotel with a pronounced cachet," where "inquiries for leases" are "now given consideration," although "acceptable social and business references" are "essential."

Mr. Gary Prophesies Prosperity

ELBERT H. GARY has made a speech to the Iron and Steel Institute and—incredible as it seems—he has prophesied prosperity, precious, permanent, proletarian, and princely prosperity, for one and for all. Said he: "I tell you, gentlemen, we are on the verge of a great era of prosperity. Before another meeting of this institute . . . you will be turning down orders. The country is all right."

Steel is the barometer of prosperity, and Gary is steel's prophet. But as we read and reread these stirring remarks a dim remembrance forced itself upon us that once upon a time this prophet had said something of the same kind. Turning to the New York Times, we found that memory had not played us false. There on January 26, 1921, a great headline stared us in the face: "Gary Predicts Business Revival." "Improvement in business conditions in the near future was predicted yesterday by Judge E. H. Gary," we read. By May 28, 1921, he was able to report that business improvement had come "but the rate is slow." Indeed, it was so slow that the July report of his United States Steel Corporation showed the lowest net earnings for any quarter of a year since 1915. None the less, Mr. Gary declared: "We need not shout in triumph, but we are not compelled to feel despondent." By November 19 of the same year he had got back to his old confident note. "Gary Says Great Prosperity Near." He expected "a return to large prosperity in the comparatively near future."

On March 24, 1922, the headline assured us: "Gary Says Business Now Trends Upward." And on May 14 these were his ringing words: "Lasting business based upon sound principles and investment is not far distant." Within two weeks thereafter came the good news that the "era [of] prosperity [is] near us, says Gary." Even on July 25 he was a "strong optimist and altogether hopeful of the future," perhaps because the quarterly net earnings of his corporation had risen from $21,000,000 to $27,000,000.

The country hearkened. So on October 14 came this paean: "Confidence is restored . . . at the present time this country has a better chance for business prosperity than in all its history." By October 28 the country learned from Mr. Gary that "Great Prosperity Is Near." And on December 11, reviewing the prospects for 1923, Mr. Gary declared with all his old firmness and confidence: "If we do not have prosperity this year it will be because of agitation and laws." But somehow or other 1923 failed to react to the magic wand, and so, on September 14 of that year, the prophet threw himself into the breach and "denied that there was a slump." "There is nothing in sight to indicate a serious depression in business in the near future." By October 26 Mr. Gary had once more espied his old friend Prosperity on the horizon. "Prosperity Ahead," he announced. "Let us have faith in the future and do our part, proceeding . . . toward the goal of the prosperity which we know is ahead and which will be greater than ever before." What more natural than in the following December this dauntless optimist should declare that the "outlook for 1924 is good"? "The day of prosperity in the United States cannot easily be restrained," he asserted. Specifying more exactly, Mr. Gary also declared: "There will be success for those who proceed with good judgment, extending and progressing carefully within the limits of their resources"—a sentiment with which we fancy a majority of our fellow-citizens could safely agree. On January 30, 1924, the country was reassured again. Said Mr. Gary: "The business situation looks bright to me." He felt absolutely confident that "business would continue in a sound position if permitted to pursue its own course." Business evidently was allowed to follow its nose in accordance with Mr. Gary's desire, for on April 30 the good news came that "steel earnings were at a new high mark." Mr. Gary was certain that the tide of prosperity would reach its peak around election-time and he thrilled the country by declaring that "God Almighty gave this country its vast resources and opportunities. Nothing can take those possessions away except God Almighty or our own stupidity."

But God Almighty evidently did not respond quite as well as Mr. Gary had hoped, for on July 31 we find him saying: "Nothing that is reasonable and sound and honest can prevent a fair volume of business in this country." On October 29 he was certain that we should have "a wise administration at Washington, a competent and fair-minded Congress, a satisfactory volume of business prosperity."

By December 18 he was on his job again. "Judge Gary predicts a prosperous year." "Industry has turned the corner," he opined; "great business awaits the country in 1925. If it does not materialize it will not be because of lack of conditions or opportunity." Next the judge started the New Year well. On New Year's Day the Times announced that "Gary Is Optimistic." Strangely enough he was, and he was also in a grateful mood. "In view of the extraordinary opportunities offered those who are fortunate enough to be inhabitants [of the United States] every individual should . . . give thanks for a kind and merciful providence."

The height of far-sighted prophecy was, however, touched by Judge Gary on April 8 of this year. In his usual clear-cut, daring, straightforward, and unqualified form of statement he gave voice to this memorable utterance, quite without parallel in the history of prophecy:

> The fundamental conditions of the country at the present time are the best in its history. . . . If the crops this year are as good as they now seem to me to promise; if we have no special session of Congress, and if when Congress does convene there seems to be a disposition to get together and to act together, considering only the best interests of the country; if our banks are reasonably conservative and keep the rates of interest where the volume permits—that is, reasonably low, as now seems possible; if we have no epidemic of any kind in business or otherwise; if, in short, we take advantage of the opportunities for actual success, development, and progress, I believe next fall and through next winter we will have no reason to be frightened by the future. If the business men will keep their heads, if they will keep cool and refuse to be stampeded, if they will utilize the resources which are offered to them, we will have success—big success—in this country.

Fortunate steel industry! Fortunate country to have so wise and able a prophet! Without fear we prophesy that death alone will part Mr. Gary and Madame Prosperity.

Trouble in France

CAILLAUX is out; Painlevé has formed a new Ministry in which he himself takes over the Finance portfolio; and the Left parties have adopted a resolution declaring that they will support only a "government resolved to demand from acquired wealth the sacrifices necessary for the relief of the financial situation of the country." The make-up of the new Cabinet indicates that it will endeavor to carry out that resolution, which is a cautious wording of the demand for a capital levy. So France at last stares bleakly at her own bankruptcy.

A capital levy is an emergency measure. It cannot be applied repeatedly; it is a surgical operation upon the national capital. Caillaux refused to consider it; but France, after years of shillyshallying, at last has a parliamentary majority which is ready to face the necessity for heroic action. Very likely there will be a near-revolution before a capital levy is actually carried out. Some of the financial interests which shout most loudly in war time lose their patriotism when faced with such a proposal. Switzerland, when a capital levy was under discussion, watched her rich men shift their capital to other countries as if a plague had struck the Alps. But some such step has become for France an inescapable necessity.

The franc, worth eighteen cents after the armistice, and well above five cents ever since the Morgan credit of the spring of 1924, has again sunk dangerously close to four cents; and unless some real remedy can be found it will sink lower still. The actual deficit—not the paper deficit—of the year 1924 was, according to the careful estimates of Mr. Harold G. Moulton of the Institute of Economics, approximately 16½ billions of francs. Such savings as Caillaux has been able to make have undoubtedly been wiped out by the added expenses of the wars which France has been waging in Syria and in Morocco. New internal borrowing has become almost impossibly expensive. French investors before the war were content with 3 per cent rente, but when in November, 1924, the French Treasury floated ten-year bonds with a nominal interest rate of 5 per cent, it had to sell them so cheaply that it was in fact paying close to 9 per cent interest on them. Caillaux's attempt to meet the oncoming floods of short-term obligations by offering to convert them into perpetual bonds with interest payable in gold francs was a failure. The French peasants did not jump at his magic bait, and there are 10 billion francs more of these short-term notes to be met on December 8. What can the Treasury do? The one answer that political-minded doctors can see is: Inflate! Issue more paper money; borrow more from the Bank of France! And then the value of the franc will fall again; the franc will follow the old chase after the worthless paper marks and rubles, and sooner or later France will again face, in the midst of worse disorder and chaos, the necessity for complete reorganization.

Something in the nature of a capital levy seems inevitable. It may come in the form of an attempt directly to tax all France's capital (the justest but most difficult form); it may come in the form of a fiat reduction of the interest charges on the public debt; or, conceivably, it may ultimately come as a repudiation of the debt itself. Failure to pay the inter-Allied debts is of course a form of repudiation, but of much less consequence to France's financial position than a failure to pay the domestic debt would be. For it is a curious fact that the great investing banks, little upset when a nation defaults on its nation-to-nation obligations, have conniption fits when loans made by bankers are not paid on the dot.

Senator Borah says France is prosperous. "John D. Rockefeller," he says, "could not pay his laundry bill if he spent all his money in yachts and wines and hunting lodges." And he points to the facts that France since the war has maintained an active army of from 700,000 to a million men, with a reserve force of 4,500,000; that she has more airplanes than Great Britain, the United States, and Japan combined; that she now has 200,000 men fighting to subjugate the Riffians and the Syrians; and that she has made military loans to her lesser European allies. All that is true. It inevitably enters into the mind of any intelligent American considering the question of the inter-Allied debts. But the amazing fact is that if France wiped out her entire military budget she would not be financially on her feet. Eighty per cent of her entire revenue from taxation—and she has enormously increased her taxes since the war—goes to pay interest on her public debt. If she scrapped her entire army she would still have a deficit of nearly ten billion francs.

Her inescapable problem, then, is to reduce the public debt. And if she is to do that it will have to be by sacrifices on the part of her men of wealth. The Left parties justly demand that men of wealth be forced to make sacrifices. If they refuse, if they use the conservative Senate as a fortress from which to fight any effort to make them sacrifice, they will only be calling on the deluge. No country is revolution-proof when its rich men refuse to heed the writing on the wall.

An American Paradox

MR. BURNS MANTLE undertakes each fall to issue an anthology which contains in somewhat abbreviated form the text of the ten best plays of the previous theatrical season in New York. In the preface to the latest volume, just issued, he announces with some jubilance that for the first time during the six years that he has performed his self-appointed task he can find it in his conscience to name ten American plays as the best ten, and there seems, indeed, no good reason to quarrel with his judgment. If we consider, as we have a right to do, that such established plays as "The Wild Duck" and "Candida," to say nothing of "The Way of the World" and "Love for Love," are hors concours, then Mr. Mantle's main contention is indisputable. Ten is rather a large number; half of his list is composed of the titles of works whose modest merits make the question of their relative superiority to certain imported pieces of comparable excellence not worth discussion, and the omission of "Processional" is unfortunate; but that five—"What Price Glory," "They Knew What They Wanted," "Desire Under the Elms," "The Firebrand," and "Wild Birds"—are better than any play newly imported from England or the Continent will readily be granted by nearly every student of the New York stage.

Now, this fact is a phenomenon. For the first time in the history of the American theater the native playwright has supplied it with its most interesting works. But there is another phenomenon equally interesting by no means so surely a cause for jubilation. Of the five playwrights who contributed the five indisputably best plays only one had previously written with conspicuous success for the stage and thus only one has shown that he can be called a distinguished dramatist rather than merely the author of one distinguished play. Eugene O'Neill is no mere comet; he at least is a star sufficiently fixed to be sure of some sort of place in the history of the American drama. But there is no certain reason for believing that the authors of the other four may not disappear as many other meteors and comets have disappeared from our literary firmament, leaving us to scan the skies again and to acclaim new discoveries with new hope.

This fact is the paradox of our contemporary literature and it is observable in the fields of poetry and fiction as well as of the drama. In any given year American books seem as a whole to compare favorably with those which Europe sends us, but our writers build no reputations comparable to those of their transatlantic fellows. We are rich in novels but not in novelists, in poems but not in poets, in plays but not in playwrights. We may rejoice in last year's theatrical season and we may have good reason to suspect that no other country in the world produced so much good work, but before the skeptical Englishman who asks "Where is your Shaw, your Maugham, or your Barrie?" we must remain in embarrassed silence, for we know that they are not.

Our skeptical Englishman draws his own conclusions. We are, he says, a nation of enthusiasts and we are so eager for heroes that we make them overnight. We set up the exultant cry "A genius at last!" and then, next year, we find him out. Nor is this Englishman entirely wrong. There probably never was a time or place where it was as easy to get a book published or a play produced as it is in the United States today, and certainly the young aspirant to literary honors was never so promptly crowned and so eagerly acclaimed. Writers leap into fame and disappear into obscurity within a period of time less than that which served Shaw for his obscure apprenticeship, and reputations are apparently consolidated before they are submitted to any real test.

The situation has another aspect. Literary interest and literary talent are extraordinarily diffused in America. Nearly everybody can read, nearly everybody can write, and, as a result, almost anyone with anything to say is sure of a hearing. Perhaps he is even sure of more success than he deserves and, perhaps, he is thus exposed to the danger of never being compelled to do the best of which he is capable. But our experiment in hospitality is at least a new experiment and it seems to be justified by its fruits.

No world figure has emerged, but none, we suspect, has been actually killed with kindness, and we have at least received from each what he had to give. Five good plays, five genuine contributions to a living theater, represent an achievement worthy of respect even if we must, as it were, glean them here and there and consider them as the produce of a general movement rather than as a proof that any outstanding genius has appeared. We are laying a broad foundation. Every year a large company, not ill endowed, sets out in quest of fame, and the prizes are many. It is not easy to discover in the eager melee the man supremely endowed, and perhaps, indeed, he has not yet appeared. Yet it is surely in the midst of just such a company that he may, sooner or later, be expected.

A Clipper Ship's End

THE newspapers have been telling us that the last of our wooden clipper ships has made her final voyage. After bringing a cargo of lumber from Puget Sound, by way of the Panama Canal, the Benjamin F. Packard has been left in idleness until a tug shall throw a hawser impudently around her capstan and drag her ignominiously away to the scrap-heap. Unless—unless, perhaps, some plan to save her shall come to a head first.

Of course one is bound to squint pretty hard at the phrase "the last wooden clipper ship." We surmise that something of the sort is likely to furnish the newspapers good sentimental stories for a number of years to come. We well recall, for instance, "the last horse car in New York City." It took its "last trip" ten or a dozen times in as many years. Somebody was always discovering a final last horse car about to make its authentic farewell trip, and even today we should not be surprised to find some morning beside the coffee and rolls an announcement that an extra final last horse car was preparing for its positively authentic farewell trip.

So it is likely to be with the square-rigged sailing ship. We have been singing its swan song for a quarter of a century, but even today one can hardly take the ferry from the Battery to Staten Island without seeing a square-rigger at anchor somewhere in upper New York Bay. Of course there are square-riggers and square-riggers. The more careful newspaper historians have been at pains to describe the Benjamin F. Packard as the last American wooden full-rigged ship. This is important because during the final years in which the world was still building square-rigged sailing vessels most of them were constructed in England, almost all of them were made with iron instead of wooden hulls, and for the greater part they were barques rather than full-rigged ships. So it happens that the square-riggers one sees afloat today are usually iron barques or barquentines, and fly a foreign flag.

A good many years ago, when square-riggers began to prove unprofitable for Americans to operate, many of our vessels were sold to Scandinavians, and it is possible that there are still American-built, wooden, full-rigged ships under the flag of Norway, Sweden, or Denmark. But members of the Neptune Association—New York City's organization of masters and pilots—seem to agree with the newspaper reporters that the Packard is the last wooden full-rigged ship under the Stars and Stripes.

The exact sequence of the Packard in the long wake of glory which American clipper ships left on the Seven Seas doesn't matter greatly. What is more important is that this vessel, although built in 1883, is almost as sound and seaworthy as when she left the shipyard at Camden, Maine. Her captain said upon arrival in New York harbor that he had not had to man the pumps once since leaving Panama. And whether she is the last of her kind or not, she probably represents the final opportunity for some yachting or other nautical organization to acquire in good condition one of these historic vessels and preserve it intact as a clubhouse. A group of men in the New York Maritime Exchange has such a plan under advisement.

What a place for spinning salty yarns the roomy old cabin would make! What a reminder of American sea history her rugged hull and towering spars would be!

At a Peasant Soviet

By MAURICE G. HINDUS

HE was an uncommonly handsome youth, of not more than twenty-five, short, wiry, agile, with a round blond head, a mobile face, snapping blue eyes, shrewd, good-humored, and overhung by heavy light-brown brows. Himself a peasant, he was dressed simply enough in a faded black blouse with big coarse patches under the arms and in large boots with the freshly applied grease sparkling in little pools in the folds of the leggings. He looked more like a college athlete fit for the football squad than chairman of a village Soviet in Russia, and seemed dismally out of place in the stuffy little corner room where he had his office with its paper-littered floor, its fly-festered windows, its wabbly old table strewn with heaps of documents, and the crowds of peasants coming daily to unload their burdens before him.

For several days I had been a visitor at his office studiously observing the streams of humanity, ragged, smelly, hardy men and women from the surrounding countryside passing in and out of its portals. Did a man steal apples from his neighbor? Was a son neglectful of his aged father or mother? Did a mujik beat his wife? Did a boy wrong a girl? Did a girl object to marrying the man her father had chosen for her as a husband? Did a peasant discover a neighbor's cow or pig in his garden or potato field? Was he too poor to pay his tax; or was he without a horse, a plow, a wagon? They all came to him for counsel and aid, and they recited their grievances with the earnestness, simplicity, pathos which distinguish the speech of the Russian peasant and which make him one of the most affecting talkers in the world.

One day an old woman came dressed in mud-soaked bark-sandals and a tattered jacket, the pockets of which were stuffed with black bread and apples. She was leaning on a tall cane, as bent and battered as she was herself with her humped back, her swollen eyelids, her unwashed face, and her toothless mouth. Timidly and with trembling hands she pulled out of her bony bosom a roll of yellow papers and laid it before the youthful chairman of the Soviet.

"You have no idea, my beloved," she pleaded, nodding her head in sorrow, "how unfortunate I am, so old, so crippled in body, so abandoned. Do sign these papers."

He unwound the various sheets, hurriedly ran his eyes over them, then rolled them together again, fastened the string about the roll, and returned it to her. "Listen, little grandmother," he said gently, addressing her in the parlance of the mujik, "why don't you do as I have told you to? What is the use of coming before me again, if you fail to follow my advice?"

"Ah, dearest," she supplicated, "don't refuse me the favor this time, please don't. It is my land the brute is on, and if I do not get him off soon, the summer will pass, the fall will follow, I shall have no rye seeded and no wheat, and I shall have nothing to harvest, not a single stalk of grain, and I shall be without bread, yes, beloved, without a mouthful of food, like an old cow without a master."

"But," he replied impatiently, "if you do not take the case to the land court and bring witnesses and have a proper hearing as I have advised you, you'll never do any seeding. Can't you see that?"

"Again you tell me witnesses," she burst out in wrathful despair, "when I have told you that nobody wants to testify in my behalf. They are afraid of that brute; he is rich, has loads of hay and rye and wheat and oats, and they are afraid to displease him, this brother-in-law of mine, lest he refuse to make loans to them, and besides, of what good are witnesses? He is on my land, and if you sign these papers I can drive him off like a pig that's dug his way into a garden."

He frowned and shook his head in refusal. "I cannot do it, I cannot sign your papers, I have no right to, it is against the law. Do you understand, little grandmother?" he protested with weary exasperation in his voice.

"But what's the law got to do with it? O, my God!" she wrung her hands in dismay, "how can the law keep me from chasing him off my land? How? And it is my land, soaked in my sweat, in my blood, in mine and in my deceased Peter's."

The chairman turned to me with a bitter smile on his lips, like a man whose patience was at an end and who struggled desperately to keep from bursting into wrath. I was moved to pity for him, so youthful, so earnest, so tormented with impossible petitions; and even more for her, an illiterate, battered, broken-hearted woman, with no conception of the meaning of the law, thinking of life and the world, like most mujiks of the older generation, in terms of immediate needs, the gratification of which depended upon the whim or will of the individual official.

"Please," she pleaded again, advancing a step nearer and holding out to him the roll of papers, "please, beloved, sign them—master chairman."

At the mention of the word master he straightened up in his seat with a start and scowled at her. "What? 'Master chairman'?" he growled. "And what sort of a master am I to you? Don't you know that we have driven all the masters out of the land? Don't you know that we have no more masters in our Soviet Republic, that now we are all only tovarishchi (comrades)?"

His loud voice cowed her, and, shriveled as she was, she curled up even more, like a cat in the face of an enemy, and as she stood there humped up, leaning on her twisted cane with her head dropped low, she was to me a symbol of self-abasement, the self-abasement of the mujik, this ageless and deathless sphinx, who has survived slaveries, invasions, monarchies, revolutions, plagues, and famines; who is so simple, so humble, yet so shrewd, so untamed, so tantalizing, and so likable, and who now and for years to come will constitute Russia's chief burden and chief sorrow, whatever the government that is in power.

"How should I know?" she apologized meekly, "what is the right or the wrong way of addressing you? A worthless old fool I am, dark and ignorant, in lapti (bark-sandals) that leak, and in rags that protect neither from rain nor wind, a poor creature whom even a learned man like you disdains to rescue from the evil spirits that toss her around like a piece of carrion. . . ."

"There is no use imploring me," he replied, "to sign your papers. I cannot do it."

"What do you mean you cannot?" she protested. "A literate, learned man you are and not a dark-minded fool like me, and here is a pen and ink on your table, and here are the papers. Just sign them and save me from ruin, and I shall always think of you in kindness and good-will, and I shall always speak well of you and praise you to all people, aye, and the good Lord will bless you."

She paused and waited, but he made no reply. "Please, beloved," she resumed meekly, "please master, beloved master," and as he raised his eyes toward her she checked herself instantly and apologized profusely. "Nu, let it be comrade chairman. It is all the same to me, comrade, master, if you only sign my papers."

He shifted uneasily in his seat and frowned. "I am sorry, little grandmother. I cannot violate laws. If I do, I'll be put in jail. You are only wasting time here, your own and mine. Come with your witnesses any day, and the land court will give you a hearing, and if your witnesses refuse to come, let me know, and I'll bring them here, even if I have to send the militia after them. But I personally can do nothing for you. Do you understand?" and after a brief pause he added, "Please!" and motioned for her to step aside and make room for the barefooted mujik with the long russet beard who stood patiently waiting for his turn.

She did not stir from her place. The roll of papers dropped from her hands, and as she stooped down to pick it up she began to sob, quietly, convulsively. He begged her to cease sobbing, but she only shrugged her shoulders and wiped her eyes with her red bony fingers. The other peasants in the room and in the vestibule crowded close and gazed at her with uplifted faces and whispered solemn words to one another. The chairman motioned to the bearded man to draw closer, and as he was moving around her so as to come face to face with the chairman she swiftly and wildly elbowed him out of the way, leaped a step forward, and in the next instant she was on her knees, wailing piteously and reaching out for the chairman's hand to kiss it—as peasants have been accustomed to doing since days immemorial.

Hardly had she touched her lips to his hand, when he jerked it back, and sprang to his feet, pale, infuriated, like an animal threatened with attack. He gazed at her in terror and wrath. "Rise, little grandmother," he thundered imperiously. But she remained lying prone on the floor, a huddle of flesh and bones quivering with despair.

"Rise, I tell you," he shouted again. "Rise, little grandmother, rise at once. Slowly she clambered to her feet, choking with sobs and rubbing her eyes with her soiled sleeves. He shook his head at her in silent reproof, and then leaped upon the little backless bench near his desk and turned to the mob of peasants that had gathered there.

"Listen, mujiks, listen, tovarishchi," he began, pointing a stern forefinger at them. "When are you going to cease enacting such shameful scenes? When are you going to learn that the Czar is no longer in power, that the landlords are no longer ruling you? When are you going to learn that you are no longer serfs? When are you going to learn you are men and women and not dogs who have to lick the hands of their masters? When are you, dark mujiks, going to cease disgracing yourselves? O, shame on you! You come here and cringe before me and want to kiss my hand and get down on your knees and speak endearing words to me, yes, and bring me bribes, butter and pork and eggs and even home-made vodka, which you are not allowed to make, thinking that you can flatter me into doing favors for you in violation of the law of the Soviets and the honor of the Revolution. O, you silly and ignorant and impossible mujiks! Do you think that your obeisance flatters me? Do you think that your bribes can turn me traitor? Don't you know that we, revolutionaries, despise such homage? What was this Revolution for—tell me—what was it for, if not to set you free and to make you feel that you are the equal of everybody? When will you learn that you are no longer to bow or kneel before anyone or kiss the hand of any human being? When will you learn to be men, proud and brave and self-reliant? When will you learn that I and my associates in this Soviet are here to talk to you, to help you, to serve you, and if necessary to discipline and punish you, but never, never, to receive homage from you, never, never to receive gifts from you? Don't you know that we are mujiks like yourselves? Why can't you be honest with us? Why do you persist in acting as though you belonged to one race and we to another, as though we were here merely for the purpose of inflicting hardship and pain upon you? Why do you persist in exposing so openly and shamelessly your slavish souls?"

He paused as though for a reply. But none came. Not a voice rose in response or comment. They stared at him, those hardy peasants, with wide-open eyes and drawn faces as though craving further admonition. Presently he dismounted from the bench, went back to his seat, and quietly resumed his hearings.

To me it seemed that I was not in the office of a Soviet, of a government institution, but in a classroom, or rather in a kindergarten, a new and significant kindergarten for grown men and women. Communism. World Revolution. How frightened the world is of these words. What wrath and terror they have stirred, and what hate. I was scarcely aware of their existence or their meaning as I sat there in the crowded village Soviet, in that extraordinary kindergarten tucked away in the fat mudlands of Central Russia. For there, far from railroads and from the hubbub of civilization, I heard revolutionaries teaching peasants not the creed of communism, not the gospel of world revolution, but a more prosaic and elementary message—the need and the glory of self-respect.

An Experiment in Freedom

By WILLIAM RESWICK

FOR years Dzerjinsky, former head of the Cheka, has been pictured abroad as the living and palpable terror of the Revolution, who stops before nothing to crush the faintest resistance to the Soviet regime. In Russia enemies of the Soviets tremble at the mere mention of his name, while communists and non-partisans, among them scientists, artists, and writers, who have had personal dealings with Dzerjinsky ridicule the very idea of his so-called cruelty, insisting rumor created an imaginary man-eater.

Dzerjinsky alone is silent, rarely speaks in public, and has never uttered a syllable on the subject. The commissar is known as Russia's hardest worker, his chief pastime being an occasional visit to his "baby" farm, an experiment in penal reform that has the attention of all Russia.

The experiment begun by Dzerjinsky, Yagoda, and Menjinsky, the latter two now actively directing the All Russian GPU (Government Political Bureau), is an attempt to turn some of the worst juvenile criminals in Russia into decent human beings with a sense of honor, duty, and responsibility. Some of the boys on whom the experiment is being tried have committed no less than ten murders each. All of them were burglars, thieves, opium fiends. What Dzerjinsky, Yagoda, and Menjinsky are trying to prove is that given a change of environment the worst of criminals, especially in his youth, may be made into a decent, useful member of society.

To prove their claim the three Commissaries went into the Buterki Prison and picked about fifty of the worst specimens in juvenile crime. The boys were taken to one of the fine estates in the suburbs of Moscow and were told that henceforth they were entirely free to stay on the estate or go wherever they pleased. Should they decide to remain they must make up their minds to learn a trade, to learn to read and write, and try to manage the place on an efficient basis so that in time they might make it a paying proposition and thus maintain themselves instead of being subsidized by the government. There was to be no police, no guards of any kind, no outside restrictions or discipline whatever, except such rules of conduct as the young men might formulate for themselves.

The only outsiders assigned to share the premises with the boys were a superintendent, formerly a director of schools under the Czar, and a staff of teachers, the understanding being that under no circumstances were they to impose their will upon or even mildly criticize the pupils. The criminals were advised to organize a sort of commune and elect their managing committees.

The experiment was started less than a year ago. About six months later I went to the colony accompanied by the superintendent and Braginsky, who has spent years in jail in close association with criminals and now acts as a sort of friend and adviser and does it quite skilfully by speaking to the boys in their own lingo.

We arrived at the estate about 4 p. m., shortly after the boys quit work and were out on the campus in groups, playing football. They were quite free in their manners and speech. Most of them appeared well fed, ruddy, broad-shouldered, and broad-chested; their eyes sparkled with health and vigor. It was difficult to believe that only a year or two ago these boys were murderers and ruffians.

Here, as everywhere else, Russian hospitality proved to be the invariable rule. Before we were shown anything, the youngsters took us to the kitchen and there had the cook—one of them—give us kasha, borsht, and roast beef. It was as wholesome and palatable a meal as one could hope to find anywhere in Russia. While we ate, exchanging compliments with our hosts, the word was passed to open the workshops. The boys cleared out in a jiffy and in less than ten minutes the colony lost the aspect of a boarding school. From various buildings came the buzz of whirling wheels, while in the distance we heard the rhythmic ring of blacksmiths' hammers striking steel.

A short walk across the yard brought us into a small but exceedingly well-appointed shoe shop. Here about fifteen youngsters were cutting, sewing, and finishing. The foreman, formerly a shoe operator in New York, told us with pride that the pupils are beginning to turn out some excellent work, and that the shop is no longer an experiment, as it was actually filling orders placed by various government concerns. We next visited a furniture plant with electric saws and all the rest of the paraphernalia of a modern furniture factory. This workshop was much larger than the shoe plant. Here about twenty-five boys worked as carpenters. From the furniture place we went into the blacksmith shop, where we found a slightly deaf, middle-aged blacksmith in a leather apron, watching four young giants blazing away at red-hot iron.

"These," whispered one of the escorts, "were all highwaymen and murderers with a record of killing people with their bare fists."

Our next stop was at the dairy, where we found about thirty cows and two bulls. Alongside the dairy was a stable with some fourteen horses and a number of wagons and sleighs. There was a stall full of hogs, a beehive, a fine poultry run, and a yard full of pigeons. All the property on the estate, factories, cows, horses, etc., the boys regard as their own, but life on the farm is not all work. The lads have their pleasures as well. They have their own orchestra, choir, classes, a dramatic circle, and a small theater with a miniature stage.

Dusk was coming on fast, and we made haste to get back to Moscow. As I sat in the car, shaking hands with the boys and bidding them goodby, I questioned some of them as to their political views. To my great surprise it appeared that only one in the crowd knew that May 1 was a revolutionary holiday, and even he did not know why or how. The rest of the boys simply knew that it was some sort of holiday but they were hazy as to whether it was a religious holiday or not. Braginsky explained that Dzerjinsky and his colleagues do not care to propagandize the youngsters, preferring to have them form their political views after they get on their feet mentally.

Theater and Revolution

By MICHAEL GOLD

A WORLD exploded. Monuments of dogma scattered like leaves. Ponderous sanities—Money, Career, Comfort, Titles—spouted like sterile rocks from a volcano. Mountains danced the Carmagnole. The stars clanged out the Internationale. All seemed madness to old eyes.

Great days. Boys became men overnight, girls women. Intellectuals who had been sincere liberals for twenty-five years discovered suddenly that they hated the workers, and escaped the country, chattering. Old peasant women began wanting to know how to read and write. Socialists joined the Czarist forces. Former Czarist generals joined the Bolsheviks.

Young drudge-minded factory workers, accustomed to obeying the foreman and to crossing themselves when meeting a priest, cast off their fear of God and man and learned to think and command.

The world was upside down; the money-maker was a pariah and outlaw; the revolutionists became the pillars of society.

It was the Revolution—the end of everything—the beginning of everything. But Mr. Stanislavsky was not impressed.

All through the titan clamor of worlds crashing, the Moscow Art Theater went on playing its gentle, weary little play about sad, aimless little people, "The Cherry Orchard."

While the proletarian Apocalypse thundered, Mr. Stanislavsky, noted director, grieved because good laundresses were scarce in Moscow; his collars were not being starched properly. (At least so an interviewer reported: "Art Is Dead, Weakly Mutters Noted Director as He Presses Own Pants.")

And all over Russia, while art, Mr. Stanislavsky, and the world he represented were dead, the theater bloomed riotously like spring in a thousand fat valleys. In dark mujik villages, in typhus cities and famine provinces, the workers, soldiers, and peasants crowded to thousands of improvised theaters. They needed this. They discovered this. Stages on motor trucks, theaters in icy barns and stables, in union halls, in army barracks, streets, and dugouts. The first revolutionary plays were bold and crude propaganda, like poster art or oratory. They were meant to teach and inspire simple men; they were as naive and earnest as those medieval Christian miracle plays out of which Shakespeare ultimately flowered.

Reconstruction has come in Soviet Russia; the dark days are over and these workers' theaters are flourishing more than ever.

All over the land, in factories, villages, and wherever workers, soldiers, and peasants congregate, the neo-primitive stage flourishes and presents plays bearing such monotonous titles as Red Dawn, Red Earth, Death of a Red Soldier, The Red Star, The Red Wedding, Reds and Whites, Under the Red Flag, The Red Worker.

Titles for bourgeois intellectuals to smile at; so naive. But Red Dawn is a precise symbol of the present hour in Russia. Men must begin somewhere. These theaters of the red dawn are the baby-stammerings of a young giant class growing up into mastery of the world.

The Moscow Art Theater, against this background, seems like a museum where the past is reconstructed for one. The audience is the same audience—the stranded intelligentsia who could not grow with the Revolution. They sit in the classic theater with its gray, sea-gull curtains, and dream they are back in the lovely past, when all was so gray, mystic, and Czarist. The new business man is found there, too, with his wife, mopping up what for years he has been assured is the A 1 quality in the art market.

Other theaters, besides the Moscow Art, cater to this dwindling and incongruous audience. But the masses, the youth, the rising class of worker-intellectuals, soldier-intellectuals, peasant-intellectuals—these go elsewhere.

They are the new audience in Russia, and they have shaken the professional stage from top to bottom. They have let in a great blast of heroism and freedom. There are at least thirty popular experimental theaters in Moscow run on a professional basis that have adapted themselves to the new audience. These theaters have broken up the stiffness, the drawing-room stuffiness, the parliamentary talkiness of the old stage. Acrobatic actors race up and down a dozen planes of action. The drawing-room play has been thrown on the junk-pile of history. Things happen—broad, bold, physical things, as in the workers' lives. There are danger and the feel of elementals. Music and dancing and the circus have been brought back on the stage. Shots are fired—masses pour to and fro. Belly-laughter and high tragedy live side by side, as they did in the glorious plays of the Elizabethans. Satire and heroism—the silliness of the bourgeois world and the heroism of the proletarian world—these are the basic themes of the new stage. Longshoremen, factory workers in overalls, Red soldiers, athletes, clowns—these are some of the new figures that dance and shout there.

Machinery has been made a character in the drama. City rhythms, the blare of modernism, the iron shouts of industrialism, these are actors. Paradox is an honored guest at the feast. Vitality and youth and courage are the Three Graces. And futurism is the fantastic godmother of this swarm of new theaters in Russia; futurism, the cult of a few odd persons in New York. In Russia these futurist theaters are the popular theaters—the mob wants the best in art, the individualist clings to the old and shoddy. The young factory workers, young soldiers, and roughnecks whistle and cheer and enjoy themselves riotously with futurism.

Every theater has its own style in Moscow, the city I got to know best. There is a theater of improvisation; there is the Jewish Kamerny, a marvelous synthetic theater of music and comedy. There is the Prolet-Cult Theater, with its combination of circus and tragedy; the Children's Theater, and the opera companies that have revived the respectable corpse of Western opera and made it dance and laugh with new life. Machine-dance theaters; poets' theaters; peasant theaters; theaters of satire, science, revolution. And each is different: an experiment, fresh, audacious, startling.

And there are plays given by 40,000 proletarians in a city square. And gas-worker plays given at the gas factory, and other such experiments in mass-theater.

Meyerhold is the leader of the young Russian theater. His twenty-fifth anniversary in the theater was celebrated while I was in Moscow, and hundreds of thousands of workers demonstrated in his honor, as if he were a great general or political leader. Before the Revolution he was chief of the largest theater in Petrograd; but unlike the Cherry Orchard intellectuals he did not cry that art was dead and flee the country. He yielded himself body and mind to the great passion of revolution; and gained a new world. He had always been a restless inventor and experimenter, a conflagration of ideas; but the Revolution gave him the audience and the themes he had been blindly striving toward for so many years.

His bare, immense stage is stripped for action, like a steel mill or factory. The flat curtainists and decorative scene painters have been abolished from his stage, and architects have taken their place. Intricate structures, like huge machines created for a function, furnish the scaffolding on which actors race and leap and walk from plane to plane. All that was static in the old theater has been stamped out. This is the theater of dynamics; the moving picture is its avowed model. Drawing-room plays have no place here. This theater is the battle-field of life; it is a trench, a factory, the deck of a ship in storm. And the young workers and soldiers adore the futurist director, Meyerhold. He has influenced every theater in new Russia.

Red Russia is not only the world's laboratory in the forms of collective living; it is also a world laboratory in the arts and sciences. For the next decade young students from everywhere will be pouring there for new ideas as they went to Italy during the Renaissance.

Poems of Revolution

By VLADIMIR MAYAKOVSKY

Translated by Joseph Freeman and Leon Talmy

Our March

Beat on the street the march of rebellion,
Sweeping over the heads of the proud;
We, the flood of a second deluge,
Shall wash the world like a bursting cloud.

Days are a bright steed;
Years drag glum;
Our great god is—Speed!
Our heart a bellowing drum!

What is richer than our colors?
Can we be caught by the bullet's sting?
For rifles and bayonets we have ballads;
Our gold is our voices' ring!

Green meadows grow,
Days burst by—
Rainbow, curve your bow!
Hurrying horses, fly!

See the stars in heaven above us.
Our songs without their help will thrive:
Eh, the Great Bear is demanding
We be lifted to heaven alive!

Sing! Drink sweet!
Our veins flow Spring!
Beat, heart, beat!
Breast of brass, ring!

Decree to the Army of Art

They brag, the old men's brigades,
Of the same old wearisome goals.
Comrades,
To the barricades!
Barricades of hearts and souls.
He alone is a Communist true
Who burns the bridge for retreat,
Stop marching slowly, Futurists,
Into the future—leap!
Engines are easy to build,
Wind the wheels and they go—
But hurl your song like a bomb,
There's a railway depot to blow!
Pile up sound on sound,
March on
With whistle and song;
Loud ringing letters abound
To roll
Under
Your tongue.
Pants creased like a feather's edge—
That's the easy officer's way;
All the soviets won't budge the troops
Unless the musicians play.
Drag pianos into the street,
Let drums rend the air asunder,
Whether drums or pianos beat,
Let tumult be,
Let thunder!
What good to slave in a shop,
To soil your face and growl,
Why stare at the joy
Of others,
Flapping your eyes like an owl?
Enough of pennywise talk—
Wipe the old from the heart who dares!
The streets shall be our brushes,
Our palettes shall be the squares.
The thousand-paged Book of Time
Revolution's songs shall know:
Into the streets, Futurists,
Drummers and poets, go!

What They Read in Soviet Russia

By LOUIS FISCHER

Moscow, October 4

SOVIET RUSSIA is busy devouring the printed word. There are more bookstores in Moscow's central business section than tonsorial parlors, shoe stores, lunch rooms, jewelry emporiums, men's furnishing shops, and watchmakers combined. And each time I return to the Red metropolis there are a few more. In Moscow alone 388 publishing houses work unceasingly to supply a never-saturated market; in Leningrad there are 171 more. The total for the entire country is probably near a thousand. Some are two-by-four establishments, many are much bigger, and one, the Gosisdat, or State Publishing Company, is among the largest in the world, its 1924 output having been 27,000,000 books.

Some of the Gosisdat's products enjoy fabulous circulation. Thus, during the last two years the nineteen volumes of Lenin's collected works have had a grand sale of 1,900,000 copies. A book or brochure from the pen of Trotzky invariably goes through a first edition of 30,000 to 40,000, and often through another of equal size. Bucharin, whose subjects are heavy problems of Marxian philosophy, is a best seller. In 1924 145,000 copies of his works were sold, in the first half of 1925 160,000. No writer of fiction can compete with him. He has outdistanced even Jack London, who, after a high wave of popularity in 1923 when the country quickly exhausted 10,000 editions of twenty of his titles, has now settled down to a more moderate demand.

According to the files of the Gosisdat which were opened to me, the average sale in 1924 of a book which comes under the rubric of belles lettres was 8,300, of a publication in the politico-economic class 19,000, of one on Soviet problems and current politics 21,000. Generally speaking, the character of the things read is what the Russians call "serious." For every book of fiction published there are, it is estimated, five which deal with economic, scientific, political, and social questions. Partly, this circumstance is explained by the nature of the publishing houses. One really cannot expect the Russian Communist Party or the Leningrad Soviet or the Commissariat for Foreign Affairs, each of which has its own press, to print Victor Hugo or Tolstoi or even Seifulina to any great extent. But largely, the predominance of the serious is due to the unconstrained taste of the reading public.

Time was when the Bolsheviks attempted, in vain incidentally, to dictate the nation's reading ration. Early in the revolution, for instance, they printed five million copies of the "A B C of Communism" by Bucharin and Preobrazhensky, distributed these free of charge, and said in effect: "Swallow this first. Then we'll feed you some more." No vestige remains of such tactics. Now the variety of books is endless, and all are bought and paid for. More than that, they are read, they are worn and torn as they pass from hand to hand. Books whose sole purpose is the decoration of library tables do not exist. Ninety-nine per cent of the books printed in Soviet Russia have soft, paper covers, usually ugly. The others have hard, paper covers.

In 1924 13,500 titles were published in 109,900,000 copies which contained over 12 billion pages. It is very likely correct to say that these figures for all of 1924 were exceeded in the first half of the current year, for during January-July, 1925, 6,245 titles came from the presses of Moscow alone, and 3,070 from those of Leningrad. These data, by the by, originate with Glavlit, the Soviet institution which censors every syllable that appears in the land. Not a manuscript, be it from the hand of a Stalin or a Zinoviev, not a magazine or newspaper, be it even the official organ of the state or Communist Party, not a theater poster or advertising placard or old clothes man's throw-out may be printed without its special permission. The chief of this ubiquitous censoring machine tells me that in the course of 1924 not more than 126 manuscripts, or approximately 1.1 per cent of all submitted, were returned to their authors with a "Not Acceptable" slip attached. The Glavlit lies in ambush for the politically objectionable, the counter-revolutionary; it has nothing in common with vice crusaders or American movie censorship. But, especially to the persons affected, it is none the less hateful for that reason. The head of the Glavlit makes no secret of the fact that there is no "freedom of the word" in Soviet Russia. It is only out of the inconsistent goodness of their hearts that the authorities permit the Anarchists, Zionists, and Poale-Zionists to have their own little presses.

The hold which the Bolsheviks have on the book market is very strong and far-reaching; it is one of the most important political weapons they control. The largest publishers in the country are the State Publishing Company, the Russian Communist Party, the federal commissariats, the municipal soviets, the cooperatives, and the trade unions. No more than seven books in every hundred are issued by private publishing houses. But these are private merely to the extent that they are not official. A private publisher may be a group of individual Communists or a school of pro-Soviet poets.

By virtue of the censorship and of their almost perfect control of book production, the Bolsheviks have it within their power to direct the reading of the nation. But except in a few cases they are quite sensible to popular demand. Nor is there a ban upon the old masters. Early in 1923 the Gosisdat printed 15,000 copies of Dostoevsky's "Crime and Punishment." The records I have seen indicate that 9,000 copies are still in the warehouses, unsold. On the other hand, a 15,000 edition of "The House of the Dead"—which answers more to the interests of the times—was completely sold out. Half of a 1923 10,000 edition of Lermontov cannot be disposed of to this day, and editions of Belinsky, Uspensky, Goncharov, Krylov, Pushkin, and other classic authors which the Bolsheviks found time to publish in the worst and most fanatical years of military communism have met with a similar fate.

In this connection the statistics of a typical Moscow library which I visited the other day are illuminating. The readers who frequent the institution are in the "average citizen" class—students, women who keep house, some workers, private business men, officials, physicians, and intelligentsia. Two or three per cent are Communists. (The Communists have their own club and party libraries.) And these readers, most of whom may be grouped under the heading of "bourgeoisie," demand books by Lenin and on Leninism more than anything else.

To judge the tastes of the reading public we will use the ten-mark system. Leaving Lenin out of consideration, Jack London would receive a mark of ten. For every ten persons who ask for London there are ten who ask for Leo Tolstoi and ten for Gorki; eight for Korolenko and Chekov, seven for Nekrassov and Turgeniev, five for Dostoievsky, four for Gogol, and two for Pushkin—these two, according to the librarian in charge, being students who must read him for school. With respect to fiction by modern non-Russians, Upton Sinclair would be marked 8. (Sinclair's popularity is waning, says the librarian; "He does not meet the artistic requirements of the public"), Zola 7, Wells 6, O. Henry 6, and Rolland 4. Joseph Conrad, whom Russia knew before the revolution, benefited recently by a sudden boom, but has again faded from view. As to the new Russian authors, the distinctions would be: Erenburg 10, Seifulina and Alexei Tolstoi 8, and Pilniak 5.

In this predominantly non-Communist library, where Lenin outranks even Tolstoi and Jack London, Bucharin is marked 6 and Trotzky 5. It is the consensus of opinion among all persons consulted that while the general public is still reading more fiction than any other type of writing the curve of books on social and economic problems, and especially on matters dealing with international politics, is going rapidly up. The non-party mass is commencing to read and to buy more frankly communist literature. On the other hand, people note a tendency of Communists to seek relaxation in easy fiction. They are sadly overburdened with work, and tired. After sixteen hours a day of tense office activity and exacting party duties they cannot settle down to a treatise on values and profits or to a dissertation on the sinister motives of the Dawes Plan.

When we speak of the Russian reading public we mean the inhabitants of the cities. With the exception of a very thin stratum of peasant intelligentsia, the village never read. The average mujik may know Tolstoi as a heretic anathematized by the Greek Catholic Church, but hardly as a writer. The real beginning of a change was made in 1924, when the Gosisdat took the first cautious step. This year it will print 60,000,000 books for village consumption in very cheap five- or ten-kopeck editions. The experience of the peasant magazines and newspapers (unknown before 1917), whose subscription lists often mounted to 500,000 and more in a twelvemonth, has proved that the village wants to read. If this desire remains—it almost certainly will—and if the "liquidation" of illiteracy continues to make progress, it is not impossible that the book market will double or triple its capacity in the next half decade.

The Movies in Russia

By PAXTON HIBBEN

AT the junction of Mineralne Voda, in the foothills of the Caucasus mountains, where only the station and a dozen low-lying buildings masquerade as a town, I made my way along the muddy road that passes as Main Street. There were, of course, no lights save the torch flares before wooden shacks where Kakhetian wine and Georgia watermelons were being sold. But half way down the street, the open door of the local club building invited me in. In one corner a table displayed the dozens of newspapers and magazines that seem, nowadays, to be the principal output of Soviet Russia. Around the walls, posters urged the starting of a thrift account. But the scores of young people gathered inside and outside of the modest building were interested in neither. They formed a long line at a ticket window just inside the door where for a quarter one could purchase the inestimable privilege of viewing one of the Great Films of All Time—Gloria Swanson in "Madame Sans Gêne."

In Rostov-on-Don, the public gardens and the Bolshai Sadovaya teemed with people as night came on. From cabarets and bars came the strange, oriental music of the Georgians. The gambling houses, frankly open on the principal boulevard, were scantily patronized; the crowd moved steadily toward a dozen spots where bright lights announced Tom Mix or Corinne Griffith or William Hart in the latest releases.

There are some 2,000 moving picture houses in the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics, as against 18,000 in the United States. Of this number, almost half are in one way or another connected with workers' clubs, thus paying a smaller profit than the commercial theaters. But there is not one that does not turn away a theaterful of patrons nightly, and only a handful that are not showing the products of Hollywood, unadulterated. The theory that American films by their subtle revelation of life in the dens of capitalism will debauch the younger generation of Communist ascetics has no practical effect. If there is anything in the way of extravagance, luxuriousness, revelry, or intemperance that is not to be seen on the silver screens of any Russian small town, it must be too bad for American consumption. For American films dominate, inundate, glut, overwhelm the Russian motion picture houses today. Clara Kimball Young has a theater devoted solely to her in Moscow. In the Arbat, center of the workers' quarters of the Russian capital, a new building celebrates the glory of Douglas Fairbanks in electric letters three feet high. In the leading workers' club and a dozen other places Mary Pickford holds forth. And so on throughout the list of American stars, from one end of Soviet Russia to the other.

It is a bit depressing. The Russians are the inheritors of a rare tradition of dramatic art. Since the revolution, the obscurest towns have organized their own theaters, and the drama has become not so much a national pastime as a national aspiration. But with meager equipment and no funds, native motion picture production has languished on the edge of the grave. What money the Soviet Government can lay its hands on goes to education and to such essential industries as transportation, coal and iron mining, textile manufacturing, and the purchase of agricultural machinery for the peasants. The Soviets have neither the free capital nor the free time to devote to building up the movies. All the Government has been able or willing to do, after several years of muddling along, has been to unite the various motion picture producing, distributing, and exhibiting companies that sprang up of themselves during the period when nobody gave motion pictures a serious thought, into one semi-official joint stock company in which the Soviet Government is majority stockholder—the Sovkino. And the Sovkino, once formed, was given a monopoly to manage the whole motion picture business, handed a large building in the Mali Gnezdnikovski for its offices, and told to run along and leave the Government in peace. If it wanted capital to refit or build the two or three thousand more theaters for which there is immediate demand, or to produce the 120 pictures that it is expected to provide for next year, or to buy up-to-date equipment for its studios—it might go abroad and get that capital.

The result was, naturally, that the dozen antique, ill-equipped motion picture studios which were expected to supply the whole of the Soviet Union with pictures could come nowhere near doing it. So the Sovkino was forced to go out into the market and buy foreign films—German, French, British, and, more than any others, American.

This is not by any means to say that the creation of motion pictures in Russia has halted, or is in any danger of halting. On the contrary, there have been three kinds of pictures produced right along during these years of stress: news reels, melodramas, and a few highly artistic productions. The news reels the Soviet Government needed in its business and consequently made provision for—not so much to show abroad (though some have been shown abroad and many certainly could be so shown) as to send about the country to acquaint the inhabitants of Kamchatka with what goes on in Bokhara, and vice versa. Factory workers are exhibited to peasants and coal miners to textile workers. Lenin's funeral, maneuvers of the Red Army, the work of the volunteer fleet, model farms using modern agricultural machinery, meetings of the Congress of the Soviet Union, and similar subjects are pictured in detail. All in all, pictures of this sort in Russia are much bolder and more living than our own news reels. For behind them lies the idea of the essential unity of those who, each in his own field, are creating the new Russia.

There is something of this same spirit in the melodramas as well. The revolution offers the most obvious and also the most fertile source of plot. There is, for example, that rousing melodrama, "Admiral Kolchak and the Gold Reserve," with a swaggering, drunken, knout-wielding hetman of cossacks as super-villain, and a fur-capped, fearless girl Communist as heroine. There are scenes of gambling orgies on the trans-Siberian train that served Kolchak as headquarters, and much Cossack riding across endless wastes of snow. But through the confusion of plot and incident there does somehow appear the fact that these leaderless, ill-armed peasants, with no service of supply in the dead of a Siberian winter, did not only survive against an organized military force backed by British, Japanese, and Americans, but in the end prevailed.

The truly artistic productions are of two widely different kinds, the older school represented by the Moscow Art Theater players, and the newer "revolutionary" school of the ultra-moderns. The former have given the screen some fine examples of that exquisite and painstaking work with which those who saw Moskvin play "Czar Feodor" in this country are familiar. Indeed, this same Moskvin and a group of fellow actors from the Moscow Art Theater have just completed Pushkin's "The Station Master," now showing throughout Russia. Except for the technique of lighting and the mechanical end of making the picture (of which the Russians know little or nothing) it is a highly creditable production. A similar though larger cast is to be employed shortly in creating a vast super-film from Tolstoi's "War and Peace." It is to be hoped that before so large an order is undertaken the Sovkino will arrange to send some of its technical staff to Hollywood for a few lessons.

But it is the ultra-moderns who, despite their technical handicaps, represent the most promising outlook for Russian motion picture production. Meyerhold, whose "The Path of Steel" is to cover the development of the steel industry and exhibit the titanic conflict of man with metal, is captain of a group of four directors chosen from among his own followers who are making this picture in the very mines and blast furnaces and rolling mills where the epic of steel has been enacted during the past quarter century. "The Path of Steel" will not be ready until 1926, but it is expected to embody the very soul of the new industrial order for which Russia stands.

In a sense, that is also the effect of Eisenstein's "Strike," which has already been shown throughout Russia. It is a powerful piece of work which, needless to say, will not be seen in the United States so long as the shade of Sam Gompers stalks labor circles. Eisenstein is a pupil of Meyerhold, and a modern of the moderns. At present he is engaged in filming a huge production to be called "1905." But its scope reaches far beyond Trotzky's book of the same title and covers the whole revolutionary movement in Russia from 1905 to the present.

Aside from the capital required, Russia is even now in far better position to work out a grandiose and above all a distinctive motion picture development than were we fifteen years ago, when industry in the United States was at much the same stage as is Russian industry today. The popular demand is far in excess of any supply that can conceivably be furnished from abroad with the limited resources at the command of the Sovkino. On the other hand, there are studios in operation in Moscow, Leningrad, Siberia, Odessa, Kiev, Tiflis, and Yalta—Yalta in that Crimea whose climate and beauty are calculated to drive the most ardent Southern Californian to blow out his brains, if any. There are actors who outrank any in the world, and collections of historic costumes, furniture, and stage settings unequalled anywhere. And, short of putting up funds, the Soviet Government will do anything to help, from turning out the Red Army to furnishing the Granovitaya Palace of the Kremlin as a stage. And above all, there is in Russia a feeling for dramatic art that will neither be degraded by the tawdry nor debauched by magnificence.

Books*

By MAXIM GORKI

Translated by Alexander Kaun

WHATEVER humanely good there is in me, I owe to books, and it has long been my conviction that art is more magnanimous than men. I love books; I regard every book as a miracle, and the poet as a miracle worker. I cannot speak of books without the deepest emotion, without pathos. Perhaps this is laughable, but it is so. They may say that this is the pathos of a savage. Let them say it, but I am—incurable.

When I take into my hands a new book, a thing made in the printing shop by the labor of a little hero, the typesetter, and by the machine, created by another little hero, I feel that into my life enters something living, speaking, wonderful. Here is another holy writ by man about man, about a being beyond which the world has nothing finer, more puzzling, and more worthy of my love, a being whose toil and genius have made all that is great and beautiful on earth. The book takes me into life, and however familiar it be to me, the book always tells me something I have not known, I have not observed in man. At times the whole book contains only one new phase, but it is this that brings one mysteriously close to man, showing another smile or grimace of his.

The grandeur of the starry world above my head, the harmonious mechanics of the universe, so convincingly described by astronomers, leave me cold and unmoved. To me the universe appears not at all so splendid as astronomers have made it; to me there is more senseless chaos than divine harmony in the birth and death of worlds.

Lo, somewhere in the depth of the Milky Way, the sun has become extinguished, and a whole planetary system has sunk into darkness. I feel no regret. But the death of that magnificent phantast, Camille Flammarion, obviously grieves me.

Whatever we value as beautiful has been invented and told to us by man. Unhappily he infrequently invents suffering too, sharpening and intensifying it, as in the case of Dostoevsky, Baudelaire, Leopardi, and others. But even here I see only an effort to embellish and refine that which is oppressive and repellent in our life.

There is no beauty in hostile nature around us; man creates it out of his mind's tissue. It is the Finn who pours beauty into his marshes and woods, into his rusty granite sparsely overgrown with lichen. It is the Arab who has persuaded himself that the desert is lovely. Beauty springs out of man's desire to see it. One is struck not by the lumbering formlessness of a mountain landscape but by the beauty which man's imagination has instilled into it.

It is remarkable how easily and how generously man saturates nature with beauty, the more remarkable since the earth is, essentially, not a very cozy place to live in. One need only recall the earthquakes and hurricanes, snowstorms and floods, droughts and frosts, noxious insects and microbes, and a number of other things which would make life quite unbearable were man less heroic than he is.

Man's existence is thoroughly and inexhaustibly tragic, but man transforms life's innumerable tragedies into works of art. I cannot imagine anything more marvelous, more striking, than this transformation. That is why, in a book of verse by Pushkin or Heine, in a volume of Flaubert or Balzac, I find more beauty and wisdom than in the cold sheen of stars, in the mechanical movement of oceans, in the rustle of forests, and in the silence of deserts. Borodin has eloquently told us in one of his musical pieces about the silence of the desert. Aurora Borealis? Some of Whistler's paintings are not inferior to northern lights. John Ruskin was right when he said that English sunsets have waxed more colorful since Turner. Our sky would be nicer if the stars were larger, more variegated in color, and near to us. Indeed, they have become so since the astrophysicists have told us about them.

My world is a world of little Spartacuses and Hamlets, the world of Othello and Romeo, Father Goriot, Mr. Dombey, the Karamazovs, David Copperfield, Manon Lescaut, Madame Bovary, Anna Karenina, a world of little Don Quixotes and Don Juans. Out of these little persons—out of us—poets create grand figures, and endow them with immortality.

I live in a world where one cannot understand anything concerning man unless one reads the marvelous books created about him by scholars and artists. Flaubert's "Simple Heart" has for me the value of an evangel, and I am ready to shout with joy for man when I read the maddest tales of Poe or Hoffmann, the evil poems of Baudelaire, the diabolically penetrating stories of Knut Hamsun —our greatest epic writer, whose "Growth of the Soil" amazes me as much as the "Iliad" does. When I read the epogee of "Jean Christophe" I know that this is one of the books which my grandchildren will regard with reverent wonderment at the mental and emotional power of the prophet, at his unshakable love for men.

To be sure, I know that this love is nowadays considered old fashioned. But what can you do if it still exists, does not wear out; and if we continue to live with its sorrows and joys? I even think that this love is becoming ever surer, wiser, and more practical, appearing somewhat dry and business-like in its external manifestations yet not losing its intrinsic and everlasting irrationality. Man's mind is the most irrational phenomenon in the fantastic life of our world.

I am a man of the earth, and outside of its men there is nothing I desire to know. Books bring me in friendly and magnanimous contact with men, inspire me with respect for them, and ever deepen my interest in man, master of the earth, creator of all that is fine and great on it.

* The preface to a book on modern European literature, to appear shortly in Paris.

Lloyd George's Land Campaign

By JOHN A. HOBSON

THE launching of a Liberal land policy under the leadership of Mr. Lloyd George has a personal as well as a political significance. It was impossible to suppose that so restlessly ambitious and resourceful a being, deposed from the high estate to which war-statecraft had helped him, would long linger in the shade to which the dwindled fortunes of his party had consigned him. After the difficult and imperfect reconciliation of the two factions which followed the decimation of Liberalism at the polls, Mr. Lloyd George lost no time in seeking his opportunity to emerge into the limelight. To improvise a new constructive liberal policy (with a roving eye to right and left in case the need of Tory or Labor support arose) was a personal necessity.

Do not fight your enemy on his chosen ground; choose your own, is the Georgian tactic. Why tie Liberalism to the fight against protection or socialism, if you can find a rallying [illegible] those who till it" is indeed no novel cry, but it has in England greater political, if not economic, potency than ever before. For the war and its sequels have stripped rural England of much of its glamor, and revealed the nakedness of the land. Brains, capital, labor, productivity, and markets are lacking. The triple system which had so long endured—landowner, tenant farmer, landless labor—was becoming difficult to maintain before the war. It is now unworkable. The owner, who supplies most of the capital for maintenance and improvement, is so impoverished by taxation and high prices that he cannot "do his duty by the land."

It is true that during the period of war prosperity a large number of foresighted owners sold out to their tenants at inflated prices. Thus about a quarter of our agricultural land passed into the possession of farmers with too little capital to work it, most of whom are by this time heavily mortgaged. These occupying owners and the general body of tenant farmers have been drained of all their war profits, and in the price slump of the last few years have been sinking into deeper and deeper water. The minimum-wage boards established to secure subsistence for the laborers have collapsed, and labor is in most counties ill-paid, ill-housed, uncertain, and insufficient. More than two-thirds of our food has to be brought from overseas, paid for with increasing difficulty by reason of our diminished exports, while a million and a quarter of our workers with their families are kept in enforced idleness, producing nothing to help pay for the food they consume.

Such is the challenge to land policy which Mr. George and his committee have taken up. Their program is large, bold, and radical. It proposes that the state shall relieve the landowners (except those who can undertake to farm their land themselves) of their ownership, compensating them not by a capital sum but by a guaranteed annual rent, assessed in a land court. But though the state is to become the formal owner, it must not operate agriculture, but leave the cultivation of the soil to practical farmers who will pay rent to the state and will have to satisfy a representative county committee that their farming is efficient. These farmers are to carry out their own improvements and repairs, receiving help in the form of credit, research, electricity, and organization of the market, from the county organization. The laborer is to have not only a guaranteed minimum wage, which is to be a first charge for the determination of the rent, but a favorably situated small holding and the opportunity of getting a larger farm if he shows himself capable of working it. In a word, benefits are to be secured for all three interests in the land. The landlord is to have an income equal to the net income he now receives from the land. The farmers will have full security of tenure at a fixed rent subject to good cultivation. The laborer will have a living wage and an opportunity to get an independent living from the land.

The scheme has had a fair, though scarcely an enthusiastic, reception by the Liberal press, Tory and Labor papers and politicians preferring to regard it with contempt as the wildcat project of a group of political plungers. But there is vigor, money, and influence among the projectors, who propose to pursue an active campaign in every village. They will have to cut through a vast tangle of prejudices and misconceptions, as well as to meet valid objections, if they are to attain any wide acceptance, not to say political success for their policy. Setting aside the not inconsiderable number of those with whom the whole project is damned for its paternity, criticism is bound to fasten on certain features connected with the large part assigned to the state. The state is to take over a damaged property and guarantee its part-owners against further damage. The state is to fix fair rents, and fair wages, through committees on which it must be represented. The county committees are to say what is efficient and inefficient farming in particular cases, perhaps the most delicate of all the operations under this scheme. The state, through county loan boards, is to be the ultimate source or guaranty of credits advanced to cultivating tenants for the working of their farms. The state is to set up a commission to devise machinery for a cooperative system of transport and marketing.

Though most of the actual public work is to be done by local representative bodies and not by a central bureaucracy, it remains true that the state would be called upon to undertake delicate and risky services for which many hold it is inherently incompetent. The state socialism embodied in this scheme will thus be the first line of attack, in particular the displacement of private by state ownership, and the indefinite obligation to furnish one particular industry with business credit at the risk or expense of the taxpayer.

The report thus describes the proposed machinery and procedure:

> In each County Agricultural Authority's area would be established a County Loans Board, responsible to the Central Agricultural Loans Board.
>
> The cultivating tenant would state to the County Agricultural Authority the amount he required and the purpose to which he intended to apply it. The County Agricultural Authority would refer the application to one of its officers who would take into account the applicant's reliability and competence, the suitability of the improvement suggested, and the possible adequacy or possible extravagance of the demand. The Authority, on the officer's recommendation, would agree, reject, or possibly modify the proposal.

The County Agricultural Authority, using its knowledge of farmers in the county, would recommend approved applicants for credit to the County Loans Board.

On the face of it, this proposal leans too heavily upon the wisdom and integrity of a single official, and seems a poor substitute for the better ordered system of cooperative agricultural banks, prevalent in several continental countries and recently set up in Ireland. The judgment of neighboring farmers about the needs, capacity, and character of a particular farmer would surely be superior to that even of a more expert visiting official. But behind such doubts relating to administration lies the question of financial security. Can English agriculture by the suggested reconstruction be raised into such a condition of improvement or prosperity as to make the substantial credit here envisaged a safe investment for the British state, handling the resources of the taxpayer? To shore up a collapsing industry by state-found money is not an attractive proposition.

One of the great obstacles to success of the proposed reform will be the obstinate blindness to progressive methods among the mass of small farmers, especially in the south of England. Mr. George and his advisers require a willing, if not eager, acceptance of the new order by those who are to be its beneficiaries. But, assuming a fundamental soundness in the plan, it may take the effort of a generation to set it fairly afoot. Those who point at Denmark as an example of what English farmers could do must be reminded that Englishmen are not Danes. In tradition, education, character, and outlook upon life no two European peoples show greater divergencies. The superiority of Denmark in education and in cooperation is rooted, partly, in the necessities of a very small country, and, partly, in the widespread regard for knowledge and peaceful association. Though the great estates in England are being broken up, and the number of cultivating owners and small holders are increasing, it will take a long time before serious, scientific business agriculture can be established over the whole country. In other words, the scheme is a great appeal to reason, launched upon a people soaked in obstinate traditions and deep-seated prejudices. Ultimately reason may prevail: adversity, such as exists at present, is a schoolmaster of great potency. But the scholar is rather dull and a little proud of his obstinacy in the face of new ideas.

Now rapid and eager acceptance is of the essence of the situation—for the politicians. If Liberalism in Britain is to draw new life from such a reform policy it must be put in control of a government with a mandate to carry the policy into effect. Now to describe this as a political impossibility would, perhaps, be putting the odds against it too high. If Toryism went too far in reactionary audacity, and Labor were broken by the temporary success of the Reds, it is conceivable that the country might give Liberalism another trial. But it is grossly improbable that Liberals will again be in a position to form a government. If, therefore, experiments in agricultural reform were seriously attempted, they could only come about by the adoption of the substance of the scheme by the Conservatives or by Labor. Though the scheduled proposals of the Labor Party are more radical than those of Mr. George, they are not so divergent in principles, and even methods, as to prohibit a working compromise. Labor politicians will at present scout the very idea of making common cause with any school of Liberalism in this, or any other, issue. But history shows that such tempers are very short-lived. I do not, therefore, rule out the probability of an agricultural reform policy along the main lines of this report, put into effect by a political combination of Labor and Liberals. The resistance of landowning conservatives would, however, be long and stubborn. Though the landed aristocracy has lost to the commercial classes of the towns much of the political power it once wielded, it has retained almost intact the social power and consideration which count so highly in English life. This scheme of reform would rapidly destroy this social power, would put into a secondary place the sporting and other amenities of country life, and would drive the free breath of business enterprise into an occupation where the spirit of feudalism with its customary rights and privileges for the landowner and its graded status for tenants and laborers has hitherto prevailed. To stop such a "degradation" of country life conservatives will struggle to the utmost. They do not deny that something must be done, and soon, to save British agriculture. They would like to revert to their former remedy—a protective tariff. But their shrewder politicians are aware that to tax the food of their towns for the benefit of the country is impracticable. Their present line of policy, therefore, is a state subsidy to agriculture, conceived partly as a dole to distressed farmers and landowners, partly as a national defense for a country dangerously dependent on overseas supplies.

There is "realism" in this constructive policy, injurious as I believe it to be. For it faces more clearly than do these Liberals the fundamental fact that England cannot grow the foods she imports as cheaply as they can be grown elsewhere. The Liberal scheme implies, no doubt, a challenge to this statement. If science and good business methods and keen industry were put into our land, under conditions of tenure and of reward that called out the full energies of the cultivator, no doubt we could considerably reduce the amount of our dependence on foreign supplies. But if this involved taking brains and labor from other industries to develop agriculture, the total effect upon our national wealth and even our food supply might be injurious. It is no good citing the million and a quarter industrial workers who stand unemployed as evidence that town industries are normally oversupplied at the expense of agriculture. No appreciable number of these unemployed either could or would work upon the soil. Though agricultural reforms might keep some of the rising generation in the country from drifting townward, experience shows that even good offers of land do not make a country life attractive. While, therefore, Mr. George's plan has much to recommend it, it could not go far toward making Britain a self-sustaining country as regards foods or raw materials. We must still rely upon foreign countries for the greater part of these necessary supplies, paying for them with such of our manufactures and other services (shipping, banking, etc.) as other peoples will consent to receive. If we cannot work hard or skilfully enough to produce these export goods at a price the world will consent to pay, then we are doomed to a national poverty, which no reforms of our agriculture will more than mitigate.

In the Driftway

THE Drifter will certainly never have $80,000,000, but if he had he would refrain from dumping it in a lump sum on the head of some small, defenseless college. That college can certainly never emerge from the stigma of being the most heavily endowed institution of learning in the world. No matter what masters of erudition its graduates turn out to be, they will still be pointed to with scorn as being products of an endowment of eighty millions, "when Harvard has only $64,000,000." Nor will Harvard men be the only ones thus to sniff and avert their heads. If the butler or the country cousin inherits a fortune, dislike of him is felt from the head of the house to the last and lowest.

* * * * *

THE reason for this unpopularity, of course, is a simple one. Mr. Duke in his naive way believed that he could build a great university as he could build a factory—by going out and buying the brick and stone, the machinery and tools, and the workmen to operate them. He forgot that he was dealing in the most elusive commodity in the world. He could no more create ideas in this wholesale fashion than he could later create a market for them. Thus he started to build his university at the wrong end. He was distressed because North Carolina had no great school; he did not stop to discover the reason for this lack. He assumed that it was want of money—and of money he knew he had plenty. But a careful examination of the ideas which have come out of North Carolina in the last two hundred years might have told him more. If North Carolina had no great university, it might have been that she had no desire for one. Now that one has been wished on her, it remains to be seen what she will do with it.

* * * * *

THE greatest universities in history—Bologna, Salamanca, Paris, Oxford, Cambridge—started with beginnings far less grand than Duke University. A group of students, a handful of books, one or two masters who were themselves hardly more than students; but they had also an invaluable boundless thirst for learning. And in that respect they were as rich as Duke University can ever be, and richer than the Drifter suspects it of being at present. If the president of Duke were a wise man he would invest his vast endowment in a handsome mausoleum for the founder; then with perhaps six of his best students he would retire to the fastnesses of the North Carolina mountains, he would build with his own hands and with the help of his companions—no longer pupils—a modest habitation, and there he would live with them and meditate with them on the workings of the universe. After a while he might be surprised by a visitor; others would come presently. In time he would find that a road had been built to his house—built by curiosity as well as eagerness to share his wilderness. He would profit by modern inventions; books could be had for asking, laboratory equipment would not need to be built painfully by hand. And if he could muster enough devotion to the pursuit of truth, he would in time find that, strangely enough, a sort of university had grown up around his front door. Perhaps it would never fall heir to eighty millions of dollars. But it might become a great university even without it.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

California Injustice

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your issue dated August 12 contained an editorial entitled California Justice. It had reference to the third trial and conviction in Sacramento of one Tom Connors for jury tampering. Tom Connors was then secretary of the California branch of the I. W. W. His offense was that he had mailed I. W. W. literature, violently assailing the criminal-syndicalism law, to a certain man on a jury trying an I. W. W. under that law.

In your editorial you use the following language in reference to the Sacramento Bee and myself:

> Now, it chanced that at that time in Sacramento, the State capital, there was a trial for criminal syndicalism, involving three members of the I. W. W., Judge Charles O. Busick, and the Sacramento Bee. The Bee, rather a fair and well-edited paper in other respects, reserves its sharpest stings for the I. W. W. Its editorials are frequently incitements to violence against this organization which its owner, C. K. McClatchy, so ardently hates. . . .
>
> Meanwhile, during the five days of the trial, the Sacramento Bee poured forth news items and violent editorials against the I. W. W. and all its supposed works. The jurymen received the Bee regularly, and they all knew that Connors was a member of the I. W. W. This, however, was not "jury tampering" and no one suggested arresting McClatchy.

The last paragraph is erroneous. "During the five days of the trial," the news items in the Bee thereon consisted of extremely fair accounts of the proceedings—following the unbroken rule of this paper to report all public matters without prejudice. "During the five days of the trial," the California Conference of Social Workers met in Sacramento and by a vote of 153 to 136 went on record as favoring the repeal of the criminal-syndicalism law. That action was reported in the Bee of May 28, 1925. The next day the Bee contained the only editorial in any way referring to the I. W. W. it published "during the five days of the trial." The Bee deemed it alike its right and its duty to defend a law thus attacked. And in so doing it stated in plain English why the law had been passed, quoting this language from the supreme court of California in the case of Steelik, a member of the I. W. W.:

> We hold the record justifies the conviction of the offense of criminal syndicalism, in that the defendant knowingly belonged to an organization which in its nature was a criminal conspiracy to change industrial control and government by unlawful and criminal methods.

What would you?

You say I ardently hate the I. W. W. I hate any organization that teaches men to be vandal Ishmaelites; that not only preaches but constantly practices assault, sabotage, arson, and promiscuous destruction of property as its principal "argument." I think every decent, law-abiding citizen should join me in that hate. And that such is the practically uninterrupted offense of the I. W. W. is no mere bald statement, but an incontrovertible fact repeatedly proved in California courts.

You are entirely wrong in declaring that "neither of the men" to whom Connors was charged with sending I. W. W. literature ever "actually served on a criminal-syndicalism jury." H. D. Arnold, to whom Connors sent such literature, served as a juryman in the trial of Joe Wagner and R. C. Russell, charged with violating the criminal-syndicalism law.

Sacramento, Calif., August 17 CHAS. K. MCCLATCHY,
Editor the Sacramento Bee

[Mr. McClatchy is wrong. H. D. Arnold, the complaining witness against Connors, did not serve as a juryman in the trial of Russell and Wagner, nor did he serve on any other criminal-syndicalism jury. He was once drawn on a jury panel for the court sesssion in Sacramento in which a criminal-syndicalism case known as "Brooks et al." was slated for trial, but he did not become a juror. He was excused. The Brooks case, which also included Wagner and Russell, was never tried. Wagner and Russell were later reindicted with one Vargo, but Arnold was not even on the panel called for that case. See California Appellate Decisions, Volume 45, page 994.

As we stated, Connors (who was secretary of an I. W. W. defense committee, not of the California branch of the I. W. W.) was convicted for corrupting a juryman, by mailing a pamphlet opposing the criminal-syndicalism law to a man whom he had never seen, who never served on a jury. No jury had been drawn when Connors mailed his pamphlet to a list of names from the telephone book, including Mr. McClatchy's.

Mr. McClatchy's remarks about the I. W. W. are sufficiently corroborative of what The Nation said regarding his temper. We challenge him to produce court proof that the I. W. W. "practically uninterruptedly" practice "assault, sabotage, arson, and promiscuous destruction of property." He cannot do it.—EDITOR, THE NATION.]

The Negro in the North

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: The article by Mr. Walter White, entitled Negro Segregation Comes North, in the current issue of The Nation [October 21] is interesting, but it skirts the real issue.

You can strike from the record the activities of the K. K. K., whatever they may be, and any concerted desire on the part of white people to "keep the Negro down." I feel quite sure that Mr. White believes they have the importance he attributes to them. But I doubt if they have.

The whites in the white neighborhood who object to the entrance of Negroes as residents are touched severely in the pocket-book nerve. Until both races will see that prime fact and meet that issue squarely, little permanent good can come from discussions.

Detroit, October 17 FRED H. WINTERS

He Would Welcome Letters

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Could you, through your valuable magazine, publish an appeal for a political prisoner, Charles Cline, who has been in prison for the past twelve years. An appeal was published some time ago in The Nation, which brought results, but only for a short time. We hope there are people who would be interested in corresponding with him once or twice a month. They can write to Box 32, Huntsville, Texas.

Paterson, N. J., October 10 HARRY WINDRATH

This Chief Is a Lady

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your issue of August 5, page 156, appears what purports to be a dispatch from this city by the Associated Press with reference to an Indian statue, followed by nearly a column of editorial comment. You headed it Hail to the Chief!

In no complaining way do I call your attention to the fact that the whole matter would have been more historically correct if an Indian squaw had not been mistaken for a chief.

My statue has been mounted on Perrin's Ledge, the most beautiful look-out on the Illinois River and perhaps in the world. But it is the statue of a woman Indian and not a chief. It represents Nokomis, the Daughter of the Moon, whose daughter became the mother of Hiawatha—the Indian savior.

Belleville, Illinois, October 5 J. NICK PERRIN

NATION DINNERS

DON'T WAIT
till the last minute

CHINA: THE ACID TEST OF 1925 is the subject for the first Nation dinner, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 12. Dr. Harry F. Ward, Paul Blanshard, P. W. Kuo, the first two just returned from China, will speak. Are missionaries of any use in China? Should every foreigner leave China at once? What is extra-territoriality and why is it? Come to the Nation dinner and discuss these and other important Chinese matters. China is not just a big yellow spot on the map; it is in the news, it grows in importance as an international problem every day. Come to the Nation dinner; hear about China. Oswald Garrison Villard, the Nation's editor, will preside and reservations will be made in the order in which they are received!

The second Nation dinner will be held THURSDAY, DECEMBER 10. Clarence Darrow, counsel in the Scopes trial at Dayton, and Dr. Henry Sloane Coffin, Pastor of the Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, will speak on IS MAN A MACHINE? Joseph Wood Krutch, Associate Editor of The Nation, will be chairman. On THURSDAY JANUARY 7, Mark Van Doren, the Nation's Literary Editor, will preside over a debate between the critics and the authors, with a publisher added for good measure. The subject will be IS LITERARY CRITICISM IMPORTANT? WAGES FOR WIVES? is the debatable subject for the fourth Nation dinner, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4. Doris Stevens and Arthur Garfield Hays will speak. Freda Kirchwey, the Nation's managing editor, will be chairman. The date of the last Nation dinner will be THURSDAY, MARCH 18. Subject and speakers to be announced later.

Bring as many guests as you like to the Nation dinners, but reservations may be made in the name of Nation subscribers only. Price per plate $2.50; for the series of five, $11.00. Non-subscribers may make reservations by sending in a check for $6.00, and receiving a ticket for one dinner and The Nation for a year (regular price $5.00) or $15.00 for The Nation and a reservation for the entire series.

ALL DINNERS WILL BE HELD AT THE FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT, 200 FIFTH AVENUE, AND WILL BEGIN AT 7 P. M.

The Nation:
20 Vesey Street.

Send me The Nation for a year and reserve ..... places for me at

(THE ..... Nation dinner
(The series of Nation dinners.

Name .....

Address .....

Books and Plays

Composed While Under Arrest

(Translated from the Russian of Lhermontov)

By MAX EASTMAN

When waves invade the yellowing wheat,
And the saplings sway with a wind-song brief;
When the raspberry plum in the garden sweet
Hides him under the cool green leaf;

When sprinkled with lights of limpid dew,
At rose of evening or gold of morn,
The lilies-of-the-valley strew
Their silver nodding under the thorn;

When the brook in the valley with cooling breast,
Plunging my soul in a cloudy dream,
Murmurs a legend of lands of rest
At the rise of his happy and rapid stream;

Then humbled is my heart's distress,
And lulled the anguish of my blood;
Then in the earth my happiness,
Then in the heaven my God.

First Glance

WILLIAM ELLERY LEONARD'S "Two Lives" (Viking Press: $2) was written in 1913, and it is around about 1913 that we are in the habit of supposing the new poetry of America to have been born. That "Two Lives" has exerted less than its due influence directly upon Mr. Leonard's contemporaries—owing to the circumstance that it was never printed until 1922, and then only privately—will seem of little moment to another generation which will read it and call it, I am convinced, one of the best of early twentieth-century poems. Those future judges will have forgotten how Mr. Leonard's sonnet-sequence lived for so long a smothered life, and they perhaps will never have known the reason for this—the painful environment which made Mr. Leonard hesitate to tell his story to any public at all, let alone a wide one. They will see the poem, that is to say, as the work of art which it is. They will recognize in it one of the first signs that American poetry had attained to a mature subject matter and to a truly passionate style. They will compare it not unfavorably with the longer narratives which now for a decade Mr. Robinson has been putting forth, and they will find nothing of its time in England to be set beside it—nothing of Mr. Masefield's surely, though Mr. Hardy in other modes will not suffer from a comparison. And if we now are a little disturbed by touches in the poem of the old rhetoric which we pride ourselves upon having discarded—if we find it not quite so strictly emancipated in form as Mr. Robinson's best work is—they will be undisturbed, looking, as they will, through fashion into matter and mood and essential style.

I would not tell the story if I could, for it must be read in its own powerful and absolutely personal setting. Few pieces of literature have been more personal, and the reason is not merely that the tragedy unfolded is by virtue of its events an intimate one for the author. Mr. Leonard has made it even more so—I am tempted to say absolutely so—by planting it in the center of his own mind and by feeding that mind solely upon its bitter leaves. From the moment in the first sonnet when Mr. Leonard, after a swift glance backward and forward through an eternity of human circumstances, dismisses all that and settles into his theme—

> Large thoughts, before and after; yet they be > Time's pallid backgrounds for my soul and me—

I understand that the business at hand is one man's life, is one man's vindication of a part which he had played. Mr. Leonard, like Hamlet, must get his story told; and as he concentrates himself upon his need the intensity of his telling grows. Everything is evidence of this intensity, this need—the exhortations to some audience:

> But you who read me, jest not now, I pray. . . .

> But I am ill at ease
> Coping with symbols in the halls of pain—
> As you may mark, confused;

the passages of realism which a more painless poet would have done more vaguely and more safely:

> Whilst I undressed her, as she groaned; detail,
> The critics tell us, makes reality;
> But should I chronicle each look and wail,
> Each garment, as I rent it horribly
> With twitch and twist of fingers, clutch of hands,
> Each ridge in face of me, you'd say I were > (Though doing the waiting doctor's fierce commands)
> O not the husband, but the ravisher;

the ceaseless probing of conscience, the tireless going over of motives in order to make sure that nothing is left out of account. Here in this intensity, and in the beauty and the strength which by no mere chance come with it, lies at least one reason for granting a measure of greatness to "Two Lives."

MARK VAN DOREN

Two War Books

The War of Lost Opportunities. By General von Hoffmann. International Publishers. $3.50.

Blockade and Sea Power: The Blockade, 1914-1919, and its Significance for a World State. By Maurice Parmelee. T. Y. Crowell and Company. $3.

THE first of these is an important book which should be in every war library. Coming, as it does, from the officer in considerable degree responsible for the infamous Brest-Litovsk Treaty, the man who took Lenin from Switzerland to Russia in a locked car and turned him loose there, who served for two years as Chief of the German General Staff on the Eastern front, it gains weight because of its plain speaking and frank revelations. Compact and concise, it proves once more that the most wonderful military machine the world has ever seen was wrecked by the blunders of its leaders rather than the prowess of its enemies. Nearly everything the German militarists could ask for in 1914 in the way of material was provided, but the master minds needed were not available when the emergency came.

General von Hoffmann reveals the facts that the fatal withdrawal of two corps just before the Marne for service in Russia was not due, as alleged, to any appeal from the army commanders on the East front, and that they arrived too late to aid Hindenburg in his amazing victories. It is now widely believed that this fatal departure from the von Schlieffen plan for the swing through Belgium was due to the personal intercession of the Kaiser and Kaiserin, who were overcome by the Russian destruction in East Prussia. General von Hoffmann is emphatically of the opinion that even after the disastrous retirement of von Kluck after the Marne, it would have been possible to renew the outflanking movement and begin open warfare again by transferring ten or twelve corps to the extreme German right as suggested in vain by General Gröner. Next he blames General von Falkenhayn, the second German chief of staff, for letting slip two opportunities to destroy completely the Russian Army in the fall of 1914 and the summer of 1915. This officer was also responsible for the incredible folly and slaughter of Verdun, the failure to take Salonica, and the refusal to make a concerted effort against Italy in combination with the Austrians. General von Hoffmann was sure from 1915 on that Germany had lost the war, but he could not move the Chancellor and others in power to renounce all thought of taking Belgian territory and to try in 1917 for a peace restoring the status quo ante. Naturally he dwells on the folly of carrying on a submarine warfare without submarines, and on the Von Tirpitz policy of continuing to build battleships that could never count.

General von Hoffmann went through the first Russian battles with General Ludendorff, whom he knew well and greatly admired, but he saddles him with the error of trying to break through to Amiens in March, 1918, and not succeeding because he failed to bring up all available troops and confine his attack to that one point. After the failure of that effort, Von Hoffmann clearly saw that Germany ought to make peace at once. Instead Ludendorff carried on until, on the point of collapse, he had to accept any terms.

It is interesting to note that General von Hoffmann disclaims all responsibility for the abominable terms of the Brest-Litovsk Treaty, which he charges to Von Kuhlmann and Czernin. But, by his own narrative, he did more than anybody else to get the Bolsheviks to accept it. His own desire was to have Germany march to Petrograd, set up a new Russian government, and raise new levies to fight for Germany. He attributes the collapse of the German army largely to Bolshevik propaganda spread by German troops rushed in the closing months to the West front from Russia. How bitterly Von Hoffmann must regret having been a party to the transfer of Lenin and his associates from Switzerland to Russia! They were to destroy the then Russian government, but they were not supposed to go further. It is interesting to note that this incident in General von Hoffmann's career is not recorded in this volume.

The translation of the book is poor, the proof-reading and editing equally so. Sentences sometimes do not end. We are never told the author's full name. In the second chapter General von Prittwitz und Gaffron becomes two persons. Peyton March becomes Payton, and titles and names suffer generally. This is a great pity because of the intrinsic value of the book, especially for the light it throws on Russian military blunders in 1914 and 1915.

Dr. Parmelee's book on the blockade is of equal worth. A description of the organization and development of the blockade during the war, it seems to be definitive and of permanent textbook value. Dr. Parmelee, who was one of the representatives of the United States War Trade Board in London in 1918 and 1919, a member of the Allied Blockade Committee, and Chairman of the Allied Rationing and Statistical Committee, traces not only the way the British and French governments developed at home the machinery to handle the blockade of the Central Powers but also the way the blockade was gradually applied to the neutrals as well until they were stripped of every right under international law and became merely vassals of the Allies. He does not fail to blame the United States for permitting this —Ambassador Page aiding and abetting instead of fighting for neutral rights the world over. Indeed, Dr. Parmelee writes as one whose eyes have been opened to the fact that both sides were guilty of great wrongs during the war; that neither had clean hands. He is especially forceful in showing how the Allies persuaded or coerced or forced one country after another to their will. His explanation of the "General Black List" instituted by Great Britain is valuable, but he does not, of course, set forth how that Black List was used during the war, as in South America, for instance, for the purpose of undermining England's trade rivals, not only for war-time, but for the post-bellum period.

Dr. Parmelee pays his respects to the late Admiral Mahan for misusing and misinterpreting historical facts in order to build up a big-navy propaganda, and is flat in his opposition to the control of the seas by the British fleet or any other. Perhaps the most valuable portion of his book is his group of chapters on Sea Power and the World State, which latter he does not find provided by the League of Nations as at present constituted. As he points out, "to incorporate the constitution of a professedly international state into a treaty which utilizes the advantages of victory in war is highly incongruous"; and he insists that a real World State ought not to oppose but to protect any nation which has adopted collectivism or state socialism from the capitalistic nations in order to safeguard the principle of self-determination of racial and national entities.

We cannot believe that this volume will be very popular with the big-business rulers of the world, since it points out how communistic had become by 1918 the whole administration of the economic world by the Allies and the United States, and shows the ease with which, following the precedent of the Supreme Economic Council, it would be possible to organize the world internationally for the purpose of holding and rationing all the remaining natural resources of the world for the benefit of all mankind. Those who think internationalism a crime will find a dangerous adversary in Dr. Parmelee. We cannot overemphasize the value of this book or the extraordinarily liberal and enlightened viewpoint of the author.

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD

Merezhkovsky

December the Fourteenth. A Novel. By Dimitri S. Merezhkovsky. Translated from the Russian by Nathalie A. Duddington. International Publishers. $2.

"DECEMBER THE FOURTEENTH" could not have been published at a more opportune time. For in a few weeks from now our newspapers will carry dispatches describing how Soviet Russia is celebrating the centenary of the Decembrist Rebellion, the first organized blow against the ancient Russian autocracy. It is the stirring events of this rebellion, delicately interwoven with the radiant love story of Prince Golitzin, that Merezhkovsky depicts in the present novel.

To those who are acquainted with Merezhkovsky's trilogy, "Christ and Antichrist," this volume will bring no surprises. The virtues and the faults that were manifest there are in evidence here. As a literary artist, and particularly as a writer of historical novels, Merezhkovsky may doubtless be ranked among the masters. He has a rare gift for breathing life into remote epochs and historical personages. The conflicts of the past stand out clear and significant. A man of wide culture, a fine scholar, and a diligent compiler, Merezhkovsky assembles his mosaics at times even a little too meticulously. Possessed of a keen sense for the dramatic, he makes many passages vibrate with passion and beauty.

His chief fault is that he has a theological ax to grind. His monomania is Christianity and its role in the past, present, and future life of mankind. In itself this is not a serious fault. A bit of Christian mysticism may even add to the interest of a novel. But Merezhkovsky's mysticism is too schematic. His "path is through dichotomy to unity." Everywhere he labors for a higher synthesis: Earth and Heaven, Christ and Antichrist, Paganism and Asceticism, the Flesh and the Spirit, the Church and the State. Since his entire theological structure is built on the Hegelian triad, his characters fall symmetrically into three groups: some illustrate the thesis, some the antithesis, and some the synthesis. To a sensitive reader this sort of balancing, however skilfully done, becomes rather annoying, however agreeable it may be to a critic purely of Merezhkovsky's thought.

As a result of his religious prepossessions Merezhkovsky sometimes presents historical motivation in the wrong light, imputing his own kind of faith to some of his heroes, regardless of the historic moment in which they are made to function. It must be remembered that Merezhkovsky's religion is the expression of a decaying class in a rapidly changing society. After the "gloomy eighties" a feeling that life was unendurable, a sense of impending catastrophe, a hope for a miraculous deliverance pervaded the ranks of the Russian upper classes. These fears, desires, and yearnings were crystallized in an eclectic religious mysticism which had come down from Dostoevsky through Vladimir Soloviev and the decadents of the nineties to the "God-Seekers" of the first decade of this century. For the author to make the Decembrist Golitzin think and speak in the vernacular of a twentieth-century "God-Seeker" is, it seems, doing serious violence to historical verisimilitude.

Furthermore, the lengthy metaphysical discussions clothed in the idiom of medieval scholasticism make the meaning of Merezhkovsky's novels in parts rather obscure, except to the initiate. Strange esoteric symbols speckle his writings. Proclaimed a prophet by a small coterie of fanatical admirers, Merezhkovsky tries to live up to his part. He brands as coming from the Beast (Antichrist) anything he for the moment dislikes: positivist philosophy, science, democracy, autocracy, and, since 1917, bolshevism. In his writings one comes across pages upon pages of veiled language and vague allusions to "something," and "someone," and "somewhere." In occult whispers and stimulated epileptic outcries, à la Dostoevsky, this modern prophet heralds a new apocalyptic religion.

Yet, despite the faults which "December the Fourteenth" shares with the rest of Merezhkovsky's works, it is one of the most absorbing historical novels in Russian literature. Though part of a trilogy, it is complete in itself, having its own inner raison d'être. Thanks to the discreet efforts of the translator, a good deal of the mystical clap-trap is unceremoniously done away with. What is left is mostly a powerful, tightly knit story of the tragic failure of the rebellion. All the chief characters are historically authentic, and are drawn in a masterly fashion. Nicholas I, the czar by accident and the spy by vocation, is unforgettably vivid. The prison scenes are subtly realistic. And the silhouettes of the five youths swinging from the scaffold are profoundly affecting.

JOSHUA KUNITZ

An Epic of Culture

Sovietskaya Kultura. Izd. Izvestia ZIK SSSR i XZIK. Moscow. (Soviet Culture. Published by Izvestia. Moscow.)

THERE is a fascinating glamor of adventure about the bare facts collected in this volume which makes the book read like an epic even though it does not deal with spectacular events such as those which "shook the world" during the earlier stages of the revolution. It is an epic of creation emerging from the multitude of "dry" figures and data dealing with the practical application in the everyday life of the masses of those principles which they fought for, arms in hand, during the "heroic" period of the revolution. The new period will seem no less heroic to one who understands it.

The book represents a collection of articles and summaries which tell in the language of plain facts of what has been accomplished in the various fields of political, economic, social, and cultural activity during the first six years of the existence of the Soviet republic. And each of these accounts is a tale of bold experimenting, of treading paths upon which no one had ventured before, of the accumulation of new experiences opening up vistas of new possibilities. Not a phase of life is left which has not been touched by the wand of revolution and been subjected to a thoroughgoing change. In government a new system is being evolved which will insure actual participation in the business of government to the largest numbers of the laboring population. In the economic field a system of organization is being worked out whereby intelligent planning would take the place of the bourgeois anarchy which has made a sacred principle of the blind play of economic forces. In the province of social relations, idleness and wealth are supplanted by work, physical and intellectual, as a mark of social distinction. So also in the field of cultural activity we see the beginning of a new culture which is becoming more and more the expression of the awakened and emancipated masses.

It should be remembered that before the revolution the mass of the people had been almost entirely outside the sphere of the cultural life of the country. About 90 per cent of the people had no opportunity even for the most elementary education and they were kept in utter illiteracy. Such things as books, newspapers, theaters, museums were accessible only to the upper classes and the intelligentsia. It was left for the revolution to bring the benefits and enjoyment of culture into the daily life of the masses. But it is also evident that this culture could not be left over from the old order. It was necessary to build anew, to create a culture which would be in harmony with the material, spiritual, and aesthetic values revealed in the revolution, and which would give the most significant possible expression to the masses which have now become articulate.

In this summary of Soviet culture the story is thus told of the new system of education which has been laid down, based on the principles of the unified labor school which would ultimately accord universal general and technical training; of the progress of the tremendous task of abolishing illiteracy; of workers' clubs which have sprung up in each factory; of reading huts through which the book, the theater, and the moving picture are being introduced into the villages; of the educational work which is carried on in the army and among the youth; of "workers' faculties" which prepare workers for higher education; of the new student body which is invading the universities and colleges from the depth of the mass of workers and peasants; of the new press serving the workers and expressive of their needs; of the new motives and forms which are being evolved in the field of literature, as well as in the theater and the other arts.

On the other hand the treasures of the old culture which, prior to the revolution, served for the enjoyment of the upper-class few have been thrown open and brought to the people. Private collections of works of art have been incorporated in existing public museums or form the nucleus for new museums the number of which has grown from 30 before the revolution to 476 in 1924. The same thing has happened to the valuable collections of books which were formerly to be found only in private hands.

The facts collected in this book are those which are most frequently overlooked in the daily chronicling of events. Their significance becomes fully apparent when they are brought together and correlated. The sum of these facts is the sum of the revolutionary change which is burrowing into the deep of the masses and forming the foundation for the new life.

L. TALMY

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1925 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Tuesday, December 1, and not later than Thursday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 10, 1926.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Books in Brief

American Poetry 1925: A Miscellany. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

A third volume in the series which Mr. Louis Untermeyer inaugurated five years ago. Although some excellent work mingles with a good deal that is dull, the value of the whole is not quite clear.

Arnold Bennett. By Mrs. Arnold Bennett. Adelphi Company. $2.

A rather silly performance, though not a little picturesque information is purveyed between the gasps of adulation.

Cuchulainn. An Epic-Drama of the Gael. By Terence Gray. Cambridge, England: W. Heffer and Sons. 12/6.

A highly intelligent rendering in rather undistinguished prose of the whole history of Ulster during the reign of King Conchubhar. Conchubhar is the central figure, but Cuchulainn is the central hero; and Deirdre and Queen Maeve make their tragic contributions to the story under auspices which are in many respects new. Mr. Gray's introduction, in which he criticizes the handling of his characters by recent Irish poets and dramatists, is Shavian in its common sense and refreshing in its return to the probable facts. A valuable because unsentimental version of one of the greatest of all legends.

The English Comic Characters. By J. B. Priestley. Dodd, Mead and Company. $2.50.

Spirited yet essentially commonplace criticism of some of the comic creations of Shakespeare, Fielding, Sterne, Jane Austen, Peacock, and Dickens. There is room for a truly—even gravely—analytical discussion of Falstaff, Shandy, et al. Mr. Priestley is merely one more man surprised and delighted.

John Marston: The Scourge of Villanie (1599). Samuel Daniel: A Defence of Ryme (1603); Thomas Campion: Observations in the Art of English Poesie. Vols. 13 and 14 of The Bodley Head Quartos. E. P. Dutton and Company. $1.50 each.

Convenient and attractive editions of three documents bearing on Elizabethan poetic theory and practice.

The Panchatantra. Translated from the Sanskrit by Arthur W. Ryder. University of Chicago Press. $4.

The first complete version in English, and one which fortunately is very readable, of this fountainhead of Western story.

Histriophone: A Dialogue on Dramatic Diction. By Bonamy Dobrée. 3/6. The Character of John Dryden. By Alan Lubbock. 2/6. Contemporary Techniques of Poetry. A Political Analogy. By Robert Graves. 3/6. The Hogarth Essays. London: The Hogarth Press.

Interesting additions to an admirable series. Mr. Dobrée, author of a book on Restoration drama, tries his hand at a critical dialogue in the Restoration mode. Mr. Lubbock contributes, somewhat too much in the style of Pater, one of the best brief analyses of Dryden to date. Mr. Graves, as usual, is both fantastic and shrewd.

Chaplin and Some Others

By GILBERT SELDES

A LITTLE belatedly I come to three of the summer films: "The Gold Rush," "The Merry Widow," and "The Unholy Three." Report on them has been that they were all outstanding; and the first and last easily justify the rumor. "The Merry Widow" is a mixture of very good and not quite so good; it is superior to most ordinary films in the rigorous elimination, almost complete, of the actively bad. I do not know who followed von Stroheim in completing the work he began, and can only guess which director is responsible for which part. What is good is the employment of the camera more consistently than usual, the enrichment of its vocabulary, the growing accuracy of its accent. Technically, as all the movie journals say, the film is a high mark; but this applies more to the way the camera worked than to the way the actors played. There was a deal of attractiveness in Mae Murray at times, a touch of lightness in John Gilbert, of irony in Roy d'Arcy (as I recall the name of the Crown Prince), and something quite good in Tully Marshall; but excepting the last, all of these, at one time or another, played heavily and dully.

In connection with "The Unholy Three" it is quite clear that first credit goes to the director, Tod Browning; but at least a word must be said for Tod Robbins, who wrote the story. For the movies it is wholly unusual—the story of a ventriloquist, a dwarf, a strong-man, and a girl pickpocket, all in a small circus, joining their talents to become a gang of burglars, the ventriloquist and the dwarf masquerading as an old woman and a baby. Lon Chaney, the ventriloquist, was an uncommonly intelligent creation, for he was to just the right degree sinister and attractive; and the dwarf gave utterance to such appalling sentiments, made gestures of such unholy glee at the atrocities of his own creation that even the moderate success of the film, in a world of sloppiness, astonished me. The success is due to Mr. Browning, who did what the movie always can do and has seldom been asked to do. He deliberately removed the picture from the tone of reality. Without marking it "fantasy" and without using the distortions of setting and costume which got the same effect for "Caligari," he managed, largely by taking all his important scenes in obscure, unidentified corners, to suggest that everything going on was unrelated to our known existence. Four feet of a neutral wall, a bank of filing cabinets, fifteen feet of pavement, the place for three chairs—these hemmed in the extraordinary drama in all the best parts. There was weakness when, toward the end, we had to have a jury trial and a scene in a mountain cabin; yet even here the camera selected far more than it embraced. When Chaney with Mae Busch, who gave a remarkably fine performance as the pickpocket, had to meet for the scene in which she rejects his love, the whole outdoors was suffused with a light quite unreal.

There were many other small things as good; in the main this picture provided fantasy linked with the picaresque; it used the imagination. And its fate has been only moderately reassuring. The intellectuals have been captivated; the public has been startled, but not quite to the point of enthusiasm. Yet it is agreeable to think that a fantastic picture was made not for or by the highbrows, that Mr. Browning has given himself a distinct position among the directors, that Chaney and Mae Busch have done highly superior work in a film more suited to their talents than most of those they work in. They and "The Unholy Three" are on one of the many paths which make up the right way of the movies.

Mr. Chaplin, of course, has never deserted that way. "The Gold Rush" had a tremendous success which ought to persuade Mr. Chaplin again that he is right and has always been right. The hokum was good hokum; the story was not treated too seriously; and the great moments were tragi-comic in the finest way. Nothing I had heard prepared me for the actuality. In the dream which blessedly obliterates the agony of Charlie's waiting for his guests on New Year's Eve he does the Oceano Roll, the little dance with two rolls impaled on forks. It is deft and funny; but what makes it beautiful is that, although you hardly know it, Charlie's face, like those comic photographs in which you appear over a tiny ballet dress, is the focus of interest, miming the dance, filling it with emotion. The scene in which he enters the dance hall, utterly friendless, the loneliest man on earth, going to the one place where all men are companions, and finds himself isolated, is of a rare poignance. Almost without gesture he makes you feel his awareness that he will never become one of the crowd, that they are a rigid society from which he is eternally excluded.

The comic climax of the film comes early, in the scene of the cabin teetering over the edge of the abyss, and that scene is a whole textbook of the art of film comedy. Essentially it is hokum, but it is Chaplin's supreme talent to endow everything he does with life, and the hokum disappears under his magic hands, becoming the pure gold of comedy. In this scene he does it by a hundred touches. The cabin has been blown to the precipice while the two prospectors slept; snow has frozen the windows and doors; and it is the struggle between Charlie's stubbornness and the stubbornness of the frozen door which makes his swing, when the door gives, so funny. When the cabin is almost perpendicular in the air and the two men are crawling up its floor, it is Charlie's gesture and the words "Take it easy" which lift the scene. He in every case creates a picture, imagines something and makes you see what he has imagined.

The day after I saw "The Gold Rush" I revisited two of Chaplin's early masterpieces, "The Pawn Shop" and "The Immigrant." I have not the space to detail the changes and the progress which such a comparative view indicates. But, still feeling that "The Pawn Shop" is a masterpiece in its kind, possibly the masterpiece of early movie comedy, I experience no regret at the thought that Chaplin no longer makes that type. For he has grown naturally, according to his destiny; he has kept alive all the essential things, and developed precious new ones. He is still the same because his great moments were never tricks; they were and are manifestations of an actual creative genius. It is a question now of what interests him as raw material; what he does with the material when he has chosen it is always the same and always wonderful.

Drama

Made in Czecho-Slovakia

WHEN in the past the Theater Guild has chosen to squander its unparalleled resources upon the production of a trifle by Molnar I have been disposed to regard the action as a temporary and forgivable vagary, but now that the Hungarian threatens to become a habit it behooves even the passionate admirers of our most dignified theatrical institution to protest in sorrow, if not in anger, for, whatever the conventional theatrical virtues of the complacent author of "Liliom," they are not virtues which stand high in the scale which the Guild itself has sponsored. Back in 1915 when the organization was still in its Third Avenue cradle a wearisome dexterity was generally regarded as the supreme attribute of the dramatist, but the Guild was a breaker of tablets and a transvaluator of values. It, more than any other producing group, taught us to think of the drama in terms of life rather than in terms of the theater, and the first article of its credo embodied the belief that even an unpolished verity was preferable to the most silken of artificialities. Those of us who gathered in the small auditorium at the Band Box deliberately sought it out as a refuge from Molnar and his kind, and as we increased in numbers we enabled the Guild first to establish itself in one of the suburbs of Broadway and then to erect its mansion in the very center of the dramatic world. Surely it does not, as a result, deliberately propose to go over body and soul to the enemy camp; yet it did give last year a place of honor to a trifling comedy by Molnar which a "commercial manager" had previously produced, and this year it opens its official season with a much more pretentious and even emptier play by the same author. "The Glass Slipper" would be offensive anywhere, but to find it sponsored by the Guild is like coming upon a poster by James Montgomery Flagg in the Louvre.

Molnar is, indeed, the exact antithesis of that for which the Guild is supposed to stand. It was, I have always believed, founded to produce plays which were more than merely plays and to show that the drama could be, like the novel, a commentary upon life, whereas the most striking thing about Molnar's plays is their complete theatricality. They are entirely confined within the frame of the proscenium arch and once the curtain has descended upon them they cease absolutely to exist. Their characters, situations, and ideas have a certain reference to one another, but they have reference to nothing else. They remind you of nothing and they set you thinking of nothing because they belong to a world which has arc lights instead of sun and grease paint instead of flesh. One can ask as often as one likes whether or not the wife in "The Guardsman" penetrated immediately the disguise of her husband, but one can get no answer to the fatuous question because the wife being merely a puppet neither knew nor failed to know; one may speculate to all eternity concerning the meaning of "Liliom" because it has no meaning; and one may ask in vain whether the conclusion of "The Glass Slipper," in which a love-sick serving maid is finally united to the middle-aged object of her idolatry, is sentimental or cynical for the simple reason that the question has no meaning in connection with a play whose logic is not the logic of human emotion but merely the logic of theatrical manipulation. As for Molnar himself he neither knows nor cares. For two hours and a half he has pulled the strings and now with the fall of the final curtain he has let them drop. Any one who likes may pick them up again and may make the marionettes perform whatever evolutions he likes, but to expect them to live of themselves or to inquire into their thoughts or motives is as absurd as to attribute a Freudian complex to a sawdust doll. "Why," we might quite as sensibly ask, "does the cuckoo make his hourly sortie from the door of a Swiss clock? Is a sincere desire for self-expression his only motive or is he, perhaps, merely in search of a wooden worm?"

Fancy, to be sure, has its uses; Pierrot and Harlequin can enact a drama of their own. But Molnar invents no symbols, for he tends always to fall below rather than to transcend actuality. His mannequins are gaudy, but they are not touched by imagination; his situations are strained, but they are only parodies of human complications; and thus it is that every departure from nature only serves to show more clearly the vulgarity of his nature. To say that "The Glass Slipper" is as bad as "The Green Hat" would be, perhaps, a little extreme, but it is hardly better; and to say that June Walker, Helen Westley, Lee Baker, and George Baxter transform themselves into very cunningly articulated marionettes is only to make things worse. If, thanks to them, the public can be made to accept the play they will nevertheless have no legitimate cause for pride.

Unfortunately Sidney Howard's "Lucky Sam McCarver" (The Playhouse) must also be set down as a failure, but it is at least an honest and honorable one. The play, which deals with the conflicting creed of the self-made man and the aristocrat born, is never dull and Clare Eames gives an admirable portrait of the woman of the world, but the intention of the piece is so obscured in the intricacies of the plot that one never quite knows what it is about. At the Little Theater is an elaborated and visually charming production of "The School for Scandal," a play which no one except Bernard Shaw has ever succeeded in disliking during the century and a half of its existence. Doubtless its ethics are a little old fashioned, but the vigor of its wit is undiminished and its various theatrical punches are still strangely effective in spite of their antiquity. Mrs. Insull has not undertaken the impossible task of making Lady Teazle a profound study in feminine psychology, but she is pretty, vivacious, and charming. "Antonia" (Empire Theater) tells the well-worn story of the middle-aged woman who returns for one night to the scene of her former triumphs as the idol of a Budapest restaurant. The restaurant scene is strongly reminiscent of various musical comedies, but in spite of the fact that, this being a play, one waits in vain for the languorous waltz and the passionate farewell which generally furnished the climax to this story, the scene is moderately amusing. Marjorie Rambeau is the lady in question. "The Enemy" (Times Square Theater) is another of Channing Pollock's melodramatic moralities whose virtues are as unquestionably popular as they are unquestionably non-literary.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

MOROSCO THEATER, West 45th Street. Evenings, 8:30. Matinees Wednesdays and Saturdays, 2:30.

THE DRAMATIC SENSATION

CRAIG'S WIFE

By GEORGE KELLY

with CHRYSTAL HERNE

LAST WEEKS

466 Grand St. THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE

Evenings (except Monday), 8:30 sharp.
Matinees, Saturday, 2:30 sharp.

The Grand Street Follies of 1925

All Performances—Orchestra, $2; Balcony, $1.50.

THE Actors' Theatre presents a limited return engagement of Shaw's comedy masterpiece, "CANDIDA," at the Comedy Theatre, 41st St., near 6th Ave., Penn. 3558. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday.

THE cast consists of Peggy Wood, Harry C. Browne, Morgan Farley, Richie Ling, Helen Tilden and Frank Henderson. Staged by Dudley Digges.

LECTURES

465 W. 23rd Street — THE NEW SCHOOL for Social Research — New York City announces a course of nine lectures on

The Newest Developments in Psychology of Man and the Apes

By PROFESSOR WOLFGANG KÖHLER

of the University of Berlin, now lecturing at Clark and Harvard

Professor Köhler is the author of the foremost authoritative work on the mentality of apes, and the leader of the new movement in psychology known as the "Gestalt Psychology."

The lectures will be illustrated by slides and motion pictures.

They will be held on Thursdays at 5:20 p. m., beginning November 12th.

Tickets for course, $10.00. Single admissions, $1.50

LECTURES

RAND SCHOOL

7 E. 15th Street

Nathan Fine
"Labor's Struggle in Europe Today."
Thursdays, 7 P.M., Nov. 5, 12 and 19.

Herman Epstein
"The Ring of the Nibelungen."
Tuesdays, 8:30 P.M., Nov. 10 to Dec. 15.

Leo E. Saidla
"Main Tendencies in Modern Literature."
Fridays, 8:30 P.M., Nov. 13 to May 7.

OPEN FORUM

Sunday, Nov. 8, 8 p. m.

Is There a "Nordic" Myth?

Speaker, Dr. HAROLD RUGG of The Lincoln School and Teachers' College

Sunday, Nov. 15, 8 p. m.

Relation of Public Schools to Religion

Speakers, CHARLES W. BLANFIELD, Federation of Churches
Dr. GEORGE A. COE, Teachers' College

ADMISSION FREE

SOCIETY FOR ETHICAL CULTURE

2 West 64th Street — New York

MASS MEETING — ADMISSION FREE

ARMISTICE DAY

Wednesday, Nov. 11, 1925, at 8:15 P. M.

STUYVESANT HIGH SCHOOL AUDITORIUM

First Avenue and 15th Street

Chairman: ROBERT MORSS LOVETT

Speakers:

JANE ADDAMS
The Case for Disarmament

Rear-Admiral WILLIAM L. RODGERS
The Case for Armed Preparedness

THOMAS Q. HARRISON
Youth's Preparedness for Peace

SHERWOOD EDDY
War and the Churches

International Relations Section

A Soviet Budget for 1926

THE following digest of the "control figures" of the Institute for Planned Economics of the Soviet Union, made by L. F. Winow, of Moscow, has been taken from International Press Correspondence:

The Institute for Planned Economics of the Soviet Union recently published its "control figures for the political economy of the economic year 1925-26" (October 1, 1925 till September 30, 1926). In this the methodological introduction is followed by a general and detailed survey of the probable economic and financial results of the coming economic year. The Soviet government has succeeded for the first time in drawing up beforehand an economic plan including every branch of economics, for a whole year in advance. . . .

The "control figures" cannot of course represent more than an attempt to comprise in concrete figures the statistics of the driving forces of the whole of our economic life. . . . It is more than natural that the first attempt at a work of such far-reaching importance cannot be quite perfect or free from errors—but the fact in itself that such a calculation in advance, covering every department of economic life, is possible in the Soviet Union, and solely in the Soviet Union, shows that the new economic policy does not represent a transition from war communism back to capitalism but forward to socialism; herein lies the great importance of the attempt. . . .

Agricultural Production

The material part of the survey, from which we can here only adduce a few of the most important points, b gins with an analysis of agricultural production, showing the output of 1924-25, calculated at pre-war prices, to have been 71 per cent of the output of 1913, as follows:

	Millions in pre-war roubles
	1913	1924-25	Per cent
Tillage	11,782	8,106	69
Forestry, fishing, and hunting, agriculture collectively	1,044	1,044	100
	12,826	9,150	71

The Institute for Planned Economics calculates upon agricultural production increasing by 26 per cent during the next economic year, so that the probable yield from tillage will be 89 per cent of pre-war production and from forestry, fishing, and hunting 115 per cent.

Of those branches of agriculture whose output already exceeds the pre-war level, special mention must be made of the potato output, which has already attained 116 per cent of the pre-war standard, and is calculated at 127 per cent for the coming year.

With reference to the quantities of goods placed upon the market, these represent for agriculture a value of 2,857 million pre-war roubles as compared with 4,498 million in 1913, or 64 per cent. Next year the value will be 3,369 million pre-war roubles, or 89 per cent.

The ratio of the amount of goods to collective production is thus somewhat lower than before the war, a circumstance partially explicable by the after effects of the enormous reduction in the traffic in goods during the war communism period, and partially by the dividing up of the large landed properties, resulting in a comparatively high increase of consumption among the peasantry itself.

The products of cattle rearing will be maintained at approximately the same level during the coming economic year as in the present year, that is, at 80 per cent of the pre-war production. The mutual relations of the various branches of production pertaining to cattle rearing will, however, undergo considerable alterations. The previous failures of crops have had the effect of inducing breeders to reduce their livestock, but this year's good crops, enabling the animals to be kept, will probably cause a decline in the production of meat and raw leather; this will, however, be compensated by the increased output of eggs and milk.

Industry

With regard to the development of industry, we find a general increase of production to the amount of 54 per cent as compared with the previous year. Next year it will increase by about 34 per cent as compared with this. This development is unequal in the different branches of production. While the beginning of our reconstructive work witnessed the rapid development of small and light industries working immediately for the needs of the masses, the last few years have seen great advances in the reconstruction of the large industries. . . .

Comprehensive Table of Total Production

A. Agriculture

	In million pre-war roubles[1]			Per cent as compared to 1913
	1913	1924-25	1925-26	1924-25	1925-26
Tillage	11,782	8,106	10,236	69	87
Forestry, fishing, hunting	1,044	1,044	1,200	100	115
Total agriculture	12,826	9,150	11,436	71	89

B. Industry

Large undertakings	5,621	3,950	5,280	70	94
Medium and small undertakings	1,390	1,050	1,370	76	94
Total industry	7,011	5,000	6,650	71	95
Total production	19,837	14,150	18,086	71	91

Price Movement

The control figure commission, after harmonizing various standpoints, considers a fall in the price index for industrial products by 9 per cent, for agricultural products by 8 per cent, and of the total index by 8.3 per cent, to be probable. The price index is thus as follows:

	1913	1924-25	1925-26 probably
Agriculture	1000	1693	1565
Industry	1000	1905	1733
Total index	1000	1796	1647
Percentage of agricultural index to total	100	94	95
Percentage of industrial index to total	100	106	105

The question of the development of wages and of the productivity of labor requires to be dealt with in a special article. It need only be mentioned that in the coming economic year real wages will reach on an average 100 per cent of pre-war wages. The struggle to attain and surpass the European and American wage level can then begin. With respect to unemployment, it may be observed that the rapid increase of production has already brought about a shortage of skilled labor.

Foreign Trade

In so far as absolute figures are concerned, foreign trade is still far below its pre-war level. This is only natural, since the development of export, especially in agriculture, invariably expresses the stage of production reached the previous year, while the amount of imported goods in the Soviet Union is [1] It is specially pointed out that in the categories 1924-25 and 1925-26 not the actual gold price, but the pre-war price of the amount produced, is stated.

Some Representative Modern Library Titles

South Wind
by
NORMAN DOUGLAS
(Number 5)

Jungle Peace
by
WILLIAM BEEBE
(Number 30)

The Philosophy of William James
(Number 114)

Beyond Life
by
JAMES BRANCH CABELL
(Number 25)

The Way of All Flesh
by
SAMUEL BUTLER
(Number 13)

Candide
by
VOLTAIRE
(Number 47)

An Unsocial Socialist
by
GEORGE BERNARD SHAW
(Number 15)

95 cents per copy, one dollar postpaid.

At all bookstores, or from the publishers.

MODERN LIBRARY

THE MODERN LIBRARY

There are today

114 TITLES

in The Modern Library—chosen so carefully and with such rigid adherence to a definite ideal that the list represents the very best in modern literature and thought.

AT 95 CENTS A COPY

The Modern Library offers you the finest works of Oscar Wilde, Anatole France, Nietzsche, Hardy, Shaw, W. H. Hudson, Dreiser, Lawrence, Ibsen, Sherwood Anderson and scores of others, in a format in keeping with the content.

The books are bound in a full limp fashion, printed in clear, large type on fine paper, the tops stained and the covers stamped with genuine gold. They are a permanent addition to any library.

A NEW, ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE

describing in some detail each Modern Library volume, will be sent on request.

Address [illegible] your Bookseller or

THE MODERN LIBRARY, INC.,
71 West 45th Street, New York City.
Kindly send me the following numbers.

. . . . . .

☐ I enclose [illegible]
☐ Send C. O. D. [illegible]
☐ Send Catalogue

Name . . . . . .

Address . . . . . .

N-11

Some Representative Modern Library Titles

Winesburg, Ohio
by
SHERWOOD ANDERSON
(Number 104)

Sons and Lovers
by
D. H. LAWRENCE
(Number 109)

Free, and Other Stories
by
THEODORE DREISER
(Number 50)

The Plays of W. S. Gilbert
(Numbers 26 and 113)

Green Mansions
by
W. H. HUDSON
(Number 89)

The Red Lily
by
ANATOLE FRANCE
(Number [illegible])

The Poems of Walt Whitman
(Number [illegible])

95 cents per copy, one dollar postpaid.

At all bookstores, or from the publishers.

MODERN LIBRARY

chiefly made dependent on the amount exported. We may thus say, dynamically speaking, that foreign trade has developed comparatively as rapidly as or even more rapidly than the other branches of economics. Thus we find in the estimate for the coming economic year that this year's export sum is almost tripled (274 per cent). We append a collective survey of foreign trade:

				In million gold roubles		Per cent 1913		Per cent 1925-26 Calculated
	1913	1923- 24	1924- 25	1924- 25	1925- 26	1924- 25	1925- 26	Pre-war	Gold roubles
Export:
Agriculture	927	204	353	354	950	22	60	274	265
Industry	378	66	121	108	150	17	32	154	173
Total	1305	270	680	462	1100	21	52	252	238
Import:
Agriculture	297	145	189	255	475	49	64	130	186
Industry	710	194	329	341	475	27	46	170	139
Total	1007	339	518	596	950	34	51	153	159

The Building of Dwelling Houses

With respect to the provision of housing accommodation, the control figures provide the following program for the next economic year:

	Million gold roubles
For the renovation of entirely dilapidated houses...	100
For the renovation of semi-dilapidated houses and the completion of new houses already begun..	100
For the construction of new houses to replace buildings unfit for habitation	70
For the building of houses to accommodate the increase of population	105
Total	375

The closing chapter of the control figures deals with the process of socialization in the economic life of the Soviet Union. The capital value in the hands in the state at the beginning of the economic year 1924-25 (dwelling houses excepted) amounts to at least 11.7 milliard gold roubles; the value of the cooperative capital amounts to 500 million gold roubles; the total value of the socialized capital thus amounts to 12.2 milliard gold roubles, while the private—mainly agricultural—undertakings have merely 7.5 milliards at their disposal. The capital of the country is thus socialized to the extent of more than 62 per cent.

In detail:

	Socialized up to:
Municipal capital with industry and transport.	97 per cent
Industry	89 per cent
Big industry alone.....	99 per cent
Agricultural capital only to the extent of.....	4 per cent [1]

The following table shows the gradually increasing preponderance of socialized industry in every branch of industrial production:

Gross Production

Year	State and co-operative industry	Private undertakings	Total
1923-24	5562 = 76.3%	1728 = 23.7%	7290 = 100%
1924-25	7550 = 79.3%	1970 = 20.7%	9520 = 100%
1925-26	9186 = 79.7%	2334 = 20.3%	11520 = 100%

The general survey of the economic prospects of the Soviet Union thus gained shows that next year the pre-war level will be nearly approached, and that this pre-war level has already been overtaken in several branches of industry. Most important of all is the fact that industry is developing straight along the road to socialism, to an ever higher degree of nationalization, and to an ever higher form of economic organization.

The struggle for the socialization of agriculture is, however, still in its preliminary stage. We have before us some decades of obstinate struggle for the cooperatives, for the supplying of the poorer peasantry with means of production, and not last for the industrialization of agriculture, this fundamental condition of socialization. . . .

[1] With the exception of the land itself, which is of [illegible]

The Revival of the Russian Industry

FROM the Russian Information Bureau comes the information which follows on Russian industry and trade for the past year:

Throughout the year the Soviet currency was the only major currency in Europe to hold consistently at slightly above the dollar parity. During the year the currency in circulation increased by about 80 per cent. These remarkable gains were made in the face of a severe handicap in the poor harvest of 1924 in a country where upward of 90 per cent of the people live on the land and the yield of the soil is normally an index of the national economy. The poor harvest reduced the grain exports, which ordinarily make up nearly half the value of the export trade, to a negligible quantity. For most of the months during the year there were no grain exports whatever.

The present state of productivity in the Union is the more remarkable when one considers that four years ago the industrial processes were paralyzed, much basic machinery was hopelessly depleted, the output was less than 20 per cent of that of 1913, and the currency was in an advanced state of depreciation.

The grain crop of the past summer was estimated at close to three billion bushels, by far the best since the war. The wheat crop of 660,000,000 bushels marked an increase of 100 per cent over 1924. At the close of September it was estimated that the surplus of all grains for export would be close to 300,000,000 bushels, valued at about $240,000,000. The yield per acre of all grains this year was greater than that of 1913, wheat being 25 per cent greater. This increase doubtless reflects the increasing use of tractors and more efficient methods resulting from increased literacy among the peasants and the steady flow of radio lectures on agriculture into the receivers in village "reading huts." Before the war there were less than 500 tractors in the whole Russian Empire. By September 15 last there were 12,500, most of which had been imported from the United States during the past eighteen months. During the current fiscal year it is planned to increase the number by 22,000 more.

The budget of a socialist state is an index of economic expansion. The budget for the past year amounted to about $1,300,000,000, an increase of nearly 100 per cent over the previous year. The budget for 1925-26 shows a further increase of nearly 40 per cent over the past year and stands equal to the pre-war Czarist budget. The increased resources of the country have made possible a resumption of the ambitious program of national education which was held in abeyance for several years for economic reasons. The amount expended for education last year was greater than in any pre-war year.

The feature of Soviet foreign trade is the steady rise of imports from the United States. Today, despite the severe handicaps, American imports top those of all other countries on the Soviet list. The Russian-American trading companies reported for the first half of the calendar year 1925 a trade turnover of about $59,000,000, of which Soviet purchases here were $53,600,000. The trade turnover in 1913, on a half-year basis, was valued at about 40 per cent of this figure.

INTELLIGENT INVESTMENT

You can take an active part in intelligent housing relief—and get 6% on money invested.

IN City Housing Corporation stock we offer a unique type of investment security.

On an investment basis alone, this stock is worthy of consideration. Safety of principal and steady income are assured.

But City Housing Corporation stock is more than merely an investment. The Company is engaged in building better homes and communities for people of moderate incomes—already 350 have been built at Sunnyside, Long Island City. It has been called the most significant housing movement of the decade.

Your money will be used over and over again, over a long period of years, in building homes, without speculative profit, for people with average incomes. There is an opportunity to put your capital to work to solve one of the greatest problems of the day.

The Corporation has paid 6 per cent. dividends since the very beginning, and will have a surplus of over $100,000 by the beginning of 1926.

For full information write City Housing Corporation, 587 Fifth Avenue, New York, or send in the coupon below.

DIRECTORS

Alexander M. Bing
President
Dr. Felix Adler
John G. Agar
Leo S. Bing
William Sloane Coffin
Thomas C. Desmond
Douglas L. Elliman
Prof. Richard T. Ely
Frank Lord
V. Everit Macy
John Martin
Mrs. Joseph M. Proskauer
Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt
Robert E. Simon

CITY HOUSING CORPORATION

A limited dividend company—
Organized to build better homes and communities.
Authorized capital, $5,000,000 in shares of $100 each.

CITY HOUSING CORPORATION,
587 Fifth Avenue, New York City. Please send me descriptive literature.

Name .....
Street .....
City ..... State .....

N-2

The most recent volumes
In the TODAY AND TOMORROW Series
"The cream of modern thought on questions of progress"

PROMETHEUS
By H. S. JENNINGS
Johns Hopkins University
On Biology and the Advancement of Man.

LYSISTRATA
By ANTHONY M. LUDOVICI
A man's view of the dangerous trend of modern feminism.

HYPATIA
By Mrs. BERTRAND RUSSELL
A spirited answer to the above from an extreme feminist.

PARIS
By B. H. LIDDELL HART
On the Future of War

THAMYRIS
By R. C. TREVELYAN
On the Future of poetry

PROTEUS
By VERNON LEE
A consideration of the real nature of intelligence

Each volume $1.00
Send for a complete list.

E. P. DUTTON & CO., 681 Fifth Ave., New York

Talk It Over With HARRY KELLY

Is it possible to live in the country, yet be near to the city?
Is the cost of living lower? Why? Who own homes at Mt. Airy?
How much capital is needed to buy ¼ or ½ acre at Mt. Airy?
What about water and electricity?
Can you help me finance building my home?
These and many other questions will be answered for you when you drop in to talk it over with

HARRY KELLY, 70 Fifth Avenue, New York
Chelsea 0482

MOTHER JONES' AUTOBIOGRAPHY is the thrilling story of a remarkable woman who has given her life to the struggle of the workers for a living wage and decent working conditions. First-hand material here for the student. CLARENCE DARROW writes the Introduction. Cloth, illustrated, $1.50 postpaid.
Charles H. Kerr & Company, 347 East Ohio Street, Chicago.

Science and the Workers' Revolution

THE English edition of International Press Correspondence prints the following article by A. Lunacharsky, Russian Commissar of Education, on the two-hundredth anniversary celebration of the Russian Academy of Science, which was held on September 5 with great international festivities:

The jubilee of the Academy of Science was turned into a great festival of the whole Union and at the same time of the whole world. The Government arranged a great celebration of this jubilee which found a hearty echo both in the press and among the public. The whole scientific world, and with it public opinion in all countries, devoted considerable attention to this event. The opinions expressed abroad varied greatly. Some scientific institutes and individual scientists were bewildered, some of them even indignant. They did not know what attitude to take toward this jubilee which at the same time as being a great festival in the world of science was also a festival of the hated Union of the Socialist Soviet Republic. But it was precisely the existence of this element of disapproval in the international opinion of scientists and of the public which gave the event peculiar vitality.

What was it that really took place? Would our academicians be right in saying that their personal merits, highly appreciated on all sides, made them, on the occasion of this festival, the center of attention of the whole world? Would they be right if they were to regard the academy's achievements in the domain of science during the past 200 years, which indeed represent a huge number of discoveries and attainments to which everyone must pay respect, as the chief cause of this attention and of the dignified, extraordinary character of this festival?

No. In spite of our extreme respect for the now living academicians and for their predecessors, we must say that the festival of the academy was, of course, impressive and remarkable, but that it owes its immense significance to the fact that a great scientific institution with traditions of extraordinary value has placed its services voluntarily at the disposal of the first socialist state.

It is just this which gives the event world-wide historical importance. As a matter of fact, it was proved on this day of celebration that the proletariat and, mark you, the proletariat of one of the most backward countries of Europe, having taken the power into its own hands, knows how to appreciate science.

Is it really conceivable that the shining lights of culture can peaceably work together with the masses of the people who have overthrown the dictatorship of the ruling classes? The festival proved that this is not only possible but natural. It proved to the whole world in the most telling way that Lassalle was right when he anticipated an alliance between "the fourth estate and science."

As the first step in a solemn fraternization between the liberated workers and science, the jubilee of our academy with its impressive celebration has become a magnificent event; at this festival, scientists from all over the world flocked to witness the official, formally celebrated espousals of the workers' revolution with science.

As a rule, official celebrations are dull, the speeches delivered are officially optimistic and at the same time officially uninformed. The festival of our academy was quite different. Every word spoken was original and significant. No single historian of general culture will in the future be able to pass over this powerful manifestation of a converging of social and cultural forces, the final result of which will be the creation of an entirely new world which the Old World is painfully laboring to bring forth.

Books From and About Russia

DECEMBER 14th, by Dmitri Merezhkovsky, A novel dealing with one of the most stirring episodes in Russian history. 12mo. 320 pp. $2.00

FLYING OSIP, Stories of New Russia. Eleven short stories written since the Revolution. 12mo. 320 pp. $2.50

The NEW THEATRE and CINEMA at SOVIET RUSSIA by Huntly Carter A veritable encyclopaedia of the Russian theatre today. 8vo. 300 pp. 85 illustrations. $6.00

HISTORICAL MATERIALISM—A SYSTEM OF SOCIOLOGY by Nikolai Bukharin. All the natural and social phenomena closely scrutinized and interpreted from the materialist viewpoint. 8vo. 320 pp. $3.25

RUSSIA TODAY

Official report of the British Trade Union Delegation to Soviet Russia. 8vo. 288 pp. Paper $1.25. Cloth $1.75

— TWO BOOKS BY LEON TROTSKY —

WHITHER ENGLAND?

A brilliant analysis of the factors which threaten England's economic supremacy. 12mo. 192 pp. $1.75

LITERATURE and REVOLUTION

Trotsky's brilliant criticism of present-day literary groupings in Russia. 12mo. 256 pp. $2.50

CHAINS Henri Barbusse Author of "Under Fire," etc.

A novel of imposing sweep and scope. An important literary achievement. Stefan Zweig says: "A gigantic panorama of humanity." 2 vols. 12mo. 592 pp. $4.00

Write for Complete Catalog

INTERNATIONAL PUBLISHERS CO.
INCORPORATED
381 FOURTH AVENUE NEW YORK

Announcement

Chairmen of Entertainment Committees:

BEFORE MAKING FINAL ARRANGEMENTS FOR YOUR SOCIAL AFFAIR, DINNER, DANCE, SMOKER, OR SUPPER DANCE, SEE OUR BANQUET AND BALL ROOMS. CHARGES NOT HIGHER THAN ELSEWHERE.

FIFTH AVENUE RESTAURANT
200 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK, N. Y.

THEODORE KEMM, Managing Owner

GRAMERCY 4900 TO 4907

AMTORG TRADING CORPORATION

165 BROADWAY, NEW YORK

Sole representatives in the U. S.

of

Gostorg (State Export and Import Bureau) of the RSFSR, Moscow

Gostorg of the Northwestern Region, Leningrad

Ukrainian Gostorg, Kharkov

Transcaucasian Gostorg, Tiflis

White-Russian Gostorg, Minsk

All the leading industrial and commercial organizations and combinations in the Union of SSR.

and

Arcos Ltd., London

Exporting to the Union SSR:

Agricultural machinery and implements
Electrical machinery
Technical equipment for industries and transport
Drugs and chemicals
Office materials
Objects of general use, etc.

Importing from the Union SSR:

Furs and hides
Bristle, horsehair, wool, casings, and other animal products
Hemp and flax
Peasant art and handicraft productions
Medical roots and other raw materials

MOSCOW OFFICE: KUZNETZKY MOST 14

Allied American Corporation

Alamerico

IMPORTERS U. S. S. R. EXPORTERS

Operating Under Agreement with People's Commissariat of Foreign Trade, of the Union Socialist Soviet Republics, dated July 14th, 1923

HOME OFFICE
165 Broadway, New York, N. Y.
"DEILAMERCO"—NEW YORK

RUSSIAN HEADQUARTERS
Kuznetzki Most 4, Moscow
"ALAMERICO"—MOSCOW

EUROPEAN BRANCHES

LONDON	BERLIN	RIGA	REVAL
56 Moorgate	Augsburgerstr. 47	Sanstrasse 15	Harju Tank 11a
"ALLIAMERIC"	"ALLAMERICO"	"ALAMERICO"	"ALAMERICO"

IMPORTERS OF RUSSIAN PRODUCTS OF EVERY DESCRIPTION

German Russian and Storage

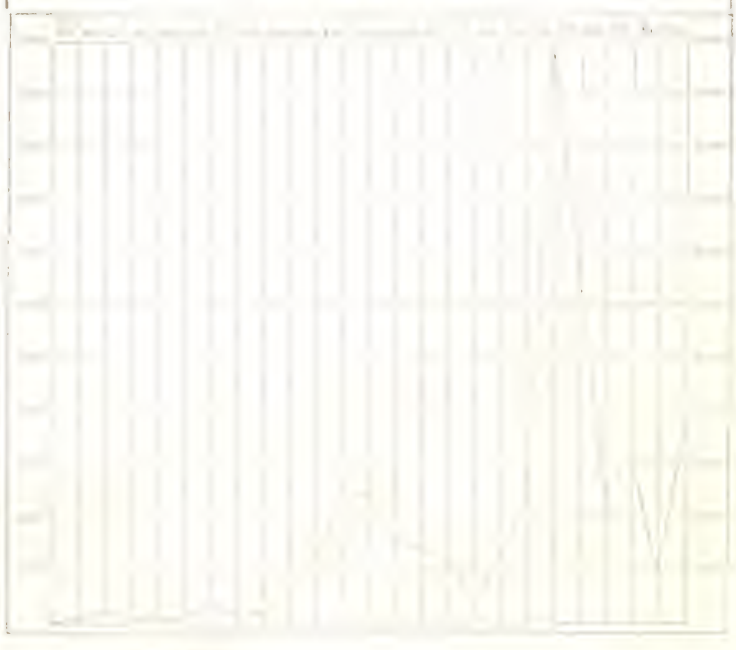
DERUTRA

Transportation Corporation, Ltd.

35 Water Street

New York

FREIGHT SHIPMENTS FROM U. S. TO RUSSIA BY DERUTRA IN 1924
JULY 1924—JULY 1925



Contributors to This Issue

MAURICE G. HINDUS is the author of "The Russian Peasant and the Revolution."

WILLIAM RESWICK is an American journalist now in Moscow.

MICHAEL GOLD has written a play about the Mexican revolution, soon to be produced by the Provincetown Players in New York.

VLADIMIR MAYAKOVSKY is one of the futurist group of Russian poets. He is about to return to Russia after a visit in the United States and Mexico, as the result of which he has written a volume of American poems.

LOUIS FISCHER is The Nation's correspondent in Moscow.

PAXTON HIBBEN was a member of the Russian Commission of the Near East Relief whose report on the famine was published by The Nation in 1922. He has since devoted most of his time to Russian relief.

MAXIM GORKI is now living in Italy.

JOHN A. HOBSON is an English economist and a contributing editor of The Nation.

MAX EASTMAN, formerly editor of the Masses and the Liberator, has lived abroad for three years, mostly in Russia.

JOSHUA KUNITZ, of the faculty of the College of the City of New York, is writing a book about Merezhkovsky.

GILBERT SELDES is the author of "The Seven Lively Arts."

Notification has been received from the Post Office Department that it is against one of their rulings to extend the time of a prize contest, and that October 15 must officially be considered the closing date for the Student-Worker Contest, as originally announced, instead of November 1.

Editors of The Nation

Next week's issue of THE NATION will be a
Foreign Book Number

BRENTANO'S, Inc. 1 West 47th Street New York

Books in English and in Russian on Russia and Russian Problems.

American publishers of Jar Ptitza $1.25 a number

ARMISTICE DAY MEETING
Wednesday, November 11, 1925, at 8:15 P. M.
under the auspices of
THE WOMEN'S PEACE SOCIETY
Speakers: Mrs. Henry Villard,
Mrs. Edward Thomas,
Rev. Leon Land,
Mrs. J. Sergeant Cram, Chairman.
PEACE HOUSE, 109th St. and Fifth Ave., N. Y. C.

The Russian Review

Published semi-monthly by the RUSSIAN INFORMATION BUREAU
2819 Connecticut Ave., N. W., Washington, D. C.

Prints the most recent material on Industry, Trade, Finances, Agriculture, Legislation, Foreign Relations and Cultural Life of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Copy, 15c. Subscription: One Year, $4.00; Six Months, $2.00.

First and second volumes of the Russian Review, including issues from September 1923 to December 1924, each volume provided with a comprehensive index, are still obtainable at the price of $4.00 and $3.00 respectively.

The third volume of the Russian Review, bound in imitation leather, containing all the issues published in 1925, with a comprehensive index, will be ready by January 1926. Price $5.00.

Autonomous Industrial Colony

"KUZBAS"

(Operating a by-product plant, a steel plant, coal mines, coke ovens, farms, machine shops, etc., in Kuznetzky Basin, Siberia.)

DURING THE COMING SPRING

Will be able to use the services of a number of HIGHLY SKILLED WORKERS (who are interested more in the opportunity of working in an important Russian-American State Trust than in high salaries) with mining, mechanical, electrical, construction or administrative experience.

During 1925-26 the coal mining program will be 760,000 tons, while $2,000,000 (of which $1,000,000 was a surplus from last year's operation) will be put into new works.

Information on the above can be obtained from

KUZBAS, 799 Broadway, New York, N.Y.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 18, 1925 No. 3150

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 559

EDITORIALS:

Governor Smith's Victory 562
General Charteris Falsifies Again 563
Coolidge and Coal 564
College Undergraduates 564
Labor Combats Waste 565

TAXATION BY MISREPRESENTATION. By Louis W. McKernan 566

A FRAGMENT OF WAR-TIME HISTORY. By Ellen Torelle Nagler 568

MR. COOLIDGE'S NEW-OLD MESSAGE. By Frank R. Kent 570

IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 571

CORRESPONDENCE 571

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:

Women's Suffrage in Belgium. By Anne Somerhausen 574

FOREIGN BOOK SECTION.

Fall Books in France. By René Lalou 576
British Books: Autumn. By Edwin Muir 577
Many Gentlemen. By Laura Riding Gottschalk 578
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 578
A French View of War Origins. By Max Montgelas 578
From the German. By Joseph Wood Krutch 579
Comte Robert de Montesquiou. By William A. Drake 580
Books in Brief 581
Aids for Editors 581
The Nation's Poetry Prize 582
Drama: Tirocinium. By Joseph Wood Krutch 582

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscription and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

LONG SINCE have we passed the stage of taking politicians' speeches at their face value. Yet we cannot but attach considerable importance to Austen Chamberlain's excellent remarks on the Chinese situation at the Guildhall banquet on November 9, for the reason that it is one of several signs that the British attitude toward China seems to be changing, at least in London. Whether the British representatives in China have as yet sensed that and changed their own attitude is open to question; there are certainly many steps for them to retrace. But when the man to whom belongs most of the credit for Locarno goes out of his way at a jubilee over the success of that negotiation to ask a similar outcome for the Chinese entanglement, it is at least a great advance from those recent days when Mr. Chamberlain himself was declaring that the Powers would do nothing whatever until China had set her house in order and established all the domestic reforms the Powers wished her to undertake. Meanwhile, the Peking tariff conference is progressing as well as could be expected. The Chinese have modified their original demands; the stumbling-block for the moment is that the Japanese insist that, under Article 3 of the Washington Treaty, the surtax on imported articles of luxury cannot be increased beyond 5 per cent. This, the Chinese feel, they cannot accept if they are to abolish the likin taxes and institute other reforms. None the less, the outlook at this writing is by no means discouraging.

FRANCE AND ITALY are both in the midst of critical financial negotiations as this issue of The Nation goes to press. Italian representatives are in Washington trying to agree with our Debt Commission upon a basis for funding (a polite word which means promising to pay in part) their war-time borrowings. The sum amounts to a little more than $2,000,000,000, or about half of the French debt to us. If an agreement is reached, it will probably be on a more favorable basis than was offered to France. Our Debt Commission must have learned something by the miscarriage of the French negotiations and, in spite of opposition in Congress to substantial concessions, the Administration is more likely to chance a rebuff there than to have chalked against it the record of failure to obtain even a paper promise of money from either of the countries which, Great Britain excepted, are our chief debtors. Meanwhile the franc is fighting for its life in France in what seems to be almost the last ditch. Premier Painlevé has advanced a bold and possibly effective scheme of taxation, including (under a softer name) a partial tax on capital. Some such plan is the only possible exit from a devaluation of the franc likely to carry it presently to a collapse as complete as that of the German mark. Yet, in spite of impending national calamity, the moneyed classes grip their purse-strings and oppose the Painlevé program. Like the aristocrats before the Revolution they prefer the deluge to any personal sacrifice.

THE TROUBLE IN SYRIA grows more serious rather than less so. The country seems to be aflame with resentment and revolt. Damascus is reported to look like a city under siege, with barbed-wire entanglements and other defenses, and the railroad to Haifa has been cut. The French have, or soon will have, 30,000 troops in Syria, but correspondents report that 10,000 more are needed. Beirut, on the coast, is out of the present zone of disturbance, and the dispatch thither of two American destroyers has no immediate significance except to relieve the United States considers that conditions in the country are a danger to European residents. The appointment of a civilian, Senator Henry de Jouvenel, as High Commissioner in place of General Sarrail is a welcome change of policy on the part of the French Government, but it is a question if it has not come too late. When native feeling has been aroused as in Syria the sentiment is hard to change, even with the best of treatment. The French, in their own interest, should get out; otherwise the time may come when they will want to but cannot.

QUIETLY AND UNOSTENTATIOUSLY Persia has deposed its Shah. The ex-Shah was not in Teheran at the time, so he could not be deposed in person. He was busy playing in the gayer French pleasure resorts, but he shows no inclination to contest the matter and so will presumably continue to play—as long as his allowance and the crown jewels hold out. The former Premier, Reza Khan, who urged his Shah two years ago to leave the country and give over the uncongenial job of ruling, has now taken the throne or, according to another dispatch, become the head of a temporary government awaiting the final decision of the National Assembly. To all outward aspects this unobtrusive ending of a dynasty might be a mere palace revolution—if it were not in Persia. But Persia is rich and on the high road to India. And control of the destinies of Persia is the need and aim of Russia and of England—who fought and schemed to get that control away from one another before a Soviet government was dreamed of in the land of the Czars. And so, when a Shah is deposed in Persia, the world may be sure that something more than personal ambition or a court intrigue has ended his rule. This particular change is reported—by the London correspondent of the Chicago Tribune—as "another triumph for British diplomacy." The former premier and present ruler of Persia is said to be a friend of the English, an anti-Soviet minister who is willing to play Great Britain's game in Persia. If this is true, England's Tory Government will have forged another link in a new chain of anti-Soviet states and helped to consolidate its strangle-hold on the East—both Far and Near.

THE NEW YORK WORLD is responsible for the text of a secret treaty said to have been signed by representatives of Soviet Russia and Italy in 1924. If this is really in existence it reflects discredit on both the countries involved. The agreement relates to the joint interests of the two nations in Eastern Europe and primarily in Turkish territory. It declares that the aims of the two countries are identical in Turkey, and that their interests in Eastern Europe "are not in the least degree contrasted." In the Balkans "both states have therefore perfectly free hands; none the less each will study means to avoid doing anything damaging to the other's interest. This holds good for Rumania as well as for Jugoslavia." As for Jugoslavia, the Soviets not only recognize the special importance of Italy's interests but "undertake to allow these interests free and full development without imposing upon Italy their own political views." The Soviets are given a free hand in Rumania, which means that they will not be troubled by Italy if they decide to get back Bessarabia. More than that, in the event of an Italo-Turkish war the Soviet Government undertakes to send Russian troops against Turkey in Asiatic territory in the neighborhood of Erzerum, the Russian force to be in proportion to the Turkish force engaged, and there is also to be naval action in the Bosporus. In the event of a Turco-Russian war Italy agrees to hold herself aloof but to support Russia politically. Finally, complete secrecy is agreed upon. If this is a reliable document it must constitute a serious blow to the Russians' contention of being opposed to imperialistic gains by force and to that of being engaged in a life-and-death struggle with the capitalist civilizations surrounding them.

THE AMERICAN AVIATORS who have been engaged in the heroic enterprise of bombarding Riff villages in Morocco have quit for the winter, so it is reported, to return to France. We hope this will end entirely their misguided adventure. Whatever may be said about the ethics or wisdom of this rather gaudy gesture, we have defended the right of these men to enlist in the French army if they desired to—and take the consequences; that is, forfeit the protection of American citizenship. But they have not done this; they have tried to carry water on both shoulders. They did not enlist regularly in the army of France but pretended in some way to be in the employ of the Sultan of Morocco (a figurehead in the French protectorate). In other words they were civilians engaged in making war and, according to international law, should have been shot if caught. They regarded themselves, apparently, as super-soldiers, fighting for France under American protection, and wore as insignia an eagle with a bomb in its talons. A recent exploit of the aviators was to land in Tangier (which is international, not French, territory) and then fly back to the war zone. These sophomoric glory-hunters have not stuck to the rules of either soldiers or freebooters, and we hope to hear no more from them.

IN MARKED CONTRAST to the results of the New York City election, the recent vote for Borough Councilors in London and in England at large resulted in a notable gain for Socialist and Labor candidates. The conservative parties attempted a campaign to "get out the vote," and they were successful—except that the aroused electorate voted for somebody else. Unemployment is the great vote-getter, and the Labor Party is the gainer. In London alone, before the present election, Labor held 263 of the 1,362 Borough Council seats; and there is not a single Socialist alderman in New York City. The explanation lies partly in the fact, often pointed out, that in England it may be unpopular but it is not disreputable to belong to a socialist or a labor party. Does it not, for example, make our Stanwood Menkens shudder to hear that not only G. Bernard Shaw, who though indubitably a gentleman is literary and hence a little queer, but Colonel Josiah Wedgwood, a former Cabinet member, and the Countess of Warwick so far forgot themselves as to go bail for the Communists recently arrested on charges of sedition? Here, unless by chance the arrested Communists happened to be of gentle birth, they might languish in jail for the rest of their lives before any of our gentry would lift a finger to get them out.

AN INTERESTING INCIDENT of the elections on November 3 was the defeat in Westchester County, New York, of the proposed new charter for remaking the government of one of the richest rural counties in the United States. A commission labored for a long time to devise a governmental machinery which could supplant the hopelessly inadequate county government dating from colonial days. It finally brought forth a document which, besides many admirable features, concentrated tremendous power in the hands of one man. Curiously enough the charter was championed both by civic leaders of unquestioned public devotion and long records of excellent public service and by the dominating Republican machine of which William L. Ward is the sole boss. Every effort was made to win the electorate to it by a vigorous campaign of "enlightenment," but the charter was defeated by about 5,000 votes of those who preferred the present poor government to the prospect of future efficiency plus autocratic control. This is an extraordinary example of intelligent voting, since Westchester usually does as Mr. Ward tells it. But gratifying as is the outcome, it does not solve the problem of how to govern "commuting counties" in the neighborhood of great cities. There are so many of these that it is a matter of national importance that there be soon the beginning of a new effort to draft a charter for Westchester which, let us hope, will find a way to combine efficiency with democracy.

SAN FRANCISCO will soon follow in the wake of her Pacific Coast neighbors, Los Angeles and Seattle, in supplying electricity to her own citizens at cost. So much may be definitely counted on as a result of the election on November 3 which sent to the Board of Supervisors nine candidates of the "minority group" ticket, opposed to the Hetch Hetchy power contract with the Pacific Gas and Electric Company and favorable to the development of a municipal distribution plant. The facts back of the controversy over the power contract were set forth in The Nation of November 4: the grant of power rights at Hetch Hetchy by the federal government on condition that these rights would not be sold for private gain; the construction by the city of a hydro-electric power plant at Moccasin Creek; the failure of the supervisors to provide a municipal distribution plant; and the sale of power at wholesale to a private corporation for resale to the people of San Francisco. The sequel to this tale was the rebuke delivered to the majority group of supervisors on November 3. In taking the next step—the development of a city distribution plant—the citizens have before them the alternative of purchasing the Pacific Gas and Electric Company's plant within the city or of constructing a new system. The power contract with the company has been declared by many lawyers to be in direct contravention to the terms of the government grant. Will it be canceled? Will it be modified? Or will it be continued until such time as the municipal distribution plant is ready for operation?

THE PROPOSAL to add 300,000 acres to the Yellowstone National Park so as to include the superb Teton Range, the western watershed of the Absaroka Range, and the watershed of the Upper Yellowstone River, is one that deserves all possible commendation. The Teton Range, with the snow-clad Grand Teton, 13,750 feet high, is one of the greatest assets of the nation; under existing conditions it is certain to lose much of its charm and its wildness; for it is being opened up in a way to destroy that pristine beauty which makes of Jackson's Hole one of the most impressive places in America. Under its present superintendent, Horace M. Albright, the Yellowstone Park is an admirable example of efficient government management. It is visited by increasing tens of thousands who can either park in automobile camps or go to the excellent hotels, seeing all the worth-while sights in the easiest possible way with the aid of well-informed and attentive guides. At the same time wild life is protected as never before, and beyond the main-traveled roads the fastnesses of the park are admirably preserved for the scientist or the naturalist or the camper who has time and leisure to penetrate where cars cannot go. Congress should lose no time in approving this recommendation to increase the park and to add 45,000 acres to the Grand Canyon National Park. Advice to do the latter has just been given by the President's Commission on Recreation after a careful study on the spot.

SPORT ENDS where cruelty begins. Hardly anybody will dispute that. But where does cruelty begin? When people in the East first began to hear of the rodeo it was as a kind of Western county fair chiefly for the amusement of the community in which it took place. Its feats of horsemanship and herdsmanship glorified and kept alive the skill and hardihood of the old frontiersmen—a fine spectacle for a younger and softer generation to contemplate. If there was some cruelty, it was incidental and a necessary survival of the old life. Then tourists heard about the rodeo and flocked to it; inevitably its character began to change. From a contest largely amateur in spirit, and for home consumption, the rodeo graduated into a circus, with a crowd of visitors and big gate-money as its chief ends. And soon after criticism of the rodeo began. There was considerable protest at the recent exhibition in Madison Square Garden, New York City; there was still more when the rodeo was introduced to England. Now it appears that the rodeo is encountering opposition in its home bailiwick. Humane societies in the West are attacking it, and although their view is perhaps exaggerated they call attention to certain aspects which American audiences can hardly fail to condemn.

WE HAVE RECEIVED, for instance, a report from the King County Humane Society of Seattle, Washington, in regard to the recent rodeo at Ellensburg. One steer had a leg and another a horn broken. In the course of three days ten men are reported as having been injured—probably only slightly; no details are given. This does not sound formidable. Horse racing, football, and many other sports have as many casualties. What impresses us most in the report is the following paragraph:

> During the time that I was near the chute all or at least most of the steers and wild mules had a white powder called Cowitch put on their back to make them buck. Several of the bucking horses were doctored up, too, with High Life, to make them buck. High Life is a liquid and is usually put in the mane. In questioning one of the riders concerning the use of the Cowitch powder he admitted the fact, and said it had to be done to make them buck.

This is an exploitation of animals that goes beyond the bounds of sport; it is an unjustifiable perversion of the original conception of the rodeo. Similar practices on a race track, when known, result in severe discipline. If the original rodeo was somewhat rough, its justification was that it was a survival from real life. Now that the rodeo has become primarily a public amusement it must conform to stricter standards or find itself outlawed.

OTTO H. KAHN has come to the defense of the Metropolitan Opera in a pamphlet in which he examines at some length the various charges, most of them flimsy, as to the conduct of the finest opera in the world. For us no defense was necessary. We have never believed that there was any discrimination against American composers or artists because the general manager rejoices in the name of Gatti-Casazza. We are convinced that no new American operas are being given because none are being written. The day America produces a composer with even half the talent of a Wagner, or one capable of writing a "Madame Butterfly," the several American opera companies will hasten to honor him. The constant engagement of promising young Americans like Marion Talley and just now the former chorus girl Mary Lewis, is proof positive that neither pull nor social influence is a requisite to a hearing. At the same time we are glad that Mr. Kahn wrote as he did, if only because it gives us an opportunity to voice once more our gratitude to him and to his associates who meet the large deficits of what is a great and a pioneer American institution.

Governor Smith's Victory

AGAIN Governor Smith has handsomely defeated the Republican leaders in New York State. We do not, of course, refer to the municipal election in the metropolis. Any Democrat would have won that. The complete demoralization of the reformers, many of whom joined the Walker forces because of their faith in Governor Smith, the lack of any specific issues, and the electorate's recognition that the Republican machine is scarcely a whit better than Tammany's, all made the outcome a foregone conclusion. In addition, the colorless campaign made by Mr. Waterman, the Republican nominee, added to the Republican disaster; never was there an election which showed more clearly the utter stupidity of trying to decide municipal questions under national party labels.

Though this Democratic victory does add to the prestige of Governor Smith, his real achievement was the carrying of the State for the four proposed amendments to the constitution, especially one granting authority for a bond issue of $100,000,000 for a State building program. The biggest Republican guns were unlimbered to defeat this proposal. Mr. Hughes, Mr. Root, Representative Mills, and ex-Governor Miller all took issue with the Governor, but in vain. The enormous majorities in the city for the amendments defeated the opposition of the up-State Republicans, which, by the way, is clearest proof that if "Al" Smith wishes to be elected Senator from New York in 1926 he need only run.

That this will increase the talk of him as candidate for the Presidency is beyond question. Indeed, inquiry in Washington shows that a number of Democratic Senators have come to the conclusion that Governor Smith's nomination for the Presidency is both desirable and inevitable. These men are Protestants, and they are quite aware of the growth of the Ku Klux Klan and the fact that it has transferred its activities to the North, is dropping the Jew and the Negro as targets for its onslaughts, and is concentrating upon the Roman Catholics. These Washington observers feel that the country is in for another bitter fight on the religious issue, that the Ku Klux Klan will become another edition of the A. P. A., and that the combat might as well be joined now as later. They are emphatically of the opinion that his religion should bar no man from the Presidency. They are rejoicing over the defeat of the Klan in its efforts to elect mayors in Buffalo and Detroit—its success in choosing its own mayor in Indianapolis surprises no one, for Indiana remains the stronghold of the organization, but even there the usual majority was considerably reduced. The point is that Governor Smith has shown himself to be a fighter and to be a master of administrative detail; they have a childlike faith that he will be free from corporate influences should he reach the White House, and there is no one else in the entire party who can be called a national leader in the sense of being known to the country as a whole.

Upon the wisdom or unwisdom of this position we do not today wish to pass. We would merely point out that if Governor Smith should be nominated for the Presidency other embattled groups besides the Roman Catholics would flock to his aid. More than that, Governor Smith ranks as a wet and would so be regarded whatever adherence he might give to the existing prohibition status. Now New Jersey has just elected a wet Democratic Governor by some 40,000 plurality in a stand-up fight with a high-grade Republican candidate who was for prohibition—a remarkable overturn, since Mr. Coolidge carried New Jersey by the enormous plurality of 341,885. There can be no doubt that there is going to be a determined drive for a revision of the Volstead law in other States as well. There is thus a fresh temptation to the Democratic Party, lacking other issues, to take the wet side of the argument, which would again benefit the candidacy of Governor Smith. Of course, we hear it said that the South would go Republican for the first time in its history if the Democrats should nominate one who is both a Roman Catholic and a wet, but that threat has been made so often few people are likely to take it seriously. Indeed, anything that would make the South change its political adherence, even in one election, would be so beneficial to political thinking and development in that section of the country that the nomination of Governor Smith might easily prove to be a blessing in disguise even though not in the sense expected or intended by the party leaders.

All of this puts the Governor in a difficult position. He has positively said that he would not again become a candidate for governor, but as he has declined before and finally changed his mind under party compulsion it is by no means certain that he will not do so again. He must today be asking himself how his political fortunes would be affected by his running for the senatorship next year and, in the event of his election, playing a national role in Washington. If he is really bent on the Presidency it would surely be a mistake for him to retire to private life, for the public forgets much and the politicians still more in two years' time. That he has a great opportunity no one will deny. The decay of the Democratic Party, the death of Mr. Bryan and of Senator Ralston, and the disappearance of other old-time leaders leave the field remarkably clear. Only Mr. McAdoo is at the moment also a contender for the nomination, and we cannot believe that the party or the public will stomach him. The fact that most of the important offices in the country are held by Republicans militates against the development of new Democratic leaders during the next three years. There is no other Democratic Governor and hardly a Senator who stands out against the mass of his party associates. It is not surprising, therefore, that the party interest in "Al" Smith grows. To whom else can it turn?

There is only one thing certain about the situation, and that is that if the Governor should be nominated we should have a campaign that would arouse the country, unfortunately along wrong lines. It may, however, be necessary once more to fight out at the polls the question whether religious issues shall dominate our political life. We have no fear as to the outcome of such a contest. The waning power of the Klan speaks for itself. We cannot believe that the American people for all their love of being buncoed will put up much longer with the brand of bunkum offered by the Ku Klux Klan, with its bigotry, its sham patriotism, and its commercialization.

General Charteris Falsifies Again

GENERAL CHARTERIS, the former head of the British Military Intelligence at General Headquarters in France, having arrived in London and been cited before the Secretary of State for War because of his speech in New York in which he playfully described how the abominable lie that the Germans boiled their dead to obtain fat was originated by him, announces that the aforesaid Secretary of State is satisfied with his denial of the story. "Let me say that I neither invented the cadaver story nor did I alter the captions of any photographs nor did I use any faked material for propaganda purposes." In justice to him we print this statement, but we do not believe one word of it. Neither does the London Daily News. It points out that the New York Times reporter stands by his story and has reiterated his statement. More than that, General Charteris's own lecture manager, James B. Pond, never thought of denying that General Charteris had told the story as it was printed, but declared that through a misunderstanding the reporter of the Times had printed some portions of his speech that the General preferred not to have see the light of day. If the British Secretary for War is satisfied to accept General Charteris's denial without further inquiry, the War Office must have much to conceal.

We are entirely of the belief that it has and that the British Government itself is as guilty as General Charteris and, in particular Lord Robert Cecil, recipient of the Woodrow Wilson medal. We base our belief upon the official record of the parliamentary debate of April 30, 1917:

> Ronald McNeill asked the Prime Minister if he will take steps to make it known as widely as possible in Egypt, India, and the East generally that the Germans use the dead bodies of their own soldiers and of their enemies when they obtain possession of them as food for swine.
>
> Mr. Dillon asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the reports widely circulated in this country that the German Government have set up factories for extracting fat from the bodies of soldiers killed in battle; whether these reports have been indorsed by many prominent men in this country, including Lord Curzon of Kedleston; whether the Government have any solid grounds for believing that these statements are well founded; and, if so, whether he will communicate the information at the disposal of the Government to the House?
>
> LORD ROBERT CECIL: With respect to this question and that standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Mayo, the Government have no information at present beyond that contained in extracts from the German press which have been published in the press here. In view of other actions by German military authorities there is nothing incredible in the present charge against them. His Majesty's Government have allowed the circulation of the facts as they have appeared through the usual channels.
>
> MR. MCNEILL: Can the right hon. Gentleman answer whether the Government will take any steps to give wide publicity in the East to this story emanating from German sources?
>
> LORD ROBERT CECIL: I think at present it is not desirable to take any other steps than those that have been taken.
>
> MR. DILLON: May I ask whether we are to conclude from that answer that the Government have no solid evidence whatever in proof of the truth of this charge, and they have taken no steps to investigate it; and has their attention been turned to the fact that it is not only a gross scandal, but a very great evil to this country to allow the circulation of such statements, authorized by Ministers of the Crown, if they are, as I believe them to be, absolutely false?
>
> LORD ROBERT CECIL: The hon. Member has, perhaps, information that we have not. I can only speak from the statements that have been already published in the press. I have already told the House that we have no other information whatever. The information is the statement that has been published, and that I have before me.
>
> "We are passing the great Corpse Utilization Establishment of this Army group. The fat that is now here is turned into lubricating oils and everything else is ground down in the bones mill into a powder which is used for mixing with pig's food and as manure. Nothing can be permitted to go to waste." This statement has been published in the press and that is the whole of the information that I have.
>
> MR. DILLON: Has the Noble Lord's attention been drawn to the fact that there have been published in the Frankfurter Zeitung and other leading German newspapers descriptions of this whole process, in which the word "kadaver" is used, and from which it is perfectly manifest, and stated, that these factories are for the purpose of boiling down the dead bodies of horses and other animals which are lying on the battlefield [An hon. Member: "Human Animals!"] and I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government propose to take any steps to obtain authentic information whether this story is true or absolutely false? For the credit of human nature he ought to.
>
> LORD ROBERT CECIL: It is not any part of the duties of the Government, nor is it possible for the Government to institute inquiries as to what goes on in Germany. The hon. Member is surely very unreasonable in making the suggestion, and as for his quotations from the Frankfurter Zeitung, I have not seen them, but I have seen statements made by the German Government after the publication of this, and I confess that I am not able to attach very great importance to any statements made by the German Government.
>
> MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, before a Minister of the Crown, a member of the War Cabinet, gives authorization to these rumors, he ought not to have obtained accurate information as to whether they are true or not?
>
> LORD ROBERT CECIL: I think any Minister of the Crown is entitled to comment on and refer to something which has been published in one of the leading papers of this country. He only purported to do that, and did not make himself responsible for the statements. [An hon. Member: "He did!"] I am informed that he did not. He said: "As has been stated in the papers."
>
> MR. OUTHWAITE: May I ask if the Noble Lord is aware that the circulation of these reports—[Interruption]—has caused anxiety and misery to British people who have lost their sons on the battlefield and who think that their bodies may be put to this purpose, and does not that give a reason why he should try to find out the truth of what is happening in Germany?

To this, Lord Robert Cecil could make no reply, and he made none. What a disgrace to all concerned!

Coolidge and Coal

AS the price of coal goes higher and higher it is interesting to recall the emanations from the summer White House in Swampscott last July. The miners and the operators were in conference in Atlantic City, and the date for the stoppage was known. The country showed signs of being nervous, but real nervousness, under a Republican Administration headed by Mr. Coolidge who had a great reputation as a strike-breaker, was unthinkable. Hence from Swampscott came successive reassurances that all was well.

On July 18 Secretary of Labor Davis, "after a brief conference with President Coolidge," said that "the government has decided upon positive steps to be taken in case of a coal strike." A plan had been thought out "which President Coolidge believes will be effective in the event the miners and operators fail to reach a settlement by the end of August." Ineffectiveness was impossible, for the undisclosed plan "had been carefully worked out by the Department of Labor and other government agencies at the direction of President Coolidge." The next day the President was reported as "determined to prevent a coal strike. . . . He has let the operators know that he will exert all the pressure possible to keep the hard-coal mines operating and prevent the condition of three years ago when the public suffered greatly."

On July 21 it was said that "there is no danger of a hard-coal strike, in the opinion of President Coolidge." Soon, however, came intimations that the piece of Vermont granite might prove to be dynamite; "it is thought by those who know him well" that the plan will be of "a revolutionary nature." If conceivably the Executive should fail—or decide not to act—there was the comforting assurance that the "strike cannot be of long duration."

On July 25 "Mr. Coolidge indicated" that he was giving the coal situation "earnest thought" and that he "was prepared to exert the pressure of the federal government representing public opinion." But as the negotiations neared their failure and the strike began, the tune of the Swampscott press agent changed. By July 27 the President's position was "that it would be premature to assume that this dispute is not going to be settled within the industry."

For weeks Mr. Coolidge's thoughts, plans, and hopes were the daily pabulum of Americans concerned over the price of anthracite.

It was a campaign of lies, of a sort which has too frequently fooled the people—daily pictures of a strong President about to prevent something which nevertheless happens on schedule time. In this case it had this serious effect: it lulled the country into a false security. Almost without exception the newspapers aided what was an advertisement for the President at the same time that it was a sedative for the public. It is possible, of course, that real leadership would have failed to arouse the country and enable the President to force the operators and miners to accept a fair agreement. But a real Chief Executive, though he only wished to act up to the Boston myth, would at least have tried. Even Mr. Harding did that. Mr. Coolidge did nothing—absolutely nothing.

In recent weeks, as is natural, the White House spokesman has said nothing about coal. In marked contrast to the thundering at Swampscott, a Washington news service reports that "the President is apparently going out of his way not to mention the coal strike." Whenever a question has been asked about the strike at the newspaper conferences the President has refused an answer. A special dispatch to the New York Times declares that "President Coolidge sees no way at the present time in which he can take an effective hand in the situation despite its growing seriousness." He feels, the dispatch continues, that "all he can do is to await the time when suffering as a result of the strike becomes so acute that public opinion will support him in the exercise in some decisive way, even though it be beyond the letter of the law, of the prestige of his office to compel a resumption of anthracite mining."

There you have the great leader in all his nakedness. First, he thunders and fulminates as to what he will do if the issue presents itself. Then, when it comes, he runs away from it, as from every other vital issue. Next he threatens once more, this time that he will turn to illegal and lawless methods—but only when he is convinced that the suffering of the people is so great that it will forget to hold him responsible for acts which he admits are beyond his authority and are not within the duties covered by his oath of office.

College Undergraduates

THE last man in a modern university to know anything at first hand about the modern undergraduate is, it would appear, the president. The reason is simple enough—he is too remote from his humble subjects ever to see what they do or hear what they say in their characteristic moments; he is too busy with policies and appropriations to devote his imagination to their problems or even to remember what undergraduates were like in older—generally it is "better"—days. Hence the misleading remarks which we have come to expect from presidents when they are asked their opinion of undergraduate morality and mentality.

President Lowell, for instance, was recently reported to have complained of a decline in scholarship at Harvard, and to have said:

> If we could make youth feel that scholarship was worth while, we would undoubtedly have more scholars. The question is, How are we to do this? One way is to get rid of the idea prevalent among undergraduates that a man studies hard for honors only because he wants to and does not care for anything else. As soon as students can be made to realize that examinations are not a test of an ability to grind and work unusually hard, but are rather a test of intellectual grasp, mental ability, and general taste, then they will show some interest and see that this kind of work is really worthy of effort.

President Lowell forgets that scholarship has never been attractive to youth generally, and never can be made so. The scholar is one of the rarest of creatures, and one of the most unaccountable. Nothing outside himself ever made him "feel" that scholarship was worth while—nothing except the example of another scholar—and certainly the scholar was never made by being given to understand that hard work is unnecessary. The most obvious as well as the most profound thing about him is that he loves to work hard. He was not coaxed into his career by phrases about "general taste" and "intellectual grasp"—or if he was, and then advanced through his own efforts, he soon understood their hollowness. If Harvard is like many another American university today, and of course it is, certain young instructors there are well aware of what the president cannot know—that small groups of undergraduates are reading like mad this very moment, talking excitedly about difficult ideas, and thinking their heads almost off. They do not get into the newspapers, for they make no noise. And they do not come to consult the president. More or less brainless alumni come to him and talk exclusively of football, he complains—and straightway decides that football is all. The infant scholars, meanwhile, keep to their rooms and preserve without any encouragement the one academic tradition which is worth while.

The papers may have quoted President Lowell inadequately. It is to be hoped that they quoted the newly installed president of Michigan with outrageous inexactitude. President Little, we believe, was discussing undergraduate morality. We do not know, but here are some of the flowers with which he said what he thought he had to say:

> In the day of highly explosive mixture of youth, gasoline, and liquor borne swiftly on balloon tires to remote retreats; in an era of college comic publications and terpsichorean efforts, skating on the thinnest possible ice of indecency, it would take Hercules himself to guarantee a fair substitute, and I believe he cheerfully would admit that the Augean stables were, in comparison, an early season practice game.

Labor Combats Waste

> Social inequality, industrial instability, and injustice must increase unless the workers' real wages—the purchasing power of their wages—coupled with a continuing reduction in the number of hours making up the working day, are progressed in proportion to man's increasing power of production. . . . We oppose all wage reductions and we urge upon management the elimination of waste in production in order that selling prices may be lower and wages higher. To this end we recommend cooperation in the study of waste in production, which the assay of the Federated American Engineering Societies has shown to be 50 per cent attributable to management and only 25 per cent attributable to labor, with 25 per cent attributable to outside sources.

THESE words formed part of the statement on wage policy, unanimously adopted by the 400 delegates attending the recent convention of the American Federation of Labor at Atlantic City. If tangible action is to follow the declared statement, it is impossible to overestimate its importance. Even as an official pronouncement confined for the present to the minute books, the importance is very great. For it means that the American labor movement has begun to realize that its immemorial slogan of a "fair day's work for a fair day's wage" is not enough, that along with organization, defensive strikes, and a solid front must go an understanding of the physical process upon which our economic life is based and a concerted movement to take an active hand in controlling that process on the engineering basis of maximum output with minimum effort. President Green followed the resolution with these words:

> This action places American labor in a most advanced position on wage theory. It is a position far beyond any position we have ever taken before. We are on the threshold of a great new era. We are in the infancy of a great power. A new condition is here, and we must meet it.

John Stuart Mill once said that it was doubtful if all the labor-saving devices invented to date had lightened the load of a single human being. In the year 1925, within the confines of the greatest republic ever heard of, his words are perhaps not as true as in the fifties, but they remain in substance bitterly true for the two-thirds of the families in the country whose total earnings are less than the Department of Labor's minimum budget of health and decency. Dire poverty is not widespread perhaps, but a shambling, miserable half life is the lot of the majority of our people.

Meanwhile the arts of industrial invention and production are accelerating at a rate unprecedented in human affairs. A machine can make nails 129 times faster than a village blacksmith can produce them; make cotton sheeting 106 times faster than a spinning housewife; make plows 32 times faster than hand labor. In the energy released by our dynamos and turbines we have the equivalent of the hand labor of three billion hard-working slaves. "The use of energy materials gives to each man, woman, and child in this country the equivalent of thirty servants," say Gilbert and Pogue in "America's Power Resources." Power unlimited, machinery unbounded, a technical process capable of inexhaustible output—and seventy millions of us living on the goods and services which $1,500 a year, or less, per family, will buy.

This is the paradox which transforms the whole structure of business as usual—with its "pep," its cleared desks, its conferences, its follow-ups, its "sucker" lists, its double-barreled "go-getters," its adding machines, its protectographs, its bank clearings, and its three million share days on the New York Stock Exchange—into a matter to tickle the ribs of the last god on Olympus and to keep the devil from eating his meals for fear of choking to death. It is akin to that felicitous system of torture whereby the chained victim was allowed to starve to death athwart a table laden with the choicest food. The reasons for this paradox are many and complicated, and most emphatically not to be disposed of on the naive theory of a resplendent plutocracy deliberately robbing a shivering proletariat. But the naked fact of the paradox remains, bound up with the fact that probably half of all our potential power of production is scattered and wasted. The wheels grind, the engines pant, the freight cars take their unending ways from East to West and from West to East—but out of the roar and the hubbub come to the majority of final consumers only sufficient goods of a dubious quality and workmanship to keep life in their bones, coats on their backs, and a jerry-built roof over their heads. Waste takes its toll along the whole line of march.

The official policy of the labor movement hitherto has been to disregard this paradox in toto; to remain ignorant of the growth of the technical arts or of the possibilities of increasing the flow of sound goods and services. The battle has been in terms of money wages with no conception of the physical and engineering factors which lay beneath. But the coming of giant power seems to have ended some of the old incantations. Labor has at last realized that if the good life is to be won at all, it must be won at the price of cooperating with management in the job of understanding and controlling the industrial flow and clearing channels now choked with flotsam and waste.

Taxation by Misrepresentation

By LOUIS W. McKERNAN

MR. MELLON advances the flivver theory of surtaxes, that the lower the surtaxes the more can be sold to the surtax classes. Mr. Couzens, on the other hand, contends sturdily for the aluminum-trust theory of capacity to pay. And it is all on the assumption that the war is over, that is, the European War, for which we contracted a debt of more than twenty-six billion dollars. But, financially speaking, the war is not over. More than half the budgetary expenditures of the federal government are directly in payment for the war and must continue so for at least twenty years.

Paying for a dead horse is proverbially a disheartening job. It is a job for George, if possible. During the period from April 6, 1917, to June 30, 1920 (the war period), the federal government expended the tremendous sum of $38,800,000,000. The receipts for this period were in excess of $16,000,000,000, more than 41 per cent of the expenditures—a remarkable exhibition of paying as you go—but that left $22,000,000,000 of the expenditures of the war years to be paid as part of the national debt. The total debt on June 30, 1920, was $24,297,918,411.53. That is the most expensive "dead horse" in history.

June 30, 1920, is the basic date for purposes of tax discussion. At that time President Wilson was on his sick-bed; the country was in the control of a Republican Congress; deflation of the country's business and agriculture from the war-time basis was an accomplished fact; the election of a Republican President—who turned out to be Warren G. Harding—was a certainty; the Victory Loan had been successfully floated; the great war expenditures of the government were at an end. Reduction of the national debt on a peace-time basis then began. Twenty-four billion dollars in round numbers was the amount of the national debt when the peace period began, and that fact should be clear before everyone, Democrat or Republican, normal-taxer or surtaxer, in fact all who "pay the freight," whether it be "Pittsburgh plus" or "Detroit minus."

Let us consider the debt reduction which has been accomplished since June 30, 1920. In the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the last year of the Wilson Administration, the public debt was reduced $321,871,000, making the gross $23,976,250,608. That was the debt burden inherited by Mr. Mellon. Today the public debt of the United States stands at $20,406,090,295, a reduction of $3,570,160,313, a great achievement.

How has this been accomplished? Beginning July 1, 1920, the sinking fund established by the Victory Loan Act became operative. By that means a certain sum is applied each year to the reduction of the public debt. That application is by virtue of an act of Congress and is not dependent on the will or policy of any executive officer. For the Executive to claim credit for the reduction accomplished through the sinking fund is, under the circumstances, a piece of demagogic effrontery unparalleled since Mohammed claimed credit for the miracle of moving a mountain when what he did was go to the mountain instead of making it come to him.

For the fiscal year 1920, as has been stated, there was no sinking fund. For the fiscal years since, the reduction accomplished through the sinking fund has been as follows:

1921	$261,000,000
1922	276,000,000
1923	284,000,000
1924	296,000,000
1925	306,000,000
Total	$1,423,000,000

Accordingly, a reduction of $1,423,000,000 has been achieved since June 30, 1920, by virtue of this act of Congress, conceived by the Wilson Administration, and enacted shortly after the armistice. It was calculated at the time of its passage that the sinking fund would retire the war debt of the United States, minus the war loans to foreign countries, in about twenty-five years. By reason of an amendment to the original act, approved March 2, 1923, securities issues to refund the original war loans are also included, so that the original purpose of the act, the retirement of the war debt, minus foreign loans, is sure of accomplishment, and in a period even shorter than the estimate of twenty-five years. It was deemed a sufficient burden for this generation to pay the entire cost to the United States of the greatest war in history, a war which left the public debt of the country twenty-five times as great as it had been.

But what has been done by the Treasury since June 30, 1920, has been far more burdensome to the taxpayer than the congressional program. While the Sinking Fund Act calls for a reduction in that period of $1,423,000,000, which has been accomplished in accordance with law, the actual reduction in the gross public debt, chiefly through taxation, has been $3,782,000,000. This means that, if the same policy is pursued in the future, and foreign countries pay their war debts in a like period, the entire war debt will be retired in a period much shorter than twenty-five years. It also means that if twenty-five years is a reasonably short time within which to pay so colossal a war debt, this generation is having imposed upon it an unduly high burden of taxation, and that not by policy of the law-making body, which constitutionally controls the purse-strings, but by the policy of the Executive of misleading Congress into the creation of surpluses which are applied by the Executive in reduction of the public debt.

During the five years from June 30, 1920, to June 30, 1925, the taxpayers of the county paid $2,359,000,000 more than was necessary to retire the war debt—exclusive of loans to foreign governments—in less than twenty-five years. And this in spite of the much-heralded tax reductions of 1921 and 1924. How has this come about when we have an expensive Bureau of the Budget, headed first by General Dawes and now by General Lord, aided by the regular government departments, to estimate the revenue requirements of the government, and Treasury and tax experts to estimate what revenue given taxes will yield? For some reason, budget estimates year after year prove too large and estimates of tax revenue prove too small. The result is that every year we have an unexpected surplus which is applied, with much gusto, by the Treasury Department to reduction of the national debt. This surplus—which is a surplus after sinking-fund requirements have been taken care of—in some years has reached tremendous proportions. The surpluses for the fiscal years 1921-1925 are as follows:

1921	$87,000,000
1922	314,000,000
1923	310,000,000
1924	505,000,000
1925	251,000,000
Total	$1,467,000,000

This means that the taxpayers of the country were compelled to pay not only the ordinary expenses of the government, more than half of which are directly traceable to the war, plus $1,423,000,000 for the retirement of the public debt through the sinking fund, but also $1,467,000,000 to be accumulated by the Treasury as a surplus and applied to further debt reduction. Surely there is something seriously wrong when the Bureau of the Budget and the Treasury experts are so constantly in error in their estimates of revenue requirements and receipts. This goes to the vitals of tax reduction and tax reform. The strangest feature of the situation is that the discrepancies between revenue requirements and revenue produced have been greater since the Bureau of the Budget was established in June, 1921, than before, although one of the main purposes of the budget was to prevent such discrepancies and see to it that only the minimum amount of revenue required should be raised to run the government.

Let us take some of the estimates. The Secretary of the Treasury in a letter dated January 24, 1922 (a half year after the inauguration of the budget), addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, with respect to the soldier's bonus, said: "It appears from these statements that for 1922 the budget estimates indicate a deficit of over $24,000,000, and for 1923 a deficit of over $167,000,000."

The actual financial outcome of the year 1922 was, as we have already stated, a surplus of $314,000,000, and for the year 1923 a surplus of $310,000,000, a combined surplus for the two years of $624,000,000, instead of the formidable-looking deficit predicted by the Bureau of the Budget under General Dawes and used by the Secretary of the Treasury to defeat the soldier's bonus.

This of course was in the first year of the budget when General Dawes was saving money on the consolidated purchase of brooms. Better things might be expected of later years. However, in the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1923 appears this gem:

> Budget estimates at the beginning of the year indicated a deficit of about $822,000,000, and the fortunate result of turning an apparent deficit into an actual surplus was due, in large part, to increased revenues from internal revenue and customs, and in a lesser degree, to decreases in the general expenditures of the government.

The "actual surplus" for the year was, as we have said, $310,000,000, making a small error of $1,132,000,000. It has been suggested that the demand for a soldier's bonus had something to do with the estimates of deficits for the fiscal years 1922 and 1923, which so quickly turned into actual surpluses once the threat was past.

In the fall of 1923 the Treasury decided to recommend tax reduction. The Secretary of the Treasury's letter of November 10, 1923, makes the following estimates as to the outcome of the next four or five fiscal years:

> After taking into account all these considerations and making the most conservative estimates about the yield of existing taxes and the possibilities of further reductions in expenditure, it appears that for this year, and for the next four or five years, there should be a surplus of something over $300,000,000 a year over and above all expenditures chargeable to the ordinary budget, including the fixed-debt charges payable out of current revenues.

The original budget estimate for the fiscal year 1924 had been a surplus of $180,000,000. This was later raised by the budget to an estimated surplus of $330,000,000. As we have seen, the actual surplus for the fiscal year reached the unprecedented total of $505,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1925, with Adjusted Compensation on the statute books and the Revenue Act of 1924 as law, bringing an immediate reduction which was intended to exhaust the surplus, the Bureau of the Budget estimated a surplus of $68,000,000. The actual surplus turned out to be $251,000,000. With the progressive retirement of the public debt, the consequent reduction each year of interest charges, and the additional foreign-debt settlements made since 1923, it would appear that his estimate for the fiscal year 1926 should be exceeded by even a greater amount. Such appears to be the case, even on the present estimates of the budget and the Treasury, the present prediction being a surplus of $290,000,000 for 1926.

Curiously enough, the Secretary of the Treasury on October 29, 1925, went before the Committee on Ways and Means to make his recommendations for tax reduction without having an estimate for the fiscal year 1927, the first year which will be wholly dependent upon a new tax law. He said: "For 1927 the budget has not yet determined the total of expenditures which will be necessary to run the government."

A remarkable situation! In the first week of December the President of the United States will transmit the budget for 1927 to Congress, but on October 29 the budget is not able to give the Secretary of the Treasury even a preliminary estimate for statement to the Congressional committee drafting a tax bill, which cannot be even started intelligently without an absolutely accurate estimate for the fiscal year 1927.

We have had surpluses since June 30, 1920, totaling by July 1, 1925, the enormous sum of $1,467,000,000, in spite of tax reduction by the revenue bills of 1921 and 1924 and passage of the Adjusted Compensation Law, which were supposed and intended to distribute any possible surplus. These laws were passed on the basis of budget and Treasury estimates, under which there would have been, had they been correct, not only no surplus for those years but even a deficit. That is, because of colossal misrepresentations in estimates, intentional or unintentional, the taxpayer has paid for those five years roughly a billion and a half of taxes which Congress never intended to levy. That sum would have allowed a reduction in taxes of $300,000,000 for each year.

Are we to be taxed through our representation in Congress or through misrepresentation by the Executive?

A Fragment of War-Time History

By ELLEN TORELLE NAGLER

[We are glad to preface this narrative with the information that the verdict described below was overruled by the higher courts and the defendant was set free.]

UNDER the blaze of a July sun the dust lay thick in the cheerless streets of a little city in western Wisconsin where a criminal trial was about to be held in the federal court. A State official at Madison had been indicted by the grand jury for refusing to contribute to a Y. M. C. A. "drive" for war funds.

Seemingly for no better reason than to make the trial as severe a drain on the defendant's courage and financial resources as possible, the judge of the district in which the indictment was returned transferred the court action from the city of his residence to Eau Claire, two hundred miles distant. War fever ran high; the armistice, which was entered into some five months later, was not anticipated at this time, and every train which arrived from the East brought additional strangers to town, witnesses for the plaintiff, mostly, who was no less a dignitary than the Government of the United States of America! Before the day was over the lobby of the principal hotel swarmed with well-dressed people, men and women, who, if one judged them by their carefree appearance, might have been out for a holiday.

The assemblage in the courtroom the next morning presented an equally animated appearance. Representatives of the various war-time organizations mingled with prominent citizens representing no announced organization, but whose presence probably was thought desirable by the prosecution for its effect upon the jury as well as upon public opinion.

Within the railing which inclosed the witness-stand and jury-box were gathered the plaintiff's witnesses and their friends. A tall, narrow-shouldered man with colorless hair and pallid countenance was pointed out as the State secretary of the Y. M. C. A. He was dressed in a striped suit of blue and carried a heavily loaded portfolio under his arm. The well-groomed man who walked about with an air of importance was a deputy controller of the American Red Cross Society. The tall, fair-haired, fashionably dressed woman seated near the judge's bench was the wife of a newspaper editor who had found the war financially profitable to himself and who exhibited an intense hatred of any person not in his entourage. Near the editor's wife sat the elderly wife of a bank president who was the local representative of the Red Cross Society. At one of the tables sat a short, stout, thick-necked man whose drooping mouth and deep-set eyes betokened the bully and fighter. He frequently rose from his chair to look into papers and books on the table, and at such times it was seen that one of his legs was twisted or deformed. This man was B. R. Goggins, the special prosecutor, or special assistant United States district attorney; on him rested the responsibility for the success of the Government's case. In a chair drawn close to that of the special assistant was the nominal district attorney, Albert C. Wolfe, a dark, thin, sallow-complexioned individual who unceasingly scribbled or drew meaningless lines with a pencil on a paper before him, while his assistant ground out the necessary and expected arguments from an all too meager supply of facts.

Another table was reserved for the counsel for the defense. The most conspicuous figure here was small in stature and quiet in demeanor, but his white hair, his benevolent expression, his courtly bearing, and his unquestioned ability won the respect of friend and foe alike. This was Burr W. Jones. Opposite him sat C. H. Crownhart, chief counsel for the defense. Both of these gentlemen were afterward elected to the Supreme Court of Wisconsin.

The women within the railing carried bags of colored worsted and "purled" as they noted with apparent satisfaction the gathering crowd without. Just so the women of the French Revolution knitted as they counted the heads which dropped before the guillotine. A little white-clad child, the son of the defendant, got inside the railing and ran about, looking up with smiling face into the faces of the adults about him. But these faces bore no answering smile for him; only stern rebuke and condemnation.

Presently a hush fell upon the courtroom. Two judges entered. One, tall and thin with straggly gray hair, took his seat on one of a row of chairs ranged along the rear wall of the platform. The other, a heavy-set man, who walked as if he were trying to conceal a limp, advanced to the front and took his seat on the bench. He was the trial judge, Evan A. Evans, called in to aid the presiding judge of the district.

Counsel for the defense arose and moved a general and special demurrer in the case. The judge listened with obvious displeasure, then answered gruffly: "Very well, interpose a demurrer and the demurrer is overruled."

A jury was then drawn from a horde of men collected in the room and swarming into the corridor. They seemed to take the situation humorously. Some of these men had served before on juries summoned to try cases under the Espionage Act, and they had learned their paces. Later it was charged by counsel for another defendant under the Espionage Act that the fifty-six jurymen selected for this term of the court had not been drawn in the manner provided by law, but had been hand-picked by loyal members of the Councils of Defense.

The panel completed, the judge charged the jury, emphasizing the fact that this was a criminal case and that their minds must be kept free from prejudice. The trial was opened with a speech by the special government prosecutor, Mr. Goggins, who said in part:

> If it please the Court and gentlemen of the jury, having in mind what I said before, the statement I made, and so as to enable us to properly question you as to your qualifications as jurors, it won't be necessary for me to add but little more.

The jurors seemed to comprehend this as well as anything that took place at the trial.

Then followed an extended address in which the defendant, L. B. Nagler, was exhibited to the jurors in all his wickedness as a State official who, after having been thrice canvassed for a subscription to the Y. M. C. A. war fund, persisted in refusing to subscribe, with the result that he was indicted by a grand jury sitting at Madison, the capital of the State. The indictment set forth that on the occasion when the defendant was last canvassed he, in the course of a lengthy discussion, had used the following language, which, under Section 3 of the Espionage Act, was considered treasonable as calculated to obstruct the recruiting and enlistment service of the United States:

> I am through contributing to your private grafts. There is too much graft in these subscriptions. No, I do not believe in the work of the Y. M. C. A. or the Red Cross, for I think they are a bunch of grafters. No, sir, I can prove it. . . .
>
> I won't give you a cent. The Y. M. C. A., the Y. W. C. A., and the Red Cross is a bunch of grafters. Not over 10 or 15 per cent of the money collected goes to the soldiers or is used for the purpose for which it is collected. . . .
>
> Who is the government? Who is running this war? A bunch of capitalists composed of the Steel Trust and munition makers.

During three weary days, beginning July 29, 1918, testimony was taken which showed conclusively that the defendant had not included the Y. W. C. A. nor the Red Cross in his condemnation, but had used some plain language, not the jargon of the indictment, in regard to the Y. M. C. A. Testimony also proved that his comment on the conduct of the war was wrung from him as a protest against attacks made by his interviewers upon members of Congress from Wisconsin who had opposed our country's entry into the war, men whom he respected and admired, and whose opinions he shared. Senator La Follette and his attitude on the war were particularly in question. Testimony showed that the defendant was opposed to our entering the war, but that he had steadily counseled support of the Government after war was declared; that he was the first volunteer in Wisconsin for civilian war service (he was ineligible for military service); that he had always been a loyal citizen, a man of excellent reputation for honesty and morality in all dealings with his fellow-men, and a faithful public servant for many years; but he believed that the Government should support the war through taxation, and that private organizations should not be permitted to collect funds in that way; financial "drives" by such organizations were wrong in principle and unfair in practice.

All testimony for the defense was ignored or overruled by the court. A witness for the Government testified on cross-examination that in his presence the defendant had counseled a young man who asked his advice to volunteer and not wait to be drafted. This advice the young man followed and with the aid of the defendant was commissioned a second lieutenant. But this testimony was struck out by order of the court.

Other testimony on behalf of the defendant was befogged by the interjection of long dissertations on the activities of the Red Cross and of the Y. M. C. A. While these dissertations had no bearing on the case as testimony they were interesting to the student of history. The deputy controller of the National Red Cross Society testified that Italy would have been lost to the Allies without the intervention of the Red Cross Society. "We went into Italy," he said, "after the first German drive and organized the country for war against Austria. After that we kept Italy in the war by the establishment of soup kitchens, 'colony' formation, and the distribution of men and money to each and every hamlet and town throughout the land. This work," he continued, "won for us the praise of the King of Italy and the War Premier, and it has been continued on an increased scale to the present time."

This testimony was a revelation to the thoughtful of the real function of the Red Cross. Its activities have been commonly understood to be limited to the relief of human suffering, but this national administrative officer of the society testified under oath that its chief function was to precede the armies into a country (Italy, in this instance), to organize the country for war, and then to keep the country fighting.

The significance of his statement that the American Red Cross Society also made Great Britain's occupancy of Mesopotamia possible was lost upon the greater number of persons present. Today a knowledge of the presence of rich oil-fields there is general.

The Deputy Controller waxed eloquent when he emphasized the fact that only prominent citizens who were the possessors of great wealth were intrusted with the control of the American Red Cross Society. Eighteen bankers, grocers, or manufacturers, with former President Taft at their head, formed the executive committee during the war. Yet he deplored the fact that "profligate" methods were often employed in collecting money, as when great balls were given and only a small part of the money received was turned over to the society.

The solicitors for the Y. M. C. A. war fund were not representatives of that organization but citizens engaged in various lines of work. The man who reported the defendant's unwillingness to contribute to the drive was an unsuccessful lawyer, who later became attached to the Department of Justice as a secret agent. He was unable to remember with any definiteness what had been said during the discussion which led to the defendant's indictment. The regular Y. M. C. A. officials whom the prosecution brought on as witnesses had never seen the defendant nor had any conversation with him.

The first of these witnesses was the State Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. He testified in regard to activities. The Y. M. C. A. operated in Italy, France, Mesopotamia, and Russia, and after the revolution (referred to by the witness as "the fall of Russia") orders were given them to remain in Russia to cooperate with the "better" class of people. He admitted that since the Y. M. C. A. does not confer full membership upon Catholics, Unitarians, and Jews, a man belonging to one of these sects might rightfully feel disinclined to contribute money to its activities.

Struck by the accomplishments of the Red Cross Society and the story of the Y. M. C. A.; impressed by the lack of credence given the testimony for the defense by the presiding judge, who consistently overruled all testimony bearing on the intent of the defendant and refused to give the jury any instructions requested by the defense—

A month later sentence was pronounced in his home city, where friends and neighbors might witness the attempt to humiliate him. In pronouncing sentence, Judge Evans said: "The judgment of the court is that you be imprisoned at the federal prison at Leavenworth for a period of thirty months, your sentence to begin at 12 o'clock today."

Mr. Coolidge's New-Old Message

By FRANK R. KENT

Washington, November 6

IF the bump of humor in the American people had not degenerated into a dent, a good many patriots in high public office here in Washington would certainly be laughed off the political stage. And if the popular lack of humor were not combined with a memory collectively crippled and dreadfully infirm, it would very badly cramp the style of some of our most serious and successful statesmen.

Take, for instance, the present predicament of Mr. Coolidge over his forthcoming message on the state of the Union with which three weeks from next Monday he must greet the new Congress. That is, it would be a predicament if it were not for the before-mentioned traits of the common people and an overwhelming and utterly non-critical press support. It is safe to say, for instance, that not one man in 100,000, including the erudite editors whose business it was to digest them, can today recall the recommendations made by Mr. Coolidge when two years ago he sent his first message to Congress. If they did remember clearly, it would very greatly add to his apprehensive embarrassment now. The fact that they do not makes it relatively easy for him with customary solemnity to deliver another message which, however differently worded, in all vital respects will be identical with the one delivered two years ago.

Of course there will be a few pestiferous persons to see and point out the old stuff in the new dress, but their carping voices will be drowned in the great Coolidge chorus of a united press, which so greatly contributes to the unprecedented presidential popularity. The truth is that the rushing tide of prosperity has swept from the public mind all things political save those implanted by the current propaganda or instilled by prejudice.

To the few, however, who do recall the facts, the reason the second Coolidge message is bound to be identical in substance, though not in form, with the first is entirely plain. It can be stated in a few words—of all the recommendations made by the President in 1923 not a single one has yet been carried out. There have been two solid years of marking time. Exactly nothing has been achieved except a reduction in taxes, which every fair-minded man is compelled to admit inevitably would have occurred under any President and regardless of party. Right here it ought to be noted that the tax reduction made was not along lines recommended by Mr. Coolidge but along the lines he specifically did not recommend; that the bill as passed was not the Administration bill and that he signed it with extreme reluctance.

To make things clear it seems worth while to set down the outstanding recommendations of the Coolidge message of 1923, which of necessity must be remade in 1925 because nothing has been done to carry them out and their need has been enhanced by time.

First—He asked for railroad legislation to render consolidation of the roads possible, but Congress did not respond. He will have to ask again.

Second—An ugly coal strike having just ended, he urged legislation that would prevent strikes in the future and protect the public interests. The report of the commission upon which he based his 1923 recommendation only recently has been printed, but nothing has been done with it. We are now in the midst of another coal strike and Mr. Coolidge necessarily will renew his advice.

Third—In the matter of agriculture he very strongly recommended the enactment of laws urged by the commission named by him to study the subject, but not a single law was passed. His Secretary of Agriculture is preparing a new set of recommendations on this subject.

Fourth—In 1923 he urged the Senate to adopt the World Court proposal, but the measure did not even come out of the committee. He, of course, will renew the recommendation this time.

These four were the big recommendations of Mr. Coolidge in 1923. They constituted the bulk of his message. There were some minor recommendations concerning prohibition, veterans of the World War, and immigration—not one of which, by the way, was carried out either—and there was considerable "apple sauce" about peace and prosperity, but these four constituted the vital parts of the message. They will also be the substance of the forthcoming message. There is no way to avoid it.

In the new message there will, of course, be a lot of palaver about tax reduction, which unfailingly strikes a responsive chord in the bosoms of our high-bracket business Babbitts, and there will be much more about economy, in spite of the steady rise in federal expenditures, but it will be old stuff and mean little.

On the subject of foreign debts unquestionably the President proposes to speak in solemn commendation of the "establishment throughout the world of the principle that nations must pay their war debts." He proposes, too, I am informed, to highly approve the Locarno Conference, with which we had nothing at all to do, to speak well and kindly of the nations which have funded their debts and with sympathetic tolerance of those that have not. All that is obvious. He cannot avoid saying those things. What he will not say, however, is that as a result of our pressure on our foreign friends for payment in the face of our own overpowering prosperity, the mountain of concentrated hate of the United States on the other side is higher than ever before in history. Nor will a tone of broad tolerance and an assumption of moral leadership, inevitable in the message, lower the mountain or dilute the hate. Another point not likely to be brought out is the passing of the initiative in world affairs which was ours up to the time of the Locarno Conference. Nor will it be stated that the only important foreign debtor from whom we have any real expectation of ever being paid anything except stage money is Great Britain.

Mr. Coolidge's job is so to word the new that its similarity to the old one will not be noted generally and all his recommendations can be renewed without seeming to confess futility. This is made easy for him by the forgetfulness of the people and the friendliness of the press.

[This is the first of a series of letters which Mr. Kent will contribute every other week during the winter.]

In the Driftway

AN anonymous lady, writing in the London Spectator, points out certain painful truths with regard to men's clothing. It is perfectly apparent that men's clothes are awkward, hot, constricting, and bulky; what is, one had hoped, less apparent, she sets forth in downright terms:

> The truth is that man's dress today conceals a multitude of weaknesses. Many athletes, even, look anything but their best in working kit. . . . Ordinary men in bathing costume look quite pathetically unimportant and unimpressive. . . . Their long trousers collect mud and dust just as women's draggling skirts used to do. Their collars throttle the neck. . . . Their hats are hard and tight, inducing baldness. Their kidney-exposing waistcoats are ugly. Their braces and their thick underwear are as shameful and comic as women's corsets and clumsy undergarments used to be. . . . If it became customary to expose legs, then vanity would impel men to cultivate pleasing forms.

* * * * *

THIS frankness is deplorable. The Drifter himself, at sight of a worthy captain of industry in running trunks, or of a Methodist preacher in a modest bathing suit, has often shuddered at the unfortunate picture, but he shuddered with the comfortable thought that at least the more decorative and sensible sex was not present making comparisons. Evidently he was wrong, and certainly the anonymous lady is right. Man's costume is ridiculous and man appears ridiculous in it only too often. The feeble attempts that are being made to remedy matters would be pitiful if they were not laughable also. A few bold spirits have permanently discarded the stiff collar; a scattering number refuse to wear a hat in summer, although all but the bravest of these few carry their hats in their hands. The stiff-bosomed shirt has almost disappeared, the heavy woolen suit in summer is going fast, although a man who discards his coat in hot weather and appears in a perfectly decent white shirt is frowned upon as an ill-mannered lout. But see what remains! On May 15, for example, man dons the most cunningly devised instrument of torture ever invented—the straw hat; on September 15 he discards it. If he chooses to keep this strange head-gear on until the day after the middle of the ninth month it may be knocked from his head. He slops about the streets in trousers that the snow has muddied and the rain has splashed. If he rolled them up, or better still, cut them off below the knee, young children would follow him with hooting and derision. Upon his head he perches a felt hat of ugly shape and sour color which he tries to improve by a piteous small feather.

* * * * *

YET in spite of all these undeniable reasons why man will never be called the fair sex, the Drifter finds himself a little reluctant to adopt the amendments suggested by the Spectator's anonymous lady: the jumper blouse, the short fur coat, pajamas for the house in "green, bright navy, rust-red, or wine, with full and comely shirts . . . and light-weight flexible shoes of vivid leather." No, something better than this must be devised. Man must proceed slowly; possibly it would be better if, following woman's example, he began to discard his garments one by one. Then he could eventually see which was most useful and at the same time most decorative. THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

The Irreconcilables

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As an old and battered, even if totally uninfluential and insignificant, hanger-on of the old Battalion of Death of 1919, may I ask you why you do not give credit for this new magnificent Locarno Treaty to the Irreconcilables who in 1919 and 1920 saved this country from joining the League of Nations and saved Europe from having us Americans act as the arbiters of its destiny?

According to the official intentions of that time, the Goths and Vandals of the Hudson and the Mississippi and the Sacramento were to stand with their threatening swords in the civilized vales of the Rhine and by their savage frontier might were to prevent the infuriated Teutons and the infuriated Franks from rushing upon one another to their mutual destruction.

The argument was: These Europeans want peace. They yearn for peace. There is nothing that they want so much as peace. But they just simply will go against their own natures and burst unwillingly out into fighting one another unless the Americans prevent them.

This role of preventing people from doing what they claimed they did not want to do we rejected. There seemed to us to be something fishy in it. To some of us it seemed that it was an indignity, an insult, to Europe.

Was the continent of Marcus Aurelius, of St. Francis of Assisi, of Kant, of Gladstone, of Tolstoi unable to refrain from shedding its own blood except under the mentorship of a childish continent sprung from its own loins?

Thank God, Europe may now say that it has recovered its own self-respect! All by itself, just out of its own spiritual resources, if it does not want to fight, it can say, with its own lips and for its own reasons and purposes, and bound by its own guaranties, that it will not fight!

It was the Irreconcilables that really protected Europe. It was the Irreconcilables that really helped Europe. It was the Irreconcilables that compelled Europe to seek within its own rich ancient self for its own richer future. It was the Irreconcilables that prevented the cradle of our civilization from becoming its subordinated and humiliated annex. It was the Irreconcilables that kept Europe Europe.

Why not give us our presidential Irreconcilable Americans a little credit for having been the really best Europeans of our time?

Washington, October 25 WILLIAM HARD

Land of the Free!

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Jacob Riegel, born in Jugoslavia forty-two years ago, was refused citizenship papers by A. J. Pearson, a Cleveland common pleas judge, on September 17, because his principles would not allow him to subscribe to the oath to bear arms for his adopted country.

"I will support the United States in any other way," Mr. Riegel is quoted by local newspapers as saying, "but I do not believe in war and I cannot promise to fight."

When friends of Riegel protested to William T. Shockley, chief United States naturalization examiner, that many naturalized Americans have taken the oath with the mental reservation that they would not fight in defense of this country, that worthy official replied: "If we ever find them, we will revoke their naturalization papers."

Land of the free! Home of the brave!

Cleveland, Ohio, September 18 CLARK KINNAIRD

Prohibition

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: The intellectual confusion with regard to the enforcement of prohibition seems to be ineradicable. The article in the last number of The Nation [October 7] says: "Prohibition—so far—has failed: it has reduced drinking, but it has increased lawlessness." But if prohibition has reduced drinking, it has no concern with decreasing lawlessness. Apply the same phrase to stealing and observe the result.

I am vice-chairman both of the National and the New York State Women's Committee for Law Enforcement, which includes representatives of temperance and church organizations, and the only criticism which has reached me is to the effect that the report of the Federal Council of Churches strikes a more defeatist note than the contents warrant. However, we take it for granted that this was done merely to emphasize the necessity of a campaign of education, a necessity of which we are entirely conscious.

No service can be more important than the clear placing of responsibility upon the Treasury Department and the recognition that misused permits for the manufacture of industrial alcohol are the greatest source of the illicit supply. This understanding will clear the ground for all our future work.

We hope that this inquiry will be continued and that it will include a study of the following points: First, the effect of State-wide prohibition on the points raised by the inquiry. Second, the effect on women of the control exerted through a public opinion as rigid as law which effectively debarred one sex from a prevailing indulgence.

I believe that the intellectual confusion is created by the assumption that the majority of the support which the prohibition law has received comes from those who believe that a moral improvement should be effected by it. I believe that any inquiry would show that the favorable majority which has been secured for referendums in California, Ohio, and, lastly, in Massachusetts was made up of persons who supported this legislation as measures of health and public safety.

There also appears to be an extraordinary confusion as to the definition of crime. Does anyone believe that a crime can be created by the passage of law? Drinking, in my opinion, should be classed with the taking of other habit-forming drugs. While neither, perhaps, can be classed as a crime in itself, both are a source of crime and of indescribable misery.

New York, October 7 Margaret Norrie

Binding the Filipinos

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Representative Charles Underhill has been to the Philippine Islands and has come back and been interviewed. He expresses the opinion, in very positive terms, that General Wood should be made an autocrat—given a free hand in the Philippines, "without the impossible restrictions and irritations imposed by the independence propagandists." He declares: "The Philippines are not ready for independence and will not be for many years."

Most drastic methods have been used to make and keep them unfit for independence. To kill, imprison, terrorize, torture, and in all possible ways suppress its advocates is as sure a way to unfit a people for independence as the "Blessings-of-Civilization Trust" can devise. (For above naming see Mark Twain's To the Person Sitting in Darkness, the first article in the North American Review, February, 1901.) And so Mr. Underhill says Congress should immediately "pass legislation depriving the Philippine legislature of the power to interfere with the executive and judicial branches of the government."

Mr. Underhill doesn't mention them, but of course there would be proper pains and penalties provided for any independent spirit objecting to this new tyranny. As Mr. Underhill doubtless foresees, this move would give occasion for new "rebellions" and America's protecting guns would then have excuse for killing off some more "independence propagandists" and so keep the islands "not fit for independence."

> When I went to the Philippines it was my opinion that we should get rid of the islands at any price. But I quickly changed my mind. It would be unpatriotic, uncivilized, and un-Christian to give the islands their independence and plunge those people back into barbaric, internecine conflicts.

Mr. Underhill isn't going to allow those barbarians to kill each other. If any killing is to be done—and no doubt that under Mr. Underhill's regime there would be good and plenty—it is to be done by nice, patriotic, civilized, Christian Americans.

Immediately following the blessings-of-civilization talk we are told: "Moreover, we need the Philippines in connection with our industrial development and as a commercial outpost in the Orient. . . . We could grow enough rubber in the Philippines to make us independent forever of rubber sources controlled by other Powers."

And now comes the last paragraph, still further illuminating Mr. Underhill's change of mind: "The Filipino independence agitators so far have blocked the establishment of rubber culture on a large scale by American interests, realizing that if we develop a rubber supply there we will never get out."

Denver, Colorado, September 28 Celia Baldwin

Miguel de Unamuno

To the Editor of The Nation:

Sir: Writing as a subscriber who enjoys the many excellent reviews that appear in The Nation, I beg leave to say that the review by Mr. Eliseo Vivas, in the issue of September 23, of the volume of Unamuno, translated under the title of "Essays and Soliloquies," seems to me—although the reviewer is familiar with his subject—singularly inept. Why hurl the epithet "unscientific" at one who (though never disputing the achievements of science) glories in his contempt for "scientificism"? And why urge the lack of practical conclusions against one who has already proclaimed (in this book): "And I will tell them, once for all, that if it is solutions they want, they can go to the shop opposite, for I do not deal in the article"? Readers of your review are likely to picture Unamuno as a poet and dreamer, buried in the past, oblivious to the present, innocent alike of science and of modern thought, and unaware of the pitfalls that await him. They would be surprised to learn that he is a person intensely alive, and vastly read, no less in the literature of the present than of the past, who, moreover, has very explicitly anticipated his reviewer.

Your reviewer disposes of Unamuno's ideas about immortality by explaining that Unamuno—professor of Greek at Salamanca for thirty years or so, who took his doctorate at Madrid in letters and in philosophy—fails to see that the possibility of immortality involves the question of the transcendental nature of the ego. I think that no instructed reader of Unamuno will doubt that he has had his course in the transcendental ego—and graduated. This transcendental ego of medieval metaphysics is possibly the most typical representative of that "scientificism" which he explicitly rejects. And this should be enough to suggest that, intellectually at least, Unamuno is far from archaic; he is possibly the most modern of the moderns. And, above all, in the fact (evidently not grasped by your reviewer) that he refuses to permit his point of view to be described as a system of philosophy. Nor has he "set himself to solve" any "problem" of immortality; nor, least of all, to demonstrate the fact of immortality. Unamuno's "problem," which he never expects to "solve," is primarily the problem of grasping and communicating the quality and meaning of this mortal life. And his doctrine of immortality, so far as it involves any positive assertion, is only (but this is much) that any vital interest in life—this life—is inevitably an interest equally vital in immortality. Whether this be true, is a question not for science but for you and me.

Meanwhile, I fear that the readers of your review will get from it no inkling of what the compiler and translator of this anthology has been at such pains to offer—an opportunity to sample the magnificent flavor of the man, of the man Unamuno; to note his wonderful power of expression amidst a careless informality of style; his abundant, exuberant, even boisterous vitality; his trenchantly clear vision and never-failing sense of humor, along with a terribly tragic grasp of the facts of life and a preoccupation with the thought of death.

Princeton, New Jersey, September 26 WARNER FITE

Concerning France

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: In your last issue to hand, in three editorial paragraphs and one article, The Nation continues its prolonged offensive against France. Do you ever find anything good to say about the French? Anyhow you don't say it. But you are a great lover of the poor, downtrodden Germans, once more goose-stepping under Von Hindenburg. How is it that a man conducting a journal of civilization (as, I nevertheless admit, The Nation is) can be afflicted with such an incurable prejudice against that people who lighted the torch of civilization in an otherwise dark world and have kept it aflame for more than a thousand years—a prejudice emphasized by a gushing infatuation for their militaristic neighbor? Or is the latter emotion the cause of the former?

Although convinced that it is, I shall, for its many other good features, not cease to read The Nation, bearing in mind, however, that your expressions concerning France will be but the garden variety of Nordic propaganda.

San Diego, Cal., September 10 EDWARD H. WHELAN

"Hobo" and "Gay-Cat"

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: As to the definition of "hobo," be it remembered that the first strict definition put before the public was that given by Josiah Flynt. Flynt professed to have had his doctrine most particularly from a hobo who declared that the proper spelling was "haut beau." His account was that "hobo" is the distinctive name for such a tramp as will not in any case work, while a tramp who will accept work upon occasion is known in the language of the road as a "gay-cat." Now you are promulgating a directly opposite limitation for "hobo." My conclusion is that "hobo" has as yet all the indefiniteness of slang, and that if it is ever to be established as a word with a precise meaning this possibility belongs altogether to the future.

Ballard Vale, Mass., October 28 STEVEN T. BYINGTON

Sauce for the Gander

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Is there any reason in law or morals why the Chinese nation should not take up with the American Government the recent outrages upon the Chinese in Cleveland and elsewhere and demand reparation and an apology? Chinese military weakness has no bearing, as practically all nations are turning from war to law, at least in desire and hope. Particularly would this demand be fitting as these evil deeds were the official acts of men appointed by the State to maintain civil order.

Strictly, an honorable government would voluntarily apologize and offer satisfaction.

Bryn Mawr, Pa., October 13 JAMES A. TOWLE

A COMPLETE TECHNIQUE OF IMPERIALISM

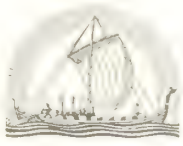
DOLLAR DIPLOMACY

BY SCOTT NEARING AND JOSEPH FREEMAN

This astounding record of America's foreign activities is a unique lesson in Empire-Building. Readers of The Nation know many of the separate episodes: marines in Haiti, "oleaginous diplomacy" in Mexico, exploitation in China, financial gymnastics in Europe. Mr. Nearing and Mr. Freeman have made a candid study of each of these and many more, from their origins to the present, and correlated them in a significant pattern.

The picture is startlingly impressive, full of the dramatic interplay of diplomacy and high finance, the fates of small nations, and the new destiny of the United States. It will prove revealing and stimulating even to those acquainted with the separate facts.

Illustrated with 11 Maps and Charts. 270 pp. $2.50



THE VIKING PRESS

B. W. HUEBSCH, Inc.

30 IRVING PLACE NEW YORK

More Nation Dinners

December 10

Is Man a Machine?

HENRY SLOANE COFFIN

Chairman

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

January 7

Subject to be announced

February 4

Wages for Wives

March 18

Is Literary Criticism Important?

Nation subscribers and their guests. With The Nation for a [illegible] $13.00.

The Nation,

[illegible] for a year and

..... places at the ..... dinner (or the series).

Name .....

Address .....

11-18-25

Women's Suffrage in Belgium

By ANNE SOMERHAUSEN

THE question whether women should vote at provincial elections has interested Belgian politicians during the past summer and may rouse them once more after their return to the Chamber and Senate on November 18. Dramatic incidents will perhaps occur, for "each time motions with regard to women's suffrage have been laid before this House," declared the president of the Chamber, "and whenever an attempt was made to merely find a place on the agenda for discussions of such motions, we have seen the Chamber become a prey to the utmost agitation. . . ."

Why? Because progress or defeat of the various political parties in the Belgian Parliament depends upon women's suffrage! Party considerations keep Belgian legislators from voting upon this just reform. There are no objections of principle. Most Belgian politicians admit that the one million women who work and pay taxes should be entitled to determine the laws under which they toil, and that family interests will be better taken care of when women voters cooperate with men.

No objections of principle, indeed. The Clericals, Belgium's tories, made women's suffrage a party issue after the Liberal and Socialist parties had become their powerful rivals; during the thirty-five years of uncontested Clerical rule before the war, however, the Clericals did not happen to think of women's rights. No objections of principle: the Labor Party, too, carries woman's suffrage on its program. In fact, this party was the first to propose the enfranchisement of women. Unfortunately the Belgian women's trend during clericalism augured so ill for Labor that the party decided to oppose women's suffrage "for the present" and a widely known Socialist minister broke his pledge to enfranchise women. The Liberal Party, small now but still decisive, fights women's suffrage for electoral reasons.

When, in 1920, these three parties gave women the right to vote in communal elections, it seemed logical to enfranchise women entirely during the next few years and to grant them suffrage first for provincial, then for national elections. The communal and provincial legislative bodies, moreover, are complements in Belgium; life in the communes is greatly influenced by the decisions of the nine provincial councils. On the other hand, the provincial vote plays also its part in national politics because the provincial councils elect nearly half of the country's Senators. For this latter reason the enfranchisement of Belgian women has been delayed.

Is women's vote conservative? The Belgian Socialist and Liberal parties are convinced of it. They quote the experiences of Germany and Holland; they attribute MacDonald's fall to the votes of women; they cite the results of their own communal elections in which women participated; Ghent, an industrial city where thousands of women work, had 45 per cent Labor votes during the legislative elections, but only 35 per cent such votes at the communal elections, which shortly followed.

Even Vandervelde—up to last July an unyielding champion of women's suffrage—conceded: "If tomorrow the women voted in the provinces, I admit the results would be worse (for the Labor Party) than if men voted alone."

That "by the grace of women" at the provincial elections the Clerical Party would not only obtain a majority of seats in the Senate but destroy the Socialist majority in the Red provincial councils of Hainaut and Liège has not been denied. If we are to believe gloomy Socialist statisticians, women's suffrage at national elections for Chamber and Senate would give a majority of 400,000 votes to the Clericals and would plunge the country for a hundred years back into clericalism.

"To give women the provincial vote now is an adventure full of perils," declared most of the Socialists when, in 1921, 125,000 women asked for the right to vote in the provinces and when the Clerical Party upheld them.

"Quite the contrary; give women political rights, and they will mature politically," a few Laborites maintained, and seemed willing to grant women the provincial vote if the Clericals, in turn, were ready to make certain concessions to the Left.

Vandervelde, then Minister of Justice, proposed a fair bargain: the Clericals were to consent to a couple of urgent reforms, such as universal suffrage for men in elections for the Senate and a salary for Senators, while a sufficient number of Socialists and Liberals was to guarantee the victory of women's suffrage for the provincial elections of 1925. A more tempting compromise could hardly have been found. The Clericals felt their mouths water when they thought of the victory women would assure them in 1925, and the parties of the Left rubbed their hands about the electoral advantage which men's universal suffrage for the Senate was certain to give them at the polls in 1921. All agreed to the bargain, the Socialist Party solemnly permitting a score of its deputies to vote for women's suffrage against the majority of their own party in order to help put any suffragist bill through in Parliament. Twenty-eight parliamentarians signed the compromise, and among them Vandervelde rejoiced: "From now on it is certain that there will be a majority in both houses to see to it that women vote at the provincial elections in 1925."

From 1921 to 1925 Belgium had a Clerico-Liberal coalition government in which the Liberals opposed so violently the very discussion of women's suffrage that their Catholic partners dared to bring up but one timid bill in its favor. Parliament at once banished the bill to the end of its agenda. It was certain, and the Liberals emphasized it frankly, that an extremely grave misunderstanding would arise within the parliamentary majority on which the Government rested if any suffragist bill was voted upon in either house. Consequently the Clericals remained during four years the platonic lovers of women's suffrage, realizing that, with the 1921 compromise in their pocket, they might demand women's provincial vote at any opportune moment. "Opportune" is a relative term. When, last spring, the Clerico-Liberal Government was replaced by a Clerico-Socialist Cabinet certain Clericals thought matters ripe for a women's suffrage bill, while the majority of their party believed it inopportune.

In fact, the situation had changed but little. Again the Government was based upon a majority which, in regard to women's suffrage, was utterly divided. This time it was the Socialist Party which, with the exception of its few consecrated suffragist deputies, threatened to abandon the Government if women were allowed to vote at the provincial elections. Nevertheless, a number of ultra-conservative Clericals, whom their party's alliance with the Socialists piqued considerably, insisted upon introducing a suffrage bill and demanding a vote upon it.

They knew that this bill was bound to be successful if all Clericals and the score of left-wing pro-suffrage parliamentarians voted for it. They also knew that the coalition Government would have to fall if the bill succeeded. They hoped probably that then the way would be free for an unadulterated Clerical Cabinet.

The life or death—to put it dramatically—of the Clerico-Socialist Government depended upon those few Socialists who, in 1921, had pledged themselves to vote for women's suffrage. Were they going to keep their word in the face of this grave situation? Were they willing to save the Cabinet by a breach of promise?

What followed in Parliament was rather piquant.

The Vandervelde who, as a minister of justice, had declared before the Senate in 1921: "I like to remember that, in 1895, I was one of the first to propose women's suffrage. I am convinced that the intervention of women in politics will have a salutary influence from all points of view"; the Vandervelde who, in 1920, made a Socialist party council adopt a resolution favorable to women's suffrage; the Vandervelde who, in the name of his twenty suffragist partisans, affirmed at a Labor congress in 1923: "We have engaged our word of honor. Nobody can release us from it. This congress can dispose of our mandates; it cannot dispose of our political honor"—this same Vandervelde and his followers (with two or three exceptions) broke their pledge to support women's suffrage and voted last July against the Clerical bill.

Also under the pressure of the Socialist discipline Madame Spaak, the only Belgian woman parliamentarian, announced she would not be a puppet in Clerical hands, but would vote for women's suffrage only "when the reform should be introduced as a measure of justice, not as a party-political trump."

Scandal! Scenes of incredible uproar, particularly in the Chamber. Insults. The president calls for order and cannot dominate the tumult.

Vandervelde starts seven times his declaration that he feels not bound by his promise, since the regular date of the 1925 provincial elections is past.

After chaotic debates a close majority relegates the suffrage bill to a committee which will meet after the vacation of Parliament, on November 18—and the provincial elections are scheduled for November 8. Women's provincial suffrage is buried for four more years. Vandervelde tries to be soothing:

"I hope that the next elections in the provinces, in 1929, will not pass without our legislation having finally registered the political equality of the two sexes. . . . When the time comes we shall energetically defend the universal suffrage of women for the elections of 1929."

Belgian women will have to resign themselves to the status quo. In vain do they protest against "a dishonesty without precedent in Belgium's parliamentary history, a dishonesty which harms the dignity of the national legislature and which is liable to destroy respect for a freely given word of honor." Their rights will continue to be no more than an ace in the party-political game until the Left believes women sufficiently educated to resist clericalism.

Contributors to This Issue

FRANK R. KENT has been vice-president and Washington correspondent of the Baltimore Sun. He wrote the article Mr. Coolidge, in the American Mercury for August, 1924.

LOUIS W. MCKERNAN is a New York lawyer, for several years a member of the War Loan Staff of the United States Treasury.

ELLEN TORELLE NAGLER is a biologist, formerly on the faculty of the University of Wisconsin.

RENE LALOU is the author of a standard critical volume, "Contemporary French Literature."

EDWIN MUIR is writing a series on modern British authors for The Nation. He has just published a volume of verse, "First Poems."

LAURA RIDING GOTTSCHALK is soon to have a volume of poems published in London and New York.

COUNT MAX MONTGELAS is author of "The Case for the Central Powers" and co-editor of "German Documents on the Origin of the War."

WILLIAM A. DRAKE is foreign editor of Books.

ANNE SOMERHAUSEN is a correspondent of the Christian Science Monitor in Brussels.

The Nation considers the present Chinese situation so serious that it has sent one of its editors, Lewis S. Gannett, to China for several months to study it at first hand. Mr. Gannett sailed from San Francisco on November 10. During his absence The Nation will have the services of Stuart Chase, author of "The Tragedy of Waste," as one of its editorial writers.

:: Where to Buy Books ::

ANY BOOK IN ANY LANGUAGE
B. WESTERMANN CO., Inc.
IMPORTERS—PUBLISHERS
13 WEST 46th STREET NEW YORK CITY

W. BEYER, Inc.
(Established as 1841)
259 FIFTH AVE.
NEW YORK
nal etchings.)

"WE MODERNS"
by Edwin Muir with a lengthy introduction by
H. L. Mencken First Edition
Published at $2.00, our special price $1.00, postpaid.
other books.
SEIFFERS, National Book Sellers,

Book Gifts for Christmas anywhere. Send for suggestions in our Xmas Book Notes.
THE POST-BOX BOOK SERVICE
25 West 42nd Street, New York

Foreign Book Section

Fall Books in France

By RENÉ LALOU

AS last winter's publishing season stretched out till the end of July, it is no wonder that publishers have not yet resumed their offensive and that no official candidate has appeared for the Goncourt cup. One new firm has emerged meanwhile, Les Arts et le Livre; and calculated indiscretion, that food of journalism, prompts one to disclose in this a new venture of Georges Crès, the well-known publisher, who has left the old firm he founded and led to such success. To vindicate the name he has chosen, he is going to publish a series of illustrated books on art and life, ranging from Rops and Daumier to Rowlandson and the Japanese, as well as a series entitled Les Prix Littéraires, an anthology of literary prizemen including Giraudoux, Carco, Mac Orlan, and Estaunié.

One of the chief features of present French publishing is the increasing number of translations. Some editors proceed at random, translating things that are not worth translating; others pursue a definite program: Gallimard (Nouvelle Revue Française) stands for Tagore, Conrad, Pirandello, Chesterton; Kra for Unamuno, Ferrero, Pirandello, Symons, Dostoevski; Stock for Strindberg, Tagore, Bunine, Moore; Rieder for American authors such as Sandburg and Waldo Frank. Two promised studies by Lucie Delarue-Mardrus (Plon) and Camille Mauclair (Michel) testify to a renewed interest in the work of Edgar Poe. The coming publishing season will also see many books dealing with social problems, especially with bolshevism; two books by Alain, "Elements d'une doctrine radicale" (Gallimard) and "Le Citoyen contre les pouvoirs" (Kra), will set forth a new theory of political individualism; "Nouvelles Aristocraties" (Kra) will be a study of social forces by Lucien Romier, and "Comme je les vois" (Kra) a gallery of French statesmen painted by Jean Piot; while Giraudoux will offer in "Bella" a picture of the Poincaré and Berthelot family feuds. Interest in Jewish problems is also steadily increasing; Gallimard will produce "Jacob," Bernard Lachace's first novel, and Grasset the Letters of Henri Franck with a long introduction by André Spire. Lastly, under the title "Judaisme," Rieder has just started a new series of texts and essays which will run parallel to his "Christianisme."

Plon-Nourrit, on the other hand, is the stronghold of Catholic authors and academicians, and this firm will honor its tradition by publishing Henri Bremond's new work, "Le Roman et l'Histoire d'une conversion." At the same time it is beginning the issue of a new series, Le Roseau d'Or, aiming at what is called "a spiritual revival," and this golden reed will bear without breaking not only works by Ramuz, Max Jacob, and Belloc, but a "Défense de l'Occident" by Henri Massis, the neo-Thomist pamphleteer, and the first part of "Le Soulier de Satin," a drama in the free vein of Shakespeare and Calderon, written by Paul Claudel during his embassy in Japan.

Pure literature is naturally to be expected from the Nouvelle Revue Française. Two works of Stéphane Mallarmé will be published by this house—"Les Dieux antiques," an original interpretation of old myths, and a recently discovered tale, "Igitur," presenting many analogies with the famous poem, "Un Coup de Dés," which will also appear in a new edition. "Albertine Disparue," a new part of Proust's prose epic, will be accompanied by the 1923 "Hommage" in book-form and a pamphlet by Louis de Robert on Proust's first experience with publishers. Then one of the events of the season will be "Les Faux-Monnayeurs," which André Gide describes as his first novel, quite different from anything in his former work. Jacques Rivière's posthumous book, "A la trace de Dieu," with a preface by Claudel, will probably raise many controversies. The series Une Œuvre, un Portrait aims at revealing young talent, and Kra has dedicated his Cahiers Nouveaux to the same purpose. In the last-named series Pierre Girard, René Jouglet, Antonin Artaud, Marcel Arland, René Crevel, and Robert Desnos will propound impressionism, Freudian complexities, "Surréalisme," the new "Mal du Siècle," and other modern romanticisms.

The firm of Stock continues to concentrate on a few chosen writers. In addition to many translations, they will issue several unpublished works by Léon Bloy and Apollinaire, among which the letters of Bloy to Maritain and "Anecdotiques," a miscellaneous mirror of Apollinaire's wanderings through modern art, should be particularly noteworthy. Under the significant title of "le Rappel à l'Ordre" will be arrayed the collected essays of Jean Cocteau—the landmarks of his journey from what he called anarchy to what he is pleased to call order.

Bernard Grasset is the chief publisher of novels. His program for the winter season is as copious as usual, and includes "Battling Malone," by Louis Hémon; "la Revanche," by André Thérive, and "Quand on conspire," by Raymond Escholier. Further, "En Joue," by Philippe Soupalt, and "l'Apprenti Sorcier," by André Obey, will show that those established novelists have competitors in the rising generation. Then Grasset has a knack of discovering a new promising youth every year; and this time it is André Chamson with "Roulé Bandit," who will bear the colors of the firm through the literary contests. The Cahiers Verts are nearing their completion: the last rose of their season will be a book by the Comtesse de Noailles, a prose work poetically named "Ciels." A series of studies on the great monastic orders has also been begun by this same firm under the management of Edouard Schneider, whose first contribution is a fine life of St. Benedict.

Modernity and cosmopolitism are the key-notes of present French thought, from the literary impressionism of Mac Orlan, who is going to publish "Aux lumières de Paris" (Crès) and "Images sur la Tamise" (Kra), to the collective survey of general problems which will be attempted in "Enquêtes" by writers and sociologists. But the past is not really forgotten. Escholier will publish (Crès) the drawings of Hugo, which will throw a new light on the mind of the great poet. Two unpublished works by Sainte-Beuve will appear this winter: a kind of anthology, "Aperçu sur l'histoire de France," and a diary with the minatory title of "Arsenal de mes Vengeances," which is awaited with much curiosity (Plon). Another striking feature is that three series of famous lives are simultaneously advertised by Gallimard, Grasset, and Plon. In every case the author has chosen his own particular hero; Paul Valéry will write about Descartes, Fabre-Luce about Talleyrand, Carco about Villon, Benda about Spinoza, Hermant about Plato.

British Books: Autumn

By EDWIN MUIR

IN works of imagination this season has not been prolific, and from the announcements does not seem likely to be so. A respectable, orderly, but mediocre stream of books, neither very full nor very rapid, has been flowing since the beginning of the season, and if any surprising acceleration is to set in it cannot happen now until the spring. The section of literature auxiliary to fiction and poetry—criticism and belles-lettres—has not quite the same bareness and moderation. But where the publishers' lists are rich is in memoirs, reminiscences, and books of travel: a class of reading very often interesting, but only rarely and by a lucky chance literature. There seems to be at present a fairly keen public taste for this kind of reading, and at the same time, naturally, a ready disposition on the part of all sorts of people to supply it. What further this may connote it is hard to say; perhaps a poverty of creative imagination, perhaps a fresh current of interest in all purely human affairs, which in its turn may give a new impetus to the imagination. Time will tell. A very good sign is the growing number of anthropological and psychological works. These are being produced tirelessly, and a great number of them are valuable, while almost all are interesting. They should not be ignored by the general reader. He will find them infinitely more interesting than most contemporary fiction, and also more profitable.

In fiction there have already appeared Mr. David Garnett's "The Sailor's Return," a repetition of his two former successes, but all the same a repetition; Mr. T. F. Powys's "Mockery Gap," a very fine novel, probably the best he has written; Mr. F. M. Ford's "No More Parades," also a remarkable work; and Princess Bibesco's "The Whole Story," in which this author's sensibility and wit are seen at their best. Among novels which are still to appear are "Portrait of a Man with Red Hair: A Romantic Macabre," by Hugh Walpole; "Broken Ties and Other Stories," by Rabindranath Tagore; "The Mulberry Bush and Other Stories," by Sylvia Lynd; "The Dinosaur's Egg," by Edmund Candler; "The Madonna of the Barricades," a first novel by the experienced and versatile editor of The Spectator; and "Old Pairs," a collection of short stories about the English countryside, by Laurence Housman.

In poetry there are a few volumes of the greatest interest. First of all there is Mr. Thomas Hardy's new collection, "Human Shows: Far Phantasies: Songs and Trifles," a volume which cannot but be important. Only less interesting is the "Collected Poems" of Mr. T. S. Eliot, in which will be contained, the announcement says, certain pieces no longer obtainable (among these "The Waste Land," which is out of print), and some not previously collected. There are also the "Early Poems and Plays" of Mr. W. B. Yeats; "Parables," by John Gould Fletcher; "A Poet's Alphabet," by W. H. Davies; "Poems, Brief and New," by Sir William Watson, and "The Londoner's Chariot," by Wilfrid Thorley: a small harvest, but some of it likely to be excellent.

The most noteworthy volume of criticism to appear thus far has been Mr. Middleton Murry's "Keats and Shakespeare." Still to come are "Books and Theaters," by Gordon Craig; "Critical Essays," by Osbert Burdett; "Modern Poetry: A Study," by H. P. Collins; "Kabuki: The Popular Stage in Japan," by Zoë Kincaid, with an introduction by Laurence Binyon (which should be an invaluable work, since the author has exhaustive knowledge and several years' experience of the Japanese stage); "Some Contemporary Musicians," by Ernest Newman; and the Collected Essays of the late W. P. Ker in two volumes.

But travel, biography, and memoirs occupy the center of the scene. In the latter two classes there are (among a host of others) the "Life and Letters of W. T. Stead," by Frederick Whyte, in two volumes with illustrations; "Melodies and Memories," by Dame Nellie Melba; "Monarchs and Millionaires," by Mme Vandervelde, the wife of the well-known Belgian statesman; "The Letters and Memoirs of Sir William Hardman, 1863-1864," by S. M. Ellis, containing adventures during a continental tour and impressions of Meredith, Shirley Brooks, and other well-known figures; "Ghostland," by Elliott O'Donnell, an account of occult experiences; "Later Days," by W. H. Davies, a continuation of his "Autobiography of a Tramp," and "Adventures of a Scholar Tramp," by a new writer, Glen Mullin, with an introduction by Mr. Davies; "On the Panel; General Practice as a Career," by a Panel Doctor (conceivably interesting); and a memoir of Brigham Young, by M. R. Werner, which traces the origins of the Mormon movement. From literally hundreds of books of travel I have picked out three or four, whether better than the others I do not know. There are almost the usual number of books about Russia, among which "The New Russia," by Dr. Haden Guest, M.P.; "The Reforging of Russia," by Edwin Hallinger (which claims to be a first-hand account of life under the Soviet Government), and "Beyond the Baltic," by A. McCallum Scott, appear to be the most promising. "The Little World: Sketches of Travel in Many Lands," by Stella Benson, is a volume whose interest will not be chiefly that of its subject matter. And, probably most fascinating of all, a long-expected volume, "The London Perambulator: Impressions and Ideas of London Life and Scene," by James Bone, with collotype illustrations by Muirhead Bone, is shortly to appear.

There remain a few volumes, perhaps the most significant of the lot, on anthropology and psychology. The most exciting of these is the first volume of Sir James G. Frazer's "The Worship of Nature," dealing with the worship of the sky, the earth, and the sun. Also obviously important is "Ritual and Belief in Morocco," by Dr. Edward Westermarck, based on the author's seven years' experience of the natives of that country. "Art and the Unconscious: a Psychological Approach to the Problem of Philosophy," by J. M. Thorburn, is bound to be interesting if it fulfils its program, which is to estimate the value of the work of Freud and Jung toward a theory of art; for that is what we are waiting for. "The A B C of Relativity," by Bertrand Russell, sounds fascinating, as do the three new volumes in Messrs. Kegan Paul's History of Civilization. These are "Mesopotamia: The Civilization of Babylon and Assyria," by Professor L. Dolgorsky; "The Aegean Civilization," by Professor G. Glotz; and "The Peoples of Asia," by S. H. Dudley Buxton. Professor Glotz's picture of Aegean life is based on the discoveries of Schliemann and Sir Arthur Evans. In Mr. Buxton's book the peoples of Asia are described, and some of the larger racial problems of Asia considered. Altogether this is the most impressive division of reading that the season's announcements offer.

Many Gentlemen

By LAURA RIDING GOTTSCHALK

Many gentlemen there are born not babes.
They will be babes, they will be babes
In the shades.
They will dribble, they will babble,
They will pule in pantomime
Who were not babes in baby time.

Of such infant sorrow
Will they whimper
On Aspasia's bosom
In the shades tomorrow:
Many gentlemen, many gentlemen frowning,
But not Socrates simpering among these,
Who was well weaned of her honey
In his prime and needs no pap now,
Having long ago with baby eyes
Smiled upward to her learned brow.

First Glance

ALBERT BIGELOW PAINE had a humbler motive for writing the life of Saint Joan than Mark Twain had, and in "Joan of Arc, Maid of France" (Macmillan: 2 vols., $10) he has produced a humbler work. It has virtues of its own, chief among these being a kind of dogged fidelity to the documents in the case, so that for the first time in a popular biography of the maid we get her whole story as nearly as possible in the words of herself and her contemporaries. But it has not the virtue which makes the "Personal Recollections," if hardly, as both Mark Twain and Mr. Paine have gone on record as believing, its author's best work, at any rate one of his most passionate and gallant. This virtue in the older book is not necessarily a result of the fact that Mark Twain worked hard at writing it—"I have never done any work before," he said, "that cost so much thinking and weighing and measuring and planning and cramming, or so much cautious and painstaking execution." Nor does it follow by any literary law from the fact that he performed all these labors "for love." The significant circumstance is simply that in the story of Joan he found one more key that would unlock the gates of his great eloquence; and this was because he was touched at a point that was of the profoundest importance both for his thinking and for his feeling. As a boy in Hannibal he had been strangely moved by a fragment of the tale which he found on a piece of paper in the street—his sympathy for wronged virtue had been awakened. As a man, growing every year more closely acquainted with those defects of the human animal which in the end so bitterly impressed him as to make him write "The Mysterious Stranger," he continued to be interested in Joan; and it is clear to me that when he began the "Recollections" he conceived his heroine as the one historical spot of perfect white against a background which experience was painting always darker. Hence his worship of "the noble child, the most innocent, the most lovely, the most adorable the ages have produced." Hence the beauty and the power—whatever may be the extravagances—of the "Recollections."

Anatole France approached the subject in a mood scarcely less exalted, for he declared Joan to be "the sweetest, most ingenuous, the daintiest and most generous being that ever lived upon this earth." And Mr. Paine himself is not without his moments of ecstasy—as when, speculating upon the possibility that Joan's armor still exists, he muses: "It could be identified; there would be a patch on the shoulder, a break in the cuissard, the contour of the cuirasse would conform to the feminine outline. What a quest to seek for it! Second only to the search for the Holy Grail." But this is bathos, and the reason is that Mr. Paine has for the moment strayed out of his path, which, as I have said, is a humble one. Without the moral passion of Mark Twain, without the erudite curiosity of Anatole France, and without any such generalization in his mind as moved Mr. Shaw to set forth in "Saint Joan" the eternal opposition between the individual and the organized will, Mr. Paine has been content for the most part to tell a conventional story, adding only the bits of topographical information which as a pilgrim to Orleans, Rouen, Domremy, and the other places he has industriously collected. Not for him to hint—what Mr. Shaw seems to have demonstrated—that the members of the Inquisition which tried Joan could have possessed both virtue and intellect. His indignation at them, like his love for Joan, is the standard article.

MARK VAN DOREN

A French View of War Origins

Les Origines Immédiates de la Guerre, 28 juin—4 août 1914. Par Pierre Renouvin. Paris: Alfred Costes.

FOR some years Professor Renouvin has been lecturing at the Sorbonne on the origins of the World War. As a result of his careful study of the diplomatic crisis of 1914 he now presents the students of this vexed problem with a well-informed and most readable book. It may well be called the sanest and most up-to-date volume which has come out of France.

These are the most important of the facts which, owing to the evidence produced by Renouvin, must be considered henceforth as indubitably established:

1. The Serajevo attempt was plotted and organized by Colonel Dragutin Dimitrijevich, chief of the Intelligence Department of the Serbian General Staff. The indirect complicity of the Serbian Government is proved by their toleration of the Pan-Serbian agitation against Austria-Hungary. One can hardly doubt that the eminent French scholar would have admitted as well the direct responsibility of the Belgrade authorities if he had known the latest revelations made by Ljuba Jovanovich, Minister of Finance in the Pachich Cabinet.

2. At the Potsdam conference on July 5 "The European War seems not to have been part of the program." It goes without saying that the myth of the Crown Council is completely repudiated.

3. The Wilhelmstrasse did not join the Ballhausplatz in working out the ultimatum to Serbia. In Berlin they knew only the probable contents of that fatal document, and it must be borne in mind that the Entente cabinets also had succeeded in obtaining pretty exact information.

4. In the beginning Chancellor von Bethmann, relying on the reports received, was entitled to believe that England and France would not be opposed to the "localization" of the conflict. Grey's first proposal of médiation à quatre between Austria and Russia "suited the main thought of Austro-German policy, as it did not imply any interference with the Austro-Serbian issue. Bethmann-Hollweg was ready to accept it." This disposes of the legend that Grey's first proposal contained the idea of a conference in London, and of the accusation against Germany that she rejected the médiation à quatre.

5. The Serbian answer can be judged very severely. In Renouvin's opinion, a close examination of the note shows that it contains many "conditions and restrictions."

6. Grey's sudden proposal of a conference on July 26 was designed to settle the Austro-Serbian, not the Austro-Russian quarrel.

7. On July 27 the Berlin Cabinet agreed to direct conversations between Vienna and Petersburg and transmitted to Count Berchtold Grey's proposal to accept the Serbian reply either as satisfactory or as a basis for discussion. But next day, the Wilhelmstrasse having got a favorable impression of the Serbian reply and Austria having launched her declaration of war, Germany on her own initiative advised Vienna to limit her military operations to Belgrade and the neighborhood.

8. The highly interesting chapters on the mobilizations in Russia and Austria completely overthrow what has hitherto been the common opinion in the Entente countries. Founding his narrative on a minute inquiry into all of the available evidence, Renouvin demolishes the very basis of the Versailles impeachment by his pitiless chronology. Renouvin's account suffices to stigmatize forever the main war lie that Austria's general mobilization was anterior to Russia's.

9. Chancellor von Bethmann made vigorous efforts to arrive at a peaceful solution by diplomatic means at a time when in Russia military arguments were overriding all other considerations.

10. On the other hand, censure is due the way in which Austria carried on her direct conversations with the Petersburg Cabinet. She should have accepted Grey's last proposal; and General von Moltke, who quite rightly insisted on Austria's mobilization, mistakenly meddled with diplomacy by telling the Austrian military attaché in Berlin that Vienna had better not accept Grey's suggestion.

11. What finally does Renouvin think about Germany's declarations of war? Even here his thesis does not agree with French and English war propaganda, for he writes: "It seems to be the point of view of [all] the general staffs and of [all] the governments" that declaration of war is "a mere formality."

All this has been well known for a long time to impartial historians. The novel thing is that it should be frankly accepted by a French scholar who is lecturing on the origins of the Great War in what may be called a semi-official position and who is not afraid of contradicting the fabulous compositions published by French and British statesmen or of revealing the falsehoods of the French Yellow Book.

It must be added, however, that history will not in the same degree approve of Renouvin's last chapter containing his "conclusions." There he says that the Central Powers "remained tenaciously faithful to the plan of localization" and that Germany, by permitting Austria to declare war upon Serbia, "accepted voluntarily the possibility of Russian intervention and of a European war." Those statements overlook the facts that Germany renounced the program of strict localization as early as July 27 by transmitting to Vienna the English suggestion to treat the Serbian note either as satisfactory or as a basis for discussion, and that on the very day of Austria's declaration of war the Berlin Cabinet made the proposal to "Stop at Belgrade," which is universally considered to have been the sanest expedient under prevailing circumstances.

Dealing with the Russian general mobilization, Renouvin dares not squarely draw the conclusion that it meant war. He admits that the negotiators of the Franco-Russian alliance in 1892 had openly declared: "La mobilisation, c'est la declaration de la guerre." But he adds that this referred to the mobilization of Russia's and France's adversaries, not to their own. The author may be reminded that he himself has said that Russia's mobilization "could not but provoke a reply from Germany." This reply could be no other than German mobilization. If Russian mobilization necessarily provokes German mobilization, and if German mobilization is equivalent to a "declaration of war," then Russian mobilization, too, must be equivalent to war. Renouvin further criticizes the hasty actions of German diplomats after the receipt of the official news that the whole of the Russian army and navy had been mobilized. Nobody will deny the blunders committed in those days in Berlin, but if Russia's mobilization meant war the course of events would have been the same without those blunders.

Finally, Renouvin says: "In July, 1914, the military provocation was the result of a diplomatic provocation; Austria's declaration of war (on Serbia) is the link between both." It must be observed that the origin of the catastrophe does not lie in any diplomatic action in July but in the murder in June. With regard to that crime so much fresh evidence has come to hand that the opinion about responsibility must be revised. Professor Renouvin has done so much toward clearing the way for truth that it may be hoped that loyalty to his country will not make him shrink from drawing the inevitable conclusions.

MAX MONTGELAS

From the German

Faber, or The Lost Years. By Jacob Wassermann. Translated by Harry Hansen. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.50.

The Island of the Great Mother. By Gerhart Hauptmann. Translated by Willa and Edwin Muir. B. W. Huebsch and the Viking Press. $2.50.

Fräulein Else. By Arthur Schnitzler. Translated by Robert A. Simon. Simon and Schuster. $1.50.

"FABER," the latest of Jacob Wassermann's novels, is the shortest and the most restrained of the four which have reached America. The three hundred and fifty pages of ordinary type which serve to tell its story contrast strikingly with the huge bulk of "The World's Illusion," and a similar restraint is evident both in the conception of the characters and in the handling of the plot. A simple narrative replaces the complicated chronicles embodied in previous books and the gigantic figures which formerly peopled his pages have shrunk nearer to ordinary human proportions. Nor is it possible to deny that something has been lost in the process, for Wassermann's novels owed a part of their impressiveness to the largeness of their scale. An energy of imagination commensurate with their bulk animated them and the grandiose stature of their protagonists suits well the fundamentally mystical temperament of their creator. In an age which [illegible] little of the heroic there was something peculiarly exciting in the work of a man who saw contemporary life not as the mean intrigue it appeared to most of his fellow-realists but as the battlefield of vast spiritual forces, and who created tumultuous phantasmagoria redolent with [illegible]. In "Faber" he does scarcely more than repeat on a smaller scale and in a somewhat subdued manner what he had done before. The hero who returns after six years as a prisoner of war and attempts to [illegible] is the same seeker after the ultimate spiritual verity who has appeared before, and the mysterious Princess who has exercised what he believes to be a baleful influence over his wife is the symbolic embodiment of the same ideal of complete humanitarian self-abnegation which is the implied perfection for which Wassermann's [illegible]. To put it briefly, that which the central character of "Faber" most passionately was not that which the hero of "The World's Illusion" became, and that which the status of "The Goose Man" was.

Indeed, as the increasing number of Wassermann's novels makes it possible to judge him comprehensibly as an artist, his essentially [illegible] becomes evident not only that his limitations are narrower than one might have been led to expect. His sense of the contrast between the thirst for power on the one hand and mystical self-effacement on the other is so strong as to exercise a positive tyranny over his mind and to make it impossible for him to see either characters or events save as part of the universal struggle between these forces. Every human relationship seems for him significant only as it tends to pull the parties concerned toward one side or the other and every character appears chiefly as the representative of the one tendency or the other, with the result that his world, in spite of all the multiplicity of its details, is curiously simplified. Thanks to the passionate strength of his convictions his novels produce a powerful impression, and thanks to their apparently comprehensive sweep they seem to suggest that their author is a man capable of grasping modern life in something like its full complexity; but his tendency to schematize it becomes increasingly evident and his vision is seen to be less comprehensive than one was led to hope.

"Faber," though it contains scenes of great power, clearly reveals this central defect of its author's work. As long as its problem is held in solution, as long as one is searching with Faber himself for the secret of the fascination which the Princess exercises over his wife, one shares in the emotion which masters him; but no sooner is the secret revealed than it seems somehow inadequate. To manage a house of refuge for mistreated children is doubtless a noble work, but it is not a unique undertaking; and it does not seem to promise an immediate solution for all the ills of mankind. Simple humanitarianism does not burst upon us as a new revelation, and we see no reason to believe that one of its many practitioners would appear, as the Princess does, to be a light from Heaven which would illuminate for Faber all the dark corners of his soul. The solution is too familiar and too commonplace, and it says something of the mind which conceived it. Wassermann has great artistic gifts but he is intellectually a little naïve.

Unfortunately neither Hauptmann's "The Island of the Great Mother" nor Schnitzler's "Fräulein Else" seems more likely than "Faber" to add much to the permanent reputation of its author, for though the second is said to be a European best-seller and both are the work of obviously competent writers both seem to me, nevertheless, more characteristic of the weaknesses than of the strength of the German and Austrian schools. Hauptmann's story of an island matriarchy finally wrecked by the insurgency of the males and the sexual hunger of the ruling women is vaguely mystical and, unless its intention escapes me, rather pointless, while Schnitzler's somewhat lurid novelette is in mood a little closer to the sentimental scabrousness of "True Stories" than is grateful to my taste. Its rather tearful picture of the young girl who went mad and committed suicide because an old roué demanded a sight of her beautiful body in payment for a certain sum of money which she had to have seems to me quite unconvincing and its elaborate psychology false. Undoubtedly there is skill in the telling and every precaution is taken to disguise the banality of the incident, but it remains, however dressed or undressed, a silly story.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Comte Robert de Montesquiou

Les Pas Effacés. Mémoires de Robert de Montesquiou. Three volumes. Paris: Emile Paul.

ROBERT DE MONTESQUIOU was without doubt the most accomplished poseur of his generation. Barbey d'Aurevilly, who died in 1899, was a pigmy as compared with this prodigy; Oscar Wilde a twittering imitation, and Maurice Barrès only a fop. Montesquiou alone had an authentic genius for the absurd, and the effrontery to carry off his poses in the manner they deserved. The sire and child of all the extravagances of symbolism, the original of the Des Esseintes of "A Rebours" and the Charlus of "A la Recherche du Temps Perdu," the most lavish, fastidious, and original entertainer in Paris, he was a figure which it took eight centuries to produce and the like of which our century is not likely to know again. The mystery with which he habitually surrounded his person; the apartments of his earlier years, embellished with all the strange richness of the Orient; his later establishments in Versailles, Le Pavillon des Muses and Le Palais Rose, decorated in exquisite taste; his perverse affectations—the cult of the hydrangea, the symphonies of liqueurs and perfumes, the jewel-incrusted tortoise, the astonishing wardrobe; his monstrous and indefatigable literary activity; his associations with the whole aristocracy of France and the most celebrated literary and artistic figures of his time, and his outspoken contempt of both; his entertainments, unmatched for sheer elaborateness and ingenuity since the Florentine Renaissance; his sympathetic view of himself as a great poet neglected by the stupid public—it may be said that Robert de Montesquiou-Fézensac spent his life in the diligent labor of creating his own legend and in the effort to live up to the celebrated portrait which Whistler painted of him and which hangs in the Salon du Champs de Mars.

Although Montesquiou published in his lifetime thirteen volumes of verse and seventeen of prose and assiduously cultivated literary society and esteem, he will perhaps be best remembered in literary history as the first patron of that exquisite poet, Marceline Desbordes-Valmore, and as the protagonist of Huysmans and Proust. Yet it must be admitted that his poems are totally unlike anything else that has ever been written. Let us quote the two quatrains made famous by Mr. Arthur Symons, who remarked of them that, though their composition may not have required thought, it could hardly have failed to demand labor:

> Terreur des Troglodytès,
> Sur leurs tapis de Turquies,
> Et de tous les rats de tes
> Batrakhomyomakhyes,
>
> Homère: Méridarpax,
> Voleur de portioncule;
> Trôxartès et Psikharpax,
> Par qui Péléïôn recule.

"Les Chauves-Souris" was Montesquiou's first book; it was published thirty years ago, in covers of violet velvet, and contains some five hundred pages of poetical enigmas of which the above is only an average specimen. For years artistic Paris had been waiting for this book. Montesquiou had let it be known that he was writing symbolist poems compared with which those of Mallarmé would blanch into a puerile simplicity; the fable grew, with its author abetting it; but Paris was probably not prepared for the shock it received when the formidable volume finally appeared. Paris was flabbergasted; it did not know what to make of this strange poet whom it was so ready to admire. The apparently rigid divisions into which the poems are grouped and the prose commentary in which the poet attempts to explain them would argue that Montesquiou actually aimed at some intangible end; but that any one ever surmised what this might be is very doubtful. Despite the commentary, the poems are so many words—great, gorgeous, flowering, monstrous words, to be sure; words that Phoibos Apollo might have flung at Ares to shame the hot-headed god with his ignorance of Greek roots, but words without the slightest meaning. His subsequent poems only repeat this original obscurity, which no one has thus far taken the trouble to penetrate. Rémy de Gourmont pretended to believe that the vagueness might after all conceal a mystery, but one can see all too clearly the quandary of this affable critic, who wished to encourage even at the risk of insincerity. Extraordinary and memorable as he was as a man, as a poet Montesquiou will probably have to wait long for that celebrity of which he was so certain.

"Les Pas Effacés" is in many ways Montesquiou's best gift to that posterity, for it reveals a remarkable character in whose consciousness converged the richest social and artistic streams of his half-century. The last survivor of an ancient house, of the first nobility of France, rich, strangely gifted, and determined to reduce every detail of his life to the precious delicacy of a fine art, Comte Robert was by his very nature a romantic figure. A royalist stubbornly demanding all the rights of precedence observed before the revolution, and at the same time an artist avid for the society of writers, painters, and actors, his social situation was unique. He could look down on his aristocratic friends and relatives as bores; he could look down on his artistic associates as boors. He did both. Literature has probably never known a greater snob than the protagonist of "Les Pas Effacés," who adored the earth trodden by the foot of Gabriele d'Annunzio and introduced the poet to Ida Rubenstein, but could never quite forgive him for his humble origins. He is at his best when writing of his illustrious ancestors, and he does so often and at great length. One remembers Des Esseintes when Montesquiou writes of his family, as one remembers Monsieur de Charlus when he writes of art. And his malignity is incredible. He quarreled, literally, with everyone with whom he came into intimate contact throughout his long life (he was born in 1855), from his tutors and the members of his parents' household to his friends in Versailles.

His intolerance was equaled only by his egotism, and when we have said that, we have not said all by any means. He was even capable of regarding Marcel Proust, whom he knew intimately over a number of years, with an indifferent patronage; and he undoubtedly fancied himself to be the intellectual peer, if not the superior, of the most famous of the illustrious throng that frequented his receptions in his Pavillon des Muses.

WILLIAM A. DRAKE

Books in Brief

German Books. A Selection from the Most Important Publications of the Years 1914-1925. Columbia University Press.

Between 1914 and 1925 there were published in Germany about a quarter of a million books. From this number the German Publishers' Association has selected a list of 15,000 representative works for exhibition in this country. The exhibition at Columbia deservedly attracted general attention. For this catalogue, a volume of some 700 pages, makes it clear that the collection offers indeed a remarkably comprehensive conspectus of the German scientific and literary output during the last decade. The bulk of the volume covers, in an admirably systematic and perspicuous arrangement, the whole field of the mental, natural, and technical sciences, with a comparatively brief appendix on belles-lettres and editions de luxe.

J. G. Fichte Briefwechsel. Kritische Gesamtausgabe von Hans Schulz. Zwei Bände. Leipzig: H. Haessel.

Since, in 1830, Fichte's son brought out his father's "Life and Letters" numerous additions to Fichte's correspondence have been published here and there; other letters remained in private hands. All of this material, together with the revised text of the original collection, is brought together in this, the first truly authoritative and adequate record of the great philosopher's intimate life, prepared with remarkable circumspection and accuracy by the librarian of the German Supreme Court. Of the character revealed in this record a glimpse is given in the following passage from a letter written in 1807, during the occupation of Berlin by the French: "People here are near utter despair, and it is hard to see what is to become of us during the approaching winter if these guests are not going to leave us. I, locked up in a lonely garden house and thereby exempt from quartering any soldiers, am doing my best not to let any sound of that despair or of the insults which cause it cross my threshold, so that I may preserve the freedom of my spirit to think out principles of a better order of things." This was the state of mind from which came the "Addresses to the German Nation."

Wanderungen mit Kaiser Wilhelm II. By Alfred Niemann. Leipzig: Verlag K. F. Koehler.

Like the earlier books written under his own name, this defense by the Kaiser dictated to one of his former staff officers deals in large part with his treatment of the great but irritating Iron Chancellor. "The Germans," once said the French journalist Paul de Cassagnac, "are not a great people. If Bismarck had belonged to us Frenchmen, not the Pantheon, not the vault of Heaven itself, would have been large enough to do justice to him." Which is all very fine when it is merely a question of tributes and honors, although it would have been more than ambitious young blood could have stood to dance long to Bismarck's peremptory piping, especially since there is no reason to believe that the old autocrat could have bellowed a growing and discontented populace into submission many years longer. We are strongly inclined to agree with the ex-Kaiser that Bismarck, unless he had become a very different Bismarck, had served long enough for his own glory and nearly long enough for Germany's. "The years 1806 and 1813, 1866 and 1871, 1914 and 1918 were real crises in Germany's history, but not the year 1890," says the former Kaiser very justly. But why not add to the list of years of decision the year 1878, when the passing of the first anti-Socialist agitation marked the open declaration of a class war which was but a symptom of Germany's swelling growth, ambition, and impatience? Students of the Great War and its causes would do well to start with that year.

Aids for Editors

Survey of International Affairs for 1920-1923. By Arnold V. Toynbee. Oxford University Press. $9.

This invaluable volume includes a summary of eighteen international predecessors of the Locarno Conference, a record of the League's work, a short history of reparations; country by country is covered systematically, concisely, and—curiously—interestingly. Extracts from documents and bibliographies dot the text. Harassed editors will find it and its successors more useful than the "World Almanac." Naturally Mr. Toynbee is at his best in Western Europe. Neither Lenin's nor Gandhi's name appears in the index. Asia and Africa appear only when Europe—or Europe and America—attempt to legislate for them.

The World After the Peace Conference. By Arnold V. Toynbee. Oxford University Press. $1.75.

A preface to the Survey of International Affairs, which grew into a book. A few of Mr. Toynbee's pages remind one of the fact that he was the most plausible of British propagandists during the war.

The French Debt Problem. By Harold G. Moulton and Cleona Lewis. The Macmillan Company. $2.

A Washington [illegible] says that this book cost the United States billions of dollars. Certainly no one who reads it will expect large debt payments by France to the United States. It is a mine of facts on public finance of France, exposing the dishonest budget-juggling and virtual bankruptcy of that country. France's chief difficulty is in paying her internal debt charges, and the authors recommend a flat reduction of interest to 2 per cent. Without some such form of capital levy they see scant hope. The dogmatism of some of their conclusions is excused by the effective assemblage and analysis of difficult data. An editor who has not studied Moulton has a poor right to write on the debt settlements.

International Economic Policies. By W. S. Culbertson. D. Appleton and Company. $3.50.

An unusual book by an unusual man, treating of discriminatory tariffs, international tariff bargaining, the "open-door" imperial preference, foreign loans, monopoly of raw materials, coastwise shipping regulations, with the intimate knowledge acquired as a member of the United States Tariff Commission and a broad but strictly pragmatic international outlook. It includes valuable data on the tariff systems and treaties of other countries.

The Permanent Court of International Justice: Its Constitution, Procedure, and Work. By Alexander P. Fachiri. Oxford University Press. $5.

This is a scholarly, documented account of the organization, procedure, and work of the World Court, summarizing in some detail the decisions of the court in every case that had come before it by the end of 1924. Written objectively by an Englishman, it is the most useful account of the court available.

A Handbook to the League of Nations. By Geoffrey C. Butler. With an Introduction by Viscount Cecil of Chelwood. Longmans, Green and Company. $3.75.

An Englishman explains the League in glowing terms. A convenient chronological table summarizes the work of the various League assemblages down to March, 1925.

The Governments of Europe. By William Bennett Munro. The Macmillan Company. $4.25.

This is a useful routine textbook, most of which might well have been written before the war. The author's feet are safely planted in the past, and the trend of his mind is indicated by the fact that he devotes 375 pages to Great Britain, 211 to France, 74 to Germany, 35 to Italy, 27 to Switzerland, 22 to the succession states, and 21 to Russia (14 of these to Soviet Russia).

Russia Today: The Official Report of the British Trade Union Delegation, 1925. International Publishers. $1.25.

The most comprehensive report yet issued by any group which has visited Soviet Russia. An enormous task of friendly research lies behind the chapters on politics, finance, industry, religion, education, health, organized labor, and cooperation, which are followed by an effective exposure of the forged Zinoviev letter which played so large a part in the last British electio. .

Problems in Pan Americanism. By Samuel Guy Inman. George H. Doran Company. $2.

Dr. Inman writes of Pan Americanism and American imperialism with a human touch born of personal contact with Latin Americans. He understands their point of view. This is a new edition of a book widely used in college courses and church classes.

Opium as an International Problem: The Geneva Conferences. By W. W. Willoughby. Johns Hopkins Press. $4.50.

The documents in the case, assembled with discrimination by the able scholar who was counselor to the Chinese delegation at the conferences.

The Nation's Poetry Prize

THE NATION offers an annual poetry prize of $100 for the best poem submitted by an American poet in a contest conducted by The Nation each year between Thanksgiving and New Year's Day. The rules for the contest in 1925 are as follows:

1. Each manuscript submitted in the contest must reach the office of The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York City, not earlier than Tuesday, December 1, and not later than Thursday, December 31, plainly marked on the outside of the envelope "For The Nation's Poetry Prize."

2. Manuscripts must be typewritten and must have the name of the author in full on each page of the manuscript submitted.

3. As no manuscripts submitted in this contest will in any circumstances be returned to the author it is unnecessary to inclose return postage. An acknowledgment of the receipt of each manuscript, however, will be sent from this office.

4. No more than three poems from the same author will be admitted to the contest.

5. No restriction is placed upon the subject or form of poems submitted, which may be in any meter or in free verse. It will be impossible, however, to consider poems which are more than 400 lines in length or which are translations or which are in any language other than English. Poems arranged in a definite sequence may, if the author so desires, be counted as a single poem.

6. The winning poem will be published in the Midwinter Literary Supplement of The Nation, to appear February 10, 1926.

7. Besides the winning poem, The Nation reserves the right to purchase at its usual rates any other poem submitted in the contest.

The judges of the contest are the editors of The Nation. Poems should in no case be sent to them personally.

Drama

Tirocinium

IN some dim and distant past when the soul was still adolescent it learned the subtle chemistry which enables it to unite the hard fact of physical passion with the tender idealism to which this passion so mysteriously gives rise, and since that day every individual adolescent has been called upon to repeat the miracle under penalty of leading a perpetually jangled life if he should be so unfortunate as to fail. The first vague aspirations toward an unknown beauty come with the first current of warm blood in the veins, and woe to him who in his helplessness and his ignorance sets them warring one with another instead of uniting them in the marriage which nature intended. Doubtless the secret, learned so long ago, reveals itself of its own accord when it can, but all the bungling pedagogic theories of two thousand years have been the result of a consistent attempt to make the miracle as difficult as possible. In the interests of morals, of innocence, of discipline, and of God knows what every effort has been made to set the "higher" and the "lower" natures one against the other, to widen the gulf between the two, with the result that youth is normally at war with itself and that the man, emerging from the battle, is more often than not either the dull ascetic or the cynical sensualist instead of the strangely harmonized and strangely beautiful creature which he can sometimes become. When a youth is brought by some crisis to realize that all the carefully inculcated ideology of his boyhood is false, that the repulsive imagery of his dreams and the whispered jokes of the street corner are not the antithesis but the artificially distorted complement of his romantic aspirations, then and only then can he triumph over his education and achieve an adjustment to life.

Of all the institutions which have ever been devised for the purpose of making this adjustment difficult the typical English public school is probably the most efficient. By the complete monastic isolation from life which it affords, and by the elaborately artificial system of activities, interests, and standards which it provides, it makes learning from observation almost impossible, while by herding together a large group of boys who have only themselves for companions it encourages not published in America.

ENGLISH EDITIONS OF

BOOKS

* *
*

¶ FOLLOWS a selective list of books which are not available in American Editions. The prices given include postage, but do not include import duty.

*

THE DIARY of PRINCESS LIEVEN

Harold Temperley

Madame Lieven was the friend of Metternich, Palmerston, Wellington, Guizot, and in fact all the leading figures in European politics in the early nineteenth century.

$3.15 net

A POET'S ALPHABET

W. H. Davies

Twenty-six new poems with decorations by Dora M. Batty.

$0.95 net

IXION IN HEAVEN

Benjamin Disraeli

A reprint of this famous tour de force with decorations in colour and line by John Austin.

THE WORM OUROBOROS

E. R. Eddison

"An author whose command hardly only and many of the commonly romantic are impressed on every page. His language is consistently and inevitably beautiful."

$3.85 net

SHAKESPEARE'S SONNETS

A facsimile

Photographed from the original in the Grenville collection in the British Museum, with a recently discovered portrait as frontispiece.

HERBERT TRENCH

Collected Works

Herbert Trench, who died in 1923, [illegible] distinctive place in contemporary poetry. [illegible] several poems hitherto unpublished or [illegible] ornamental play. Nefandus.

3 volumes

Selected Works

Herbert Trench's literary executor, Mr. Harold Williams, has here, with one or two exceptions, followed the [illegible]

All the above obtainable from all Publishers

JONATHAN CAPE

THIRTY, BEDFORD SQUARE, LONDON

ENGLAND

OXFORD BOOKS

THE LIFE OF SIR WILLIAM OSLER

By HARVEY CUSHING 2 Vols. Net $12.50

"My advice regarding this life of Dr. Osler is definite and unqualified. 'Read it.' From the reading . . . I arose refreshed, strengthened, inspired to better living."—Robert M. Yerkes, International Book Review.

WINDOWS OF NIGHT

By CHARLES WILLIAMS Net $2.25

"He manages to inject a sincerity into his work that is unmistakable. The sonnets in the book are finely turned and well reward reading."—New York Evening Post.

SIDELIGHTS ON ELIZABETHAN DRAMA

By H. DUGDALE SYKES Net $4.20

"Mr. Sykes' work is interesting and satisfying. His studies may be recommended to any one who desires to become acquainted with the methods and results of what may be called literary connoisseurship."—New York Herald-Tribune.

A BRIEF HISTORY OF CIVILIZATION

By JOHN S. HOYLAND $1.50

Library Edition. Net $3.25

"The text is vivid and interesting but is no more interesting than the illustrations."—New York Evening Post.

THE DIALOGUES OF PLATO

Translated into English with Analyses and Introductions

By B. JOWETT Five volumes, cloth. Net $25.00

Owing to a regrettable incident at the [illegible] Jowett's Dialogues of Plato were lost, with the result that the book [illegible] and very high prices have been charged for copies.

THE WANDERING SCHOLAR

By D. G. HOGARTH $3.00

A vivid picture of life and adventure in the Near East.

AUSTIN DOBSON

An Anthology of Prose and Verse.

With a Foreword by EDMUND GOSSE Net $1.50

A reissue of the well-known volume of Oxford Standard Authors. All Austin Dobson's works are now in the hands of the original University Press American [illegible]

THE LIFE OF WESLEY AND THE RISE AND PROGRESS OF METHODISM

By ROBERT SOUTHEY

Edited by M. H. FITZGERALD

One volume on India Paper. Net $5.00

[illegible] "the greatest [illegible] many [illegible] that I can read [illegible] when I can read nothing else at all."

A BIBLIOGRAPHY OF SAMUEL JOHNSON

By W. P. COURTNEY and D. N. SMITH Net $10.00

A reissue of the edition of 1915. Illustrated with [illegible]

A NATION IN MAKING

By Sir SURENDRANATH BANERJEA Net $6.50

Being the [illegible] of Fifty years of public life in India.

At all Booksellers or from the Publishers

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS [illegible]
35 WEST 32ND STREET, NEW YORK

the most luxurious development of puerile obscenities. Yet strange as it may seem the tendency of the soul to achieve a normal growth is so strong that even graduates of these English public schools have been known who were neither brutes nor prigs, and even within the walls of these institutions of learning it is sometimes possible that something may be learned. So much at least seems to be admitted by John Van Druten, author of "Young Woodley" (Belmont Theater), for in his play, bitterly critical of the whole system, he nevertheless tells the story of one boy who was able, at the expense of much unnecessary agony, to come through.

It is now nearly a century since the gentle Cowper wrote his sarcastic couplets advising the father to send his son to a public school where a tavern waiter

> [illegible] and bosom friend shall prove
> And some street-pacing harlot his first love, and several novels dealing with school life in a manner very different from that of "Tom Brown" have recently been published; but no work taking the school as its scene has, I think, shown a more tender insight into the soul of the adolescent or achieved a more genuinely artistic effect than the play at present under discussion. Against an admirably sketched background it tells the story of a tortured boy, unable to disengage his romantic impulses from the filthy associations of the schoolyard, who finds his salvation in the love of a House Master's young wife. Their relations, which have developed no further than an impulsive embrace, are discovered; the boy is expelled and the wife, realizing how fantastic is the situation into which she has drifted, bids him goodby. But the little drama has liberated his soul; he has learned what he needed to know—that passionate love is not necessarily of the gutter—and thus he has triumphed over his education, for he has achieved in his own person the fusion achieved by the race so many centuries ago.

Incidentally the fact that the play was forbidden by the censor in England affords another example of the way in which censorship operates chiefly against ideas rather than against the indecencies which it is supposed to prevent. As most admirably performed here by Glenn Hunter and Helen H. Gahagan the piece is poetically delicate and completely inoffensive. Its frankness is not half so brutal as that of dozens of plays which pass unchallenged, and whether or not the censor was aware of the fact it was not any indecency which offended him. The public school is a revered institution, and censors are a good deal more sensitive to the criticism of revered institutions than they are to any mere impropriety.

Three other plays of the week are unusually successful in achieving their diverse aims. "The Carolinian" (Harris Theater), an honest swashbuckling melodrama taken from Sabatini's novel, is excellent in its way and affords Sidney Blackmer an admirable opportunity to be handsomely heroic, while Owen Davis's hundredth play, "Easy Come Easy Go" (Cohan Theater), enables Otto Kruger and Victor Moore to provoke a good deal of uproarious if not particularly search- [illegible] from the story of the adventures of two youths who seek asylum in a Health Farm. An English comedy, "The Man with a Load of Mischief" (Ritz Theater), has, however, the touch of literary distinction to which neither of the two plays just referred to aspires. Its scene is laid in that heyday of dandyism, the first quarter of the nineteenth century, and it manages to achieve a very distinct flavor by the artful blending of romance and irony. Ruth Chatterton, with her mannerisms considerably chastened since she last appeared, gives a delightful performance and she is ably seconded by Robert Loraine and Ralph Forbes.

"Princess Flavia" (Century Theater) is a lavishly produced operetta with tuneful music by Sigmund Romberg. It is well sung, but the book, taken from "The Prisoner of Zenda," is neither novel nor brilliant.

JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

THEATER

MOROSCO THEATER, West 45th Street. Evenings, 8:30. Matinees Wednesdays and Saturdays, 2:30.
THE DRAMATIC SENSATION
CRAIG'S WIFE
By GEORGE KELLY
with CHRYSTAL HERNE

ACTORS' Theatre presents for a limited return engagement Shaw's "CANDIDA" at Comedy Theatre, 41st St., near 6th Ave., Penn. 3558. Mats. Wed. & Sat.

A NEW but still superb cast includes Peggy Wood, Morgan Farley, Harry C. Browne, Richie Ling, Helen Tilden and Frank Henderson. Staged by Dudley Digges.

LAST THREE WEEKS
Eves. (Except Mon.) 8:30. Mat. Sat. 2:30
THE NEIGHBORHOOD PLAYHOUSE 466 Grand St.
Tel. Dry Dock 7516
THE GRAND ST. FOLLIES of 1925 including
"Hamlet, the Well-Dressed Dane"
Orchestra, $2; Balcony, $1.50
Early in December, "The Dybbuk" by Ansky

LECTURES

RAND SCHOOL
7 E. 15th Street

Herman Epstein
"The Ring of the Nibelungen"
Tuesdays, 8:30 P.M.

August Claessens
"Elements of Social Progress"
Thursdays, 8:30 P.M.

Leo E. Saidla
"Woman Tenderness in Modern Literature"
Fridays, 8:30 P.M.

NATIONALISM SIX LECTURES ON THE MOST IMPORTANT WORLD PROBLEM TO-DAY
By Prof. CARLTON J. N. HAYES, Ph.D., LL.D.
Professor of History in Columbia University
In the COMMUNITY CHURCH AUDITORIUM, Park Ave. and 34th St.
On Thursday evenings, October 15, 22, 29, November 5, 12, 19 at 8:15 P. M. Course tickets, $2.50, can be secured in advance at the Office of the Community Church, 12 Park Avenue. Single Admission, 75 cents.

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL 2nd Avenue 14th Street.
Lewis Mumford: [illegible] 5 Tues., Nov. 10-Dec. 8
John Macy: [illegible] 5 Thurs., Nov. 12-Dec. 10
Julius Moritzen: [illegible] 5 Fris., Nov. 13-Dec. 11
Will Durant: [illegible] Weds., Nov. 18-June 23
Will Durant: [illegible] 8 P.M. Sats., Nov. 15-June 27
All instructors speak 8 P. M. in the following. Phone Stuyvesant 9266.
Single admission, 25c. and 50c.

LABOR TEMPLE SCHOOL 14th Street, 2nd Avenue
Problems of Race: a Symposium. Sats. 8:30 P. M.
Nov. 21—Dr. A. Goldenweiser: "What Is Race?"
Nov. 28—Dr. Wm. E. B. Dubois: "The Future of the Negro Race"
Dec. [illegible]—Dr. Lothrop Stoddard: "Is the White Race Doomed?"
[illegible]—Dr. Sidney L. Gulick: "East and West"
Dec. [illegible]—Dr. Will Durant: "Race and Environment"
Single admission, 35c.

The Nation

FOUNDED 1865

Vol. CXXI NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1925 No. 3151

Contents

EDITORIAL PARAGRAPHS 585
EDITORIALS:
Those Grave-Robbing Taxes 588
The Infant Muse 589
Loyalties—By Air and on Sea 589
The Baby of Courbeck Loo 590
THE SEE-SAW IN FRANCE. By Robert Dell 591
ANTHRACITE COUNTRY—I. THE PATCH. By Anne Hard 592
STOCKHOLM, 1925. By Robert C. Francis 594
THE VEGETARIAN AND THE TIGER. By Ernest Sutherland Bates 595
LOGIC. By Ernest Sutherland Bates 595
BOSTON INSULTS ITS HEROES. By R. L. Lurie 596
IN THE DRIFTWAY. By the Drifter 597
CORRESPONDENCE 597
BOOKS AND PLAYS:
Walter Hines Page. By Edgar Lee Masters 599
First Glance. By Mark Van Doren 599
The Vulgate. By H. L. Mencken 599
A Critical Creator. By Zona Gale 600
The Philosopher's Stone. By Henry Raymond Mussey 601
Sweet Out of Hard. By Lola Ridge 601
Animals for Children. By Dorothy Graffe 602
Children's Books in Brief 602
The Nation's Poetry Prize 603
Drama: Symbols. By Joseph Wood Krutch 603
INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS SECTION:
Italy's Despotism. I. Local Tyranny in Italy; II. Fascism on the March. By James Murphy 605

OSWALD GARRISON VILLARD, Editor

Associate Editors

LEWIS S. GANNETT

ARTHUR WARNER JOSEPH WOOD KRUTCH

Managing Editor FREDA KIRCHWEY

Literary Editor MARK VAN DOREN

Contributing Editors

JOHN A. HOBSON LUDWIG LEWISOHN H. L. MENCKEN

NORMAN THOMAS CARL VAN DOREN

DAVID BOEHM, Advertising Manager

Subscription Rates: Five dollars per annum postpaid in the United States and Mexico; to Canada, $5.50, and to foreign countries of the Postal Union, $6.00.

THE NATION, 20 Vesey Street, New York. Cable Address: Nation, New York. Chicago Office: 38 So. Dearborn Street. British Agent of Subscriptions and Advertising: E. Thurtle, M.P., 36, Temple Fortune Hill, N.W. 11, England.

IS FRANCE GOING FASCIST? The question is not so fantastic, perhaps, as it sounds. But in suggesting the possibility we have our eye less on the formal public emergence on Armistice Day of the "blue shirts," a Fascist organization, than on the financial pages where the exchange barometer registers the fluctuations of the franc. For if a nationalist and reactionary group should come into power in France, either by a coup or by parliamentary means, it would be due less to political and more to economic reasons than in Italy or Spain. It's all bound up in the value of the franc. If the French Parliament fails to pass a drastic taxation law, including in some form a levy on capital, the franc is doomed and in the resulting crash extremists of either the Left or Right—more probably the latter—are likely to come into power. If Parliament yields to the demands of the Socialists and accepts a radical financial program, the resentment of the propertied classes may produce a reaction favorable to Fascism. But the danger is less in that event than in the other because if the franc can be saved the country is likely to stand by those who save it. And fortunately, as Robert Dell shows in his letter from Paris in this issue, the sentiment of the country now leans well to the Left, enabling us to hope for the acceptance of the Socialists' fiscal reforms—the only possible escape from financial shipwreck.

ITALY'S DEBT to the United States has been compromised, as we predicted last week that it would be, on a more favorable basis to the Italians than was offered to the French. Indeed greater leniency has been shown to the Italians than to the Belgians, although supposedly we made special concessions to the latter because of President Wilson's promises. Nothing matters much in these agreements except what the debtor nation promises to pay for the first five years. That is as far ahead as any European country, in these changing times, need look. Before the end of five years a nation's financial resources may have so improved that it can carry a burden that in advance looks staggering; or another agreement with easier terms may be obtained; or a new government may come into power which refuses to carry out the commitments of its predecessor. Let us see, then, what Italy agrees to pay for the first five years. She promises $5,000,000 annually on a debt of somewhat over $2,000,000,000, or about one-quarter of 1 per cent. As this $2,000,000,000 is costing us some $80,000,000 annually at 4 per cent interest it is obvious that for the first five years Italy is not liquidating any of the principal of her debt and is undertaking to pay only one-sixteenth of our own carrying charges. Incidentally we accept from her for the first five years a percentage amounting to only a fourth of that which we so cavalierly refused from France.

WE DO NOT SAY THIS in any spirit of unfriendliness toward Italy or of criticism of our Debt Commission. On the contrary we approve of the agreement and hope that it will be accepted by Congress. The Nation, as its readers know, would have offered more generous terms and would have done it long ago. Before the growth of the frightful post-war hates and reprisals that have racked Europe during recent years, before the German mark went to smash and the franc and lira tumbled to their present levels, The Nation advocated the cancelation of the European war debts to the United States in return for equivalent concessions to Germany in the way of reparations and a restriction of Allied military activities. Our plan met with no sympathetic response in Washington, but our predictions that in any event America would never be able to make substantial collections from any of the countries involved, except Great Britain, have been amply confirmed by the debt agreements so far. Yet Mr. Coolidge's supporters, ably assisted by a careless or dishonest press, are trying to make the American people believe that he is recovering their money just as six years ago they were bamboozled into believing that he saved Boston at the time of the police strike.

THE OPERA BOUFFE PLOT against Premier Mussolini's life proceeds merrily to its not unexpected conclusion. All the elements of the best musical comedy were there: the mysterious stranger who engaged not one but three hotel rooms giving on the Palazzo Chigi, where the Premier was expected to speak; the attentive host who saw, as he was watching the crowds from the sidewalk and waiting for the Great Man to appear, a malevolent eye gleaming from a particular window in his hostelry; the brave police who, having scented the plot, needed only this hint to rush to the room with the balcony, where they found a man in the uniform of a major general, a black shirt deceptively showing above his tunic, the blinds closed, and the malevolent eye trained along the barrel of a rifle pointed through a slit in the window covering. Then, of course, there were tons of seized documents, dozens of secret meetings, lodgings taken in out-of-the-way quarters of the city, and last, but by no means least, a beautiful young woman arrested as the accomplice of the pseudo major general. Now we have Te deums, letters of congratulation, a great meeting of 100,000 in the Piazza Colonna at Rome at which the Premier, with a wave of his hand, quieted the thirst of the crowd for bloody revenge. "You will obey because I wish it," he said magnificently—and of course they did, and went home like lambs. It is perhaps doing Signor Mussolini—who, one assumes, has no real wish to be assassinated—a grave injustice to point out that all this has a fishy smell, especially when it is so promptly accompanied by even severer measures against the opposition to Fascismo. Seven more papers have been suppressed or are daily censored; the jails have been crowded with suspects.

MUSSOLINI HIMSELF, it is said, fully expects to die with his boots on of an assassin's bullet. At any rate, he takes what care of himself he can. At Locarno, where every other minister went unaccompanied and unarmed, he was preceded and followed by a score of guards even when he motored. He was not a popular figure there, one gathers. Of the 200 press representatives present a bare dozen did not boycott him; he was the only important person not invited to the dinner given by the foreign correspondents to the leaders of the various delegations. And the correspondents did not hesitate openly to express their disapproval of his high-handed methods in banishing accredited newspaper representatives from Italy and in his stringent censorship of outgoing dispatches. When the leader of Fascismo tried to bait the correspondent of the London Daily Herald by inquiring of him: "Is communism marching on?" the correspondent quietly denied that he was a communist. "I thought you were," replied Mussolini; "perhaps I am mistaken?" "You are," was the reply, and another correspondent standing by added: "As is often the case." Such retorts, of course, do Mussolini no harm; while they may gall him, they break no bones; and they give no indication of the state of affairs in Italy itself. There one hears no such impertinences. A proposed law, which is sure to be passed at the new session of Parliament, will make speaking or writing against the Premier a penal offense and will make him responsible only to the Crown. If resentment brews, it boils below the surface. But the Italians are a hot-blooded race; and Fascism has placed a curb upon them more sudden and more constricting than any modern nation has had to endure.

AT LAST THE ALLIES have done the proper thing; they have agreed to quit Cologne on December 1 and to end civil control in the Rhineland in short order. The former they should have done nearly a year ago, but they deliberately violated the Treaty of Versailles by staying at the bridgehead. In order to do this they trumped up charges that Germany had not thoroughly disarmed, charges which our own Ambassador to Berlin declared to be poppycock and nonsense, but were good enough to be held over the heads of the Germans and used as a means to get further concessions from them. Locarno has changed that attitude, and the Council of Ambassadors met hastily to take action so that the German Government could have the benefit of the news to head off nationalist opposition to the ratification of the Locarno treaty. The abolition of civilian control in the Rhineland will be a special boon to the cities of the occupied area where the French have governed with a high hand, taking the best apartments for themselves, compelling almost bankrupt cities to build huge barracks and apartment houses, establishing brothels and requiring the municipalities to fill them with German girls for the use of their colored and white troops alike, and inflicting all kinds of petty pin-prickings upon the inhabitants that conquerors are wont to inflict upon the conquered—that Germany would doubtless have inflicted had her troops won and held French cities. The ways of conquerors are as old as the ways of men and never do they breed anything but hatred and bitterness and the spirit of revenge. It is joyous news, therefore, not only for the Germans but for all the world, that the Germans are going to govern their own cities in the Rhineland, that the remaining occupation will be purely military and will be considerably decreased—which is the next best thing to getting out altogether.

THE LOSS of the British submarine M-1 with sixty lives has rightly stirred public sentiment here and abroad. There is something particularly ghastly in the picture people have of a boat suddenly plunging to the bottom and lying there with her crew well and unhurt, but beyond all rescue. It does not need a Victor Hugo to paint the horror of such an ending, men slowly asphyxiating, or committing suicide, or going mad, or even dying of starvation. So Lady Astor, Chairman McKinnon of Lloyds, Lords Cecil, Parmoor, and Sydenham, and many others in England have raised their voices to demand the abolition of this terrible engine of war, and Senators Borah and Swanson have joined in on this side of the Atlantic. Senator Swanson, speaking as chairman of the Senate Naval Committee, has recalled the paper restrictions put upon the use of the submarine by the Washington Conference, but if war comes before the submarine is entirely abolished not a nation, not ours, not England, will pay any attention to such rules. Our government, it will be remembered, would have abolished the submarine altogether at the Washington Conference; the opposition of France was the chief factor in preventing such action. Today there is a new and better spirit in France: Aristide Briand, who made such bad speeches in Washington, was one of the leaders at Locarno in ushering in a new spirit of good-will. By all means let us have a new conference to outlaw the submarine, while not losing sight of Senator Borah's admonition that the main thing to do is to abolish war itself, since if war cannot use the submarine it will employ some other brutal and sneaking method of killing.

THE STATE DEPARTMENT has finally condescended to inform the Countess Karolyi's attorneys under what provisions of law she is excluded from this country. It seems that the powers that be are hiding from this dreadful woman behind two statutes—one which orders the government to exclude those favoring revolution by violence, and a second, a war-time law, which gives the President and his subordinates sweeping powers to control the entry of aliens. Well, the Countess is about as violent a revolutionist as Ramsay MacDonald. As for the war-time law giving the President the power to say who shall or shall not enter this country according to his prejudices or those of some underling of the State Department, it ought to be repealed together with all the other products of war-time hysteria which still disfigure our statute books, including the conscription and censorship laws which automatically go into effect as soon as we enter the next war to end war. All of which does not explain the abject terror of the great Government of the United States at the possibility that one exceptionally well-bred and charming woman, who has devoted her best years to the advocacy of purely American doctrines of democratic liberalism, might enter this country and deliver a few lectures on conditions in Europe. It remains both a base and contemptible attitude which nobody but a Coolidge and a Kellogg could possibly father.

AFTER MONTHS of vacillation Governor Sorlie of North Dakota has appointed Gerald P. Nye, a country editor, thirty-three years of age, who is affiliated with the Nonpartisan League, United States Senator to succeed the late Senator Ladd. The Washington Administration has been determined to prevent the appointment of a Progressive Senator, and so it sent Senator George H. Moses to tell Governor Sorlie that he had no authority to make any appointment since North Dakota had passed no law specifically conferring such a power upon him. The Governor, therefore, issued a writ for a special election in June, next, to fill the vacancy. Now he has changed his mind. The result is that a pretty fight will take place in the Senate when the Senator-designate seeks to take his seat. If the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections follows the Administration's wishes, Mr. Nye will not be seated. The Progressives in the Senate are reported to be welcoming the opportunity to close their ranks and to fight for a man they can all welcome to the Senate. The regulars are equally determined to keep out of the Senate as long as possible another Republican who supported La Follette in the last Presidential election. They are determined that no one shall say to them: "What is the Constitution between friends?"

THE FEDERAL RESERVE BANK of Boston raises its rediscount rate from 3½ to 4 per cent. An orgy of frantic selling breaks loose on the New York Stock Exchange, and some thousands of small speculators emerge from that sublimest of modern temples, clad lightly in one suspender. Tuesday, the 10th of November, witnessed the biggest day, registered in shares sold, ever known in Wall Street, and the average decline was between 10 and 20 points. This was by no means a panic, but a lot of small platters, with here and there a big one, must have been licked clean. What an infinitely charming and fabulous mechanism our economic system is! A worried federal bank governor in Boston—for Mr. Harding has been through the mill on one memorable occasion before—decrees a one-half of 1 per cent advance in Boston paper, fearing over-inflation; and presto, New York security values drop by the tens of millions, and men turn homeward gaunt and desperate. For the shorn lambs we have no tears to waste, but we await with profound interest the shifting rates of discount registered by the Federal Reserve system. It is this same system which economists and statesmen have vowed to be our protecting wall against the invasions of the business cycle, with its ups of inflated booms and its downs of stagnation, misery, and breadlines. The usual swing which calls for a down has not yet come around—1921 is still too near. When it comes, will this little one-half of 1 per cent—up a peg, down a peg—save five million men from the streets?

THE AMERICAN WOOLEN COMPANY has just announced an advance in prices on all men's and women's fabrics containing worsted yarn. The advance ranges from 2½ to 12½ cents a yard, the average being about 6 cents. This is expected to increase the cost of a suit of clothes about 20 cents. But as one woolen manufacturer has pointed out, the garment trades figure their price changes in units not smaller than 50 cents. Thus if the garment trades are to pass the price boost on, it will be on a 50 cents basis rather than a 20. By the time you buy the suit it may be substantially more, for the retailer, and occasionally the jobber, have to move their margins up, again in round figures. While the consumer pays more for clothes, labor in the American Woolen Company has less to buy clothes with. About two months ago wages were reduced 10 per cent. So the American Woolen Company plays both ends against the middle. It forces manufacturing costs down, and forces the cost to the consumer up. At the same time the cotton manufacturers of Massachusetts are trying to play an equally discreditable game. Pleading the pressure of competition in the South, they are urging the repeal of the State's law restricting women's work to forty-eight hours a week. They want to return to a 10-hour day and night work for women. That is not the way to restore New England's waning industrial prosperity; or, if it is, the restoration is not worth accomplishing.

"IT IS OUR DUTY in college to disregard the individual and to turn out a Trinity type." These ringing words are quoted from a recent chapel address of the dean of Trinity College at Hartford, Connecticut. If the dean went on to say what form he wished the Trinity type to take, he is not quoted, but it does not matter. For evidently he has not been quite successful as yet. Malcolm Stevenson, the editor of the weekly college paper, himself presumably not the Trinity type, ventured to criticize his dean. "Better a radical with a beard and a bomb," said this young gentleman rashly, "than a type—a [illegible] man without brains enough or courage enough to declare himself." And for this criticism the rash Mr. Stevenson was suspended from Trinity for a month, probably on a diet of bread and water, although this was not made public. The Nation suggests that a better punishment would have been to make Mr. Stevenson stand with his face in the corner, after having written "I have been a rude boy" 500 times on his slate—corrections to be made with the eraser and not with the wetted finger. Dean Troxell must see that discipline is maintained, and since he is evidently interested in the discipline of the old first grade, where every little boy is to sit up straight and look like every other little boy, he should adopt a corresponding form of chastisement. Meanwhile, Mr. Stevenson will have his month of freedom, after which he may or may not return to Trinity; and Trinity may go on forming types without his disruptive influence.

Those Grave-Robbing Taxes

THE untaxing of wealth goes merrily on. It is Secretary Mellon's favorite indoor sport. He has done well at lifting the burden of taxation off the groaning shoulders of our live captains of industry and now he proposes to take it off the dead ones too. This, of course, is as it should be, and the governors of thirty-two States rally to the support of the Secretary; the "tax clubs" of Iowa and Texas (by an odd coincidence the home States of the leaders of the opposition to his scheme) descend on Washington to demand the repeal of the estate tax; business organizations shout themselves hoarse in the same good cause; metropolitan editorial pages bristle with raucous denunciations of these detestable and unwarranted grave-robbing taxes. So the Committee on Ways and Means gives ground.

Why all the pother? Because the federal government has since 1917 imposed a tax on large estates at the death of their owners. Receipts from this source during the period 1920-24 have varied between $100,000,000 and $150,000,000 annually. Preliminary returns for the calendar year 1924 show 12,403 resident decedents with a gross estate of two and a third billions, a taxable estate of a billion and a quarter, and a tax something over $100,000,000 at the average rate of about 8 per cent on the taxable estate, or less than 4½ on the gross estate. Under the present law estates are wholly exempt up to $50,000; between that figure and $100,000 they pay one per cent; and above $100,000 the tax rises gradually to a maximum of 40 per cent on that part of the estate which is in excess of $10,000,000. The tax is distinctly a tax on the rich, and this tax the Secretary proposes to repeal. Nearly every State, with the conspicuous exception of that constitution-bound real-estate paradise Florida, has its own inheritance tax in addition, but the federal government grants a rebate, up to 25 per cent of the federal tax, for payments of State inheritance taxes. Naturally enough, the States want the inheritance taxes as a source of revenue for themselves.

There is something to be said for the repeal of the federal estate tax, but most of the arguments that have actually been put forward would make a dog laugh. Last year, for example, Secretary Mellon, apparently with the efficient collaboration of his office-boy as statistician and heavy thinker, produced a book on taxation that was freely presented to the populace. At page 119 we learned to our grief that if all inheritances were taxed at 40 per cent "it would then be only two or three generations until private ownership of property would cease to exist"! But sadder yet, as the government uses the tax for current purposes, "the result would be not that the government had absorbed the wealth of the country, but that the wealth had been spent and none was left"! And such driveling nonsense was acclaimed by the press and the business community as economic statesmanship—but a recalcitrant Congress pushed the maximum estate tax up from 25 per cent to the fatal 40.

Unhappily for the gaiety of nations this particular argument has disappeared out of the Secretary's boilerplate, but from a prayerful perusal of his surviving publicity we learn that men will not try to build up large fortunes just to have them taken away from their families at death. This is too bad too. Of course a few of us will still modestly try, perhaps, to leave to our descendants that untaxable $50,000, and will imagine in our simple ignorance that the inheritor of a $10,000,000 estate will have a comfortable nest-egg in the nearly seven and a half millions he will have left after paying the tax, while a $20,000,000 estate will still yield the heirs almost $13,500,000 after a rapacious government has taken its 40 per cent; but we sorrowfully confess that the Secretary is a better authority on the psychology of rich men than we are, and if he says that they won't work and save under those conditions, then they won't. Meanwhile our thoughts revert, however, to the two and a third billions of property that passed at death last year, and we recall that the grave robbers got but $103,000,000. Then our mind turns to David Friday, who has had the temerity to estimate that in the face of such confiscatory and destructive taxation the wrong-headed American people were actually guilty of saving $12,000,000,000 in 1923. What can a harassed Secretary do with such a people? In sober fact, saving in the United States is going forward today at an unexampled rate. Mr. Mellon's suggestion that the estate tax or any other existing tax is causing or threatening to cause inadequate saving is plain unadulterated nonsense, as the facts abundantly prove. That aside, he has no argument whatever, except for some ill-fated excursions into the field of an economic theory that he does not understand. Lacking argument, he simply shouts that the taxes he dislikes are ruining business, or are going to do so the day after tomorrow, and all his faithful echoes take up the shout. It is all a matter of assertion, catchwords, formulas, based on the ignorance and the prejudices of a lifetime devoted to the eager pursuit of dollars.

Mr. Mellon has not produced, and cannot produce, a scrap of evidence to show that the repeal of the estate tax or the cutting of the surtaxes to his beloved and sacred 25 per cent maximum—by the way, it's 20 per cent this year—would have any substantial effect in reducing the cost of living, which is the bait held out to the small taxpayer to induce him to shift the tax load from the rich man's shoulders to his own. The question is simple. The taxes have got to come from somewhere. Shall we get this particular hundred millions from the tax on large estates or from a tax on the little fellows? Secretary Mellon has a mystical and fanatical faith that it is somehow better for the little fellow to take it from him; but in the nature of the case he cannot prove it, because it is not so.

Why not leave the inheritance tax to the States? Because State competition in taxation will prevent its intelligent use to the legitimate ends of democratic social policy. The federal government can avoid robbing the States of this source of revenue by extending its present system of credit for State inheritance taxes or by adopting the scheme suggested by Professor E. R. A. Seligman of distributing to the States at least part of the proceeds of the federal tax. That great tax authority hit the nail on the head as usual in declaring that the Secretary was attaching too great comparative importance to purely business considerations, and that an inheritance tax is part of the machinery of a democracy. Let people decide where they stand. Mr. Mellon honestly believes that the way to make everybody prosperous is to build up big individual fortunes, whose owners then will provide capital. Let his fellow idol-worshipers support him in trying to repeal the estate tax, for it is certain to be used in opposition to that theory. But students who have actually studied present tendencies in capital accumulation in the United States and have discovered the possibilities of economic progress and general well-being involved in high wages and widespread saving power will feel no need of allowing inheritance to do its perfect work in helping forward the concentration of wealth. Rather they are likely to agree with our two outstanding older orthodox economists, Professor Seligman and Professor Taussig, of Harvard University, both of whom are on record as favoring a federal tax, with distribution to the States. Taxation is not solely a matter of business.

The Infant Muse

NATHALIA CRANE, twelve-year-old Brooklyn poet, is once more figuring in the newspapers. Two years ago her first volume, "The Janitor's Boy and Other Poems," attracted considerable attention, and now the appearance of "Lava Lane" is made the occasion of a rather unedifying row. Acting upon the principle that even the best poetry is not news but that almost anything else is, a Brooklyn newspaper challenged Nathalia's father to prove that she was the author of the verses in question and then, according to her publisher, proceeded to create more news by causing legal investigation to be instituted into her father's disposal of her earnings. As a result Mr. Crane dismisses as palpably absurd the report that $10,000 was received for the British rights to his daughter's poems, declaring that $433 was actually paid as royalties.

Now, even $433 is a rather remarkable sum as the royalties of poets go, but we are sufficiently familiar with poets to know that their incomes are never worth discussing. We are, however, interested in poetry; we have read Nathalia's effusions; and we would be willing to take a large wager that her verses are her own. Our conviction rests upon the internal evidence of the poems. To those who say that they are too good to have been written by a child we would reply that they are, on the contrary, too good—at least in their own peculiar way—to have been written by anybody else.

Nathalia has certainly read the poets. Her diction, often highly artificial and always exact, is distinctly literary, and her manner obviously owes something to those contemporary poets whose admiration for wit has set them studying the seventeenth and eighteenth century masters. She is sophisticated and ironical, but the materials upon which she works are experiences possible to a precocious child, and the result is a curious sort of naivete which mocks itself. One perceives in them a sort of double personality, one-half of which is a child quite frankly absorbed in childish things and the other half an adult who smiles at the immaturity of her twin.

Take, for example, some verses from her first volume. They are in her lightest vein; they contain none of the more serious touches observable in some other poems, and they are no more than pleasantly amusing; but they do reveal a curiously sophisticated self-mockery. The poet in company with a seven-year-old friend has gone to make a purchase in a Flatbush store, but they are overwhelmed with the gallantry of a handsome clerk.

> He smiled at us, we smiled at him,
> And then we went away;
> We were so captivated, yes,
> That we forgot to pay.
>
> Of course we could have sauntered back,
> And settled, don't you see,
> But oh, we could not stain romance
> With monetary fee.

We are not, let it be understood, attempting to set any exalted valuation upon the verses of this youthful poetess or risking any predictions as to her future. We are merely expressing our belief that the verses are the genuine writings of a child who is more interesting than most infant prodigies. She has produced two volumes which at least deserve to stand as interesting literary curiosities, and she has a right to develop in whatever supernormal or merely normal manner may come to her without being disturbed from the outside. Writing verses is not a crime which lays one liable to either cross-examination or investigation by a lunacy commission, and as for the money involved, no poet's income is, as we suggested before, worth judicial inquiry. She who wrote in My Husbands:

> I hear my husbands marching
> The aeons all adown;
> The highest kings and princes—
> From cavern unto crown.
>
> I hear in soft recession
> The praise they give to me;
> I hear them chant my titles
> From all antiquity,

can look after herself.

Loyalties—By Air and on Sea

WERE John Galsworthy following the Mitchell court martial he would surely be tempted to another version of his "Loyalties." For here we have the testimony of the widow of Commander Lansdowne of the ill-fated Shenandoah that Captain Paul J. Foley, the technical aide of Secretary Wilbur himself, and judge advocate of the court of inquiry into the Shenandoah disaster, endeavored to influence her testimony. First there came to her Captain Walter Gherardi, long known as a gallant gentleman and officer, urging her to modify her first harsh but truthful criticism of Secretary Wilbur and the Navy Department the day after the disaster, apparently in the effort to protect Secretary Wilbur from the consequences of his monumental falsehood that Commander Lansdowne had never protested in person or by letter to him or anyone in the Department against sending the Shenandoah on its fatal trip. Then appeared Captain Foley, who not only tried to suggest to her what attitude she should take before the court of inquiry but through the medium of another officer's wife—a medium not original with him—gave to Mrs. Lansdowne a written statement for her to sign and to present to the court martial. This she tore up because it contained several statements which she considered to be inaccurate. It is so grave a charge that Captain Foley properly resigned from the court of inquiry. He has also denied the charge on the witness stand.

There is nothing inherently improbable in the story. Far from it. The bonds of loyalties are nowhere so tight and so difficult to escape from as in army or navy. There lies the chief offense of Colonel Mitchell. Insubordination is what they charge him with, but his real crime is that he went back on the system and forgot the traditional professional loyalty—that loyalty which in the navy has saved many a man who ran his ship aground, and in the army many an officer who merited dismissal but was a good fellow with a wife and children to support. These are loyalties not unknown in civil life by any means, but they are fealties that are more deadly in such close corporations as the army and navy, with all their inherited prejudices, customs, and traditions.

Colonel Mitchell has not only attacked the system but he has made it possible for officers to appear before the court martial and speak out. We have read numerous court-martial proceedings in our time, but we do not recall a case like that of Lieutenant Colonel W. G. Schauffler, who testified that he had flown 500 feet above the enemy's lines because "the fliers snapped their fingers at anti-aircraft fire." To this General Howze, president of the court, replied: "Now, we were all in France, Colonel Schauffler, and we never saw a plane flying as low as 500 feet." Quick as a flash came the retort: "Then you must have been down in your dugout." True, Lieutenant Colonel Schauffler is only a reserve officer, but even a reserve officer would not have dared to speak thus to a real major general a short time ago.

Other officers who are still active have spoken out with amazing frankness. They have declared that no fewer than 517 flying officers and men have been killed since the war, nearly all because of inadequate equipment or defective machines. They have told the story of one officer being deliberately sent to his death by the commander of a flying field who objected to so many forced landings. They have sworn that if the present rate of casualties keeps up not a single officer of the present corps will be alive twenty years from now. They have even gone so far as to make the gravest possible charge against the Assistant Chief of Staff, General Hugh A. Drum, namely, that he presented to a committee of Congress a report which he knew to be false because it was full of glaring inaccuracies and misstatements, so full that other officers would not touch it.

It is a shocking, an almost incredibly shocking, story which is being revealed day by day before the court martial in Washington. To the credit of that body we must record the fact that it has thrown the doors open wide and that it has not, as we feared, restricted the testimony merely to the question of the insubordination of Colonel Mitchell. That has become a minor incident; it is forgotten in the face of the testimony against the War Department. Already the army stands convicted beyond peradventure of waste of public funds, maladministration, and gross inefficiency. All of this is bound to have a wide repercussion both in and out of Congress. Reports from the West tell us that the people are stirred by what is coming out, as they were not over the far more important and sinister revelations in the oil scandals as to corruption in the civilian side of the government. As our readers are aware, we are not the least bit interested in the military results the inquiry may have; we are for abolishing the whole damnable business of preparing for mass murder. But we do rejoice wholeheartedly that some of the facts as to how the army and navy are being conducted by our professional soldiers who seek to militarize our nation are seeing the light.

The Baby of Courbeck Loo

THE Charteris incident has stirred people's memories as well as their ire. Thus the Glasgow Forward is disgusted by the hypocritical comment of the London Daily Mail upon the Charteris case that "The special feature of the British propaganda was that it told the truth. Great care was taken in obtaining facts and rectifying them." It reprints a delightful statement by a former Daily Mail correspondent, a Captain Wilson. This appeared in The Crusader of February 24, 1922, as follows:

> The Daily Mail telegraphed out that they wanted stories of atrocities. Well, they had not any atrocities at that time. So then they telegraphed out that they wanted stories of refugees. There was a little town outside Brussels where one went to get dinner—a very good dinner too. I heard the Hun had been there. So I wrote a heart-rending story about the baby of Courbeck Loo being rescued from the Hun in the light of the burning homesteads. The next day they telegraphed me to send the baby along, as they had about 5,000 letters offering to adopt it. The day after that baby clothes began to pour into the office. Even Queen Alexandra wired her sympathy, and sent some clothes. Well, I couldn't wire back to say there wasn't a baby. So I finally arranged with the doctor that took care of the refugees that the blessed baby died of some very contagious disease, so it couldn't have a public burial.

And he got Lady Northcliffe to start a creche with all the baby clothes, concludes the account.

Since the end always justifies the means in war time the baby creche undoubtedly paid for the invention of that touching baby of Courbeck Loo. And now the Daily Mail and all the Rothermere-Beaverbrook newspapers, which were the chief liars during the war, are howling for a parliamentary inquiry into General Charteris's allegations.

The town of Dumfries, which is represented in Parliament by General Charteris, also writes the Glasgow Forward, has before this had some experience with war lies. Early in the war much publicity was given to the case of a Dumfries nurse in the army. The press said the poor thing had had both her breasts cut off in Belgium by some bestial "Huns." Naturally, all Dumfries saw red and its boys flocked to the recruiting stations—until the outraged nurse in question, who happened to be not in Belgium but in the good British town of Huddersfield, read the story of her mutilation and telegraphed a denial. That was bad taste, we admit; had she been a true patriot, she must have acquiesced in the loss of her breasts. Some curious personal pride in the perfection of her anatomy kept her from assenting. But the London Times was equal to the occasion. It pointed out that this outrageous journalistic carving-up of an entirely complete British woman was due to a story circulated by a German spy!

Even the New York Tribune now concedes that the atrocity business was faked. At least in its issue of November 15 it allowed its London correspondent to say that a few months ago General Charteris's indiscretion would have been bluffed out on the ground that all is fair in war. Today, he declares, "with a more or less shame-faced recognition that all the belligerents told a pack of lies during the war there is anxiety that this country should not stand out as the champion liar of the war." Hence there is even the belated admission of the truth of Admiral Sims's statement that stories of German submarine atrocities were greatly exaggerated. Thus truth, crushed, rises again.

The See-Saw in France

By ROBERT DELL

Paris, October 19

THE congress of the Radical Party, which ended yesterday at Nice, showed that the great majority of the party is, on the one hand, dissatisfied with the general policy hitherto pursued by the present Government, and, on the other hand, determined to revive, if possible, the "Cartel des Gauches." It will not be the fault of the Radicals if the alliance with the Socialists is not resumed. On the two important points that caused the Socialists to withdraw their support from the Painlevé Cabinet—Morocco and the financial question—the congress adopted the Socialist point of view. It called on the Government to declare its willingness to grant the Riff "the widest political, administrative, and commercial autonomy within the limits of the international treaties" concerning Morocco, and it defined the financial principles of the Radical Party as being: (1) The predominance of direct over indirect taxation; (2) a progressive income tax; (3) a special tax on all forms of capital. Further the congress called on Radicals in Parliament to support only a government resolved to apply without hesitation the program of the "Cartel des Gauches" and thus to exclude from its majority the members of the "Bloc National."

From l'Ère nouvelle

AFTER LOCARNO

"Satisfied, John Bull?"
"Yes, but what does Uncle Sam say?"

Thus, although the Radical congress has not declared against the present Government, it has not given the Government its confidence. The Government is put, so to speak, on its good behavior. At the end of the last session the Government was saved from defeat on a question of confidence by votes of the Center and the Right against the great majority of the Radicals and the whole of the Socialists. The Nice congress says in effect that the Government must not do it again or the Radical Party will go into opposition.

M. Painlevé's speech at the closing banquet of the congress yesterday, at which he was invited to preside, although he is not a member of the Radical Party—he belongs to the "Republican Socialist" group—suggests that he at any rate is ready to fall into line with the program of the congress. Whether the "Cartel des Gauches" can be resuscitated depends on the Socialists. If the Socialists continue to refuse their support to the Government, the latter will have no majority without votes from the "Bloc National." In that case M. Herriot expressed definitely his opinion that the Government should resign, and there is no doubt that the great majority of the congress agreed with him. It is possible that, if the support of the Socialists cannot be obtained for the present Cabinet, M. Painlevé will resign and then form a new Cabinet more definitely to the Left. M. Herriot is unlikely again to become Prime Minister, but another possibility is a revival of the Herriot Cabinet or something very like it under some other Radical Prime Minister such as René Renoult. There is also the possibility that the Socialists will refuse to revive the "Cartel" on any terms and that a "Cabinet of Concentration" will be formed, but that seems to me improbable. The feeling of the country is so plainly on the Left that a Center Government could not long survive. Moreover almost the only political leader capable of forming one is M. Briand, and it is unlikely that he would be willing. He knows which way the wind is blowing. I doubt whether he would consent to become Prime Minister except as head of a Government of the Left with the support of the Socialists. Even after the resignation of M. Herriot he made the support of the Socialists a condition of accepting the premiership and refused it because that support was not forthcoming. He has more reason to make the same condition now, when the various local elections held this year have confirmed the victory of the Left at the general election in May, 1924. The difficulties of the Painlevé Cabinet are mainly due to the fact that it was formed before the municipal elections, which everybody then expected to be a setback to the parties of the Left. For that reason a policy was adopted calculated to appease the moderate electors. The result of the municipal elections was a great victory for the Left, and the Painlevé Cabinet was put in a false position.

Perhaps it would be easier for another Prime Minister to redress the situation. The liquidation of the Riffian adventure is the most urgent necessity. It is now plain that there is no likelihood of finishing the war this year. The French troops will have to go into winter quarters to start again in the spring, and the campaign is likely to be a long one. Curiously enough, although the war is very unpopular, there is less open protest against it than in its earlier stages. This may be partly because the partial Franco-Spanish successes have produced an excessive optimism and a belief that the war will soon be finished, but probably more because the French people are so exhausted and so morally anemic that they seem incapable of any reaction.

The terms of peace offered to Abd-el-Krim are far from guaranteeing the Riff such an autonomy as the Radical congress has demanded. They are so vague that the offer was a farce. Who, for instance, is to supply the police force mentioned in the terms? Presumably the French, in which case France would have something like a joint protectorate with Spain over the Riff. It is probable that Abd-el-Krim would now abandon his demand for complete independence if he were offered a genuine autonomy, extending to everything except foreign relations. The French objection to giving the Riff complete independence, including separate relations with foreign countries, is that it might lead to the introduction of some other Power—Italy is, of course, the Power indicated—into Morocco. But there is no valid objection to granting complete autonomy, short of the control of foreign relations.

The difficulty between M. Caillaux and the Socialists arises from the opposition of the former to a capital levy, which he frankly expressed at the Nice congress, although the majority of the delegates were evidently against him and agreed with the Socialists on this point. In the resolution finally adopted and accepted by M. Caillaux the term "capital levy" was not used and, as I have said, that of a "special tax on capital" was substituted for it. M. Caillaux opposes a capital levy, not for any reason of principle but because he believes that it is not practicable. In my opinion, he is probably right, and in any case a special additional tax on incomes derived from invested capital, which M. Caillaux is prepared to accept, would serve the same purpose. A capital levy is merely a way of compounding income tax.

The member of the Government whom nobody criticizes at this moment is M. Briand, who has returned from Locarno with the laurels of victory—a pacific victory. It is, of course, in itself a great gain that Germany has at last been admitted to a conference on terms of equality. The Western Pact will be chiefly valuable in so far as it inaugurates a new policy and a new spirit, and leads to a practical revision of the Treaty of Versailles. If it has not those results its value will be smaller. The pact puts England in the position in which she should have been in 1914—that of taking sides against whichever party is guilty of an aggression—and a definition of aggression is provided by the agreement to submit all disputes to arbitration.

This is much, but nevertheless a change of spirit is essential and, although it is needed both in France and Germany, the need is greater here. The latest example of the temper that prevails is the outcry against the invitation given by the Minister of Education to a German professor to follow as an observer the classes in some Parisian lycées. The protests both from professors and pupils were such that the arrangement had to be abandoned. In Germany Frenchmen are being appointed to lectureships in the universities. Of one thing I have become quite certain since I returned to France seven months ago—hatred of Germany is more widespread and, above all, more deep-seated here than is hat ed of France in Germany. It may be hoped that the Western Pact, by relaxing the tension between the two countries and giving the French a sense of security, will gradually bring about a change for the better.

From [illegible]

BRIAND-LA-PAIX

Anthracite Country

I. The Patch

By ANNE HARD

BLUE-BLACK against the sky, pyramidal, looming—the "culm." Unleafed scrub, purple in long ridges; suddenly torn downward, shelving hundreds of feet in wide bands clay-yellow beside black and clay-yellow again—the "strippings." Long, deep valleys torn by terrific eruptions in which, deadly black, lie sodden marshes—the "drift." Weather-worn gray in twos or rows, in twos or rows the "Pennsylvania" red; now and then a forlorn tree or two; wooden fences, picket or board; a scatter of geese; wind-blown chickens; a bit of garden or an occasional vine—"the patch." A wagon goes down the road, a wagon curtained and weathered as the patch. It is the prized alternative to the company store for the marketing miner's wife. Over the ridges lie the towns—fine cities like Scranton, dyed to the tip of her tallest spire with the black of the mines' dust. Fine towns like Hazleton, clean, brisk Hazleton, with her Broad Street lined with shops of as pretty things as any fine lady need to wear, flowered satin comforts and pink blankets for the cold, furs and fruit and the latest pictorial magazines, taxis and glittering cinemas. Dingy towns like Pottsville, brilliant towns like Sunbury, crowded places like "Shenandor"—as they call Shenandoah in the patch. In that town there are three churches, in this town six. Side by side in the same town are the thin spire with its single-armed cross of the Roman Catholic, the onion-dome with its double cross and the onion dome with its Greek cross of the Greek and the Slavish, and the flat spire of the Lutheran. "Why," said the Greek priest, "do they quarrel so among themselves but unite in the union?"

And they are united in the union. There is no question about that. Even the women, the older women, the miners' women, who have no voice about anything at all in the affairs of their men. Perhaps that is the reason. For it is a man's world, this world of the anthracite country. Titan struggle tore those hills to shreds, heaped those rocks, bored seven stories deep below. Struggle with nature duplicated by struggle with one's fellow-man. Rough men doing rough jobs, getting from their women hard-won help. No frills here: cooked food, a help with washing the man's back when, just up from the mine, he sits in the round tub, tin or wood; a sponge-off with blackish-green "sand-soap"; a clean shirt; hot broth when he's laid up; and always the unexpressed confidence of the simple.

But unity is not merely bound up in this confidence. It exists because they—these women—have a memory of their own childhood, of their own fathers in the mines, of their mothers crying, of a scuffle of feet in the yard, and of moving away from the tiny two rooms they had called home, of a thousand incidents pitiable and terrible which the union has gradually fought away from them. Their attitude toward this strike, toward any strike into which the leaders may take them, is impossible to understand for one who looks at this situation of today with fresh eyes unenlightened by the family stories of these dwellers in the patch.

I left a town in which a fine bank, with its offices above, glorified the name of a certain absentee mine owner.

His grandfather had scored out the valleys for miles about, and I stood upon a height with a miner I know and looked down at his terrible and enriching heritage. Beyond upon the further slope, tiny in the distance, were the weathered houses of his workers. And my miner friend pointed to one of them, quite clear because of its color, among the others.

"My mother lived for forty-nine years in that house," he said, "and when my father was killed in his mine, he" (bitterly he mentioned the name of the banker) "put her out in three days' time. Do you wonder I love him, and don't forget?"

There are thousands in the mines who have no traditions, but there are other thousands who have. It is a bitter tradition which the women do not talk much about but which they feel none the less keenly. Be sure that you can have no sense whatever of the reality of this strike as long as you regard it as a phenomenon unrelated to the history of this terrific country.

An American woman, daughter of a Polish mother, her children playing about the floor, other children off at school, pulled her bread out of the oven and laughed across at her husband. He had just stamped in, his black and white checked mackinaw open at the throat. He threw down on the shelf a fat rabbit he had shot. She passed a capable hand across a high white brow over blue eyes, straight nose, finely molded mouth. A beautiful woman. Her father was a miner, her husband is a miner, her son is a miner. She has been married twenty-three years and she looks not a day over thirty. She has two rooms downstairs and two rooms up. Her stove is black in its ironwork and white in its enamel and shiny in its nickel plate. She has cooked and cleaned and nursed and watched. Her brothers went to work at eleven years of age. Her son at eighteen. It is a step. She thanks the union. She is inarticulate but understanding. She knew—they all or nearly all of them sensed, even last spring—that this might be a trying winter. She has canned the beans from her tiny vegetable garden. She will have two geese for Christmas and all her relatives will come. Twenty-three will sit down, the grown-ups first and the children after. Chickens, too, will help out for Christmas. Strike or no strike, there will be that dinner.

An American woman whose father and mother came to this country from Italy when she was a baby draws the water from outside, cleans the lamps, and tends the coal stove—but she bakes bread in great brick ovens in the yard, fourteen loaves at a time, bread the height of three ordinary loaves, bread that melts in the mouth, bread golden of crust and fleecy soft within like a veritable food of angels. She feeds it to the babies, along with thin slices of wonderful Italian cheese formed into a flattened pineapple, moldy without but bursting from its wrappings into fine flecks of perfect cheesiness. Another handsome woman. Another capable and determined and perfectly assured woman, though her husband has been at home now for four months with a leg broken in a slip of rock in the mine.

I cannot imagine these women being terrified; they were born and reared in the atmosphere of terror and it has lost its salt for them. Women who from babyhood have seen the men brought home maimed, agonized, dying from any one of a thousand unexpected causes, with any one of a thousand inescapable consequences, are not given to hysterical speculation about a simple lay-off due to a strike.

The younger generation? That may be different. For one thing, there are those magnificent schoolhouses where the girls and boys of the miners' families spend the years from nine or ten or eleven to sixteen or eighteen that their fathers had to wear out in the breakers. You will see the motion-picture houses packed in the mining towns, even during this strike, and you will see autos drawn up by those old weathered houses, and you will see fine fur coats and pretty clothes and dainty shoes on the miners' daughters. Not everywhere. But let your stern-browed ancient see only one and it is enough to damn the strike. One said to me: "You'll see them living in one of those terrible little houses and coming out dressed in fur coats."

One might argue that the miners' families have no choice but to live in the houses which they cannot buy and are obliged to rent if they would work. They get them cheap enough, from the five-or-six-dollars-a-month shanty, with no conveniences, yet with a curious picturesque charm inside, to the newer, plumbing-and-electricity-included, stark ugly houses at seventeen or eighteen. The girls are going to work for themselves in various mills and factories. The boys who leave the mines have left the patch, of course, and the boys who are now on strike are hopping freights to Baltimore, to the South, to El Dorado Florida.

I think the girl gets her fur coat for herself. For many of the old men of the mines, the Czechs, the "Slavish," keep their bank accounts safely tucked away beyond the knowledge of wife or daughter or son, under some strange name like "Crow" or "Owl." Not a cent of interest is touched.

There is yet no more than the usual tale of necessity—such cases as always occur from time to time in any community. The hard-luck stories are told by the local merchants who for some time before it began felt the strike in the curtailed expenditures of their regular customers. But as to actual suffering, both workers and merchants indignantly deny it.

Big "Slavish" women, shawled, carrying dish-pans of coal upon their heads, looking like Caryatids, easily walking; Italian women carrying home bundles of twigs for their brick ovens from the woods nearby; Irish and American women canning, cooking, washing again what has been washed too often already—they know how to manage, these women. They make possible to their men the liberty to follow their leaders in this strike.

Glacier

By LOUISE TOWNSEND NICHOLL

Your cool, selective memory moving slow
Is a smooth glacier down a mountain pass.
All those who slipped and fell in Arrowsmith
To the long track's appointed end must go,
Set preciously in old moraine and snow
The coldly treasured jewels you amass
Borne in a frozen pageant under glass.
This is the valley where the ice will flow:
I who am dead but living wait that space
Though it be years until it come so far,
To see, intact in you, my own dead face.
Waiting for light from an extinguished star
Would be like this: my life is held in trust
Until I see that dead face turn to dust.

Stockholm, 1925

By ROBERT C. FRANCIS

AMERICAN optimism may be a virtue or it may be a fault, but when it strays beyond the shores of its natural habitat it is likely to receive some hard knocks. The American delegates to the Universal Christian Conference on Life and Work went to Stockholm this summer full of vague hopes. Just what became of those hopes between August 19 and 30 will never be known. It is certain that days before the conference was over these delegates were assuring one another that "after all the great thing is we have met." Now the people back home are being assured of this indisputable and not very glorious fact. Since the war, groups of business men from various countries have met and accomplished something. So have educators and politicians. Churchmen have arrived at the point of meeting one another. This was not, of course, the minimum degree of success possible. The conference might not have held physically together. One or more of the delegations might have left before it was over, as a few disgruntled individuals did. But that the conference did hold together is not to be marveled at. It was obviously and quite necessarily the concern of its leaders that it should. What is truly marvelous is that men and women who had hoped for so much should now rejoice in so little. Such is the invulnerability of American optimism.

The opening service in the Storkyrkan, or Cathedral, will probably be remembered after many of the other sessions have been forgotten. Against a background of noble architecture and music, and in the presence of a large, distinguished audience, the King and Queen of Sweden with other members of the royal family passed slowly down the central aisle to their seats near the altar, followed at a short distance by the most remarkable ecclesiastical procession we had ever seen. Bishops and archbishops, patriarchs and metropolitans from many countries and communions, with their miters, croziers, robes, and crowns. It was as if the history of the medieval church had come to life, and characters from various chapters had formed this procession for the instruction of a later age. There were faces and figures, too, as well as vestments which seemed to belong somewhere between Constantine and the Reformation. No one could look at this solemn pageant unmoved, but the emotions aroused in the audience may well have been diverse. One young delegate from America was fascinated by the ugliness of the spectacle. The longer he watched the uglier the whole affair became until the force of the impression grew almost unbearable. Amusement came as a relief. Here was a personage with a golden crown and scepter, wearing a golden robe whose train was carried by a hardly less gorgeous fellow-cleric. There near the end of the line came Bishop Brent and Bishop Cannon marching together, the former looking much at home in his episcopal robes, the latter pitifully naked in a mere cutaway. After some fine music and a sermon the procession, in which the whole audience now joined, moved out of the cathedral. As the delegates filed through the crowd on their way next door to the royal palace for further ceremonies the general observation was passed about that the conference had enjoyed a most auspicious beginning.

In the regular sessions which began the next day we soon became aware of a continued effort to have the conference think and speak together. Having met it was assumed we must agree; but agreement usually meant reaching a lowest common denominator. This process was interfered with by the more spontaneous effort to be frank. The result was what usually happens when a person tries to sit in two unconnected chairs at the same time. We were too frank to agree, and we agreed too well to be utterly frank.

The feeling of lack of unity was partly due to the dissent of the German delegation. It was a delegation and not merely a group of delegates as the Americans were, for example. The Germans soon let it be known that they did not share the hope that had presumably brought us all to Stockholm—the hope of a better world here and now. They were as other-worldly as American fundamentalists, and they clung to this pessimistic attitude with a stubbornness that was now only wistful and now almost bitter. This frame of mind was not inexplicable. It reminded the rest of us of what Germany had passed through during the last decade, and it gave us hints now and then of that curious mixture of humiliation, revolt, resignation, and perplexity which is always the reward of the vanquished.

A lack of frankness was most felt where it could be least avoided. On the subject of birth control one passionate protest against our would-be unanimity aroused some applause, but apparently met a convincing response from a good German Frau who argued that the regulation of population, like other mysteries, should be left to God. The quest for unanimity on alcoholism was, of course, a reductio ad absurdum. The Americans were hampered, doubtless unconsciously, in their efforts to justify prohibition by the grand municipal banquet scheduled for that very evening at which most of them would join in the toasts with their brothers of other lands. Of course, advocacy of prohibition is not the same thing as the practice of total abstinence. But one does rather imply the other. The question of war, one would have supposed, would arouse both frankness and unanimity. That it did not was a real surprise. The conference condemned "the horrors of war"—as any group of experienced soldiers would have done during the past few millennia. Unanimity rather than frankness triumphed on the last day when the message of Stockholm to the world was presented for acceptance. Four diehard devotees of frankness prevented an absolute and technical victory of unanimity, but its moral victory was on this occasion assured.

If the attempt to capture both frankness and unanimity in the same net was doomed to fail, there were other failures that ought not to have been. Both distinguished thought and careful expression were noticeably absent. Many times the only escape from utter boredom was to stop trying to listen and to do some looking. The officials of the conference sat on the platform, possibly to facilitate this very thing. The Bishop of Winchester, head of the British delegation, would have been taken anywhere for an Anglican bishop—portly, white-haired, florid, with an habit-ual expression of sweet loftiness which lapsed only occasionally into vacancy. It was in his accustomed cheery, chirrupy voice that he remarked, "as our King George once said, the home is the foundation of the nation." Beside his lordship sat Dr. A. J. Brown, president of the American section, a capable presiding officer, but a disappointed-looking old man. Germanos, Metropolitan of Thyateira, probably enjoyed his place among the big four more than did the others, for it did not entail the burden of presiding. Several years of contacts with the West had taught him to leave most of his ecclesiastical paraphernalia at home, and the role of a frock-coated Occidental gave him obvious gratification.

But all of these men together did not attract as much attention as did Dr. Söderblom, Archbishop of Upsala and Primate of Sweden. In appearance he might have been one of those medieval cleric statesmen who ruled their monarchs along with their monarchs' kingdoms. His centrifugal, sandy hair emphasized the height and breadth of the forehead which often wore a frown when other faces, and sometimes his own, were smiling. Now he would sit back deep in his chair, projecting against the ceiling the problems and solutions which his mind bred. Or he was jumping up to hail a page for an errand which he alone had thought of. When he spoke, he graciously confined his thoughts and words to the three official languages of the conference. But he was too tactful to make a good presiding officer. In ticklish moments he would jiggle the gavel and look at us rather helplessly. What supreme diplomacy hesitancy can be! That the archbishop should have a medical degree with his others, and should also be something of a musician, seemed quite fitting. Clearly he was the real thing, although we had supposed that centuries had passed since the last of his kind had lived.

More serious than the absence of good speaking was the lack of spirituality. It was significant that Pastor Gounelle of France should have turned to the Germans in his address and pleaded with them for mutual love and trust. It was more significant that the Germans sat stolidly in their seats and refrained from any expression of emotion or their inmost thought.

What helped as much as anything to keep the morale of the conference at a low level was the greediness of speakers in regard to time. The incident of Bishop Cannon is typical. He was reading a paper on prohibition that was too long for the allotted time. He felt that the conference must hear all that he had to say, for the bishop is an ardent prohibitionist and most of the others were not. First the warning bell, then the final bell which means "positively no further." The bishop only quickens his speed. Ominous rumblings of feet. An old man calls out repeatedly "time, time, time." The bishop can no longer be heard, but he valiantly continues his fight against time. When he finally gives in, he tells us with a smile that he had just a few more sentences. There is applause. Why?

Fortunately no such incident marred the final session on August 29, which really touched the heights. The auditorium was crowded, for the Swedish Crown Prince, who had faithfully attended all the sessions, was to make a speech. Although it was a good speech and in excellent English, it did not prove to be the great event. Nor did the speech of any of the representatives of delegations. The great moment came near the close when the Archbishop of Upsala rose to speak. A minute before he had been seated in his chair, a magnificent picture of gloomy abstraction surrounded by a sea of standing, applauding, cheering humanity. Now he had risen slowly to his feet. Suddenly we saw the man. We saw that this conference was his. It was he who had dreamed it and labored for it with all his great powers. Now he was taking a last look at his creation, resolved to see it as it was and not as he had hoped it would be. We hoped that we did not appear too disappointing. We were sorry that we had not worked harder, sorry that we had ever been amused or bored. He spoke with wonderful gentleness as St. Francis must have talked to the birds, and Christ with little children. He was confessing our sins from which he did not claim exemption. "There has been much littleness, meanness in this conference." He was looking far ahead. "I do not know whether men in the future when they look back at this conference will call it great." He was standing watching us. The conference was over.

What were the results? Not a proclamation with which to return home and conquer the world but just some new problems with which to return home and struggle. And one of these problems is: Shall the next step be toward unanimity or frankness?

The Vegetarian and the Tiger

By ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES

A THIN vegetarian was once gathering herbs in the forest when he met a tiger.

"Take care not to eat me," said the vegetarian. "It is wicked to destroy life."

"Bah!" roared the tiger.

"I understand what you mean," said the vegetarian, nervously. "Of course, in a certain sense, the herbs, too, have life. But meat-eating is very bad for the health."

"Bah!" roared the tiger a second time, coming closer.

"Yes," stammered the vegetarian, "you do seem to be in excellent health yourself. It is true I am a mere bag of bones. But in the next clearing is a stout beef-eating woodchopper who would make a delicious meal for you."

At this the tiger switched his tail contentedly and trotted off to the next clearing.

"See," said the vegetarian, "how virtue triumphs even over the wild beasts!"

Logic

By ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES

A CLERGYMAN, a judge, and a banker met one morning on the corner of a public square. There they beheld a shabbily dressed man seated on a bench, reading a book.

"That fellow must be a communist," said the judge.

"Yes, and a socialist too," said the banker.

"An anarchist as well," added the clergyman.

They hailed the president of the Society for the Prevention of Vice, who happened to be passing by.

"Yonder sits a communist, a socialist, and an anarchist, reading a lascivious book," they cried.

"How do you know it is a lascivious book?"

"Because," they answered, "he is a communist, an anarchist, and a socialist."

Boston Insults Its Heroes

By R. L. LURIE

Boston, November 12

WE stand together on the Common watching the marchers as they tramp to the bandstand. Along Tremont Street the floats have been diverted and are being carried away to dismantlement and death. Before us march men and women, serious of face and expression, some young, some old, moving forward between silent spectators who occasionally are stirred to applause, more often to hissing. Banners, flags, slogans—"Law Not War," "War Is Hell," "War Is Not a Biologic Necessity," "My First Wish Is to See War Banished from the Earth—George Washington." A little girl bravely carries a placard. A group of sideline youngsters jeer her. She looks neither to right nor to left, and is gone. A pause as we wait for the next division. A voice behind me: "Most disgraceful thing that ever happened. Look at their faces. Not a regular he-man there, not one!" The speaker is tall, square-shouldered, with watery eyes, pugnacious jaw. A group of young men of the Fellowship of Youth for Peace, robed in ancient classic style with legs bare, carry a miniature Greek temple to symbolize the age-old struggle for peace.

Indignation simmers down to sly comment as the Sargent School girls march into view. White middy blouses, blue serge bloomers, gymnasium costumes. Sturdy, healthy women marching to spirited, steady beat. Other detachments come by, more and more women, now young, now old and feeble, but all marching forward. A college delegation. Then, followed by a murmur of anger, and sheltered by a flag proudly borne, a compact mass whose slogans mark them as Socialists. "We believed in peace in 1917. We believe in it in 1925." "Workers of the World, Unite." A thick voice growls: "Yeller dogs. A hell of a Governor, Fuller, reviewing this parade!"

A forest of national flags, indicative of the membership of the League of Nations. Costume-clad representatives fenced in and guarded by aisles of ribbon. And now a delegation from a fundamentalist Bible school. More theologians behind, and then the steady beat of drums. Around the bend marches the Salvation Army band leading its section with stirring music. Here march the children.

Suddenly there is heard loud and harmonious singing of deep-throated men: "Hail, hail, the gang's all here! What the hell do we care, what the hell do we care"—endless repetition by a body of legionnaires who flock to seats before the bandstand. An amen of cat-calls. Enthusiastic, robust cheering. On the platform reporters move about with eager, pleased expressions.

The presiding officer of the meeting steps forward. He is strangely unperturbed as he faces the hostile crowd before him. Police stand about in wooden-soldier paralysis, facing the crowd. The chairman speaks of the significance of the day, of the cause for rejoicing at the armistice, of the great debt the nation owes to the dead, of the resolution that war must come no more. There is silence. Announcement is made that speakers will limit themselves to three minutes each, that veterans of the war, including German and Austrian, will be heard in the cause of peace. There is an instant uproar. The chairman pauses. The uproar continues, subsides. The chairman leans forward. "We will wait for the gentlemen to retire!" The veterans, encouraged by the police, withdraw loudly to a neighboring hill and its lonely sentinel, the Soldiers' Monument. There a sour-voiced singer yodels in praise of their valor. Harsh comment spiced with profanity is hurled at the "yellow dogs" and "Bolsheviks" below. Inspiration strikes some uniformed leaders. The men are marshaled into lines and are marched down toward the bandstand. The police head them off, and they commence a wide-diametered circular swing singing, yelling, jeering.

There seems danger of a riot, when an ex-soldier, shoulder-borne, shouts that they will have a meeting of their own. The encircling march continues. Darkness of night bitten into by the sharp teeth of the gleaming bandstand. The program finished, the leaders of the peace demonstration leave. Only the reporters and police remain—and part of the crowd. A rush by the protesters to the platform. A self-appointed chairman calls for quiet. He denounces the march of the people that afternoon through the streets of Boston as a shame and a disgrace. This day is the day of the veterans. He protests at its being taken away from them. He introduces a Gold Star Mother.

Chivalry instantly appears, every hat is removed, and the Gold Star Mother speaks.

"I believe in peace, as you all do. But this is your day. It is a day I couldn't bear to see used for any celebration of any sort except of the spirit of the boys here before me and those you left overseas.

"We didn't want to see today the banners of foreign countries massed in our streets. We want our boys; we want all our boys and nothing but our boys today. The people of the world don't even yet know what you suffered, and we must have Armistice Day for you boys. This must not happen again in Boston."

An answering roar of agreement. The emergency chairman reads a hastily drawn resolution:

> To the Patriotic Citizens of Boston:
>
> Resolved, That we, the war veterans of Boston, assembled on Boston Common, who viewed with a sense of shame and outrage the unforgivable insult cast not only upon us but on our own dead comrades sleeping in Flanders Fields by the parade through the streets of Boston and the demonstration on historic Boston Common this afternoon of the "peace-at-any-price" fanatics and the hundreds of misled individuals who participated—hereby resolve that
>
> We protest vigorously and declare that we, the men who fought and won the war for our beloved country, believe that Armistice Day is our day, because we won it by our blood, and never again do we want to see such a demonstration on this day as disgraced the fair name of Boston; because we want peace; peace with honor, protective peace, a peace that will warrant the respect and admiration of all men and all nations.

The insult cast upon them is recognized in one tremendous shout as the resolutions are adopted. The chairman takes his final slap at the peace parade: There had been no singing of the "Star-Spangled Banner"! Mentioned, it immediately rises in the air and the crowd joins uncertainly.

Fragments of the crowd pass by in heated argument. "Goddam right," shouts a voice, "The Mayor wouldn't review those yeller dogs. Jim Curley knows them all right!"

An old lady, hat askew, skirt trailing on the walk, turns and screams in shrill anger: "Jesus took his place! Jesus took his place!"

In the Driftway

THE Drifter contemplates writing sometime a pretty little ballad; it will have for hero the author of some great work; the creation will be stolen by another, who will make his fortune out of it, and the real author will die in poverty bemoaning his lost masterpiece. The recent death of Hugh D'Arcy, who wrote "The Face on the Floor"—corrupted by prohibitionists to "The Face on the Barroom Floor" and put to a use that its author never even remotely intended—is merely another instance of this sort of misfortune. While the immortal ballad was being recited by thousands of young women in white dresses and with blue ribbons in their hair, Mr. D'Arcy was vainly trying to obtain his rightful royalties from the publisher. A cruel world, almost as cruel as the one pictured in the ballad itself.

* * * * *

MEMBERS of an older generation will remember how it began:

'Twas a balmy summer evening, and a goodly crowd was there
That well-nigh filled Joe's barroom on the corner of the Square,
And as songs and witty stories came through the open door
A vagabond crept slowly in and posed upon the floor.

The derision that greeted his poor appearance left our hero only a little sadder:

. . . Come, boys, I know there's kindly hearts among so good a crowd;
To be in such good company would make a deacon proud. . . .
Say, give me another whiskey and I'll tell you what I'll do—
I'll tell you a funny story, and a fact, I promise too;
That I was ever a decent man, not one of you would think,
But I was, some four or five year back, say, give us another drink.

Duly fortified, he proceeded with his unhappy story. "I was a painter. . . . I saw the star of fame before my eyes."

And then, I met a woman—now comes the funny part—
With eyes that petrified my brain, and sunk into my heart.

The Drifter's readers know the rest only too well. Young love returned and then betrayed: "The jewel I had treasured so had tarnished and was dead." And then the denouement:

That's why I took to drink, boys. Why, I never saw you smile,
I thought you'd be amused and laughing all the while. . . .
Say, boys, if you'll give me another whiskey, I'll be glad,
And I'll draw right here the picture of the face that drove me mad; . . .
Another drink, and with chalk in hand, the vagabond began
To sketch a face that well might buy the soul of any man,
Then as he placed another lock upon the shapely head,
With a fearful shriek he leaped and fell across the picture—dead.

* * * * *

A TOUCHING tale and certainly superior to the "Red Hot Mama, She's Some Charmer" style of ballad that the Drifter hears on every hand in these degenerate days. Those were the days when barrooms were barrooms, when honest sawdust covered the floor, when the free lunch filled many an empty stomach. A tramp with such a history today would not gain access to the company of gentlemen taking their leisure behind their convivial glasses; he would never compel the tear of pity. Even our estimate of immortal verse is different now. But fortunately, Mr. D'Arcy's ballad remains.

THE DRIFTER

Correspondence

Walter Hines Page

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: Your publication of November 4 contained an article, Walter Hines Page, Patriot or Traitor.

The effect of Mr. Hendrick's biography as well as the memoirs of Viscount Grey reflects unfairly upon Dr. Page in that they leave out of consideration his very effective work in matters where there was a conflict between British and American interests.

Out of respect to Dr. Page's memory, and as one who represented a great many Americans whose shipments had been unlawfully seized, I wish to pay tribute to the very vigorous attitude Dr. Page took against the British Government in connection with violations of international law. Unfortunately, there appears little reference to this in Mr. Hendrick's biography, but I have no doubt that a record of the protests of the American Embassy in England would completely bear out this statement. Time and again the letters of Dr. Page were so strong in his protest and resentment at the violation of American rights that they were, perforce, toned down by Mr. Laughlin, of the embassy, in order better to accord with diplomatic procedure. In fact, unable to express himself as an ambassador with the vigor of his indignation, he accepted letters from American lawyers and representatives, not written in diplomatic language, and forwarded them to the British Foreign Office with a covering letter stating that the inclosures represented the position of the interests involved. This was continued until a time when, to my knowledge, the British Foreign Office returned a letter on the ground that it was contrary to diplomatic usage to address another government, even indirectly, in such vigorous or, I think the word was "insulting," fashion.

I know of no one engaged in the defense of American rights with the British Foreign Office, the Board of Trade, the Procurator General, or the British Prize Court who ever complained that he did not receive the most sympathetic and effective support from Dr. Page. And I know that he was continuously greatly exercised over the illegal actions of the British.

I find little of this in the work of Mr. Hendrick. In fact, I find many things that indicate the contrary, such as the anecdote about the Dacia. Having known Dr. Page intimately at the time, I have some doubt about these incidents because they were so directly contrary to the fighting spirit he showed in matters in which I personally was interested, among them, incidentally, the Wilhelmina case.

Page was pro-British, but beyond and above this, pro-American. Wilson's admonition of neutrality could hardly be expected to imply that an ambassador should not advise his own government and associates of his personal views, although it undoubtedly did imply that in those views he did not pretend to represent the United States and that those views should not be a matter of common knowledge. Dr. Page was fond of repeating the story of an American lawyer who, in talking about one of his cases with a representative of the British Foreign Office, was asked: "What is the use of a big navy unless you can use it to strangle the enemy?" To which the American responded: "What is the use of a big army unless you can use it to march through Belgium?"

I have stated here matters with which I was personally familiar. There may be many other things that reflect the other way, but both Mr. Hendrick's biography and the memoirs seem to me to reflect on Dr. Page, and this out of an excess of desire on the part of both writers to paint a picture which, in their view, would do him great honor. Those who know the other side should present the facts so that Americans may have a true picture.

New York, October 30 ARTHUR GARFIELD HAYS

Russian Agricultural Progress

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: So many other aspects of the Russian situation have been presented in your columns that it seems appropriate for a returning farmer to indicate what he considers significant. Taking a typical rayon, a geographical division which roughly approximates our county, I found that 93 per cent of the land was in the hands of the peasants. What is perhaps even more important than the actual increase in the amount of the peasant's land since the revolution is the fact that it has been given him in fewer and larger pieces, and because of its distance from the village has necessitated the removal of the peasants from the central village, laying the basis for a new order.

Gradually three processes have begun to define themselves in the reorganization of the peasants' life in this rayon:

1. The continuation of the old process of dividing the land into pieces, some near and some far from the village, so that each peasant should have a share in the good, the medium, and the poor land. Under this system the peasant actually leaves his village in the middle of the night to work the land far from the village, returning to work the nearby land the following day. At any time of the day or night you may see the peasants sleeping on the seats of their wagons, their camels or oxen or horses, as the case may be, ambling along undriven —for the only time for sleeping this plan of peasant production provides is during the drive to and from his land.

2. In the next stage, already well defined, the peasant takes part or all of his family with him to the far-away fields, camping there until that land is entirely worked before returning to the village. In dry steppe country, water must be hauled along with the tillage tools.

3. The third stage, which is just beginning, undoubtedly offers the ultimate solution of the problem. This is the breaking up of the old concentrated village into smaller artels or collectives which move out of the village group permanently and form smaller groups living right on the land, which is operated collectively. There has been a great increase in these artels during the last two years, as the peasants have come to realize the impossibility of continuing the individual operation of scattered pieces of land far removed from their homes.

The significance of this third process lies in the fact that, for the first time in history, economic conditions are forcing the peasants to cooperate as producers by the collective use of the land; that this movement is being worked out gradually by the peasant himself and is in no way the result of conscious propaganda by the Soviet Government, although they are encouraging it and helping to finance its development with long-term credits for machinery; and, finally, that it means that the old system of working the land from the village is changing into the American system of living on the land that is operated, but unlike the American farms the land is being operated by groups of farmers who, while working the land collectively, maintain their individual homes and lives and problems.

The Russian Reconstruction Farms, which has just been established this summer on 15,000 acres of land turned over to us by the Russian Government, and is building up a model demonstration farm to teach the peasants modern methods of agriculture, is in the center of the typical rayon of which I speak. It is being organized as the service station for these artels, providing education and material assistance to the peasants who are adopting this new system. The greatest contribution of this group will be in helping to demonstrate for the first time that the solution of the farm problem the world over lies not merely in cooperative buying and selling but in cooperative production.

New York, November 5 HAROLD M. WARE

Visas and Immigrants

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: After I had prepared an article for Service Talks, in which appeared the sentence, "Thousands are emigrating, but America and the colonies cannot absorb them quickly enough," your editorial in the issue of October 7 came to my attention. In that editorial you indicate that Great Britain fell short of its immigrant quota in the year ended June 30, 1925. In order that I might not make an inaccurate statement, I checked this material and find that while a casual study of the statistics of the Labor Department would support the figures which you give, the truth is that while the number actually coming in to the country was below the quota figure, yet the number of visas issued equaled the full quota and persons holding unused ones are eligible for admission after June 30 in addition to the quota of the present year.

Philadelphia, October 9 J. M. SHAW,
Editor, Service Talks,
Philadelphia Rapid Transit Company

Drink and Modern Industry

TO THE EDITOR OF THE NATION:

SIR: It occurs to me that the revolt against prohibition is also a revolt against our present industrial order. Drinking, even in moderation, implies carefreeness, and there is no place for that in the order of things under industrialism. Workers have to be sober, rigid, and staid in their habits. Speed and efficiency give no quarter to anyone who wants to take the time to sip a glass of wine. They don't even permit a leisurely manner of eating.

New York, October 9 MORGAN MAYO

Contributors to This Issue

ROBERT DELL is The Nation's correspondent in Paris.

ANNE HARD will send The Nation another report from the coal district.

ERNEST SUTHERLAND BATES was formerly on the faculty of the University of Oregon.

ROBERT C. FRANCIS was an official delegate at the Stockholm conference which he describes in his article.

EDGAR LEE MASTERS wrote "A Spoon River Anthology," "Domesday Book," and other poems and novels.

H. L. MENCKEN is editor of the American Mercury and author of "The American Language."

ZONA GALE is the author of "Miss Lulu Bett" and "Birth."

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY, formerly managing editor of The Nation, is professor of economics at Wellesley College.

LOLA RIDGE is the author of "Ghetto" and "Sun-Up."

DOROTHY GRAFFE is on the editorial staff of The Nation.

JAMES MURPHY was a British correspondent in Rome until last summer. The Fascist censorship made his work so difficult that he went to Paris, where, he writes, "we know much more about Italy than they do in Rome."

An important letter was sent last week to all the subscribers of The Nation. If you have not received a copy, send a post card with your address to the Extension Department, The Nation, 20 Vesey Street, New York.

Books and Plays

Walter Hines Page

By EDGAR LEE MASTERS

Saying that England's freedom was our own,
So he served England with our sovereignty,
And ripped the breeches for his lord to see
His faithful legs shamed by the cloth unsewn.
Smiles flickered. There were whispers from the throne—
About the stockings? Or the bended knee
Of shanks so shrunk with that diplomacy
Which told our secrets in an undertone
From a hand-guarded mouth? Still as of old
The High Fate has His jest, and may forswear
Peace for the eucharist, or a woman's hair.
But that servility and flatulence rolled
The drums and guns to thunder—was it fair
To have the idiot's tale by these retold?

First Glance

ALL that was said a few months ago about Robinson Jeffers will have to be said again with greater emphasis. For "Roan Stallion, Tamar, and Other Poems" (Boni and Liveright: $3) not only contains those poems which, given an opportunity to strike the critical world, struck then so hard; it marches forth with several important new poems, one of which I am sure is a masterpiece. Tamar, The Coast-Range Christ, and Continent's End, to name only three of the earlier performances, made it clear enough that Mr. Jeffers was one who stopped at nothing in narrative because some powerful thing behind him pushed him on; that he had nothing to learn about the use of free verse in an extended poem; and that he commanded a dark, rich music which liked best to unroll itself in uncommonly long lines. Now, however, in The Tower Beyond Tragedy and certain other pieces he goes past all that to a point where he reveals the ideas which impel him. And, as might have been expected, they are interesting.

They are in reality one—which is enough for one man in one world. And this idea, unfortunately for the critic, cannot be stated in a few words of prose. Fortunately for the poet, it calls for and justifies epics and dramas. I got my first hint that it was statable at all in a short poem here called Night, and particularly in these lines:

Truly the spouting fountains of light, Antares, Arcturus,
Tire of their flow, they sing one song but they think silence.
The striding winter giant Orion shines and dreams darkness.
And life, the flicker of men and moths and the wolf on the hill,
Though furious for continuance, passionately feeding, passionately
Remaking itself upon its mates, remembers deep inward
The calm mother, the quietness of the womb and the egg,
The primal and the latter silences: dear Night it is memory
Prophesies, prophecy that remembers, the charm of the dark.
And I and my people, we are willing to love the fourscore years
Heartily; but as a sailor loves the sea, when the helm is for harbor.

This is far from being Mr. Jeffers at his best, but it is Mr. Jeffers saying what it is that he thinks about. He sees the universe, I believe, as a vast and utterly black cloud enveloping a small and intensely brilliant scene. Men walk that scene, unmindful of the cloud out of which they have stepped and into which they will step again, and they are not uninteresting. But the interesting thing is the whole—the dark and the light together.

The idea is not new, but it does not need to be. And Mr. Jeffers, since it is his own, makes his own titanic uses of it. It profoundly enriches those lyrics in which, standing in his stone tower on the coast of California, he sings submission to the night that stretches west over the Pacific and east up over the mountains. It builds the background for those narratives wherein great people grope half in sun and half in shade—Clytemnestra, Cassandra, and Orestes, for instance, in The Tower Beyond Tragedy, which is Mr. Jeffers's chief work to date and undoubtedly one of the great American poems. And it furnishes the energy out of which his various demonic characters—Tamar, California, Electra, Peace O'Farrell—draw their life. For, although no man or woman can fill the void of the world, yet some men and women try. Humanity, says Mr. Jeffers in Roan Stallion, is

> The mold to break away from, the coal
> To break into fire, the atom to be split.

Always with Mr. Jeffers, as with other major poets, humanity breaks into fire.

MARK VAN DOREN

The Vulgate

The English Language in America. By George Philip Krapp. Two volumes. The Century Company. $10.

This is a large work, and of the utmost importance. It represents years of diligent labor by a highly competent philologian, and is packed with interesting stuff. In his first volume, after a preliminary survey of the field, the author presents chapters upon the American vocabulary, American proper names, American literary dialects, American style, American spelling, and American dictionaries. In his second, he devotes no less than 254 pages to the history of American pronunciation, and then adds a brief but valuable note upon American inflection and syntax. A bibliography follows, and an index of words. Altogether, the two volumes run to 732 pages, and there is scarcely a paragraph in them that does not show hard work and sound sense.

It is almost appalling, indeed, to think of the labor that must have gone into the volume on pronunciation. In this field, save for a few essays by C. H. Grandgent and a few scattered notes in periodicals, there was no literature at all, and so Mr. Krapp had to go to the sources—that is, to the early spelling books, dictionaries, and town records. The materials they offered were seldom complete and never wholly satisfactory. There were inconvenient gaps and even more inconvenient contradictions. Thus Mr. Krapp was thrown upon his patience and his wits. There are few evidences of these aids failing him. He stuck to his problems relentlessly, and nine times out of ten he solved them in the end. No one will ever write about American pronunciation hereafter without leaning upon him heavily. Nor about any of the other subjects he discusses. I point, as an example of his thoroughness in small things, to his pages on the familiar American euphemism, darn. Here his vast philological knowledge and his immense industry combine to dissipate a mystery that baffled even the staff of the New English Dictionary.

Like most academic writers upon American English, he is inclined to be conservative. That is to say, he believes that the differences between British English and American English are not many or important, and that they do not tend to increase. Here, I believe, he often goes beyond the plain facts—even beyond his own facts. For example, in discussing such doublets as brakesman—brakeman, coal-hod—coal-scuttle, and workhouse—poorhouse, he argues that "in most instances the words could be transferred from one list to the other without violence to what one might feel to be the proper character of either type of English." This is palpably not true, as Mr. Krapp will quickly discover if he gives attention to English reviews of current American books. It is, indeed, precisely such small differences that most violently irritate the English, and inspire them to their most furious denunciations of American usage. They bear it with equanimity when we call a quail a partridge—a gross and inexcusable piece of ignorance—but when we say "a quarter of six" instead of "a quarter to six," they are somehow lifted to high dudgeon. The incessant, ill-natured hammering of American books that goes on in the English reviews is chiefly caused, I believe, by this sensitiveness. The English feel that the abominable Yankee colonial is presuming to debauch the mother-tongue, and so they have at him. Certainly it is unwise to dismiss such differences as trivial. They may be so philologically, but their social importance is great—and language is a social matter quite as much as it is a matter of roots and inflections.

But here, of course, Mr. Krapp is entitled to his opinion, and that opinion must be heard with respect. He lays himself open to very few such challenges. The things he presents as facts are seldom open to question. His mountains of materials lie massively behind him; his conclusions are always reasonable, and often extremely shrewd. The chief defect of his two volumes lies in the gaps in them. His treatment of American surnames, for example, is cursory and unsatisfactory. What he has to say is obvious, and he overlooks much that is interesting. Nor is his discussion of literary dialects complete, save in the matter of Negro dialects. But such gaps are bound to show themselves in a work that ventures into a new field. The study of American English has just begun. Many men and women will have to labor at it before it is brought to order. They will all find invaluable aids in Mr. Krapp's pioneering.

H. L. MENCKEN

A Critical Creator

Other Provinces. By Carl Van Doren. Alfred A. Knopf. $1.75.

"FOR the adventurous reader," says Mr. Van Doren in his preface, "nothing can be so exciting as to come upon a library of unwritten books. But that is exactly what ordinary existence is. At least it is to me. . . . Not for years have I talked with anyone without catching sight of a whole novel built up around him."

Mr. Van Doren now presents a group of these studies, everyone the center of a potential novel. His aim being "not to tell stories but to present characters," he gives the reader material to construct novels of his own. Rather, he writes the novels, everyone in its twoscore or fewer pages. Of the persons whom he submits, each one is that which he calls every living creature, namely the protagonist of some action. In The Shadow of a Triangle his method is to disclose the geometrical arrangement merely by the acts of the three Angles—acts of whose significance the Angles are unaware. From the moment in which the wife develops the tendency to defer to her husband in trivial matters of opinion, through her delight in having her suitor conquer her in the water games, and on to her swift, indignant choice of her husband when the other man worsts him in physical encounter, she and the two men, all instinctive creatures, sophisticated but not sensitized, move with but a low fraction of the awareness of their recorder. But in The Bitter Outline a man enters and chiefly lives within his own words; and through this study, which in purity and clarity is like an artist's proof, Mr. Van Doren has, with some soft acid, bitten upon his plate a figure as memorable as that of Ethan Frome—this stark New England figure, weak, near blindness, wifeless, fortuneless, sitting on the porch of his decaying farm, his look on his meadow and his swamp, and he, quiet, wise, reflective, measuring the pace of cloud shadows, absorbing the whole of "Jean Christophe," visited once by an aging woman whom he now divines to have loved him. "What pressure of life must have been called for to discipline him to this pitch of inconspicuousness!" In that moment of convalescence, in which he says that he finds it hard to forgive them that they have not let him die, there is etched an outline which will not be lost from the literature which contains it. In The Life and Death of a Dilemma the simple truth that character makes destiny is given a treatment which composes it as a fresh discovery.

These studies would not be so searching if into them there had not gone the critic's practiced power of beholding, the power to see a man in all his projections, body, mind, and spirit; and to discern what projection, or projections, may be working at a given moment. To discern thus, moreover, through having arrived at a balance of his own power of divination, so that his body does not try to appraise another's spirit, nor his mind the body of another. To have achieved such a balance is the rarest arrow in a critic's quiver, and for a creative writer, with his more sustained performance, it forms one great secret of that arc which he is or is not able to send curving from his hand straight to another's heart. This leisurely and appraising aim does not make for a crude zest, and there may be those who will in this work miss that zest, originally derived, perhaps, from spirited accounts of the chase and the barbecue. Such zest these sketches lack. But here is another enthusiasm, rising not so much from self-identification with the characters or from a creative brooding on their deeps as from that priceless flash of literary second sight without which no writer is great. Most nearly conceived with literary gusto are the brooding and irony and pity and joy in The Scholar, in The Barbarian, and in The Gypsy. For sheer charm these three little figures, emerging from so mysterious a marble, exceed anything in the book. And the Barbarian, protesting, at three, "I like to drown," and the Gypsy, chanting rapturously

> What care I for my new-wedded lord?
> I'm off with the raggle-taggle gypsies-O, are not less memorable than the controlled and almost meditative passion of the prophecy made for the Scholar, refusing, as prophecy should, either to triumph or to ache. It will not do to try to discern all that the race might have been spared if it could have had, in childhood, such cosmically understanding expositions as these; but at least a race so endowed might have started out with, and often gaily remembered, a gift that is, here, singularly like a light.

Self-identification is really used only in Burglar's Dark, and there emotionally communicated by the skilful rhythm of fear and reassurance, fear and reassurance, played in many keys. There is needed only the irony of The Last Heretic and In Search of a Majority to disclose in Mr. Van Doren that which his criticism has always revealed hardly less than has his former creative work, a fictionist who, if he cares as little as in this book to capture a more primitive power, will now set down some of the novels through which the human being perpetually wanders, and wanders in spirit as well as in body and in mind. There is waiting a fiction which will know deeper and more exquisite dealings than those which we now record; and in particular it will not be afraid of just such themes, and just such conclusions, as lie in both the Triangle and the Dilemma of this book. When that fiction comes it may very well be pitched in the key of these studies, entering not so much an aristocracy as an individualism in letters, selecting as delicately as if it were alive. Meanwhile this work moves in an area of superb detachment, a serene and never a bitter detachment—an area which literature may share with the sovereign creative level of behavior itself.

ZONA GALE

The Philosopher's Stone

The Tragedy of Waste. By Stuart Chase. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

HALF our available man-power going to waste day in and day out year after year; twenty out of us forty million workers either spending our days making useless and injurious things or standing idle because no man has hired us or beating the air with fruitless activity in industry and trade because of bad organization—such is Stuart Chase's picture of our industrial order, the order that is at once our despair and our hope. The sober-minded reader will probably declare at first that the picture must be exaggerated; as he examines Mr. Chase's calculations and estimates, he is not unlikely to conclude that the case is even worse than it is stated or, to put it more hopefully, that the possibilities of increased production through waste elimination are even greater than this.

Mr. Chase approaches the problem as an engineer and economist, not as a business builder, wherefore he may be without honor in some parts of his own country. He quotes Wesley Mitchell: "From the business standpoint the useful goods produced are merely by-products of the process of earning dividends." Every economist knows this, but it is not polite to say it in a world whose business slogan is service. Mr. Chase's own standard of waste is that of the functional society. Great savings are possible under our acquisitive society, but "back of these devices stand—like a great peak among the foothills—the possibilities of waste elimination and increased well-being in a society organized definitely and relentlessly for its own provisioning." Mr. Chase is much impressed with the achievements of planned organization during war time, but he is not advocating a socialistic or any other reconstruction of society. He is only applying to our existing scheme the economist's criterion: How far does it satisfy organically good wants with a minimum of painful effort?

The first great channel of waste is the consumption of bad and useless things. Mr. Chase is no stern moralist. In his functional society he still leaves room for soldiers, alcohol, tobacco, speculation, gambling, even vice and crime; but the commercial stimulation of such tastes and the consequent increased provision for their gratification he rightly denominates sheer waste. How much labor goes year by year into the production of such "illth," into useless military preparations, into harmful drugs, narcotics, and patent medicines, into adulteration, into institutionalized speculation and gambling, into quackery and get-rich-quick activities, into fashions artificially stimulated for profit, into super-luxuries and cheap imitations, into perverted professional service like that of the lawyer, into commercialized recreation and vice, into advertising that the advertising men themselves declare social waste? Mr. Chase locates some eight million such workers, and believes that there are two million more. Whoever would quarrel with his figures should try at what point to reduce his estimates; the exercise will at least prove stimulating, and Mr. Chase will not mind, for he has no illusion concerning his accuracy.

The loss of man-power through unemployment, labor turnover, strikes and lockouts, absenteeism, preventable accidents, and sickness has been much studied of late years. The figures are here brought together into another startling total of six million men constantly idle. Yet further, within industry itself, the industrial engineers, and notably the Committee on Waste of the Federated American Engineering Societies under the leadership of Mr. Hoover, have been digging up astonishing wastes due to faulty technique and management, the ratio of waste to production in six typical industries examined by Mr. Hoover's committee ranging from 30 to 50 per cent. The loss of man-power in the whole field of production figures out at no less than four and a half millions, with another two million workers whose labor in the field of distribution is wasted. This loss Mr. Hoover describes as the natural outgrowth of the competitive system, and as capable of prevention only by collective action. His words are not those of agitation and discontent but of thoughtful exhortation. Such also are the words of Mr. Chase as he brings together his figures into a single impressive total of at least twenty million man-years of wasted human energy per year, as he points out that we waste a full half of all our labor and our materials.

But what of it all? Just this. Even today, Mr. Chase insists, we are not producing enough to go round in terms of adequate food, shelter, clothing, and modest comforts. We are still short of subsistence as thus defined. Waste elimination would mean the possibility of raising every family above the line of economic insecurity without the necessity of dividing up or leveling down. But the removal of the dead hand of waste would mean not simply a flow of more materials.

> It is important because it holds out the promise of giving the spirit of man a chance to forget roast beef and bathrooms and boots, and to develop whatever creative impulses lie within. It provides a method for getting the chores done and out of the way in the morning with the afternoon free to read in the garret or go on a picnic or dance a new dance or sleep in the sun. It does not call for speeding up; it calls for speeding down. . . . It calls for the life more abundant—for living instead of existing.

To dream such a dream is to turn economics into poetry, which is all that makes it worth while.

And how shall the dream be made real? Mr. Chase does not answer, but he points to certain hopeful signs—to the cooperative movement cutting wastes in distribution, to the labor movement with its growing intelligence and responsibility concerning waste, to the governments making progress in all sorts of conservation, to Ontario with its giant-power system, "like a beacon on a hill," to the various groups working on community planning, to the studies of Mr. Hoover and his colleagues, to the growing cleavage between stock-and-bond business men like Judge Gary and engineer business men like Mr. Ford. Maybe, as he suggests, following Mr. Filene, men of the latter type will supersede the former, thus ushering in a sort of functional society while the radicals are still shouting for the abolition of the profits system. Maybe—if only enough men can come to dream the same dream with this economist-poet who ends his book with an apostrophe to rushing, roaring, wasting New York and a call for the scientists and statesmen of the future who shall "dig their hands and brains into this roaring wilderness—so finely wrought in isolated detail—and bring from it ordered cities, impounded waters, terraced and tended forests, the sweep of great transmission lines, clean rivers, workshops planned with the unity of cathedrals, and the end of grime and poverty and despair." And the dreamer of today shall be the architect of tomorrow.

HENRY RAYMOND MUSSEY

Sweet Out of Hard

Honey Out of the Rock. By Babette Deutsch. D. Appleton and Company. $1.50.

THIS book of poems is aptly named. There is little softness and no dream-indulgence. Its sweetness has been drawn out of difficult and hard places. Its intuitions do not leap down like flame that glances and pierces: rather, like virile plants spiring out of dark earth, they press upward, drawing at the light. One feels here a spirit deeply rooted, yet responding subtly to the fluctuating forces about it. The inner, almost armored life remains uninvaded, but there is a shivering surface sensitiveness like that of a flowering rock.

Pose of any kind is alien to Babette Deutsch. Often, preoccupied with the intrinsic emotion, she gives too little thought to her presentation. This sometimes results in facile and worn expressions that are incongruous with her fresh and individual approach to life. But even the immature poems hold the definite contours of an original and forceful entity. In others, such as Old Women, there is trenchant power and a bitter irony:

[illegible]
As dogging hatred [illegible]

Marseillaise is threaded with a dark fire, and its explosive lines rock with the thud of heavy, implacable feet. As is evident in Capriccio, Miss Deutsch can, if she so wills, play adroitly, or, as Maxwell Bodenheim would put it, gracefully romp with words. But her chief concern is with the eternal values—with the movements of wind and sky, with love and birth, and especially with death. Her desire seems never to be completely divorced from fear. Though she holds tenaciously to love and all her pity is for valiant youth with "the tossed bright head of folly, the soft impatient hands," she is cognizant always of change and old age and decay. Even when, holding her unborn son, she awaits the light of a new dawn, her thought somberly traverses the quenching years to the final darkness of the moment when he, too, must die. Hers is not an outward but an ingoing vision. It is unblinking and direct, halted but not daunted by obstructions; nothing is permitted to interfere or divert to either side. Her steadfast concentration of purpose is almost like that of the blind. Even in her pictures of the objective world it is as though she perceived by an exquisite sensitivity of finger tips rather than by sight. Her consciousness revolves upon itself, poised, avidly possessive, and, with a slow and steady attraction like that of the earth, draws inward the life about its circle. The love poems are stripped, intrepidly seeking. In a low contralto she chants of love who would take hold

Of the Beloved like wind and iron;
To clasp, to keep, to search and environ.

But with all her candor she stands well back, affording us only a fortuitous glimpse—as when in an elevated train at night life glimmers and is lost again in the flowing windows. Always she feels for the "secret texture" of things. So she would force all secret doors, even of the Beloved's soul.

Though she notes parks "winter-plucked" and "bus tops swaying with awkward merriment," the abiding gestures of nature hold her graver attention.

A cloud-puff is a milk-weed soberly
Shredded by breezes with the fists of boys.

And, as if the mellowed and pastel colors of the fall became her, she draws September about her, as though it were a wind-blown scarf.

Of the sonnets several are very good; and her Biblical ballads move with a young and vigorous stride. (I hope, however, that she will not become ensnared by the sonnet form—whose beguiling rhythms are as destructive as a happiness that arrests the artist's growth by stroking him to sleep.)

Since her early book Babette Deutsch's tone has become more resonant and has achieved that timbre which distinguishes one voice from all other voices. Her presentation is sometimes inadequate to the richness of the content; but there is a quality of sure, unhurried growth which betokens a future greater stature. To quote from the last poem in the book, The Soul, her consciousness

[illegible]
It has yet to adventure to the far frontiers.

LOLA RIDGE

Animals for Children

Tony Sarg's Wonder Zoo. Greenberg, Publisher, Inc. $1.
Tony Sarg's Book of Animals. Greenberg, Publisher, Inc. $2.
The Jungle Man and His Animals. By Cravath Wells. Illustrated by Tony Sarg. Duffield and Company. $3.
David Goes Voyaging. By David Binney Putnam. With a solemn foreword by William Beebe. G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

IT is probably significant that so many of the best children's books have to do with animals in some way or other. Leaving out of account the noble or sentimental or pious tales that endow beasts with human emotions and follow them into their dens to describe in detail what they do there, the best of the animal books fall into two classes: those that refuse to take animals, or anything else, seriously, that invent absurd and amiable creatures with more or less human capacities, and that picture them living in a paradise of games and foolishness, and the other class written by someone who has patiently and honestly observed them in their homes, who does not try to find out what they are thinking but who can describe them as they are, strange and wonderful and inexplicable. The first kind is no more meritorious than the second; one induces laughter, the other wonder—and incidentally manages to provide information.

Mr. Tony Sarg, of course, is a master in the first class. His pictures, brightly colored in green and red and blue and yellow, show hippopotami as happy as larks, pigs on whose features joy shines like a moon, mice that laugh, and elephants that cry. These happy beings live in a perpetual carnival. If their retreats are invaded by human beings they show no surprise, but admit the intruders to their sanctums with the utmost good humor. The two little dogs who, escaped temporarily from their mistresses, are dumped from an airplane into the jungle are conducted through the animals' amusement park, where they slide down the elephant's back, ride the merry-go-round propelled by two whirling ostriches, slide the complicated chutes which require, for the apparatus, a giraffe's neck and the backs of various other animals at different levels, and are returned comfortably to their trundle-bed at night. The text, of less excellence than the pictures, does not matter much. Any child who has ever been in a zoo can look at the illustrations and laugh.

Tony Sarg also illustrates Mr. Wells's admirable book of jungle animals, and this time, strange to say, the pictures matter less than the text. The latter is a plain account of the most breath-taking wonders, the strange things that Mr. Wells has actually seen in Malaysia and elsewhere, the fish that climb trees, the bush that folds up when it is touched, the birds that sleep upside down, the insects thirteen inches long. Mr. Wells has spent many nights in the jungle and he tells exactly what it was like the first time; he discourses on man-eating tigers and falling, vine-wound trees and mischievous elephants. He knows as little of the animals as he does of the trees—he has only seen them; he cannot say what they are thinking or what they do when they are not within the reach of human eyes and ears; but his account makes exciting and thrilling reading.

In as honest a book, 12-year-old David Putnam describes his voyage with William Beebe on the Arcturus. It was a cruise of wonders; there were not only the fragile and brilliant creatures of the [illegible] and birds that were friendly because they did not know man. And David saw and touched many of them, and kept a baby penguin for a pet, and was treated respectfully as a full-fledged member of the expedition, which he undoubtedly was. His book is worthy of a sailor and a man of honor, and it will arouse in the breasts of many less fortunate 12-year-olds the bitterest envy.

DOROTHY GRAFFE

Children's Books in Brief

When We Were Very Young. By A. A. Milne. E. P. Dutton and Company. $3.

The King's Breakfast. By A. A. Milne. E. P. Dutton and Company. $2.

The first is a reprint on larger paper, with the beguiling illustrations of last year's jacket on the cover, of what has already become a classic. The second gives the words of the most popular of Mr. Milne's verses, set to alluring music.

The Adventures of Pinocchio. By C. Collodi. The Macmillan Company. $5.

